

C 62-H163331-46-P635428

The American Political Science Review

BOARD OF EDITORS

Harvey C. Mansfield, Managing Editor, Ohio State University	Edgar S. Furniss, Jr., Princeton University
Wallace S. Sayre, Associate Editor, Columbia University	Alexander Heard, University of North Carolina
Samuel H. Beer, Associate Editor, Harvard University	Victor Jones, University of California (Berkeley)
Hugh L. Elsbree, Library of Congress	Leo Strauss University of Chicago

VOLUME L

1956

46

GEORGE BANTA COMPANY, INC.
MENASHA, WISCONSIN

Q 35,128

Copyright, 1956, by

THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE ASSOCIATION

CONTENTS

NUMBER 1—MARCH, 1956

Pressure Groups and Parties in Britain. Samuel H. Beer .....	1
Politics and Religion: Luther's Simplistic Imperative. Sheldon S. Wolin .....	24
Constitutional Law in 1954-1955. David Fellman .....	43
Cultural Prerequisites to a Successfully Functioning Democracy: A Symposium. Ernest S. Griffith, John Plamenatz, and J. Roland Pennock .....	101
Toward a Model State Presidential Primary Law. Manning J. Dauer, William A. F.     Stephenson, Harry Macy, and David Temple .....	138
Experimental Propaganda Techniques and Voting Behavior. Samuel J. Eldersveld	154
The Administrative Staff College: Executive Development in Government and Industry. Marshall E. Dimock .....	166
Book Reviews, Notes, and Bibliography. Emmette S. Redford (ed.) .....	177
A Survey of the Background Material for the Study of Government in French Tropical Africa. Kenneth Robinson .....	179
News and Notes. Ralph A. Straetz (ed.) .....	284
Political Science Awards Program.....	294

NUMBER 2—JUNE, 1956

The Communist Presence in France. B. Drexel Godfrey, Jr. .....	321
An Introduction to the Senate Policy Committees. Hugh A. Bone .....	339
Cohesion of British Parliamentary Parties. Leon D. Epstein .....	360
Caste and the Andhra Communists. Selig S. Harrison .....	378
Canadian Public Enterprise: A Character Study. Lloyd D. Musolf .....	405
Executive Power in Venezuela. Leo B. Lott .....	422
Responses to Planned Political Change in a Tanganyika Tribal Group. J. Gus     Liebenow, Jr. .....	442
The Contribution of Medieval Thought to the American Political Tradition. Ewart Lewis .....	462
Political Theory and the Study of Politics: A Report of a Conference. Rapporteur: Harry Eckstein .....	475
Revision of the Nomination and Election Procedure of the Association.....	488
Book Reviews, Notes, and Bibliography. Emmette S. Redford (ed.) .....	504
News and Notes. Ralph A. Straetz (ed.) .....	613
Special Announcements.....	623

NUMBER 3—SEPTEMBER, 1956

Woodrow Wilson as Legislative Leader and Administrator. Arthur W. Macmahon	641
Civilian Control and the Constitution. Samuel P. Huntington .....	676
Newton D. Baker on Executive Influence in Military Legislation.....	700
The Changing Role of the National Guard. Bennett M. Rich and Philip H. Birch,     Jr. .....	702
One-Party Politics and the Voter. Warren E. Miller .....	707
Verbal Shifts in the American Presidency: A Content Analysis. James W. Prothro	726
Commentary on Prothro's Content Analysis. Howard B. White .....	740
Totalitarianism and Rationality. Zbigniew Brzezinski .....	751
The Twentieth C.P.S.U. Congress: A Study in Calculated Moderation. Charles D.     Kenney .....	764
The Guatemalan Affair: A Critique of United States Foreign Policy. Phillip B.     Taylor, Jr. .....	787
Doctoral Dissertations in Political Science in American Universities. William C.     Seyler (comp.) .....	807

Book Reviews, Notes and Bibliography. John D. Lewis (ed.) .....	845
News and Notes. Ralph A. Strass (ed.) .....	927

NUMBER 4—DECEMBER, 1956

The Political Science of Science. Harold D. Lasswell .....	961
The Origins of the Present Japanese Constitution. Robert E. Ward .....	980
A Note on the Revision of the Constitution of the Fourth Republic. Roy Macridis	1011
The State Delegations and the Structure of Party Voting in the United States House of Representatives. David B. Truman .....	1023
State Patronage in a Rural County. Frank J. Sorauf .....	1046
Emerging Conflicts in the Doctrines of Public Administration. Herbert Kaufman	1057
Studies in American Political Thought
The Limits of Social Science: Henry Adams' Quest for Order. Henry Kariel ..	1074
J. Allen Smith: Jeffersonian Critic of the Federalist State. Howard E. Dean ..	1093
Book Reviews, Notes, and Bibliography. John D. Lewis (ed.) .....	1105
Selected Materials for a Comparative Study of Local Government. Harold     Zirk .....	1107
News and Notes. Ralph A. Strass (ed.) .....	1219
Minutes of the Council and Annual Business Meeting .....	1219
Index to Volume L. Emma Rhyns Patterson .....	1235

The American Political Science Review,

VOL. L

MARCH, 1956

NO. 1

391,005-

PRESSURE GROUPS AND PARTIES IN BRITAIN*

SAMUEL H. BEER

Harvard University

When an American looks at British politics, one of his first questions is likely to be, "Where are your pressure groups?" Since the subject has hardly been studied and most works on British government largely ignore it,<sup>1</sup> he may feel some surprise when he finds that, even if compared with American examples, pressure groups in Britain are numerous, massive, well-organized, and highly effective. In this article I wish in the first place simply to sketch the pattern of pressure group activity in Britain and to illustrate the influence of pressure politics on the policy of British governments in recent years. This cannot be done, however, if the analysis is confined to pressure groups alone. For their aims, methods, and effectiveness are profoundly affected by the context within which they act. We all recognize, for instance, the differences from the American pattern of pressure politics which result from the discipline of British parties and the centralized power of cabinet government. In addition to these elements of structure, I wish to stress the cultural context within which British parties and pressure groups act and which, standing in sharp contrast with that of the American political system, accounts for many of the differences of political behavior between the two countries.

This cultural context of politics, comprising a complex structure of values and ideologies, cannot be explained away, it hardly need be said, in terms of economic development. We distort the facts if we suppose that new values and ideologies arise only as reflections of new patterns of behavior resulting from objective economic development. On the contrary, political values and ideologies profoundly condition the aspirations which may emerge from economic development, determining in no small degree how people group themselves, what they demand as groups, and how they demand it. The culture of a society may provide foci around which political conflict tends to crystallize—for example, the sense of social class in Britain. It may also—and this is particularly important if we are to understand the present convergence of party policies in Britain—provide a consensus on basic social and political values which endures through sharp conflicts of class and party and which may provide the means for their resolution.

* This article is based on a paper given at the Conference on the Comparative Method in the Study of Politics held under the auspices of the Social Science Research Council at Princeton, N. J., June 2-4, 1955.

<sup>1</sup> In a recent authoritative article, however, Prof. W. J. M. Mackenzie of Manchester University has sketched out the field of inquiry and indicated topics for research. "Pressure Groups in British Government," British Journal of Sociology, Vol. 6, pp. 133-48 (June, 1955).

Nor should we stress exclusively the merely limiting and “boundary-maintaining” functions of culture. Beyond its function of conditioning those aspirations which emerge from objective development of the economy or of other aspects of the society, the cultural context also has a certain capacity for itself initiating social and political change.<sup>2</sup> In certain respects and at certain times, the culture of a society develops autonomously, producing new forms which are neither a reflection of, nor even a response to, changes in other parts of the social system, but which have arisen spontaneously from the existing culture. In such autonomous cultural developments we may sometimes be obliged to seek the ultimate origins of great revolutions in public policy and of the mutations of the aims and methods of pressure groups.

Without embarking on so difficult an inquiry into social dynamics, however, we can observe the interplay between the cultural context and certain familiar mechanisms of the political system, such as the competition for votes in a two-party system. In this interaction we shall find important clues to understanding the development not only of public policy, but also of the pattern of pressure politics in Britain. The analysis is bound to be complicated. On the one hand, pressure groups have their role—a most important one—in the development of policy. Yet at the same time we cannot understand them unless we also look at the changing context of culture and political structure with which they continually interact.

What is the bearing of these conclusions on the group theory of politics? This depends on what you take that theory to mean. If it means that the political scientist concerned with the origins and formation of policy may confine himself largely or solely to the study of interest groups, then the group theory is not a satisfactory conceptual framework for the study of British politics, or, I should add, American politics. The principal failing of such an approach is that by concentrating on groups and their diverse interests, it fails to direct analysis to the cultural context within which interests emerge and act. In the study of American and British politics, such neglect means passing over important elements of consensus which are shared throughout the political system and which involve not only “rules of the game,” but also positive social and political values. Such ideal factors of integration, precisely because they are widely diffused throughout a system, may not strike the eye as sharply as do the differences of contending groups, yet they are indispensable to stable and effective government. Furthermore, not only are forces of integration neglected, but also the function of parties and of the party system may be seriously distorted by concentrating analysis on interest groups. The tendency will be to stress the sense in which a political party is a coalition of interest groups and a mechanism for winning elections, but to neglect the sense in which it may be the bearer of values and ideology and an instrument in their development. Such functions, as we shall see, have been performed by parties and the party system in Britain in the prolonged and complicated process by which the present general acceptance of the welfare state and the controlled economy has emerged.

<sup>2</sup>See Talcott Parsons, The Social System (Glencoe, Ill., 1954), Ch. 3, “The Processes of Change of Social Systems.”

I. TYPES OF INTEREST REPRESENTATION IN BRITAIN

If we had some way of measuring political power, we could quite possibly demonstrate that at the present time pressure groups are more powerful in Britain than in the United States. That at any rate is the impression of the present writer after making some preliminary inquiries in this largely uncharted field. Looking at the process of policymaking of the recent Churchill Government, for example, one finds hardly a field of domestic policy in which the effects of organized pressure are not profoundly marked. This is true, for instance, of policy toward agriculture, labor, veterans' pensions, old age pensions, teachers' salaries, equal pay for women, commercial television, and—to bring in an important "sectional" interest—the Lancashire textile industry. Nor have the demands of groups been reflected only in the policy of the Government and the party in power. The Opposition—whether Labor or Conservative—also has been affected and the competition between parties for the votes of the same group is often so intense as to modify profoundly what one might regard as "conservative" or "socialist" principles.

The old age pensioners, for instance, are a large and growing group, whose members, although not as effectively organized as they might be, are nevertheless sharply aware of their interest, of which the competition between the parties continually serves to remind them. If the Tories were to follow what they call their "net and ladder" principle of social policy<sup>3</sup>—i.e., aid for those most in need, the opportunity to rise for the others—they might well prefer to put additional funds into an increase in public assistance, rather than spread them among various types of benefits, some of which are inevitably paid out to persons not greatly in need.<sup>4</sup> They have chosen, however, to meet Labor's promise to restore all benefits to the level of purchasing power which they had in 1948,<sup>5</sup> proposing indeed to make good the rise in prices since 1946.<sup>6</sup> In 1954, as an election year drew near, both party conferences put the raising of old age pensions in the forefront "and," tartly commented the Manchester Guardian, "on the domestic side, not much else besides." Opportunely, the Government's

<sup>3</sup> See "The Ladder and the Queue," from a broadcast by the Rt. Hon. Sir Winston Churchill on Oct. 8, 1951. In The New Conservatism: An Anthology of Post-War Thought (London, 1955), pp. 24-25.

<sup>4</sup> See "Pensions in Perspective," The Economist, Dec. 11, 1954, pp. 883-88. The article also discusses the "bidding up" of pensions at election time.

<sup>5</sup> The Labor Party, Challenge to Britain: a Programme for Action (London, Dec., 1953), p. 25.

<sup>6</sup> The Economist, July 24, 1954, p. 261.

increases came into effect only a short time before the General Election of 1955.<sup>7</sup>

At the present time, British parties avoid pitched battles of opposing social philosophies and carry on the political fight through small raids, designed to capture votes from particular interest groups. In general, this tactic, which makes party programs and government policy vulnerable to pressure from organized groups, resembles the present pattern of pressure politics in the United States. And in the past, as in the present, one finds similarities as well as striking differences in the ways in which interests have brought influence to bear on government in the two political systems.

In British history, pressure groups go back at least to the 18th century—witness the various organizations which agitated for parliamentary reform from the 1760's to the 1790's—and the great period of reform in the first half of the 19th century provides many examples of highly effective pressure politics. There was the National Political Union of Francis Place, who, in Bernard Shaw's words, founded "the science of putting pressure on Parliament from outside," Wilberforce's Anti-Slavery Society, Thomas Attwood's political unions, O'Connell's Catholic Association, and that model of successful pressure groups, the Anti-Corn Law League. Yet in Britain as in the United States such organizations, founded primarily for the purpose of putting pressure on government and usually concerned with only a single piece of legislation, need to be distinguished from another type of organization which in both countries in recent generations has become far more important and effective. The latter is best represented by the organizations of the great interest groups of the modern economy—for example, trade unions, trade associations, farmers' groups, and professional associations—although their methods and form of organization may be adopted by other groups, such as war veterans. These organizations commonly have a large dues-paying membership and a considerable private bureaucracy. More important, they normally have other functions than their political ones—for instance, the internal regulation of their members or constituent organizations—and their concern with government policy does not come to an end with the passage of some particular act, but continues and indeed may be heightened as policies favorable to them are adopted. In spite of the earlier development of industrial capitalism in Britain, organizations of this type seem to have come into existence in about the same period in both Britain and the United States, beginning in the latter part of the 19th century.<sup>8</sup> Once the pattern of the permanent bureaucratic organization did emerge in Britain, however, it developed farther than in the United States, British organizations of this type today showing a greater degree of concentration and including a far larger fraction of their potential members.<sup>8</sup>

<sup>7</sup> 535 H. C. Deb. 146-148 (Dec. 1, 1954) and Cmd. 9338 on the increases and the timetable for their coming into effect.

<sup>8</sup> See the discussion of professional associations by Sidney and Beatrice Webb, who noted the growth of such organizations in membership and power in the decades before World War I and the increasing recognition of them by government. New Statesman, Vol. 9, "Special Supplement on Professional Associations," April 21 and 28, 1917 and Vol. 5, "Special Supplement on English Teachers and their Professional Organisation," Sept. 25 and Oct. 2, 1915. Both were special reports prepared for the Fabian Research Department at a time when guild socialism and pluralism were much in vogue.

Pressure groups, whether of the special purpose or the permanent bureaucratic type, have flourished in both Britain and the United States. Going back far into British history, but rarely found in the United States, is another device by which interests have been linked with the political process. This is the M.P. who "represents" a particular interest in the legislature, not covertly or illicitly, but openly and with general acceptance. For in spite of Burke's speech to the electors of Bristol, British custom has always been far more tolerant than American of the legislator who is intimately connected with outside interests. One may doubt that the subsidy for political expenses which Richard Nixon received from his well-to-do supporters would cause much excitement in Britain where not only the M.P.s. sponsored by trade unions but also quite a few others receive help from interested organizations in the form of contributions to election expenses and even to personal income.<sup>10</sup>

The history of the "interested" M.P. has yet to be written. The nature of his connection has ranged through many variations: from sponsorship, which involved subsidies to election expenses or personal income, through office-holding in an association with interests in government policy, to the perhaps less restricting ties of ownership of property and membership in a profession or trade. Under the aristocratic constitution, theory, as well as practice, permitted, indeed institutionalized, such functional representation.<sup>11</sup> Although in the Victorian reaction against placemen and patronage a high valuation was put on the financial independence of M.P.s,<sup>12</sup> they continued to be connected with interests by such ties as property-owning and to act as spokesmen for them in the <sup>8</sup> For instance, virtually all trade unions—as compared with our, until recently, three major organizations—belong to the TUC and the total trade union membership runs not much under 50 per cent of the total working force—as compared with less than a quarter here. The National Farmers' Union is the only significant organization of farmers in Britain and it includes about 90 per cent of its potential membership, while here there are three important organizations, including together probably no more than 30 per cent of all farmers. In Britain there is only one important veterans' organization—the British Legion—while we have the Legion, VFW, AMVETS, and the AVC. In the field of business organization, the story is rather different. The comprehensive organizations in Britain are the Federation of British Industries, the National Union of Manufacturers, and the Association of British Chambers of Commerce. These three organizations work together smoothly, however, and one does not get the impression that in political action British business is more divided than American.

<sup>10</sup> An M.P. who wishes to speak in the House on a matter in which he has a direct pecuniary interest—e.g., through the ownership of property—is obliged to "declare his interest." Sponsorship involving a subsidy, however, does not entail such a declaration.

<sup>11</sup> For the practice, see Sir Lewis Namier's anatomy of the 18th-century House of Commons in his Structure of Politics at the Accession of George III, 2 vols. (London, 1929). For the theory, see, for example, Sir Robert Harry Inglis' great speech against the Reform Bill in 1831, when he defended the House as an assembly including representatives of all the great interests of the country. (2 H.C. Deb., 3rd ser., 1090–1139, esp. at 1109 and 1133 [1 March 1831].)

<sup>12</sup> Norman Gash, Politics in the Age of Peel (London, 1953), pp. 106–9.

House.<sup>13</sup> The scores of M.P.s. who were railway directors are the best-known examples. Not many degrees removed from this type of connection was the practice of sponsorship, which developed in the latter part of the 19th century. Candidates and M.P.s. subsidized by trade unions became the most numerous of this class. But there were also other examples. For instance, the National Union of Teachers from shortly after its foundation in 1870 has sought out candidates from all major parties who have been willing to advocate its views in the House and who in turn have received a subsidy or election expenses from the organization. Perhaps in recent years the House has become less tolerant of such ties.<sup>14</sup> But there remain many M.P.s. who are acknowledged to be spokesmen for outside interest groups and many who receive contributions to election expenses and personal income from non-party organizations. Along with M.P.s. who have interests arising from directorships, investments, and the like, the House includes, as Sir Winston Churchill has said "those people who come to represent particular bodies, particular groups of a nonpolitical character." "We are not supposed to be an assembly of gentlemen who have no interests of any kind and no associations of any kind," he continued. "That is ridiculous. That might happen in Heaven, but not, happily, here."<sup>15</sup>

II. QUASI-CORPORATISM AND THE STRUCTURE OF THE WELFARE STATE

The M.P. who acts as the acknowledged spokesman for an interest in Parliament has been very important in the past. But although he will still be found today, he has greatly declined in importance as a means of interest representation in comparison with that more modern figure, the private bureaucrat of the permanent, large-scale pressure group. Indeed, when we compare the pattern of interest representation of the Victorian period with that of today, the most significant change is the shift of power from the older to the newer type, from the "interested" M.P. to the private bureaucrat. Yet even in the new pattern there are elements of continuity with the old. In contrast with American theory and practice, the "interested" M.P. was a more "legitimate," a more closely integrated part of the representative system. Similarly, today the massive pressure groups of Britain are, in comparison with the American pattern, far more intimately linked with the apparatus of government, especially of government administration.

During the war this association was even closer than at present, many trade <sup>13</sup> Bernard Cragcroft, "The Analysis of the House of Commons, or Indirect Representation in Essays on Reform (London, 1867), pp. 155-90.

<sup>14</sup> In 1947 the House resolved that it is a breach of privilege for a member to enter into a contractual agreement with an outside body "stipulating that he shall act in any way as the representative of such outside body" in Parliament. This has not, however, prevented M.P.s. from representing the views of outside organizations in the House, nor has it prevented outside bodies from continuing their subvention. So long as the "complete independence and freedom of action" of the M.P. is respected, such arrangements are legitimate. See 440 H.C. Deb. 285 and in general the debate on this question, col. 284-365, and the report from the Committee of Privileges on which the debate was based (H.C. No. 118, 1946-7).

<sup>15</sup> Report, Committee of Privileges (H.C. No. 118, 1946-7), Minutes of Evidence, p. 8.

associations being at least in part virtually embodied in the administration.<sup>16</sup> In spite of the relaxation of control since the war, there remains a system of "quasi-corporatism" which leaves no important organized group without a channel of influence and a real share in the making of decisions. The main substance of this system is continual, day-to-day contacts between public bureaucrats in the government departments and private bureaucrats in the offices of the great pressure groups—the Farmers' Union, the British Legion, the National Union of Teachers, the Federation of British Industries, the British Medical Association, and countless trade unions and trade associations. A great deal can be done at the "civil service" level, especially in view of the opportunities for discretion which must be left to civil servants by the vast network of rules and orders under which Britain's welfare state is run.<sup>17</sup> As an official of one organization put it, "Very much can be done which is in effect policy-making—what you try to do is to create an opinion among officials which is favorable to stretching the regulations."

Sometimes this connection is formalized by the inclusion of representatives of the pressure group in government committees. The Federation of British Industries, for instance, has representatives on some 70 government committees and similar bodies; the Trades Union Congress has representatives on 60 government committees. The old practice of a formal deputation to a minister is also still used, the classic example being the bodies of dignitaries and officials from various pressure groups which call upon the Chancellor of the Exchequer or Financial Secretary in the early months of the year to present their views on what ought to be done in the Budget.

The formal deputation is less important than it once was, but meetings with ministers are, of course, indispensable for major action. (Even then, as one pressure group official pointed out, you are likely to be successful only if you have prepared the way by winning over the permanent secretary of the department and other key officials.) The annual determination of the prices for agricultural products which will be guaranteed by the government provides such occasions.<sup>18</sup> In these prolonged negotiations, on which depend the expenditure of hundreds of millions of pounds, civil servants from the Ministry of Agriculture and certain other departments deal with experts from the National Farmers' Union. The delegation from the N.F.U. will be led by its president, Sir James Turner, who, probably attended by other higher officials of the Union, at critical points will carry the negotiations up to the Minister of Agriculture. At this level, not only the technical arguments—of which Sir James happens to be a master—will be deployed, but also suggestions of electoral retaliation and, so it is said, hints of the withdrawal of farmers' cooperation from certain administrative tasks in which their help is virtually indispensable, in particular the county agricultural committees. Since money is involved, the Chancellor of the Exchequer will at some time be brought in, on which occasion it will make a difference to the outcome if he believes—as a recent Chancellor is reported to have said—that “the farmers are the swing vote.”

<sup>16</sup> At the outbreak of the war, for instance, part of the organization of the British Iron and Steel Federation was taken over by the Iron and Steel Control of the Ministry of Supply and its then president was made the Iron and Steel Controller. (G. D. N. Worswick, The Raw Materials Controls, Tract No. 257, The Fabian Society; London, 1944.) The general type of control in the Ministry of Supply was a converted trade association. (Government and Industry; Fabian Research Group; Research Series No. 83; London, 1944.)

<sup>17</sup> In 1950 the Committee on Intermediaries reported on the relations between government departments and the great bureaucratic pressure groups. It referred to these relations as "organized liaison" concerning not only individual cases, but also "the general formulation and execution of policy" and constituting "an essential and recognised part of the machinery of government." (Report; Cmd. 7904; March, 1950, par. 6.)

<sup>18</sup> For discussion of the annual price reviews, see the annual reports of the N.F.U., statements in the House of Commons by ministers; the White Papers normally issued stating the results of the price reviews; comment in farmers' periodicals, especially The British Farmer, The Farmer's Weekly, and The Farmer and Stockbreeder, as well as the general press, especially The Times, Manchester Guardian, and Economist, the last of which has the best running comment on agricultural policy.

Confrontations of ministers, however, normally develop out of the immense mass of daily informal contacts at the civil service level. Again and again officials of pressure groups will mention that they continually ring up their “opposite numbers” in the departments and discuss a problem with them on a first name basis—an informality of contact often made easier by the fact that the private bureaucrat worked with the public bureaucrat in the same ministry during the war. Nor is the initiative confined to the pressure groups. For instance, quite commonly when the Ministry of Education has to draw up a new regulation (which may or may not have ultimately to be submitted to Parliament), it will send its draft of the regulation to the headquarters of the National Union of Teachers to get their comments and criticism. It is understandable that the Union finds it hardly worthwhile any longer to send a formal deputation to the minister, although not many years ago, before it had won its present “recognition,” it fought strenuously for the right to such audiences.

A recent summary of certain aspects of the work of the Federation of British Industries by its Director-General in its general outlines also applies to many other pressure groups:

There are . . . many consultative committees consisting of official and industrial representatives; and almost every day the F.B.I. is approached by one or another Government Department for advice. But consultation is not really effective unless it takes place before rather than after the event. On the Government side, the process may be a nuisance, but it generally saves a lot of trouble in the long run. So we are constantly impressing on Government Departments the need for them to consult and to consult early. . . .

Of course the great bulk of the work of Government is administration, not policy; and most of what I have called the F.B.I.'s policy work lies in the field of administration. Let me put it another way. Parliament may decide upon a line of policy. . . . Industry may or may not like the policy; and the F.B.I. will say on its behalf. But when the issue is decided, it may make a world of difference to industry how the policy is implemented and translated through administration into action.<sup>19</sup>

In the representation of interests, the M.P.'s role has declined, but not disappeared. How old and new methods may be combined is illustrated by the successful campaign by the National Union of Teachers in 1954 to defeat the proposed increase in teachers' contributions to their superannuation fund. Having won a modest victory when the Minister of Education accepted the recommendations for an increase in teachers' salaries presented by an advisory committee—on which the Union has a majority of the teachers' representatives—the Union set out to defeat the Minister's announced intention of raising the superannuation contributions.<sup>20</sup> Possibly, as the Union said, the proposed increase had not been discussed at the committee level, although it hardly seems likely that the teachers' representatives did not know about it. At any rate, being unable to win its point in dealings with the Ministry, the Union turned to more public methods. With 20 M.P.s as members—four of them "sponsored" candidates—the N.U.T. had a fair basis in Parliament to work from. Although all but one of these were on the Labor side, in this instance the Union picked up considerable support from Conservatives, led by a forceful and frequent rebel, Sir Robert Boothby. Within a week or so of the introduction into the House of the bill to raise contributions, branches of the N.U.T. were sending protests to the M.P.s from their constituencies. Within the House of Commons and within the parliamentary parties—the education committees in each party being used—protests were made by M.P.s. Early in February the parliamentary Labor party officially took a stand in opposition to the bill. Later that month the second reading was postponed and after at least two cabinet meetings at which the question was discussed it was put off until autumn. In October the Minister of Education was obliged to resign, and shortly afterwards the new Minister announced the withdrawal of the bill.<sup>21</sup>

<sup>19</sup> Sir Norman Lipping, The Federation of British Industries (London, 1954), p. 6.

Contrasts of this system of "quasi-corporatism" with the relations of pressure groups and government in the United States, if not sharp, are at least suggestive. For obvious reasons, the individual legislator, and the legislature generally, under cabinet government occupy a less important position. While "rebel" groups and party committees from time to time have influence, there are, for instance, no organs, formal or informal, comparable in power with our legislative committees. Not only do interest groups enjoy a greater degree of concentration, but the government with which they deal also is more highly centralized than ours: greater power to exert pressure is linked up with greater power to act. Whether that power to act will be used or not will depend on various factors with which we shall be concerned later on. Usually—this is the point to stress—if you can bring over the Minister and the Chancellor of the Exchequer you have not much else to worry about. Compare the position of the American pressure group which, if it wants positive action, must win its battle at many different points—committees in both houses, the presidency, the secretary, the bureau chief. It is no wonder that our pressure politics is so much noisier and less tidy than Britain's.

<sup>20</sup> 522 H.C. Deb. 1331 (Jan. 22, 1954) and Manchester Guardian, Jan. 22, 1954, p. 14.

<sup>21</sup> On the activities of the N.U.T., apart from those invaluable and obvious sources, The Times and Hansard, see its annual reports and The Schoolmaster and Woman Teacher's Chronicle, a weekly periodical published by the Union.

The pattern of pressure group relations with the administration, however, in broad outline is not unfamiliar to an American. There is perhaps better articulation in Britain resulting from the fact that normally only one rather than several major pressure groups represents each interest and that more effective contact with the members of the interest group results from its usually including a larger fraction of its potential membership. Perhaps also relations are to a greater degree formalized and institutionalized in Britain than in the United States, although, of course, our national government is cluttered with advisory committees and many pressure groups have continual relations with departments and bureaus.

For many British pressure groups there is a striking contrast in their present relations with departments as compared with their relations in the not too distant past. For these groups—the trade unions are the outstanding example—there was a long period of struggle for “political” recognition. Today not only are trade unions brought into frequent and earnest consultation through such means as the important National Joint Advisory Council to the Minister of Labor, but also no matter what government is in power there is always “access,” the doors are open. Replying to the traditional vote of thanks to members of the press at the conclusion of the 1945 T.U.C., the correspondent for the Times said:

You have no longer any need to thunder; you have only to whisper and Ministers tremble and Field-Marshal bend their knees. How very far away are those days when a few top-hatted, frock-coated gentlemen made a promenade of the Government offices in Whitehall respectfully carrying resolutions passed by Congress, leaving them at the door, extremely happy if they saw a permanent secretary, and most handsomely flattered if by accident they stumbled across a Minister.<sup>22</sup>

A further principal difference from the American pattern is obvious: it is that the amount of “business” transacted between pressure groups and departments is larger and more important. This results not only from the differences between a unitary and a federal system—compare the importance of educational policy at Westminster and in Washington—but also from the fact that Britain has a welfare state and a controlled economy. Perhaps there was a time when most pressure groups wanted government to stop doing things. But today in Britain as in the United States nearly all want—apart from tax matters—positive action: subsidies, benefit payments, services, favorable regulation such as tariffs.<sup>23</sup> The more positive the state, the larger the amount of business transacted between government and pressure groups is likely to be. Quite naturally, it has been the programs of the welfare state and of the controlled economy around which pressure activity has tended to cluster, giving rise to the system of "quasi-corporatism."

<sup>22</sup> Quoted in Allan Flanders, Trade Unions (London, 1942), p. 64.

<sup>23</sup> The Committee on Intermediaries reported in 1950 that 21 departments of government received some 19,000,000 applications each year from members of the public for licenses, permits and various kinds of benefits. “The Departments,” it said “. . . have one thing in common. Whatever their particular branch of business they all have the disposal of something which members of the public want—whether that be a license to acquire material needed for carrying on a business, permission to act in a certain way or the grant of some monetary or other benefit” Report, (cited in note 17), par. 6.

The structure of centralized parties and cabinet government is part of the framework within which British pressure groups operate. Such structures will tend to concentrate pressure on the ministerial level, but they do not determine whether the means of exerting that pressure shall be the M.P. or the private bureaucrat. This depends upon other factors, principally the rise of permanent, bureaucratic pressure organizations, a development which itself may be connected with not only the extension of the franchise, but also the decline of the governing class. As many English observers hasten to point out, what has happened in this regard is that old elites have simply been supplanted by new ones. In the previous social situation, interests could express themselves through traditional channels with little or no need for organization. Social class, the country house, the "Old Boy network" sufficed as channels of influence.<sup>24</sup> From that day the members of the House of Commons have not declined in virtue or ability. What they clearly have in lesser degree is the social prestige of the members of Victorian or Edwardian days. On the other hand, the new elites, if they do not enjoy the "deference" accorded the old, nevertheless have effective authority in relation to their organizations and clienteles—a striking example was the remarkable power of trade union leaders to restrain their members from making wage demands during the austerity drive from 1948 to 1950.

Whatever the reasons for the rise of such pressure organizations, they have been drawn to and ever more closely linked up with the bureaucracy by the expansion of the scope of policy and the delegation of power to ministers and, in effect, to civil servants which has been consequent upon that expansion. In addition to the party and constitutional structures, the structure of the welfare state and controlled economy also constitutes part of the framework within which pressure groups operate.

III. CONVERGENCE OF PARTY POLICY: EFFECT ON PRESSURE GROUPS AND PARTIES

A more diffuse, but no less important element of context is suggested by the acceptance by both major parties of the welfare state code and certain basic economic controls. On this topic we need first to say something to substantiate it; then we can examine some of its effects before turning to the most interesting problem of how to explain the reasons for it.

The substance of the first point is that the Tories have moved over to an acceptance of the welfare state as developed by Labor after the war, while Labor has very largely receded from its old doctrinaire position on nationalization and economic planning.<sup>25</sup> Recent Tory budgets from 1951 to 1955 continued the steady increase in the amounts spent on the social services, housing, and education, and retained the heavy taxation of the well-to-do by which Labor financed the welfare state. With regard to economic controls, both parties accept certain basic forms, viz., those necessary to maintain full employment, protect the balance of payments, and encourage productivity. As a result, while significant differences remain, British parties today are in closer agreement on "fundamentals" than they have been for many years.

<sup>24</sup> Writing of the struggle over the Education Act of 1902, Beatrice Webb contrasted "teachers' politics," which was practiced by the N.U.T., with "teachers' diplomacy," which was practiced by the representatives of the "elite" secondary schools. "Teachers' politics" meant lobbying, deputations to ministers and M.P.s, and other forms of public pressure; "teachers' diplomacy" meant informal contacts with persons of influence on the part of secondary school teachers who in general belonged to the same social class. New Statesman, Vol. 5, "Special Supplement on English Teachers and their Organization," Sept. 25 and Oct. 2, 1915.

What are the effects on the activity of pressure groups? One is that they are not obliged to defend the basic legislation or policy on which depend the benefits they receive. Any government, they can be sure, will follow the same favorable policy toward them and their clientele. Also, to a very great extent pressure groups themselves demand no further major changes in policy or legislation. There is for instance, no thorny question between government and labor such as that presented by the Taft-Hartley Act. And indeed when the trade unions want a piece of legislation, such as the night baking or pneumoconiosis acts of 1954, they need hardly do more than suggest their desires to the government and action is taken. Even when there is a change of policy, as has occurred in the sphere of agriculture under the Tory Government, the basic pledges of the Act of 1947 of "guaranteed prices and assured markets" are upheld. Given this agreement on the basic code, the activity of each pressure group is mainly a matter of getting "more." Corresponding to this tactic of the pressure group is the tactic of the parties, which, as has been mentioned before, is essentially one of attempting to win marginal segments of voters by concessions of "more."

On the side of party tactics, then, we often see the parties making advances to groups toward which they have been unsympathetic or even hostile in the past. This may involve something like a "reversal of alliances," as leaders, taking for granted the votes of traditional supporters, sacrifice or skimp the interests of these for the sake of winning votes normally attached to the other party. More than a trace of this appears in the Conservative policy toward trade unions, as is suggested by complaints on the Tory right wing that for a Conservative Government they have been exceedingly free with employers' money in their attitude toward wage claims. But the relations of Labor with the farmers are an even better example. Here we have a capitalist class—indeed, if we follow Marx, the first of the capitalist classes to emerge in England—to whom, according to E. G. Gooch, the head of the agricultural workers' union, "Labcur in office proved to be their best friend."<sup>26</sup>

<sup>25</sup> For elaboration of this point, see D. E. Butler, "American Myths about British Political Parties," Virginia Quarterly Review, Vol. 31, pp. 46-56 (Winter, 1954); and S. H. Beer, "The Future of British Politics: An American View," Political Quarterly, Vol. 26, pp. 33-43 (Jan.-Mar., 1955).

<sup>26</sup> Report of the 58th Annual Conference of the Labour Party (London, 1953), p. 145.

Nor was Labor in Opposition ready to turn against the agrarian capitalist, as a parliamentary incident of the Fall of 1953 illustrates. Horticulture was left outside the guarantees of the Act of 1947 and the industry felt itself inadequately protected against foreign imports by the low duties carried over from prewar times and by the system of quotas imposed by the Ministry of Agriculture. In the administration of the quota system, there were the closest relations between the departments and the Central Horticultural Committee and other specialized committees of the Farmers' Union—which, for instance, closely associated the representatives of the producers of tomatoes with the ministry when the pattern of quotas was decided each year and enabled them in time of excessive imports to obtain a total embargo.<sup>27</sup> What was desired, however, was a system of higher duties, but this ran into GATT which prevented Britain from raising duties against foreign imports unless they were also raised against Commonwealth and Empire countries—the “no new preference rule.” Asserting the unimportance of horticultural imports from the Commonwealth and Empire, some said there was no good reason for not raising the tariffs against them. But this was not the way that doughty imperialist L. S. Amery and his considerable faction in the party looked at the matter.<sup>28</sup> Hence, the President of the Board of Trade was obliged in the Fall of 1953 to go to Geneva and get permission to raise these tariffs only against foreigners. Thereupon a Board of Trade order providing for increases upon 18 varieties of imported fruit and vegetables was laid before the House and put down for debate on December 10th.

What would Labor's position be? The main issue it was pressing at the time was the rising cost of living, as might have been expected from a party which found its main support among the less well-to-do urban consumers. On December 8th the Food and Agriculture Committee of the parliamentary party decided by a majority of one vote to oppose the increases. The resistance to this step was led by the chairman of the committee, the former Minister of Agriculture, Tom Williams, who said he would resign if the meeting of the parliamentary party as a whole did not reverse the decision. At that meeting the next day, Williams was strongly supported by E. G. Gooch and also by George Brown, former parliamentary secretary of the Ministry of Agriculture and a representative of the Transport workers, a union which also includes quite a few agricultural workers. The electoral angle was stressed by speakers who echoed Gooch's remark at the conference a couple of months before that “you cannot have a Labour Government again with overwhelming power until you win many rural seats.”<sup>29</sup> With only 117 of 294 Labor M.P.s voting, the committee decision was reversed 81–36 and on December 10th in the House the order went through with support from both parties.

<sup>27</sup> Annual Report. National Farmers' Union (London, 1953), passim and report of Glasshouse Produce Committee, pp. 78 ff.

<sup>28</sup> See his attack on GATT at the Conservative conference of 1953, Verbatim Report, p. 63.

<sup>29</sup> Report, p. 147.

The next day the Manchester Guardian accused the Government of yielding to "pressure from the National Farmers' Union," deplored Labor's "hypocrisy," and generally lamented "the infinite squeezability of politicians." At the annual meeting of the N.F.U. a few weeks later, Mr. Gardner, chairman of the Central Horticultural Committee, took full credit on behalf of the Union for the change in policy.

The other side of this tendency of parties to "reverse alliances" is the greater independence of pressure groups in relation to parties. It is sometimes thought that a distinction between American and British pressure groups is that the American are more independent of party, while the British are more likely to be closely attached to or even embodied in a party. This distinction would accord with a division in the electorate running more along the lines of economic class. But just as the division of the electorate between the two major parties today in Britain in terms of economic class is no greatly different from that between American parties outside the South, so also are some major pressure groups probably as independent of party as the American and certainly more independent than was the case in Britain during the interwar period.

Some stray elements of big business prefer Labor—two directors of Unilever are socialists—and there are not a few very rich men sitting as Labor M.P.s. It remains, however, that business and its organizations must strongly favor the Conservatives, now as in the past. With the trade unions, there has been a change. Not only have they, like business, lost many of their previous terrors of the party of the opposite class, but they also have received solid benefits and friendly treatment from the Tory Government. The extraordinary ease with which the railway workers succeeded in getting what they wanted in 1953 and 1954 is a case in point. One should not overrate the importance of the man or the seriousness of his intent, but at the Labor conference of 1953, the then chairman of the General Council of the T.U.C. advocated in an interview that the trade unions should withdraw from the Labor party and the T.U.C. should divest itself of its present political activities. A principal advantage, he claimed, would be that thereby the T.U.C. would be less embarrassed in its dealing with a Tory Government and with industrialists.<sup>20</sup>

The most marked change, however, has occurred with regard to the farmers. Before World War II, the National Farmers' Union, then having only about half its present membership, was substantially a pressure group within the Tory party. According to Jennings, its support was extremely useful to Tory candidates in rural areas, while both Laborites and Liberals were very hostile to it.<sup>21</sup> Like the trade unions, it had a political fund which it used to sponsor candidates, invariably Tories. During and since the war, its membership has doubled; its expert staff has been greatly enlarged; it has acquired for the first time a full-time president, who has held office since 1948; and in recent elections it has not sponsored candidates, instead encouraging its members to join the party of their choice and then try to get on the party selection committees which choose parliamentary candidates. No one has any accurate idea of how British farmers vote, but it is not unlikely that as nationalization of land drops out of Labor's policy statements, quite a few—in some districts perhaps as many as 25 per cent—vote Labor. Many others are sufficiently independent to mean it when they threaten to abstain, if the government is not more considerate of their demands.

<sup>20</sup> Manchester Guardian, Oct. 2, 3, 19, and 29, 1953.

<sup>21</sup> W. A. R. Jennings, Parliament (Cambridge, Eng., 1939), pp. 211-12.

How are we to account for this convergence of party policies? Its effects today we have noted: as compared with the American pattern, the structure of the welfare state and the controlled economy associates pressure groups more closely with the administration and makes pressure groups more concerned with the decisions made at the administrative level. The agreement between parties frees pressure groups from the need to defend the basic policies favorable to them and enables them to be more independent of party. Furthermore, and this is perhaps the most important effect, the consensus on the values of the welfare state and controlled economy—e.g., the high importance of "security"—provides a favorable context within which pressure groups can urge their demands. But how did this convergence of party policy develop? Can we explain it, in turn, in terms of the operations of interest groups and their organizations or need we look at the problem on a different level of analysis from that of interest and group activity?

IV. EFFECT OF VALUES AND IDEOLOGY UPON INTERESTS

One of the compulsions tending to produce this convergence of policy proceeds from the balance of social forces which has emerged in Britain in recent years. By this I mean that today many groups in the society hold what is almost a veto over public policy in their power to refuse their work, their talents, their capital, or simply their willing cooperation in carrying out public policy. John Strachey squarely stated the problem for a future Labor Government when he observed that if such a Government came to power pledged to a radical redistributionist policy, there might well be a flight of capital.<sup>32</sup> But the threatening possibilities are not all on one side. An equally serious disturbance would face any Tory Government which attacked the welfare state. Trade unions as well as financiers and managers have a veto power, and in the years before 1951 the chances of widespread industrial unrest if a Tory Government came to power were held up as a warning to voters. In fact, these dangers did not materialize simply because the Tories yielded all along the line, even to the point of dropping the demands of their 1950 manifesto that "a final settlement" be arranged concerning "contracting out" and compulsory unionism. We can expect a future Labor Government to show a similar respect for realities.

In a more individualist society, where groups are less highly organized and less aware of their interests, it is more likely that important reforms can be put through even though enjoying the support of only a majority. But in Britain today the extent of group power, nurtured by the welfare state and the quasi-corporatism of the relations of government and the economy, means that the country has come close to the point at which a society must move with near unanimity or not at all. The idea of a balance among social forces seems attractive. Yet there is a real danger that instead of promoting agreement and a convergence of policies, such a balance may produce the "pluralistic stagnation" of the later years of the Weimar Republic, or the immobilisme of France today. We may strongly suspect, therefore, that beyond the balance of social forces there are factors of integration which make this situation in Britain promote agreement rather than stagnation.

<sup>32</sup> "The Powder and the Jam," New Statesman and Nation, Vol. 47, pp. 148-49 (Jan. 23, 1954).

A similar conclusion is suggested if we examine the effects of the present electoral situation, in which the voters are not overwhelmingly in favor of one of the parties. Such a division in itself may discourage radicalism or reaction and this effect is heightened when we examine how the situation itself has arisen. The principal development was the reform of Tory policy following upon the smashing defeat of 1945 and the welcome with which the fundamental measures of the welfare state were received by the electorate. In this reform of policy we see a familiar mechanism: the leaders of the party, thinking of the problem of winning votes, bring along the rank and file—against the resistance of some of the militants—in an acceptance of measures proved to be popular by the Opposition. This move—led mainly by Butler, Eden, and Macmillan—began soon after the defeat of 1945, centered even more around the question of accepting the heavy taxation involved by the welfare state than around nationalization, and was clinched by the acceptance of the Industrial Charter at the Brighton conference of 1947. Nor did it cease then, but continued on into the period of the Tory Government—as in the numerous concessions to pressure groups since 1951. Labor, perhaps because it had not, until the 1955 General Election, suffered a severe defeat, has made its corresponding movement to the right with less internal agreement in the party. Yet that shift has taken place and again one of the best illustrations is the party's tortuous wooing of the farmers—in spite of the fact that nationalization of land was one of the earliest of the doctrines of the socialism which it espouses.

The mechanism of electoral competition can be clearly observed, but how far does it take us in explaining the present general acceptance of the welfare state and the controlled economy? This competition is carried on within a cultural context which limits and guides what politicians will offer in their bids for votes and what demands groups will assert with expectation of finding support. We need, therefore, to look at the ideological and evaluative factors in the situation and their relationship to interests.<sup>33</sup>

<sup>33</sup> The terms "value" and "ideology" are used in the senses given them by Talcott Parsons in his Social System (Glencoe, 1951), passim and esp. at pp. 12 and 349. A value is a standard for selection among the alternatives which are intrinsically open in a situation and may be cognitive, appreciative, or moral. Following Parsons, I distinguish between values and need-dispositions (ibid., pp. 12-13). This distinction is important because values have the function of integrating social action not only directly, but also indirectly by conditioning need-dispositions. Without such integration a stable society would be impossible. Similarly, a principal theme of this article is the integrative function of values in the political system.

In Britain one of the most important changes on the plane of ideology has been the Keynesian "revolution" in economics. Without entering into the important controversies which concern economists who accept the broad framework of Keynesian thought, we can see that the main principles of Keynesianism have profoundly altered people's ideas of what government can do by way of comprehensive control of the economy. In 1929, when Britain was suffering from the chronic unemployment which had continued from the postwar slump, the then Chancellor of the Exchequer, Winston Churchill, could rest his budgetary policy on "the orthodox Treasury doctrine, which has steadfastly held that, whatever might be the political or social advantages, very little additional employment and no permanent additional employment can, in fact, and as a general rule, be created by State borrowing and State expenditure."<sup>24</sup>

Not only the "Treasury view," but also the ideas of active political circles have been liberated by Keynes from that doctrine. That government can act effectively to maintain economic equilibrium in the form of full, or near-full, employment without inflation is a belief which any government in Britain today will accept. Moreover, this belief in more or less simplified form has penetrated widely throughout the electorate. There is no doubt some very small number of voters who reject the ideology on which it is based: the Marxists, for example, and possibly some few remaining adherents of strict laissez-faire, such as the late Sir Waldron Smithers. Whether every member of the British electorate accepts it, however, is not particularly important. The relevant fact is that it is accepted by people of different parties and various interest groups and constitutes part of the framework of common belief within which they carry on their activities.

Keynesianism is not simply the belief of a group; it is part of the ideology of substantially the whole political community. Within the collectivity defined by its acceptance, it limits and guides what groups will demand of government and provides a commonly accepted standard by which demands of groups can be judged. To a significant extent, for instance, wage earners themselves understand the probability that wage increases will heighten inflation, endanger the balance of payments, and threaten their own and others' economic wellbeing.

---

The meaning I give to "interest" is based on Parsons' concept of need-disposition. Like a need-disposition, an interest is not simply "appetite," a genetically given need, but is appetite conditioned by social experience. Appreciative values, for instance, will condition the objects in which the ego seeks its gratification—e.g., the profit motive is not inborn—and will be more or less integrated with the developing moral values of a society—e.g., the rise of the moral values of the welfare state will enhance the desire of individuals and groups for economic security. Also, moral values may directly encourage or inhibit the assertion of felt needs. As John Plamenatz has pointed out in a perceptive note, people are not likely to assert demands for the satisfaction of needs unless they believe them to be justifiable. "Interests," Journal of Political Studies, Vol. 2, pp. 1-8 (Feb., 1954).

Yet an interest remains a claim for a satisfaction of the individual, or of the smaller collectivity as distinguished from the larger within which the claim is asserted. While, therefore, interests and values are closely related, the interests pursued within a political system must be distinguished from the primary integrative elements of the system, its values.

<sup>24</sup> 227 H. C. Deb. 54 (April 15, 1929).

Such understanding was one factor which made possible the "austerity" policy, the "wage freeze," and the continued budgetary surpluses of today.

"Vulgar" Keynesianism is not the only new element in the economic ideology of the British political community. To locate the other elements, we should need to go back to the development of a knowledge of economic controls which began with the "neo-mercantilist" economic policy of the National Government,<sup>35</sup> went rapidly forward under the tightly planned economy of the war, and has been added to and modified in the postwar years. The general understanding of what government can do to control foreign exchange, the volume of imports, and capital investment has been immensely expanded since the days when the Labor Government sat by impotently while the Great Depression of 1929 swept over the British economy. It is hard to believe today that one of the most doctrinaire socialists in that Cabinet and its Chancellor of the Exchequer, Philip Snowden, was also a firm believer in the gold standard, a balanced budget, and absolute free trade. With respect to the practices of economic nationalism, British socialism has accepted as much from the Tories as they have accepted from it. The familiar formula that the radical party in Britain leads while the conservatives merely follow along and consolidate, is only a half-truth.

No less important than ideology are the new values which have developed and which support the general consensus on the welfare state and the controlled economy. These are primarily political in that they define the role and goals of government and the rights and obligations of individuals and groups in relation to government. Inseparable from these political values are new moral and appreciative standards. Supporting the welfare state policy of income redistribution, for instance, are moral standards which have redefined the rights and obligations of private property. The new obligations are discharged largely through government, but in some cases—e.g., the relations of employers and wage-earners—they are expressed in direct relations between two groups. In some respects, also, these moral standards ease the obligations of property; in the welfare state, for instance, the charitable activities of voluntary associations are not felt to have the same claim they had formerly.<sup>36</sup>

In accord with these developing political and moral values, appreciative standards show a movement away from the aspirations and standards of success of the era of a more vigorous capitalism. A sociologist friend of mine touched on this point while summarizing the results of a social survey he had just concluded. The working classes generally he said, as they improve their material conditions, adopt the consumption habits of the lower-middle classes. For instance, they not only leave the tenements of the slums, but also reject life in so collectivist a habitation as an apartment house, preferring their own "semi-detached villas." They do not, however, adopt the familiar middle-class aspiration to own a shop or business. On the contrary, they prefer to remain wage-earners, rather look down on the small shopkeeper, and use their surplus energies to ensure that they get the maximum possible benefits from the welfare state.

<sup>35</sup> See Joseph Schumpeter, Capitalism, Socialism and Democracy, 2nd ed. (London, 1947), pp. 568-70.

<sup>36</sup> For discussion of this and other problems of the voluntary association in the welfare state, see Lord Beveridge, Voluntary Action (London, 1948).

When a British author finds a likeness between the new Britain and the United States except "in the case of personal acquisitiveness,"<sup>27</sup> this is a major exception. In all classes, if my experience is a fair guide, the profit motive is under such a cloud as would be inconceivable in the United States. Along with this decline of interest in capitalistic acquisitiveness, has gone a complementary rise in the evaluation of and concern for "security."

The point to be made here is how this change helps explain certain characteristics of British pressure groups and especially certain significant differences of their behavior from that of pressure groups in the United States. One of the problems in the study of the Farmers' Union, for instance, is how it manages to keep the large and more efficient farmers working in harmony with the small and less efficient farmers. In quite important ways, the policies of the Union seem in the postwar years to have shown a bias toward the small and inefficient and against the large and efficient. Yet it is rare that one finds evidence of disharmony or disagreement—in striking contrast, of course, with American experience.

A particularly puzzling example occurred in the autumn of 1953, when the Union was carrying on its prolonged negotiations with the government over the new arrangements for meat marketing. Without going into the technical details of the Union's proposal, we need note merely that in return for guaranteed prices for their meat, the producers were ready to turn over all profit on sales above those prices to the government.<sup>28</sup> The arrangement would have been clearly unfavorable to the high-quality producer, yet the proposal had been framed and put forward by the Union without significant protest from its branches and its members. When an explanation was asked for, the apparent conflict of interest between large and small producer was recognized, but again and again it was stressed that even the large and efficient producers were more concerned with security than with the opportunity to make large, but risky, profits.

The modification of interest by value is perhaps the most interesting aspect of these developments for the student of pressure groups. For the sake of the stability of the political system, it is fortunate that such a modification has taken place. Otherwise, the strain between new values and old interests might be excessive. But values and ideology, of course, have other functions in this situation. In general, they order interests in the estimation of the members of the political collectivity, excluding some potential demands from public utterance, raising others up from previous exclusion, changing the priorities attached to certain interests, heightening or lowering the intensity with which they may be asserted. It is in the different pattern of these cultural elements that the American senses the profoundly different "atmosphere" of British pressure politics.

<sup>27</sup> Donald Chapman, "What Prospect for the Labour Party?," The Political Quarterly, Vol. 25, pp. 205-16 (July-Sept., 1954).

<sup>28</sup> Manchester Guardian, Oct. 16, 1953, p. 12.

The present convergence of party policy expresses this consensus on new values and ideology. Not only does this consensus affect the intrinsic nature of the interests asserted and provide an integrating framework within which the electoral competition and the struggle of pressure groups is carried on; it also has a somewhat similar function with regard to the balance of social forces. "Objectively" considered, the interest groups of Britain today are in many ways similar to those of Weimar Germany. Yet instead of "pluralistic stagnation," we find a highly cooperative society and an effective system of government.

V. THE ENDURING CONSENSUS OF BRITISH POLITICS

Interest groups, far from explaining the present consensus of British politics, have themselves been significantly affected by it. How then are we to explain the cultural development which produced that consensus and through it the present convergence of policy? Obviously the analysis of such a development is complicated. Here one or two angles may be examined which are suggested by the comparative approach.

A part of the underlying mechanism is laid bare when we examine certain of the justifications which were used by Tory leaders when they were leading the way in the reform of party policy after 1945. At the conference of 1947, for instance, in the debate on the motion which the opponents of the new policy had chosen for their principal attack, Mr. Eden stood up for the reformist side. In his peroration, he proclaimed the party's belief in "a property-owning democracy," "the family," and "the Christian virtues." Then came an interesting passage:

We are not a Party of unbridled, brutal capitalism and never have been. Although we believe in personal responsibility and personal initiative in business, we are not the political children of the laissez-faire school. We opposed them decade after decade.

Where did the Tories stand when the greed and avarice of the industrial revolution were darkening the land? I am content with Keir Hardie's testimony: "As a matter of hard dry fact, from which there can be no getting away, there is more labour legislation standing to the credit account of the Conservative Party on the Statute Book than there is to that of their opponents."<sup>20</sup>

The note which Eden struck was what some call "Tory democracy" and others "Disraelian make-believe." It was not, at any rate, a note one would expect to be sounded by a prominent Republican leader at a party convention—even in the bad, old days of Democratic majorities. Yet in the postwar period one finds it running through the programs and pamphlets of the Conservative party and the speeches of its leaders and back-benchers, such as the members of the "One Nation" group. These themes of "Disraelian make-believe" are at least a means of sweetening with "Tory principles" the harsh lessons of electoral defeat. The delegates at a Tory conference are hardly cheered by the thought of heavy taxation of the middle classes. Yet their potential complaints can be converted to silence and even into mild applause by the appeal to these themes<sup>40</sup> which would be received with bewilderment by a Republican partisan gathering.

<sup>20</sup> Verbatim Report of the Proceedings of the 68th Annual Conference, Oct. 2-4 1947. National Union of Conservative and Unionist Associations (London, 1947), pp. 42-43.

* That these themes are effective with the active members of the party indicates that they have some real part in the operative ideals of the party. Nor does the evidence support the notion that party leaders are not genuinely moved by them. In fact the Tory party does have a long history of social reform and the intimate memoirs, as well as the domestic policies, of leaders such as Baldwin and Neville Chamberlain indicate that their readiness to fight socialism with the weapons of socialism sprang from more than political expediency.<sup>41</sup> In short, there is a real and long-standing difference between British conservatism and American conservatism—in spite of Russell Kirk's efforts in the contrary sense.

Comparison with the operative ideals of American politics, however, suggests an even broader contrast. In his study of the liberal tradition in America, Louis Hartz has elicited important aspects of this contrast.<sup>42</sup> His thesis—to which I can merely refer here—hinges on the fact that the absence of a 'feudal' tradition in this country has made the premises of our political action radically different from those of Europe, and so, of course, from those of British politics. Lacking such a tradition and a true aristocracy to embody it, we have not undergone the experience of class conflict between an aristocracy and a bourgeois middle class and have not had the sense of class which such a tradition and such a conflict have perpetuated in Britain. American politics, therefore, lacks the British ideology which defines the political situation in terms of class and guides interests in the direction of class solidarity. Such an hypothesis, for instance, helps us understand why the interests of workingmen could not be satisfied by Lib-Lab reform, but were drawn off into the formation of a party of class. In contrast, American politics, whatever the party, is dominated by a "Lockean liberalism" which greatly impedes the development of a strong socialist movement just as it has excluded a conservatism of the British type. Our politics, therefore, is a politics in which virtually all contending groups accept the premises of "democratic capitalism," while the politics of Britain

P 35428
<sup>40</sup> For example, at the 1953 conference, when a resolution was moved welcoming "the reduction in taxation already made" and urging "further economies in national expenditure," an addendum was offered specifying that this should be done "whilst maintaining and improving the social services." While the supporters of the original resolution were interrupted several times by hearty applause—for example, when asking for cuts in the housing subsidies—those supporting the addendum were heard in silence. Nevertheless, they met with no opposition and were mildly applauded at the end of their speeches; the addendum was accepted by the original movers and the resolution as amended passed unanimously. Verbatim Report, pp. 43–49.

<sup>41</sup> See Keith Feiling, Life of Neville Chamberlain (London, 1947), and on Baldwin, Thomas Jones, A Diary with Letters, 1931–1950 (London, 1954).

<sup>42</sup> The Liberal Tradition in America (New York, 1955).

and Europe tends to center around class conflicts which may bring in question fundamentals of the social order.

Not incompatible with Hartz' analysis is a further point which I should like to suggest. Granting that at times—such as the interwar years—British parties were in this sense more deeply divided than American parties have been in recent generations, it is also possible to discern in their differing positions a certain consensus which stands in contrast with the "Lockean" consensus of American politics. In the Tory tradition, as has often been remarked, there is a strong strain of paternalism and a certain "organic" view of society radically opposed to rugged individualism. Yet, within limits, these operative ideals of government responsibility and social solidarity are, and have been, accepted by British socialists. They too would agree with Burke on that un-American proposition that "government is a contrivance of human wisdom to provide for human wants" and that "men have a right that those wants shall be provided for by this wisdom." The "collectivism" of the late 19th century Herbert Spencer rightly called "the New Toryism." If we may use the names of political philosophers as symbols of these complex attitudes, we may say that both British parties fall within the values and ideology of Hooker rather than those of Locke.

It follows that not only were the interests of workingmen colored by class consciousness, but also the doctrines of the party which they produced provided for wide government responsibility and an enforcement of heavy obligations of individuals to one another. In its elements of class consciousness, the British political tradition provides foci around which sharp cleavages of political doctrine may crystallize. That same tradition, however, also contains certain enduring elements of consensus which may encourage the convergence of these opposing doctrines. In promoting the present consensus on the welfare state and the controlled economy, this broader consensus seems to have played an important part.

In this process, British parties have been not only coalitions of interest groups, but also bearers of the values of classes and of the collectivity. They have not, however, merely reflected changing values, but have taken an active part in their development and propagation. In the interwar years, for instance, objective economic developments, such as unemployment and Britain's declining international position, were the immediate stimulus to political action. The interests of groups—e.g., the farmers' demands for tariffs or the trade unions' demands that unemployment benefits be maintained—were "data" of the situation facing political leaders. One cannot, however, reduce the policies of the parties to reflections of such interests or mechanical combinations of them. Thought and research did a good deal to give direction and shape to interests which were often in themselves confused and formless. The work of the Fabians is an example; so also is the contribution of the research department of the Conservative party, which Neville Chamberlain set up in 1929 and which he used in developing the "great policy" of protection and imperial preference. Furthermore, the Tory tradition with its emphasis upon nation and Empire served to give direction to policies which party leaders developed in an effort to solve the objective problems and to win and maintain the electoral support of interest groups. The controlled economy of Britain today owes as much to these Tory innovations as to the proposals or experience of Labor.

Often the consequent government action greatly stimulated the growth of pressure groups (as in the case of the Farmers' Union), or even called them into existence (as was often the case with trade associations). In such cases, the initiating influence in policy came from the government, after which the interest group, having been given a definition of its interests and perhaps also a vehicle for expressing them, took up the task of pressing its claims upon government. Important as pressure groups have been in British politics, we cannot think of them as making policy by pushing an inert government or party this way and that. There has been interplay; and again and again government has taken the initiative, thereby crystallizing a latent interest and stirring it into political action. Individual leaders, of whom Lloyd George is an outstanding example, may perform a similar function.

If the Tory emphasis was on the side of foreign economic policy, that of Labor was on the side of internal welfare policy. How the interests of the trade unions combined with the intellectual socialism of the Fabians and the emotional socialism of the I.L.P. to produce the doctrines of the welfare state need not be gone into here. The point is that in the case of Labor doctrine as well as Tory doctrine there was development. Moreover, the Tories also had a concern with welfare policy, just as Labor had proposals for a planned economy. To this extent, therefore, the possibility was open for each to adopt from the other more precise policies in fields where it had not fully elaborated its views. Hence, on the plane of party doctrine, as well as that of ideology and values, conditions favoring a convergence of policies existed. Given these favoring elements in the cultural context, the mechanism of electoral competition would tend to bring about a convergence of party policies. Responding to such guidance of public opinion by party competition, the nature and pattern of interests in the society itself were modified, in turn providing support for the emerging consensus of the political community.

Again, it must be said that the whole process was more complicated than this sketch can suggest and that it has not by any means erased all significant differences between the parties. It is worth observing in conclusion, however, that during the past two or three generations British politics, in dealing with the broad problem of social insecurity, has framed and solved a great problem in a characteristically British way. The cycle of economic change—class war—renewed consensus has occurred at least once before in British history. Just about a hundred years ago, British politics and British society, after a period of economic revolution and bitter class strife, settled down to what some historians call "the Victorian compromise." The present "Elizabethan compromise" has been achieved through similar political and cultural mechanisms. It may also introduce a period not unlike that when Disraeli and Gladstone alternately were victors in a vigorous, but not embittered struggle for the highest political power.

POLITICS AND RELIGION: LUTHER'S SIMPLISTIC IMPEATIVE

SHELDON S. WOHLF

University of California (Berkeley)

I

The encounter between the human mind and the outside world is the essence of speculation. The dramatic element in the encounter has been provided by man's assertion that mind is capable of comprehending and ordering the world about him. This same "epistemological presumptuousness," which we associate instinctively with the spectacular successes of the natural sciences, has also been implicit in the enterprise of political theory. Here, too, the claim is that the human intellect can understand all of the complex interrelationships of a political order. In some ways this claim is even more assertive than that of the natural scientist. The theorist seeks not only to analyze and explain certain phenomena, but to prescribe more satisfactory patterns.

Given the complexity of the subject matter of politics and the finite character of the human mind, it is not surprising that the ideas of political theorists lend themselves to diverse interpretations at the hands of later commentators. Disagreement in interpretation, however, can take one of two forms: it may turn on a question concerning a particular idea, meaning, or emphasis; or it may find the interpreters taking diametrically opposed positions concerning the basic tendency of a given set of political ideas. An example of the first type would be the interpretation of Locke's theory of property. The second type, which is apt to be more embittered, is illustrated by the current controversy over Plato. The case of Luther also falls under this second category. One product of the remarkable renaissance in Lutheran studies over the past half-century has been a wide disagreement over the political tendencies of Luther's ideas. One group has tended to identify Luther with the stirrings of democracy and individualism associated with the Reformation, while another has taken the opposite position that his ideas directly fostered state absolutism in politics and state control of churches.<sup>1</sup> Both groups have been inclined to stress different aspects of Luther's thought. The image of Luther the libertarian has been constructed mainly out of the materials of his religious ideas; Luther the absolutist has been fashioned primarily from his political writings.

<sup>1</sup> The following are representative of those writers who see in Luther's writings various liberal or democratic ideas: James Mackinnon, Luther and the Reformation, 4 vols. (London 1925-1930), Vol. 2, pp. 93-97, 331; Werner Elert, Mythologie des Luthertums, 2 vols. (Munich, 1932), Vol. 2, p. 296; John T. McNeill, "Natural Law in the Thought of Luther," Church History, Vol. 11, pp. 211-28 (Sept., 1941). Representative of those who link Luther to absolutism are: Lord Acton, Essays on Freedom and Power, ed. Gertrude Himmelfarb (Boston, 1948), pp. 69, 94-96; John Neville Figgis, Studies of Political Thought from Gerson to Grotius, 1414-1685, 2nd ed. (Cambridge, 1937), Lecture III; Pierre Mesnard, L'essor de la philosophie politique au XVI<sup>e</sup> siècle, 2nd ed. (Paris, 1952), pp. 229-35; Ernst Troeltsch, The Social Teachings of the Christian Churches, trans. Olive Wyon, 2 vols. (London, 1931), Vol. 1, p. 552.

In both instances, however, something less than full justice has been done to the unity of Luther's thought. Moreover, the sharp contrast between the two images evokes the suspicion that each has been, to an extent, artificially contrived. This points to the possibility, which we wish to explore here, that Luther's political authoritarianism was closely related to the so-called "democratic" aspects of his religious ideas. By examining the inner relations between the two, some glimpse of the unity, if not the consistency, of Luther's thought is possible. By way of a caveat, the unity in question is not to be found in the systematic character of Luther's thought; if his theology was formless, we can expect at least the same in his politics. The two sides of Luther's thought were unified, first, by the way in which his political ideas presupposed his religious beliefs and by the extent to which the one "fed," so to speak, on the other; and, second, by a common impulse or imperative which was at work in both his religious and his political thinking. This aspect we shall call the "simplistic imperative": the desire to reduce "reality" to its simplest components by sloughing off the complications which appear to obscure "reality" and to have no integral relationship with it. In its religious form, the imperative grew out of Luther's insistence that "the word of God, which teaches full freedom, should not and must not be fettered."<sup>2</sup> In its political form, it worked to release secular authority from traditional restraints and inhibitions.

Before turning to these problems, a preliminary difficulty must be disposed of. It has been argued by some commentators that Luther's thought, from beginning to end, was motivated solely by religious concerns and that, therefore, his outlook was fundamentally non-political. In the words of one recent writer, Luther "was first of all a theologian and a preacher," hence "he never developed a consistent political philosophy and knew little about the theories underlying the formation of national states in western Europe."<sup>3</sup> While it would be fruitless to deny the primacy of theological elements in Luther's thought, it is misleading to conclude on that account that politics was an alien concern. Luther himself held no such modest view of his own political acumen. Prior to his own writings, he declared, "no one had taught, no one had heard, and no one knew anything about temporal government, whence it came, what its office and work was, or how it ought to serve God."<sup>4</sup> Underlying this exaggeration was the implicit assumption that a religious reformer could not avoid political speculation. The extraordinary intermixture of religion and politics in that period compelled him to think about politics and even to think politically in religious matters. It was at once Luther's insight, as well as the source of a good many of his later difficulties, that he understood that religious reforms could not be undertaken in utter disregard of political considerations. It was exactly this lesson which many of the sectarians ignored at great cost. The problems in Luther's political thought were not the product of a monumental indifference toward politics, but arose from the "split" nature of a political attitude which oscillated between a disdainful and a frenetic interest in politics and sometimes combined both.

<sup>2</sup> Reformation Writings of Martin Luther, ed. Bertram Lee Woolf (London, 1952), Vol. 1, p. 345. Only the first volume has thus far appeared. Hereinafter this will be cited as Woolf, Vol. 1.

<sup>3</sup> Harold J. Grimm, "Luther's Conception of Territorial and National Loyalty," Church History, Vol. 17, pp. 79-94, at p. 82 (June, 1948). Substantially the same point is made by John W. Allen, A History of Political Thought in the Sixteenth Century, 2nd ed. (London, 1941), p. 15; and by Preserved Smith, Life and Letters of Martin Luther, 2nd ed. (Boston and New York, 1914), pp. 214, 228; and Mackinnon, op. cit., Vol. 2, p. 229. Ernest G. Schwiebert has argued that Luther wrote essentially as a theologian, but that his political ideas derived largely from mediaeval sources. See "The Medieval Patterns in Luther's Views of the State," Church History, Vol. 12, pp. 98-117 (June, 1945).

<sup>4</sup> Works of Martin Luther, ed. Charles M. Jacobs, 6 vols. (Philadelphia, 1915-1932), Vol. 5, p. 81. Hereinafter this will be cited as Works.

While the historical entanglements of politics and religion in the sixteenth century contributed in no small measure to Luther's political consciousness, an even more influential factor lay in the nature of the religious institutions which he attacked. His great anti-papal polemics of 1520 were directed against an ecclesiastical institution which, to the sixteenth-century mind, had come to epitomize organized power. The nature of the Papacy invited an indictment framed in political terms. Luther's writings of 1520 provide impressive evidence that he clearly recognized the issue to be one involving the power of an ecclesiastical polity. In the first place, the vocabulary employed was heavily sprinkled with phrases and imagery rich in political connotations. The sacramental practices of the priesthood were attacked as "oppressive" (tyrannicum) in that they denied the believer's "right" (ius) to full participation. The Papacy was denounced as the "tyranny of Rome" (Romanum tyrannidem), a "Roman dictatorship" (Romana tyrannis), to which Christians ought to "refuse consent" (nec consentiremus). The demand was then raised for the restoration of "our noble Christian liberty." "Each man should be allowed his free choice in seeking and using the sacrament . . . the tyrant exercises his despotism and compels us to accept one kind only."<sup>5</sup>

The political note became more pronounced as Luther went on to accuse the Papacy of ecclesiastical tyranny: the Papacy had arbitrarily legislated new articles of faith and ritual. When its authority had been challenged, it had sought refuge in the argument that papal power was unbound by any law. Moreover, the temporal pretensions of the Papacy had not only endangered the spiritual mission of the Church, but also damaged the effectiveness of secular authority by confusing secular and spiritual jurisdictions.<sup>3</sup> The usurpation of temporal power had permitted the Popes to advance their temporal claims under the guise of a spiritual mission, and, at the same time, to pervert their spiritual responsibilities by treating them politically. On this latter score, the sale of indulgences, the annates, the proliferation of the papal bureaucracy, and the control over ecclesiastical appointments had as their objective, not religious considerations, but the enhancement of the political power of the Papacy. The Pope had ceased "to be a bishop and has become a dictator."<sup>7</sup>

<sup>5</sup> "... cuique suum arbitrium petendi utendique relinqueretur, sicut in baptismo et potentia relinquitur. At nunc cogit singulis annis unam speciem accipi eadem tyrannide . . ." L. Martin Luther Werke (Weimar Ausgabe, 1888-), Vol. 6, p. 507; Woolf, Vol. 1, pp. 223-24.

<sup>6</sup> Woolf, Vol. 1, pp. 127-28, 162.

During these early years Luther was prepared to accept the perpetuation of the Papacy on a reformed basis. His criticisms were founded on the assumptions that religion and politics constituted two distinct realms within the corpus christianum; that each realm required its own form of ruling authority; and that while rulership might be either of a religious or of a political type, it ought not to be both. Despite these distinctions, Luther's program for papal reform carried strong political overtones in that it was basically a demand for ecclesiastical constitutionalism and owed not a little to conciliarist inspiration.<sup>8</sup> The Pope was to exchange the role of despot for that of constitutional monarch. Henceforth his power was to be bounded by the fundamentals of Christianity and he could no longer legislate new articles of faith. Thus the teachings contained in Scripture were to be observed in much the same way as a fundamental law: they performed the function of a doctrinal constitution limiting the power of the popes.<sup>9</sup> To the papal argument that such institutional tinkering was blasphemous in that it would allow unclean hands to tamper with a divine institution, Luther responded that the Papacy itself was of human fabrication and hence susceptible of improvement.

The political element in Luther's case received further emphasis in the remedies he prescribed for dealing with a Pope who refused to recognize the bounds of his authority. If a Pope persisted in violating the clear injunctions of Scripture, then Christians were obligated to follow the fundamental law of Scripture and to ignore the papal commands.<sup>10</sup> Parenthetically it should be noted that this was the same formula employed later by Luther in dealing with secular rulers whose commands ran counter to Scripture. But in one particular Luther was prepared to counsel measures more drastic than anything he proposed against secular rulers. In an argument more political than scriptural, he contended that the Papacy might be forcibly resisted. "The Church has no authority except to promote the greater good." If any Pope were to block reforms, then "we must resist that power with life and limb, and might and main."<sup>11</sup>

Although Luther later retracted this and other more sanguinary exhorta-

<sup>7</sup> Ibid., p. 224.

<sup>8</sup> Luther had read and admired Gerson, D'Ailly, and Dietrich of Niem. He does not appear to have been acquainted with the conciliarist side of Occam's thought. For a general discussion of these matters see Mackinnon, op. cit., Vol. 1, pp. 20-21, 135; Vol. 2, pp. 228-29.

<sup>9</sup> Woolf, Vol. 1, pp. 224-25; Works, Vol. 1, p. 391; Luther's Correspondence and Other Contemporary Letters, ed. Preserved Smith and Charles M. Jacobs, 2 vols. (Philadelphia, 1918), Vol. 1, p. 156.

<sup>10</sup> Woolf, Vol. 1, p. 121.

<sup>11</sup> Ibid. p. 123; Werke (Weimar Ausgabe), Vol. 2, pp. 447-49.

tions,<sup>12</sup> the political element reached a climax when Luther prescribed for the condition in extremis where the Papacy blocked all efforts towards reform. Secular authorities possessed the right and the responsibility to initiate the processes of reform:

Therefore, when need requires it, and the pope is acting harmfully to Christian well-being, let any one who is a true member of the Christian community as a whole take steps as early as possible to bring about a genuinely free council. No one is so able to do this as the secular authorities, especially since they are all fellow Christians, fellow priests, similarly religious, and of similar authority in all respects.<sup>13</sup>

Despite the acerbity displayed in Luther's writings of this period, their revolutionary quality was blunted by the reliance on conciliarist arguments. He looked to a combination of secular initiative and conciliar reforms to restore the purity of the Papacy. In place of papal supremacy he relied partly on the older notion of the conciliarists that the Church was a societas perfecta, a self-sufficient society containing its own authority, rules, and procedures for regulating the common spiritual life of its members. According to this conception, the Church contained within itself the necessary resources for remedying any ills or grievances which might afflict it.

These conciliarist arguments worked to obscure two emergent aspects of Luther's thought: the reliance on secular authority and the bias against institutions. As long as he placed his hopes in a Church Council as the agency of reform, the secular ruler was reduced to secondary importance. But once this avenue of reform was closed off, the choice was automatically narrowed down to the secular ruler. When this stage was reached, the idea of the Church as a societas perfecta was dropped; the revitalization of its spiritual life was now held to depend on an external agency.

Similarly, as long as Luther adhered to a conciliarist position, and as long as he attributed some utility to the Papacy, the revolutionary quality of his theory of the Church would remain muted. But once he had broken with Pope and Council, the doctrine of the "priesthood of all believers" would assume central importance and the Lutheran conception of the Church would become clearer. Both of these developments, the reliance upon secular rulers and the Lutheran idea of the Church, were interrelated dialectically, in that Luther's quest for the "real" in religious experience led him to dismiss ecclesiastical institutions and to magnify the political institutions of the ruler. It is only partly correct to attribute Luther's emphasis on secular authority to the desperate plight of a reformer who had no alternative but to appeal to that quarter. Nor is it correct to view his extreme utterances during the Peasants' War as marking a sudden discovery of the absolute power of secular princes. There is sufficient evidence to indicate that he held a high opinion of secular authority before the peasant outbreaks. Instead, the emphasis on secular power should be viewed as the outgrowth of the deepening radicalism of his religious convictions, which lent additional weight to a pre-existing respect for the power of temporal rulers.

<sup>12</sup> For a further discussion see Roland H. Bainton, Here I Stand. A Life of Martin Luther, Mentor edition (New York, 1955), pp. 115-16; Ernest G. Schrieber, Luther and His Times (St. Louis, 1950), pp. 464 ff.

<sup>13</sup> Woolf, Vol. 1, pp. 122, 167.

Once this is grasped, Luther's later dilemma becomes more understandable: the secular powers, whose assistance he had invoked in the struggle for religious reform, began to assume the form of a sorcerer's apprentice threatening religion with a new type of institutional control. The sources of this dilemma lay in the disequilibrium which had developed between his theory of the Church and his theory of political authority. In the early years of his opposition to the Papacy, he did not disavow the central argument of the papalists that spiritual affairs required a ruling head. Thus, although he disagreed with the papalists over the nature of that office, his thinking preserved the mediaeval tradition of a distinctive set of ecclesiastical institutions which might offset the thrusts of temporal powers. But as his views matured into a flat rejection of the Papacy and of the entire hierarchical structure of the Church, the whole idea of a counter-vailing authority was naturally dropped. The tie between religious beliefs and religious institutions was severed; at this stage of his thought Church organization was regarded as an impediment to true belief. Concurrently with these developments in Luther's conception of the Church, his doctrine of political authority had evolved towards a more enlarged view of the functions and authority of rulers. The rulers were now entrusted with some of the religious prerogatives previously belonging to the Pope.<sup>14</sup> Thus while institutional authority was being erased in the religious sphere, it was being underscored in the political.

It was at this point that the supreme difficulty arose. In his later years Luther began to pay increasing attention to the need for religious organization, a need which he had earlier minimized. But for practical reasons this could not be accomplished except by calling in the secular authorities whose power he had consistently exalted. The institutional weakness of the Church made it no match for the secular power which Luther had rationalized. The end-product was the territorial Church (Landeskirche).

Luther's elevation of political authority, then, was closely connected with his idea of the Church. The latter, in turn, was an outgrowth of his conception of religion; hence something must be said about his religious doctrines and their bearing upon his ecclesiasticism and politics.

In Luther's theology, the supreme vocation of man consisted in preparing for God's free gift of grace. Religious experience centered around an intensely personal communication between the individual and God; the authenticity of the experience depended upon the uninhibited directness of the relationship. Good works, therefore, were irrelevant, for they involved relationships with men and things. Similarly, the ministrations of an ecclesiastical hierarchy and the full sacramental system were both useless and dangerous; they only multiplied the intermediaries between God and man and raised the inference that there existed a substitute for faith. In sum everything which stood between God and man had to be eliminated; the only true mediators were Christ and Scripture.

<sup>14</sup> In this connection Luther's letter to John, Elector of Saxony, was significant: "There is no fear of God and no discipline any longer, for the papal ban is abolished and everyone does what he will. . . . But now the enforced rule of the Pope and the clergy is at an end in your Grace's dominions, and all the monasteries and foundations fall into your Grace's hands as the ruler, the duty and difficulty of setting these things in order comes with them." Smith and Jacobs, op. cit., Vol. 2, p. 383. On several occasions Luther was to lament the release of the rulers from papal controls. See Works, Vol. 4, pp. 287-89.

Against this backdrop Luther's famous metaphor of the "three walls" surrounding the Papacy was symbolic of the dominant driving force in his religious thought: the compulsion to erase and level all that interfered with the right relationship between God and man. The significance of this "simplistic imperative" lies in the variety of ways in which it was expressed: political, intellectual, as well as religious. Intellectually it took the form of a nearly total rejection of the mediaeval philosophical tradition. It was not a rejection steeped in ignorance, but one flowing from a deep conviction that centuries of philosophy had worked to pervert the meaning of Scripture and to support the pretensions of the Papacy.<sup>15</sup> The influence of Aristotle was declared to be pernicious; the christianized Aristotelianism of Aquinas was condemned as an "unfortunate superstructure on an unfortunate foundation."<sup>16</sup> Impatient with the "Babel of philosophy," with its endless and subtle disputations concerning substance and accidents, Luther called for a return to the unglorified wisdom of Scripture and the Word of God.<sup>17</sup> In this connection his radicalism was also turned against the corpus of traditional knowledge represented by the teachings of the Church Fathers, the pronouncements of the Councils, and the doctrines of the canonists. The Catholic conception of accrued historical wisdom, painstakingly built up through centuries of interpretation, Luther matched with the uncomplicated, direct knowledge of the humble believer.<sup>18</sup> "The simple faith" of the people

<sup>15</sup> Luther's long apprenticeship in scholasticism is discussed in Mackinnon, op. cit., Vol. 1, pp. 10-27, 50 ff.

<sup>16</sup> Wodf, Vol. 1, pp. 225, 227-29; Smith and Jacobs, op. cit., Vol. 1, pp. 60, 64, 78, 150, 169-70, 349.

<sup>17</sup> Luther's distinction between Scripture and the Word of God is analyzed by Rupert E. Davies, The Problem of Authority in the Continental Reformers (London, 1948), pp. 31 ff.; and by Troeltsch, op. cit., Vol. 2, p. 486. In connection with Luther's quest for the "original" meaning of Scripture, it might be added that he was aided by contemporary humanist scholars, such as Reuchlin and Erasmus, who were seeking to recapture the true meaning of Scripture by means of philological researches.

<sup>18</sup> Wodf, Vol. 1, pp. 227-29. These sentiments were underlined in Luther's Letter to the Christian Reader (1522): "... when I compare scholastic with sacred theology, that is with Holy Scripture, it seems full of impiety and vanity and dangerous in all ways to be put before Christian monks not forearmed with the armor of God." Luther then turned admiringly to Tauler and the Theologia Germanica and raised the hope that under the influence of the mystics "there will not be left in our earth a Thomist or an Albertist, a Scotist or an Occamist, but only simple sons of God and their Christian brothers. Only let not those who batten on literary dainties revolt against the rustic diction, nor despise the coarse coverings and cheap garments of our tabernacle, for within is all the glory of the king's daughter. Certainly if we cannot get learned and eloquent piety, let us at least prefer an unlearned and infantile piety to an impiety which is both eloquent and infantile." Smith and Jacobs, op. cit., Vol. 2, pp. 135-36. Compare Augustine, Epistle 138, 4-5.

was held to be more reliable; instead of chasing philosophical hares, it was content with the knowledge which comes from faith.

Thus the end-point of the revolt against the authority of philosophy and received wisdom was a religious primitivism, flaunting simple faith against philosophical complication, breaking "the images of ancestral wisdom" in the name of a return to original Christianity. This "simplistic imperative," with its bias against "man-made" rules and rites, appeared as a kind of revival of the ancient controversy between "nature" and "convention" with scripturalism replacing nature as the basic norm. Like the ancients, Luther was beset by a deep urgency to erase historical accretions in order to commune with an underlying truth. Characteristic of his search for purity were his remarks on the confused state of marriage laws:

. . . any and all of the practices of the Church are impeded, and entangled, and endangered, on account of the pestilential, unlearned, and irreligious, man-made ordinances. There is no hope of a cure unless the whole of the laws made by men, no matter what their standing, are repealed once for all. When we have recovered the freedom of the Gospel, we should judge and rule in accordance with it in every respect.<sup>19</sup>

The impulse towards simplification was also manifested in Luther's assault on the mediaeval conception of the Church. Again the emphasis was put on leveling the "walls" which stood between the believer and the object of his beliefs. The whole of the ecclesiastical hierarchy, with its niched gradations of authority and function, was to be razed. Since the plain meaning of Scripture could be understood by the average man, sacerdotalism was superfluous; there could be no distinctions among believers:

We all have the same authority in regard to the Word and sacraments, although no one has a right to administer them without the consent of the members of his church, or by the call of the majority (because, when something is common to all, no single person is empowered to arrogate it to himself, but we should await the call of the Church). . . . When a bishop consecrates, he simply acts on behalf of the entire congregation, all of whom have the same authority. They may select one of their number and command him to exercise this authority on behalf of the others.<sup>20</sup>

The radical egalitarianism implicit in the doctrine of the priesthood of the believers was not dictated by any necessary relationships among the believers themselves. Rather, it grew out of Luther's conviction that faith could be attained only by individual effort and that, therefore, the "Christian liberty" of the believer must be unbound by externals. Faith could not be created or instilled by an external agency, whether sacerdotal or political; it was an inward disposition of the individual inclining him towards God.<sup>21</sup> The reward of faith was membership in the invisible communion of Christians, the corpus mysticum ruled by Christ:

There is no superior among Christians, but Christ Himself and Christ alone. And what kind of authority can there be where all are equal and have the same right, power, possession, and honor, and no one desires to be the other's superior, but each other's inferior? One could not establish authority where there are such people, even if one would, since their character and nature will not permit them to have superiors, for no one is willing or able to be the superior.<sup>22</sup>

<sup>19</sup> Woolf, Vol. 1, p. 303.

<sup>20</sup> Ibid., pp. 318, 114.

<sup>21</sup> Ibid., p. 113.

The "true" Church, then, was not to be located in any physical assemblage of offices, nor was it to be identified with any hierarchical institution. The Church consisted simply of "an assembly of hearts in one faith. . . . This unity is of itself sufficient to make a Church."<sup>23</sup>

Although Luther consistently denied that the equality of the believers eliminated the necessity for a trained ministry, the denial in no way minimized the revolutionary character of his attack on ecclesiasticism. The priest had been transformed into a minister, that is, one who administered, expounded, and explained the Word.<sup>24</sup> The loss in status was accompanied by a drastic change in the relationship between minister and congregation. Unlike the priest, the minister could not draw upon the mysterious sources of authority flowing from a centuries-old tradition. Stripped of the my-~~sign~~ of office, the minister faced his congregation as a primus inter pares. The office itself was no longer consecrated by the representative of a powerful ecclesiastical institution; it was derived from the consent of the pares. Since the minister was the creature of consent, not of authority, he could be removed from office by those who had selected him.<sup>25</sup>

Underlying the equality among the believers and the whittling down of the role of the minister were certain assumptions about the capacity of the believers to recognize truth:

. . . each and all of us are priests because we all have the one faith, the one gospel, one and the same sacrament; why then should we not be entitled to taste or test, and to judge what is right or wrong in the faith?<sup>26</sup>

From this followed Luther's demand that the "second wall," symbolizing the papal claim to be the final interpreter of doctrine, be swept aside. The papal position, as Luther instinctively recognized, was grounded in a kind of christianized Platonism which asserted that disputed truths could be resolved only by a specially endowed intelligence.<sup>27</sup> Against this "aristocratic epistemology" Luther advanced a "democratic" one which avowed both the right and the ability of the congregation to judge religious teachings. He adopted this conclusion partly from a profound conviction concerning the primacy of the direct communion between God and the individual soul; and partly from a conviction that the individual conscience could not be forced into salvation.

Nostalgia for the apostolic simplicity of the primitive Church did not blind

<sup>22</sup> Works, Vol. 2, p. 262.

<sup>23</sup> Ibid., Vol. 1, p. 349.

<sup>24</sup> Wolff, Vol. 1, pp. 115, 247, 249, 318, 367; Works, Vol. 3, pp. 326-28.

<sup>25</sup> Wolff, Vol. 1, pp. 115, 117, 181; Works, Vol. 4, pp. 79, 82.

<sup>26</sup> Wolff, Vol. 1, p. 120; Works, Vol. 4, pp. 76-7.

<sup>27</sup> Wolff, Vol. 1, pp. 119-20.

Luther to the fact that a near-anarchistic form of church organization was an inadequate prescription for an actual congregation whose members dwelt in varying states of grace and faith. At an early stage in his writings he began to elaborate the distinction between the "visible" and the "invisible" Church. The former consisted of those Christians whose weak faith necessitated a visible form of organizational structure. Unity had to be created externally by human art. The "invisible" Church, in contrast, derived its unity from faith; it was largely independent of organization and regulations.<sup>28</sup>

In his later years Luther came to be more impressed with the value of "distinguishing marks," even for the invisible Church.<sup>29</sup> This was less significant, however, than his growing reliance upon secular authority to police the visible Church and to insure a degree of religious uniformity. Given this development, the Lutheran conception of political authority assumes crucial importance; for a religion which had denied itself the power of an ecclesiastical organization was now confronted by, and invited the assistance of, political rulers who were unhampered by the traditional restraints of religious institutions. To appreciate the new theoretical setting within which temporal authority was now to operate, something must be said concerning earlier Christian attitudes towards the political order and the office of ruler.

II

From its early beginnings the Christian attitude concerning politics had been complicated by a persistent impulse towards disengagement from the world. The scriptural warning that "My Kingdom is not of this world" was later systematized by Augustine into the tense symbolism of the civitas dei and the civitas terrena. And despite the impressive effort of Aquinas to fashion a comfortable accommodation between the political order and the divine, the mystics and the monastics survived as eloquent witnesses to the strain of incivisme in Christianity. Moreover, this hostility towards the political order had been implicit from the beginning, when Christianity had directly challenged the classical assumption concerning religion and the political order. Classicism had judged religion largely from the viewpoint of its political and social utility. Religion had been expected not only to contribute to civic cohesiveness, but also to infuse the whole of man's political and social conduct in such a way that the believer would be a better citizen by virtue of his beliefs. For classicism, then, the value of a religion had been analyzed in terms of citizenship; the problem had been that of the citizen as a believer and not, as was to be the case with Christianity, the believer as a citizen.

<sup>28</sup> Works, Vol. 1, pp. 349-57.

<sup>29</sup> Compare Works, Vol. 1, p. 361; Vol. 4, p. 75; Vol. 5, pp. 27-37; Vol. 6, p. 148. Luther's theory of the Church has been discussed by Karl Holl, "Luther," Gesammelte Aufsätze zur Kirchengeschichte (Tübingen, 1923), Vol. 1, pp. 288 ff.; Troeltsch, op. cit., Vol. 1, pp. 477-94; William A. Mueller, Church and State in Luther and Calvin (Nashville, 1954), pp. 5-35; Wilhelm Pauck, "The Idea of the Church in Christian History," Church History, Vol. 21, pp. 191-213, at pp. 208-10 (Sept., 1952); Lewis W. Spitz, "Luther's Ecclesiology and His Concept of the Prince as Notbischof," Church History, Vol. 22, pp. 113-41 (June, 1953); John T. McNeill, "The Church in Sixteenth Century Reformed Theology," Journal of Religion, Vol. 22, pp. 251-69 (July, 1942).

In contrast, Christianity had come proclaiming the irrelevancy of political criteria to religious truths. Its avowed intention was to disentangle religion from its political context. This apolitical bent in Christianity was strikingly developed by Augustine in Books VI and VII of the De civitate Dei.<sup>20</sup> Christianity, he insisted, did not represent merely another "civil theology"; it came not to rescue a corrupt society, but to prepare men for the permanent estate of eternity. On the basis of this formulation, the relation between religion and politics was reversed. Instead of religion functioning as a support for the political order, the role of the political order was conceived to be one of securing the conditions of peace which would enable men to pursue unhindered their primary vocation of spiritual salvation. Although the responsibility for order was conferred upon the state, this did not imply, for Augustine, any positive control of or intervention into essentially religious matters. One of the primary aims of Augustine was to rid Christianity of the political interference typified by the policy of Theodosius. The state might assist religion by protecting the faithful from the contaminating influences of heresy, but the continuous supervision of religious life belonged to the Church. The spiritual needs of man were to be administered by a government reared on spiritual foundations.

In Luther the impulse towards disengagement took a quite different form. Where Augustine had relied upon the Church as the main aid to individual salvation and had relegated the state to the role of guardian of order, Luther felt constrained to call upon secular power to help Christian souls in gaining release from the tyranny of the organized Church. One fundamental reason for the different roles assigned government by Augustine and Luther is to be found in the different historical positions occupied by each. Augustine's thinking was deeply tinged by the millennial hopes common in the early centuries of the Christian era. It was natural for him to adopt a time-perspective oriented towards the future. Although, in contrast to the expectancies of some of the early Christians, Augustine minimized the imminence of the millennium, the notion of a future pregnant with the promise of deliverance remained a vivid element in his thought.<sup>21</sup> The thousand years intervening between Augustine and Luther could not but have a sobering effect on Christian optimism. What had been a beckoning future for the one became, for the other an interminable present calling for a certain resignation on the part of the believer. The muted eschatology of Luther contributed in an important way to his marked antipathy for history. After the days of apostolic simplicity had been passed, history had become a record of the degradation of the Word. Consequently, the theological and ecclesiastical legacy of these centuries must be dismissed. On the basis of these beliefs, Luther's time-perspective was reflective of a compelling urgency to return to a more primitive state of Christian perfection; it was part of a radicalism oriented towards recapturing the authentic Christian elements of the distant past; it lacked the vivid awareness of a future dimension.

<sup>20</sup> This aspect of Augustine is brilliantly described in Charles Norris Cochrane, Christianity and Classical Culture (New York, 1944), pp. 323 ff. Also see the remarks of Eric Voegelin, The New Science of Politics (Chicago, 1952), pp. 81-84.

<sup>21</sup> De civitate Dei, XX. See also the remarks of Heinrich Scholz, Glaube und Unglaube in der Weltgeschichte (Leipzig, 1911), pp. 109 ff.

These contrasts in time-perspectives were closely related to some important differences in the political ideas of Augustine and Luther. While Augustine had punctured the classical notion of the autonomy and self-sufficiency of the political order, he had not left the political order dangling in limbo. It was an integral part of the whole ordo of Creation and contributed its share towards the preservation of the total harmony. For Augustine the concept of a divine order symbolized more than an ingenious blend of diversities: it was a concordia moving towards consummation. Accordingly, the political order, integrated as it was into a cosmos full with meaning and direction, acquired a rooted stability, a sustenance drawn from the nature of Creation itself. Thus, even though the political community was destined to be superseded at the climax of history, until that time it participated in the perfection written into the very essence of things.<sup>32</sup>

Luther, however, departed significantly from the Augustinian conception of ordo. For Augustine ordo had operated as a principle immanent in the whole of Creation; therefore, any association, even a non-Christian one, possessed value to the extent that it secured peace and tranquillity.<sup>33</sup> Luther, on the other hand, reduced "order" from an immanent to a formal principle without real viability:

Order is an outward thing. Be it as good as it may, it can fall into misuse. Then it is no longer order but disorder. So no order has any intrinsic worth of its own, as hitherto the Popish Order has been thought to have. But all order has its life, worth, strength, and virtue in right use; else it is worthless and fit for nothing.<sup>34</sup>

In abandoning the concept of ordo as the sustaining principle within a larger pattern of meaning, Luther deprived the political order of the moral sustenance flowing from this more comprehensive whole. The lack of integration between the political order and the divine order produced a marked tension within Luther's conception of government. The political order appeared as a distinctly fragile achievement, precarious, unstable, and prone to upset. At the same time, the vulnerability of this order created the need for a powerful, repressive authority. In other words, it was not the political order itself which was sustained by a divine principle; it was the secular power upholding order that was divinely derived. It was no idle boast of Luther's to assert that he had praised temporal government more highly than anyone since Augustine.<sup>35</sup> Such praise was necessary once the political order had been extracted from its cosmic context. The divine element in political authority was inevitably transformed from a sustaining principle into a repressive, coercive one.

<sup>32</sup> The concept of ordo is most extensively discussed by Augustine in De civitate Dei, XIX, 11-18. Pertinent in this connection are: R. H. Barrow, Introduction to Saint Augustine, The City of God (London, 1950), pp. 220-60; Sir Ernest Barker, "St. Augustine's Theory of Society," in Essays on Government, 2nd ed. (Oxford, 1951), pp. 245-48; Étienne Gilson, Introduction à l'étude de Saint Augustin, 3rd ed. (Paris, 1949), pp. 237-38.

<sup>33</sup> De civitate Dei, XIX, 24.

<sup>34</sup> Works, Vol. 6, p. 186.

Luther's attachment to temporal authority, then, was not the product of a particular stage in his development, but was rooted in the conviction that the fallen world of man was fundamentally orderless. Order had to be imposed:

Let no one think that the world can be ruled without blood; the sword of the ruler must be red and bloody; for the world will and must be evil, and the sword is God's rod and vengeance upon it.<sup>36</sup>

Significantly, Luther singled out, as the first "wall" to be leveled, the papal claims to a temporal jurisdiction. His logic here displayed the same impulse as his religious theorizing: just as the believer's free access to Scripture was to be secured from papal interference, so the secular ruler was to be unhampered in his efforts to achieve order:

... the social corpus of Christendom includes secular government as one of its component functions. This government is spiritual in status, although it discharges a secular duty. It should operate, freely and unhindered, upon all members of the entire corpus, should punish and compel where guilt deserves or necessity requires, in spite of pope, bishops, and priests; and whether they denounce or excommunicate to their heart's desire.<sup>37</sup>

The long scholarly disputes over whether or not Luther preserved the mediaeval conception of a corpus christianum has served to obscure the profound changes he made in the content of that concept.<sup>38</sup> The emphasis on secular authority was accompanied by other doctrinal changes which enhanced that authority still further. At the same time that Luther was undercutting the sacerdotal hierarchy by the idea of the priesthood of all believers, he was elevating the status of rulers by clothing it with a sacerdotal dignity: rulers "are priests and bishops too."<sup>39</sup> The sharp line between clergy and laity was erased, and priest and peasant were placed on a level of equality in relation to secular jurisdiction.<sup>40</sup> The estate of Christendom had fallen to new trustees: the princes "discharge their office as an office of the Christian community, and for the benefit of that community. . . . Each community, council, and administration has authority to abolish and prevent, apart from the knowledge or consent of

<sup>35</sup> Ibid., Vol. 5, pp. 81-82.

<sup>36</sup> Ibid., Vol. 4, p. 23. On this same point see: Vol. 3 pp. 231-33; Vol. 4, pp. 28, 248-53, 266-69, 299 ff.; Vol. 5, p. 38; Vol. 6, p. 460.

<sup>37</sup> Woolf, Vol. 1, p. 117; Mesnard, op. cit., pp. 204-5.

<sup>38</sup> There is a recent discussion of this problem in Sjöström, op. cit., pp. 118 ff., and see the references cited there. In addition there are some interesting remarks in Friedrich Meinecke, "Luther über christliches Gemeinwesen und christlichen Staat," Historische Zeitschrift, Vol. 131, pp. 1-22 (1920).

<sup>39</sup> Woolf, Vol. 1, p. 114.

<sup>40</sup> Ibid., pp. 114-15, 129-30, 141, 147, 226-27, 282, 285.

pope or bishop, anything contrary to God, and hurtful to man in body and soul."<sup>41</sup>

The significance of the role assigned to political authority lay not so much in its broad mandate, nor in its responsibilities for religious reform, but rather in the fact that its power was now to be exercised in a context where papal institutions had been deprived of divinity and power. The secular ruler alone derived his powers from God; the power of the papacy, in contrast, had resulted from strictly human contrivings, or, worse, from the machinations of the Antichrist.

III

Luther's view of political authority was not all of one piece; it varied depending on whether the issue was primarily religious or political. When temporal government was called upon to assist in furthering religious reforms, it was viewed as a positive and constructive agency. But in its more secular and political role, government appeared as essentially negative and repressive. In the one area it was treated as the sole alternative for initiating reform; in the other as the sole alternative to anarchy.<sup>42</sup> The link which bound together the two views of political authority was Luther's demand that rulers be released from pre-existing restraints in order to accomplish their work. We have already examined this element in connection with Luther's attack on the Papacy; it reappeared when he considered the secular activities of government. Finding the same confusion and complexity in the laws of society as had prevailed in religious matters, Luther advocated a characteristically simple and radical solution:

... the body politic cannot be felicitously governed merely by rules and regulations. If the administrator be sagacious, he will conduct the government more happily when guided by circumstances rather than by legal decrees. If he be not so wise, his legal methods will only result in harm, since he will not know how to use them, nor how to temper them to the case in hand. Hence, in public affairs, it is more important to make sure that good and wise men are in control than that certain laws are promulgated. Men of this kind will themselves be the best of laws, will be alert to every kind of problem, and will resolve them equitably. If knowledge of the divine laws accompanies native sagacity, it is obvious that written laws will be superfluous and noxious.<sup>43</sup>

<sup>41</sup> Ibid., p. 167.

<sup>42</sup> Works, Vol. 3, p. 235; Vol. 4, pp. 289-91.

<sup>43</sup> Woolf, Vol. 1, p. 298. It is true that Luther occasionally praised customary law, but a close examination of the context of the argument shows that he was contending that customary laws were better adapted to local conditions than imperial laws, and not that customary laws were salutary restraints. McNeill, "Natural Law in the Thought of Luther," loc. cit., has underlined the role of natural law and reason in Luther's writings, but again the context was one where Luther was asserting that natural law and reason or equity allowed the ruler to override existing laws or customs. Natural law, in other words, played a liberating as well as a restraining role in Luther's thought. See Woolf, Vol. 1, p. 187; Works, Vol. 6, pp. 272-73. One of the few occasions wherein Luther cited Aquinas for support involved an argument in favor of an unlimited secular power in times of emergency. See Works, Vol. 3, p. 263.

The only restraints operating on the ruler, other than those of his own conscience, came from the exhortations of the ministers; since the ministers no longer spoke as the representatives of a powerful ecclesiastical establishment, the effectiveness of this restraint would be problematical.

Although some commentators have shown that Luther never intended to emancipate the secular authorities from the dictates of natural law and reason, this proves only that Luther was not Machiavelli. For the point is that natural law becomes a mere set of moral homilies when it is translated into a context where the power of the rulers alone has been elevated above all other institutional rivals and where allegiance to the other great power institution has been condemned.

The situation thus created was ripe for a collision between the two entities which Luther, by analogous arguments, had sought to set free. On the one hand there was the secular ruler, unrestrained by the pressures of competing institutions, and on the other the Christian congregation seeking divine grace, unaided and unguided by sacerdotal institutions. Luther, however, often wrote as though the former never presented a threat to the latter. The true believer was a subject of the Kingdom of God, where Christ alone ruled. "Therefore, it is not possible for the secular sword and law to find any work to do among Christians, since of themselves they do much more than its laws and doctrines can demand."<sup>44</sup> If all men were to become true Christians, secular government would be unnecessary. Government was justified by the existence of the large masses of the unrighteous and unregenerate; in the absence of coercion, men would be at each other's throats and society in chaos. "For this reason God has ordained two governments; the spiritual, which by the Holy Spirit under Christ makes Christians and pious people, and the secular, which restrains the unchristian and wicked so that they must needs keep the peace outwardly, even against their will."<sup>45</sup>

Even if the secular rulers, whose characters Luther frequently criticized, were to overstep their bounds and issue commands contrary to Scripture, no real harm could be done to the true Christian. Government, laws, and the ways of society could affect the physical goods of man, but never the vital center of his soul:

When we consider the inner, spiritual man and see what belongs to him if he is to be a free and devout Christian, in fact and in name, it is evident that, whatever the name, no outer thing can make him either free or religious. For his religion and freedom, and, moreover, his sinfulness and servitude, are neither bodily nor outward.<sup>46</sup>

"Christian liberty," then, was the state enjoyed by the believer who had severed his external dependencies and had oriented his soul towards a complete submission to God. Although he could be expected to do more than his social and political obligations required, his ultimate salvation was in no way

<sup>44</sup> Works, Vol. 3, p. 234.

<sup>45</sup> Ibid., pp. 235-36.

<sup>46</sup> Woolf Vol. 1, pp. 357-58; Works, Vol. 3, p. 235; Vol. 4, pp. 240-41; Werke (Weimar Ausgabe), Vol. 1, pp. 340-43.

implicated in the world; his good works in the world were the consequence of his faith, and his faith could never be the result of his works. "You have the kingdom of heaven; therefore you should leave the kingdom of earth to any one who wants to take it."<sup>47</sup>

The doctrine of Christian liberty was modified by Luther in the light of his experiences during the Peasants' War. The basic question raised at that time was whether the spread of lawlessness might eventually undermine the peace of the faithful and thereby interfere with the quest for salvation. The pressure of events forced Luther to soften the distinction between the Kingdom of God and the kingdom of the world. If the rebellious peasants were to gain the upper hand "both kingdoms would be destroyed and there would be neither worldly government nor Word of God, but it would result in the permanent destruction of Germany. . . ."<sup>48</sup> If both the Kingdom of God and the kingdom of the world possessed a common need for order, as Luther admitted, then the true believer could not be as indifferent towards the political order as the doctrine of Christian liberty implied. Religion and politics were more closely intertwined than the theory of the two kingdoms inferred. Luther's theory of government, then, came down to this: temporal authority could insure outward peace for the true believer; it could never affect his internal virtue. For the unbeliever, government could impose external order and external virtue. Government existed "in order that the good may have outward peace and protection; and that the wicked may not be free to do evil, without fear, in peace and quietness."<sup>49</sup>

Certain confusions began to appear in Luther's thought, however, when he attempted to relate his doctrine of government to the problems of obedience and freedom of conscience. Sometimes he argued that authority could not coerce the consciences of the believers; and this was consistent with his teaching that externals could not affect the liberty of the Christian man. At other times he insisted that government ought not to coerce consciences. This could only mean logically that freedom of conscience was useful primarily for the unrighteous who might some day be led back to the fold.

The same difficulty reappeared when Luther allowed that men need not obey when a ruler commanded contrary to the teachings of Scripture.<sup>50</sup> But this could involve only the true believer, for he alone possessed a conscience guided by Scripture. At the same time, he alone owned a conscience which could not be harmed by external actions.

The contradictory elements were present in other aspects of Luther's teaching on this same general subject. Earlier he had urged that the secular rulers apply force against the Papacy, yet he overwhelmingly maintained that secular

<sup>47</sup> Works, Vol. 3, pp. 248, 239-42; Vol. 6, pp. 447 ff.; Woolf, Vol. 1, pp. 234, 357, 368-70, 378-79.

<sup>48</sup> Works, Vol. 4, p. 220; Smith and Jacobs, op. cit., Vol. 2, p. 320.

<sup>49</sup> Works, Vol. 6, p. 460; Vol. 3, pp. 231-32; Vol. 4, pp. 23, 28; Smith and Jacobs, op. cit., Vol. 2, p. 492.

<sup>50</sup> Works, Vol. 1, p. 271; Vol. 3, pp. 255-56.

rulers ought not to be resisted for any cause. Thus political authority might resist religious authority on either political or religious grounds, while religious authorities might never resist political authority on either religious or political grounds. The final incongruity appeared during the Peasants' War when Luther advocated the right of anyone to kill a rebellious peasant. Thus a rebel might be slain by anyone, a tyrant by no one.<sup>51</sup>

IV

Luther has frequently been criticized by later writers for promoting the cause of political absolutism. Figgis, for example, coupled Luther with Machiavelli and treated their ideas as two sides of the same coin.<sup>52</sup> While this view is correct in emphasizing the extreme lengths to which Luther went in releasing temporal rulers from previous restraints, it tends to view the problem primarily in terms of moral and religious restraints. Actually, Luther consistently upheld the right of Christians to rebuke the excesses of princes, and his own writings testify to the extent to which he followed that advice. If we are to look for the fundamental weakness in Luther's thinking it is to be sought in his failure to appreciate the importance of institutions. His obsession with religious simplicity caused him to ignore the role of religious institutions as political restraints. The social consequences of a weakly organized religion were apparent in his own day. At moments of political and social crisis he was unable to appeal to any effective religious organization to act as mediator. During the Peasants' War he was compelled to entrust the whole cause of peace to the princes, despite his own conviction that all of the wrongs were not entirely on one side. In trying to get out of this predicament Luther succeeded only in making the Christian ethic appear irrelevant to the logic of the political order: "The sayings on mercy belong in God's kingdom and among Christians, not in the kingdom of the world. . . ."<sup>53</sup>

The quest for simplicity also had its effects when Luther considered political institutions. Here it took the form of accepting authority rather than rejecting it. From a few ingenuous ideas about authority, order, and social classes Luther fashioned a political doctrine of stark simplicity, unrelieved by the shadows of qualification. It was designed essentially to impress on princes the desirability of paternal rule and on subjects the wickedness of disobedience. Just as his religious teachings emphasized the single relationship of a believer who throws himself on God's mercy, so the political order was stripped of nearly all except the single relationship between ruler and ruled. In both cases the moral impotence and sinfulness of man was the source of his dependence.<sup>54</sup> But the peculiarity of the relationship between political superiors and their inferiors was that so much of it remained unpermeated by religious values. Religious considerations entered only at the extremities of the relationship: the ruler held his authority from God, while the subject was under a divine injunction to obey rulers in every conceivable political circumstance. No provision was made for the other complex relationships in a political order. The political relationship, like the religious, was a personalized rather than an institutionalized one.

<sup>51</sup> Ibid., Vol. 1, pp. 262-64; Vol. 3, pp. 211-12; Vol. 3, pp. 226-28. Some commentators have made a great deal of the joint declaration of 1531 wherein Luther sanctioned resistance to the Emperor. But when this is measured against the main body of his writings, its evidential value is small. Moreover, it would seem that the declaration was largely the work of Melancthon. Luther affixed his own signature only after a great deal of agony and self-searching. A year previously he had warned against resisting the Emperor. See Mackinnon, op. cit., Vol. 4, pp. 25-27.

<sup>52</sup> Figgis, op. cit., pp. 55-61.

<sup>53</sup> Werke (Weimar Ausgabe), Vol. 18, p. 389.

In this connection Luther's doctrine of Christian liberty and his defense of disobedience on religious grounds did little to redress the balance against the secular ruler. Both of these ideas had been hollowed of their political content. "True" liberty had been transformed into an internal state of faith, while obligation was disconnected from political relationships and made to apply solely to religious issues; in political matters men had to obey unquestioningly.

The foregoing points to the conclusion that the problem presented by Luther was not one arising from the divorce between politics and religious values, but from the political irrelevancy of the Christian ethic. While Luther certainly assumed that Christian values, such as love, neighborliness, and charity, would exercise a salutary influence in society and politics, he failed to show their viability in dealing with problems other than those located at the elementary level of the household and the neighborhood. The Christian ethic might well be applicable at the intimate, personal level, and yet be quite irrelevant for the relationships created by a complicated political order. Luther remained unaware of this difficulty, because he reduced political relationships to a single form. Something of the political inadequacy of the Christian teaching was glimpsed by Luther himself. In the tract On Trading and Usury (1524) his argument began by laying down the strict Christian teachings on the subject; soon, however, he was led to admit that the Christian ethic was of little utility here inasmuch as most members of society did not act as Christians. His solution was to abandon the Christian argument and to invoke, instead, the coercive arm of government. The argument ended on the note that the world would be reduced to chaos if men tried to govern by the Gospel.<sup>55</sup>

These doubts about the political effectiveness of Christian teachings had their roots in the fundamental ambiguity characteristic of the thinking of many of the early reformers. On the religious side they advocated the most uncompromising and radical reforms, while on the political side they enjoined quietism. Luther, for example, vehemently rejected any hierarchical distinctions among Christian believers; yet he assumed that a social hierarchy was natural and necessary.<sup>56</sup> He eloquently defended the sanctity of the individual conscience; yet he unhesitatingly accepted the institutions of serfdom. He admitted <sup>54</sup> Tillich has remarked that "Christian pessimism with respect to human nature has helped a great deal to bring about the alliance between Christianity and authority." "The Gospel and the State," Crozer Quarterly, Vol. 15, pp. 251-61, at p. 258 (Oct., 1938).

<sup>55</sup> Works, Vol. 4, pp. 16-22.

<sup>56</sup> Ibid., Vol. 4, pp. 240, 308; Vol. 5, pp. 43 ff.

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW IN 1954-1955

DAVID FELLMAN

University of Wisconsin

On October 9, a week after the 1954 Term began, Justice Robert H. Jackson<sup>1</sup> died, and for his place the President nominated Judge John Marshall Harlan, on November 8, 1954.<sup>2</sup> Judge Harlan had been appointed in March, 1953, to the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit. The Senate did not act on the Harlan nomination until March 16, 1955, when it was confirmed by a vote of 71-11, and the new Justice took the oath of office on March 28. Accordingly, the Court was handicapped during much of the Term by not having a full bench, and apparently the argument of important cases was delayed until the vacancy was filled. Former Justice Owen J. Roberts, who had taken his seat on appointment by President Hoover on June 2, 1930, and resigned July 31, 1945, died on May 17, 1955.

At the end of the Term, Chief Justice Warren announced that henceforth the Court will not hear oral arguments or hold open sessions on Friday, which will be reserved for the conferences of the Justices.<sup>3</sup> Thus the ancient practice of holding the "recitation periods" on Saturday has, at least for the present, come to an end. The Chief Justice also declared that this change in the schedule, which reduces the number of days available each week for oral argument from five to four, would not affect the number of cases to be heard, and that the Court expects to remain current with its calendar.

During the period under review the controversy over the Crosskey interpretation of the Constitution continued on its merry way, having reached the stage of rebuttals and surrebuttals,<sup>4</sup> and a Yale law professor published a book on the

<sup>1</sup> On Justice Jackson see: Symposium, with articles by Felix Frankfurter, Warner W. Gardner, Charles Fairman, and Telford Taylor, in the Columbia Law Review, Vol. 55, pp. 435-525 (April, 1955); Louis L. Jaffe, "Mr. Justice Jackson," Harvard Law Review, Vol. 68, pp. 940-98 (April, 1955); Paul A. Weidner, "Justice Jackson and the Judicial Function," Michigan Law Review, Vol. 53, pp. 567-94 (Feb., 1955); W. W. Bishop, Jr., "Robert H. Jackson," American Journal of International Law, Vol. 49, pp. 44-50 (Jan., 1955). At the time of his death, Justice Jackson was working on the Godkin lectures, which he was scheduled to deliver at Harvard early in 1955. They have been published under the title, The Supreme Court in the American System of Government (Cambridge, 1955).

<sup>2</sup> See Arthur A. Ballantine, "John M. Harlan for the Supreme Court," Iowa Law Review, Vol. 40, pp. 391-99 (Spring, 1955); Edward L. Friedman, Jr., "Mr. Justice Harlan," Notre Dame Lawyer, Vol. 30, pp. 349-59 (May, 1955).

<sup>3</sup> 349 U.S. 971.

<sup>4</sup> See William Winslow Crosskey, "Charles Fairman, 'Legislative History,' and the Constitutional Limitations on State Authority," University of Chicago Law Review, Vol. 22, pp. 1-143 (Autumn, 1954); Charles Fairman, "A Reply to Professor Crosskey," ibid., pp. 144-56; Stuart Gerry Brown, "Politics and Mr. Crosskey's Constitution, I," Syracuse Law Review, Vol. 6, pp. 261-72 (Spring, 1955); Sylvester Petro, "Crosskey and the Constitution: A Reply to Goebel," Michigan Law Review, Vol. 53, pp. 312-49 (Dec., 1954).

Supreme Court which announced the novel proposition that judges are human.<sup>5</sup>

During the 1954 Term the Supreme Court disposed with finality of 1,352 cases, an unusually high number. The figure for the 1953 Term was 1,293, and for the 1952 Term it was 1,278. There were 82 dispositions with full opinion, of which four were per curiam. Of these, 33, or 40 per cent, were unanimous, and of 101 dispositions on the merits by memorandum order, 87, or 86 per cent, were unanimous. This marked a very considerable decline in the number of dispositions on the merits in which Justices dissented. In the previous Term only 28 per cent of the full opinion dispositions were unanimous, and in the 1952 Term the figure was 22 per cent. In all, 198 cases were decided on the merits (170 a year ago, 138 two years ago). Of these cases, 27 came from the federal district courts by appeal, four from the courts of appeal by appeal and 97 by certiorari, 56 from the state courts by appeal and 15 by certiorari, and three from specialized federal courts by certiorari.

On the appellate docket, certiorari was granted by the Court in 108 cases, or 16.8 per cent of all petitions, as compared with 13 per cent the year before and 16.1 per cent in 1952. Petitions for certiorari were granted on the miscellaneous docket in 12 cases, or 2.4 per cent of all requests, as compared with 1.9 per cent a year ago, and 2.5 per cent two years ago. The Court dismissed appeals in 53 cases, the largest figure in some years. Of these, 31 dismissals were for lack of a substantial federal question.

The number of dissenting opinions declined appreciably from 57 a year ago, and 89 two years ago, to 47. This year Justice Reed led the Court with ten dissenting opinions; Justice Minton was next with nine; Justice Black wrote eight, Justice Frankfurter seven, Justice Douglas five (as compared with 15 a year ago), Justice Clark three, Justices Burton and Harlan two each, and Chief Justice Warren only one. There were, in addition, 15 concurring opinions (16 a year ago), with Justices Frankfurter and Douglas contributing four each, and Justice Clark none. Chief Justice Warren filed two concurring opinions, and each of the other Justices wrote one. Taking into account all dispositions on the merits, whether by full opinion or memorandum order, there were in all 141 dissenting votes, a very low figure, with Justice Reed voting in the negative 28

<sup>5</sup> Fred Rodell, Nine Men (New York, 1955). See also: Edward S. Corwin, Our Expedient Constitution (University of Illinois Bulletin, Institute of Government and Public Affairs, 1955); Harold H. Burton, "Unsung Services of the Supreme Court of the United States," Fordham Law Review, Vol. 24, pp. 169-77 (Summer, 1955); Jack W. Peltason, Federal Courts in the Political Process (Garden City, N.Y., 1955); Victor G. Rosenblum, Law as a Political Instrument (Garden City, N.Y., 1955); Lewis Mayers, The American Legal System (New York, 1955); Wallace Mendelson, "Mr. Justice Frankfurter and the Process of Judicial Review," University of Pennsylvania Law Review Vol. 103, pp. 295-320 (Dec., 1954); Leo Weiss, "Justice Murphy and the Welfare Question," Michigan Law Review, Vol. 53, pp. 541-66 (Feb., 1955); Leon R. Yerkwich, "Some Challenges to Our Constitutional Ideals," Southern California Law Review, Vol. 28, pp. 1-17 (Dec., 1954); Edward M. Whinney, "The Supreme Court and the Dilemma of Judicial Policy-Making," Minnesota Law Review, Vol. 39, pp. 837-51 (June, 1953); Howard E. Dean, "Judicial Review, Judicial Legislation, and Judicial Oligarchy," Oregon Law Review, Vol. 34, pp. 20-32 (Dec., 1954).

times, Justice Douglas 27 times, and Justice Black 23 times. At the other extreme Justice Clark cast a dissenting vote only five times, Justice Harlan six times, and the Chief Justice seven times.

It is of interest to note that of the 198 cases decided on the merits, the Court affirmed only 48, again an unusually small figure. Of the 83 cases coming up on appeal, the Court affirmed 15, whereas of the 115 cases on certiorari, the Court affirmed 31. Of the 56 cases which were appealed from state courts, 49 were dismissed, six were reversed, one was vacated, and there were no affirmances. Of the 23 cases that came from the federal district courts on appeal, 14 were affirmed, six were reversed, one was vacated, and two were dismissed. Of the 101 cases from the courts of appeals, 26 were affirmed, 56 were reversed, 17 were vacated, and two were dismissed.

As is usual these days, cases dealing with civil liberties questions,<sup>6</sup> above all the announcement of the final decree in the school segregation cases, attracted the greatest amount of public attention. There were no opinions at all dealing with free speech or freedom of religion problems, although there was much writing on these subjects during the period under review.<sup>7</sup>

<sup>6</sup> See: Samuel A. Stouffer, Communism, Conformity, and Civil Liberties (New York, 1955); Richard Hofstadter and Walter P. Metzger, The Development of Academic Freedom in the United States (New York, 1955); Robert M. MacIver, Academic Freedom in Our Time (New York, 1955); American Civil Liberties Union, 34th Annual Report, America's Need: A New Birth of Freedom (New York, 1954); Osmond K. Fraenkel, The Supreme Court and Civil Liberties, rev. ed. (American Civil Liberties Union, New York, 1955); Natural Law and Natural Rights, ed. Arthur L. Harding (Dallas, 1955); Murray Kempton, Part of Our Time (New York, 1955); Loren P. Beth, "The Case for Judicial Protection of Civil Liberties," Journal of Politics, Vol. 17, pp. 100-12 (Feb., 1955); Lon L. Fuller, "Freedom—A Suggested Analysis," Harvard Law Review, Vol. 68, pp. 1305-25 (June, 1955); Morris Ploscowe, "A Modern Law of Arrest," Minnesota Law Review, Vol. 39, pp. 473-77 (April, 1955); Roy Moreland, "Some Trends in the Law of Arrest," ibid., pp. 479-92; Caleb Foote, "Tort Remedies for Police Violations of Individual Rights," ibid., pp. 493-516; Rocco Tresolini, R. W. Taylor, and E. B. Barnett, "Arrest without Warrant: Extent and Social Implications," Journal of Criminal Law, Criminology and Police Science, Vol. 46, pp. 187-98 (July-Aug., 1955); Wallace Mendelson, "Foreign Reactions to American Experience with Due Process of Law," Virginia Law Review, Vol. 41, pp. 493-503 (May, 1955); Note, "The Doctrine of Immunity under the Civil Rights Acts," Harvard Law Review, Vol. 68, pp. 1229-40 (May, 1955); Lauren Colby, "Recent Developments in the Right to Public Trial," Syracuse Law Review, Vol. 6, pp. 339-46 (Spring, 1955); Note, "Constitutionality of Rebuttable Statutory Presumptions," Columbia Law Review, Vol. 55, pp. 527-49 (April, 1955).

<sup>7</sup> On free speech problems see: William L. Chenery, Freedom of the Press (New York, 1955); Anne Lyon Haight, Banned Books, 2d ed. (New York, 1955); Congress for Cultural Freedom, Science and Freedom (Boston, 1955); University of Michigan Law School, Communications Media: Legal and Policy Problems (Ann Arbor, 1954); Herbert Brownell, Jr., "Freedom and Responsibility of the Press in a Free Country," Fordham Law Review, Vol. 34, pp. 178-86 (Summer, 1955); S. I. Shuman, "Publicizing Judicial Proceedings," Wayne Law Review, Vol. 1, pp. 1-44 (Winter, 1954); Note, "Free Press and Fair Trial—A Conflict," Minnesota Law Review, Vol. 39, pp. 431-44 (March, 1955); Edgar A. Jones, Jr., "Picketing and the Communication of Ideas," U.C.L.A. Law Review, Vol. 2, pp. 212-23 (Feb., 1955); Note, "Regulation of Comic Books," Harvard Law Review, Vol. 68, pp. 489-506 (Jan., 1955); Note, "Crime Comics and the Constitution," Stanford Law

I. QUESTIONS OF NATIONAL POWER

1. FEDERAL RIGHTS

The Federal Loyalty Program. The leading security<sup>8</sup> case of the Term was Peters v. Hobby,<sup>9</sup> in the disposition of which many hoped that the Supreme

Review, Vol. 7, pp. 237-60 (March, 1955); Comment, "Censorship of Obscene Literature by Informal Governmental Action," University of Chicago Law Review, Vol. 22, pp. 216-33 (Autumn, 1954); Charles M. Whelan, "Censorship and the Constitutional Concept of Morality," Georgetown Law Journal, Vol. 43, pp. 547-81 (June, 1955); Loren P. Beth, "Group Libel and Free Speech," Minnesota Law Review, Vol. 39, pp. 167-84 (Jan., 1955); Leon R. Yanawich, "Private Libel or Public Exhortation," Notre Dame Lawyer, Vol. 30, pp. 245-72 (March, 1955); Jay W. Murphy, T. J. Earnea, and Samuel Kaufman, II, "Book Labeling—An Ominous Venture in Censorship," Alabama Law Review, Vol. 6, pp. 186-234 (Spring, 1954).

On freedom of religion questions see: J. M. Snee, "Religious Disestablishment and the Fourteenth Amendment," Washington University Law Quarterly, Vol. 1954, pp. 371-407 (Dec., 1954); Harold H. Punke, "Religious Issues in American Public Education," Law and Contemporary Problems, Vol. 20, pp. 138-63 (Winter, 1955); Robert F. Cushman, "The Holy Bible and the Public Schools," Cornell Law Quarterly, Vol. 40, pp. 475-99 (Spring, 1955); Robert E. Rodes, Jr., "Religious Education and the Historical Method of Constitutional Interpretation," Rutgers Law Review, Vol. 9, pp. 682-95 (Summer, 1955); Leo Pfeffer, "Released Time and Religious Liberty: A Reply," Michigan Law Review, Vol. 53, pp. 91-98 (Nov., 1954); Paul G. Kauper, "Released Time and Religious Liberty: A Further Reply," ibid., pp. 233-36; Virgil C. Blum, "Religious Liberty and the Religious Garb," University of Chicago Law Review, Vol. 22, pp. 275-88 (Summer, 1955); Comment, "Religious Garb in the Public Schools: A Study in Conflicting Liberties," ibid., pp. 888-95; Note, "The First Amendment and Distribution of Religious Literature in the Public Schools," Virginia Law Review, Vol. 41, pp. 789-807 (Oct., 1955); Virgil C. Blum, "Religious Liberty and Bus Transportation," Notre Dame Lawyer, Vol. 30, pp. 384-437 (May, 1955); Leo Pfeffer, "Religion in the Upbringing of Children," Bozeman University Law Review, Vol. 35, pp. 833-93 (June, 1955); Elvin E. Crerton, "Religion and Adoption," Tennessee Law Review, Vol. 23, pp. 951-58 (June, 1955); Note, "Constitutionality of Mandatory Religious Requirements in Child Care," Yale Law Journal, Vol. 64, pp. 772-86, (April, 1955); C. C. Cawley, "Criminal Liability in Faith Healing," Minnesota Law Review, Vol. 39, pp. 48-74 (Dec., 1954).

<sup>8</sup> There was a great deal of writing during the Term under discussion on various aspects of security problems. See: Maurice J. Goldblock, American Security and Freedom (Boston, 1954); John Lord O'Brian, National Security and Individual Freedom (Cambridge, Mass., 1955); Alpheus T. Mason, Security through Freedom (Ithaca, 1955); Harold W. Chase, Security and Liberty: The Problem of Native Communists, 1947-1955 (Garden City, N. Y., 1955); Martin Marson, The Private Dignity of a Public Servant (New York, 1955); Robert E. Murray, Red Scare: A Study in National Hysteria, 1919-1920 (Minneapolis, 1955); Symposium, "Secrecy, Security, and Loyalty," Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists, Vol. 11, pp. 106-69 (April, 1955), and see especially Hans Morgenthau, "The Impact of the Loyalty-Security Measures on the State Department," pp. 134-40; Symposium, "Internal Security and Civil Rights," Annals of the American Academy, Vol. 300, July, 1955; Note, "Federal Anti-Subversive Legislation of 1954," Columbia Law Review, Vol. 55, pp. 831-747 (May, 1955); Comment, "The Communist Control Act of 1954," Yale Law Journal, Vol. 64, pp. 712-65 (April, 1955); A. W. Blumrosen, "Repeated Federal Employee Security Adjudications," Wayne Law Review, Vol. 1, pp. 77-104 (Spring, 1955); Arch Dotson, "The Emerging Doctrine of Privilege in Public Employment," Public Administration Review, Vol. 15, pp. 77-88 (Spring, 1955); Paul R. Haerle, "The Court would finally rule on a number of serious constitutional issues long under discussion. Instead, in accordance with the well-established rule that constitutional questions should be avoided if it is possible to dispose of litigation on nonconstitutional grounds, the Court chose such a minimal basis for its decision that it settled practically nothing of any importance. Dr. Peters, a professor of medicine at Yale, was employed as a special consultant in the United States Public Health Service of the Federal Security Agency, which in 1953 was transferred to the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare. His duties required his presence in Washington from four to ten days a year, upon call of the Surgeon General, to give advice on assistance to medical research institutions, for which he was paid on a per diem basis. This work was neither confidential nor sensitive, and he had no access to classified material. Dr. Peters had first been cleared by the Agency Loyalty Board in 1949. After the standard for removal was changed in April, 1951 from "reasonable ground" to "reasonable doubt," the Loyalty Review Board reopened Dr. Peters' case in May, 1951 and remanded the case to the Agency Board for a hearing.

The Agency Board gave Dr. Peters a hearing in April, 1952, at which the sources of adverse information were not identified and were not available for cross-examination. In fact, the Board itself did not know the identity of one or more of the informants, though apparently it knew who some of them were. The only evidence adduced at the hearing was presented by Dr. Peters. He denied under oath that he had ever been a member of the Communist party, and testified as to the other charges, not refusing to answer any questions. His testimony was supported by 18 witnesses, and by the affidavits and statements of 40 others. On May 23, 1952, the Agency Board cleared him. However, since it is apparently always open season in the government service, and a new doctrine of perpetual jeopardy has elbowed the ancient doctrine of double jeopardy into the discard, the Loyalty Review Board notified Dr. Peters, on April 6, 1953, that it was conducting a "post-audit," and he was given another hearing before a panel of the Board on May 12, 1953. The evidence was the same as that presented previously, with Dr. Peters offering five witnesses. The identity of the Communist Control Act of 1954," Michigan Law Review, Vol. 53, pp. 1153-65 (June, 1955); Alan Reeve Hunt, "Federal Supremacy and State Anti-Subversive Legislation," Michigan Law Review, Vol. 53, pp. 407-38 (Jan., 1955); Comment, "Control of Communist Unions; A New Approach," Northwestern University Law Review, Vol. 50, pp. 396-409 (July-Aug., 1955); Note, "Government Exclusion of Foreign Political Propaganda," Harvard Law Review, Vol. 68, pp. 1393-1409 (June, 1955); A. F. Westin, "Critique of Civil Libertarian Reactions to the 'Communist Problem'," Northwestern University Law Review, Vol. 50, pp. 58-70 (March-April, 1955). See also the following publications of the Fund for the Republic: Preliminary Study, Personnel Security Programs of the Federal Government (1954); Digest of the Public Record of Communism in the United States (1955); Bibliography on the Communist Problem in the United States (1955); Adam Yarmolinsky, Case Studies in Personnel Security (Washington: Bureau of National Affairs, 1955); Rowland Watts, The Draftee and Internal Security (New York: Workers Defense League, 1955).

---

* 349 U.S. 831 (1955). See Phillip Sirotkin, "The Peters Case," The Nation, Vol. 180, pp. 438-40 (May 21, 1955).

informants was not disclosed to Dr. Peters, and not all were known to the Board, nor had the testimony of the informants been given under oath. The record also contained the evidence which Dr. Peters had presented at the previous hearing.

The Review Board concluded that there was reasonable doubt of the loyalty of Dr. Peters, and so notified him on May 22, 1953. He was dropped from his position as consultant, though his appointment would have expired December 31, 1953, and barred from further federal employment for a period of three years. Dr. Peters maintained that the action of the Review Board violated both the Executive Order (No. 9835) under which it operated, and the Constitution. His argument was that he was unconstitutionally denied an opportunity to confront and cross-examine his accusers, that the penalty of disbarment was both a bill of attainder and ex post facto, and that his right of free speech had been invaded. Accordingly, he brought suit in the District Court of the District of Columbia for a declaratory judgment, but both this court and the court of appeals denied relief on the authority of Bailey v. Richardson.<sup>10</sup> The Bailey case, it will be recalled, affirmed a court of appeals decision<sup>11</sup> in favor of the loyalty program by a 4-4 vote, without opinion.

While the Supreme Court reversed the holding of the lower courts against Dr. Peters, and admitted that serious constitutional issues were presented, all it actually decided was that the action of the Loyalty Review Board was patently in violation of Executive Order 9835, in that it went beyond the jurisdiction delegated to the Board by the Order. The Board was authorized by the Order "to review cases involving persons recommended for dismissal" brought to it by the agency or the employee. It was given no power to review on its own motion, and thus what the Board sought to do was not authorized under the Order. The Chief Justice maintained that limiting the Board to reviewing adverse determinations was in accord with the recommendations of the President's Temporary Commission on Employee Loyalty, whose 1947 report was the basis of the Order, and with "the deeply rooted principle of criminal law that a verdict of guilty is appealable while a verdict of acquittal is not." He pointed out that this was one of the most important safeguards the Order afforded an accused employee, since it assured that the initial determination of loyalty would be made by one's departmental colleagues who know most about him, rather than by political appointees who might be "more vulnerable to the pressures of heated public opinion." To sanction the abrogation of this safeguard, he declared, would be to sanction "administrative lawlessness."

The Chief Justice also ruled that failure of the President to disapprove of the regulation under which Dr. Peters' case was reopened by the Review Board is not to be deemed acquiescence in it. He said that the Court could not indulge "in such fanciful speculation." There would have to be "explicit Presidential action" to support the inference that limitation on the Board's powers had been eliminated. Furthermore, knowledge by the President of the challenged practice can hardly be imputed to him in view of the relatively small number of cases—only 20—in which, during its six years, the Board reversed favorable determinations. Since dismissal for disloyalty is, in the Chief Justice's words, "a badge of infamy," the Court will not support the "tenuous" theory advanced in support of the Board's action. The Court also ruled that the Review Board had no authority to make Dr. Peters ineligible for federal service for a three-year period.

<sup>10</sup> 341 U.S. 918 (1951).

<sup>11</sup> 182 F. 2d 46 (1950). See this REVIEW, Vol. 46, pp. 165-67 (March, 1955).

In a separate concurring opinion, Justice Black declared that he preferred to decide the case on the constitutional issues, the rule of avoidance of constitutional questions not being "an inflexible rule to be inexorably followed under all circumstances." He not only agreed with the Court on the construction of the Order; he also had grave doubts whether the Executive Order had been authorized by any act of Congress. He even doubted whether Congress could delegate to the President the power to do what he sought to do in the Order. In another concurring opinion, Justice Douglas took the position that since the Order was at best ambiguous, the Review Board had the authority it claimed, but that in the absence of confrontation of the "faceless informers" and cross-examination under oath, due process had been denied. For under this procedure, he said, a man loses reputation and the right to work, and is condemned to a suspect class, "without the rudiments of a fair trial."

Justice Reed, who was joined by Justice Burton, argued in dissent that the Board had adopted the challenged regulation at the very outset, in December, 1947, and had recorded such cases as that of Dr. Peters in each of the annual reports of the Civil Service Commission which, as required by statute, were submitted to the President. He also rejected the Court's analogy between review of presidential orders and review of the administrative interpretation of acts of Congress, since the executive is traditionally free to handle its internal problems of administration in its own way. He doubted the legality of judicial review of such intra-executive operations. But even if the Order is construed as a statute, Justice Reed thought that the Board acted properly, in the light of contemporary construction and the fact that the President allowed the practice to continue after having notice of it in the reports.

The Peters case settled very little.<sup>13</sup> The Civil Service Commission was ordered to expunge from its records the Review Board's finding of reasonable doubt of Dr. Peters' loyalty and the order of disbarment, but Dr. Peters did not get his job back, since his term of appointment had ended December 31, 1953. While the Review Board was denied authority to take up cases on its own initiative, the decision was not very important since the Board went out of business when President Eisenhower supplanted the earlier Executive Order on employee loyalty with Order 10450 in April, 1953, placing ultimate authority in the head of the agency. The grave constitutional questions which the procedures under discussion raise are still without authoritative answers by the nation's highest court, and the faceless informers are still in business.

<sup>13</sup> Congress has not been altogether indifferent to the current criticisms of the security program. It has passed an act, approved August 9, 1955, creating a 12-member Commission on Government Security to study and investigate the entire federal program. The Commission is required to submit a final report not later than December 31, 1956. Public Law 304, 84th Cong., 1st sess., c. 664.

Self-Incrimination. Several procedural and substantive questions concerning the privilege against self-incrimination<sup>13</sup> and the conduct of legislative investigating committees<sup>14</sup> were before the Court in three cases. In these cases it was the government's contention that the witness was trying to eat his cake and have it too by pleading his privilege in such an evasive way that he could enjoy the advantages of silence without incurring the public odium which follows a forthright claim to the privilege. In the leading case, Quinn v. United States,<sup>15</sup> the Court was concerned with a conviction for contempt of Congress in refusing to answer a question put by the House Committee on Un-American Activities. Quinn, a union official, was subpoenaed with two others, Fitzpatrick and Panzino. Fitzpatrick, who was called to testify first, refused to answer a question about Communist affiliation on the ground of "the first and fifth amendments."

<sup>13</sup> For writings during the year under review dealing with self-incrimination problems see: Erwin H. Griswold, The Fifth Amendment Today (Cambridge, Mass., 1955); Nathan April, "A Reappraisal of the Immunity from Self-Incrimination," Minnesota Law Review, Vol. 39, pp. 75-92 (Dec., 1954); George S. Flint, "Witness Immunity Act of 1954," Michigan Law Review, Vol. 53, pp. 858-71 (April, 1955); C. D. Williams, "Problems of the Fifth Amendment," Fordham Law Review, Vol. 24, pp. 19-52 (Spring, 1955); Robert G. Dixon, Jr., "The Doctrine of Separation of Powers and Federal Immunity Statutes," George Washington Law Review, Vol. 23, pp. 501-34, 557-57 (April, June, 1955); Arthur B. Hymar, "What Price Constitutional Immunity?" Tennessee Law Review, Vol. 23, pp. 931-42 (June, 1955); Fred E. Inbau, "Should We Erosion the Constitutional Privilege against Self-Incrimination?" Journal of Criminal Law, Criminology, and Police Science, Vol. 45, pp. 80-84 (July-Aug., 1954); John T. Noonan, Jr., "Inferences from the Invocation of the Privilege against Self-Incrimination," Virginia Law Review, Vol. 41, pp. 311-42 (April, 1955).

On closely related topics see: N. Redlich, "Searches, Seizures, and Self-Incrimination in Tax Cases," Tax Law Review, Vol. 10, pp. 191-200 (Jan., 1955); Louis B. Schwartz, "On Current Proposals to Legalize Wire Tapping," University of Pennsylvania Law Review, Vol. 103, pp. 157-67 (Nov., 1954); Note, "State Exclusionary Rule as a Deterrent against Unreasonable Search and Seizure," Journal of Criminal Law, Criminology, and Police Science, Vol. 45, pp. 697-707 (March-April, 1955); Note, "State Police, Unconstitutionally Obtained Evidence and Section 242 of the Civil Rights Statute," Stanford Law Review, Vol. 7, pp. 75-96 (Dec., 1954); Richard A. Edwards, "Criminal Liability for Unreasonable Searches and Seizures," Virginia Law Review, Vol. 41, pp. 621-32 (June, 1955); Note, "Constitutional Limits on the Admissibility in Federal Courts of Evidence Obtained from Required Records," Harvard Law Review, Vol. 68, pp. 340-49 (Dec., 1954).

<sup>14</sup> See: Alan Barth, Government by Investigation (New York, 1955); Telford Taylor, Grand Inquest: The Story of Congressional Investigations (New York, 1955); Legislative Reference Service, Congressional Power of Investigation (Sen. Doc. 99, 83d Cong., 2d sess., 1954); Dorothy C. Tompkins, Investigating Procedures of Congressional Committees: A Bibliography (Berkeley: Bureau of Public Administration, University of California, 1954); Robert B. Tunstall, "Scope and Limitations of the Investigating Power of Congress," Virginia Law Review, Vol. 40, pp. 875-97 (Nov., 1954); Walter F. Hoffmann, "The Legitimate Functions of a Congressional Investigation," Reiers Law Review, Vol. 9, pp. 528-43 (Spring, 1955).

<sup>15</sup> 349 U.S. 155 (1955).

At one point he also said that he was relying upon "the first amendment to the Constitution, supplemented by the fifth amendment." Then Panzino refused to testify, on the grounds relied upon by Fitzpatrick. The next day Quinn was asked whether he had ever been a member of the Communist party. He declined to answer, on the grounds relied upon by Fitzpatrick. Panzino and Fitzpatrick were both acquitted after trial before different judges. In Quinn's case, the district court held that a witness may not incorporate the position of another witness, and rejected his defense based on the Self-Incrimination Clause. The court of appeals reversed, sitting en banc, but remanded the case for a determination as to whether Fitzpatrick did claim the privilege, holding that a witness may adopt as his own a plea made by a previous witness. By an 8-1 vote the Supreme Court set aside the remand, and directed the district court to enter a judgment of acquittal.

Speaking for the Court, Chief Justice Warren undertook to review the nature and scope of the power of Congress and its committees to investigate. While the power is concededly a broad one, he emphasized that it is also subject to "recognized limitations": "it cannot be used to inquire into private affairs unrelated to a valid legislative purpose";<sup>16</sup> it does not extend "to an area in which Congress is forbidden to legislate";<sup>17</sup> the investigatory power must not be confused with any of the powers of law enforcement, which the Constitution assigns to the executive and the judiciary;<sup>18</sup> and "still further limitations on the power to investigate are found in the specific individual guarantees of the Bill of Rights, such as the Fifth Amendment's privilege against self-incrimination which is in issue here."<sup>19</sup> Furthermore, the Chief Justice stressed the antiquity and importance of the privilege, and argued that it should be liberally construed in favor of the right it was intended to secure, particularly in prosecution of a witness for a refusal to answer, "since the respect normally accorded the privilege is then buttressed by the presumption of innocence accorded a defendant in a criminal trial."

There was no doubt of the fact that an answer to the question whether Quinn was a member of the Communist party might have tended to incriminate him.<sup>20</sup> The only issue was whether Quinn did claim the privilege, since he was clearly entitled to do so. On this point Chief Justice Warren said: "It is agreed by all that a claim of the privilege does not require any special combination of words. Plainly a witness need not have the skill of a lawyer to invoke the protection of the Self-Incrimination Clause. If an objection to a question is made in any

<sup>16</sup> Citing McGrain v. Daugherty, 273 U.S. 135, 173-74 (1927); Kilbourn v. Thompson, 103 U.S. 168, 190 (1881).

<sup>17</sup> Citing United States v. Rumely, 345 U.S. 41 (1953). The Chief Justice seems to believe that Congress has only legislative functions.

<sup>18</sup> Citing Kilbourn v. Thompson, 103 U.S. 168, 192-93 (1881).

<sup>19</sup> Nothing was cited.

<sup>20</sup> The cases cited on this point were: Blau v. United States, 340 U.S. 159 (1950); Bruner v. United States, 343 U.S. 918 (1952); Hoffman v. United States, 341 U.S. 479 (1951). The Hoffman case grew out of an investigation of violations of customs narcotics and liquor laws, and had nothing to do with so-called subversive activity.

language that a committee may reasonably be expected to understand as an attempt to invoke the privilege, it must be respected both by the committee and by a court. . . ." The Chief Justice thought that Quinn's references to the Fifth Amendment were clearly sufficient to put the Committee on notice of an apparent claim of the privilege, since in common parlance today the Fifth Amendment has come to mean the privilege against self-incrimination. It was then necessary for the Committee either to accept the claim or ask Quinn whether he was in fact invoking the privilege. And he added: "Particularly is this so if it is true, as the Government contends that petitioner feared the stigma that might result from a forthright claim of his constitutional right to refuse to testify. It is precisely at such times—when the privilege is under attack by those who wrongly conceive of it as merely a shield for the guilty—that governmental bodies must be most scrupulous in protecting its exercise."

There was a second ground for this decision. The Chief Justice maintained that Section 192 of Title 2 of the U. S. Code, which Quinn was alleged to have violated, like the ordinary federal criminal statute, requires a showing of criminal intent, in this instance, "a deliberate, intentional refusal to answer." Obviously, not every refusal to answer a question asked by a congressional committee subjects a witness to prosecution under Section 192. For example, if he raises an objection to a certain question and the committee sustains the objection and abandons the question, there can be no criminal intent even though the objection might actually have been without merit. Or the committee may disallow the objection and confront the witness with a choice of answering or not. If, given such a choice, the witness does not answer, then there is a basis for a finding of criminal intent. In short, the witness must be clearly apprised that the committee demands his answer before there can be a conviction under Section 192. In this instance, the Chief Justice held, the Committee did not at any time specifically overrule Quinn's Fifth Amendment objection, and thus he was never confronted with a clear-cut choice. At best he had to guess whether or not the Committee accepted his objection. Thus, the Court laid down the rule that "a clear disposition of the witness' objection is a prerequisite to prosecution for contempt." This rule, it was declared, was supported by long-standing English and American decisions, by congressional history, and by the legislative history of Section 192.<sup>21</sup> Justice Harlan concurred except as to what was said with regard to criminal intent.

Justice Reed dissented alone. Conceding that a question about Communist party membership is incriminating, he maintained that whether a claim of the privilege was made is a question of fact for the trial court to decide, and he therefore objected to directing the district court to acquit. Nor did he believe that Quinn had notified the Committee that he was claiming the privilege, insisting that "the burden is on the witness to advise his interrogators of a claim to privilege in understandable terms." Furthermore, Justice Reed thought that Quinn had been sufficiently advised that the Committee believed that his reply was not a satisfactory excuse.

<sup>21</sup> The Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia had previously ruled that criminal intent did not have to be proved to establish a violation of Section 192. See Barsky v. United States, 167 F. 2d 241, (App. D.C. 1948); Pielke v. United States, 164 F. 2d 97 (App. D.C. 1947).

In Emspak v. United States<sup>22</sup> the Court had before it another union official who had refused to answer 68 questions, of which 58 asked whether he knew named individuals, two dealt with alleged membership in front organizations, and eight with alleged membership in the Communist party. His refusal to answer was based, in his words, on "primarily the first amendment, supplemented by the fifth." Again Chief Justice Warren declared that "no ritualistic formula or talismanic phrase," or orthodox statement, is necessary to invoke the privilege. All that is necessary is that the objection be stated in language a committee could reasonably be expected to understand as an attempt to invoke the privilege. Answering the government's contention that Emspak deliberately phrased his claim to get the benefit of the privilege without the odium, the Chief Justice declared that if it is true that in these times a stigma results from reliance on the Self-Incrimination Clause, "a committee should be all the more ready to recognize a veiled claim of the privilege. Otherwise, the great right which the Clause was intended to secure might be effectively frustrated by private pressures." He added that a committee is not obliged either to accept or to reject an ambiguous claim to the privilege as soon as it is presented, but that it ought to inquire further into the nature of the claim before making a ruling.

When Emspak refused to discuss his associations, and was then asked whether that would subject him to criminal prosecution, he replied: "No, I don't think this Committee has a right to pry into my associations. That is my own position." The Court held that this was not an effective waiver of the privilege, that waiver is not lightly inferred, and that at most the "no" was equivocal, since it may have referred to the reasons underlying the witness' assertion of the privilege. One does not have to disclose the precise hazard he fears. The Court also ruled that it was immaterial that some of the questions dealing with associations sought information which Emspak might have been able to explain away on some innocent basis unrelated to communism. If the answer tends to be incriminatory, a witness does not lose the privilege merely because he might be able to refute any inference of guilt in a later prosecution.

Justices Reed and Minton dissented for the reasons given in the former's dissenting opinion in the Quinn case. Justice Harlan also filed a dissenting opinion in which he agreed that Emspak had adequately invoked the privilege, but could not agree that the 58 questions on associations called for possibly incriminatory answers. Asserting that the danger of prosecution must be real, and not an imaginary possibility, he thought that many of these questions were innocent, revealing no more than was already known, and that one could say he knew a man without admitting he knew he was a Communist. In his view there is no legal right not to "stool pigeon" on others. He was also certain that the witness knew that the committee wanted its questions answered.

<sup>22</sup> 349 U.S. 190 (1955).

In the third case, Bart v. United States,<sup>23</sup> the witness, then general manager of the Daily Worker, was convicted of contempt for refusing to tell the committee his name when he came to this country as a child, his name before he changed it to Bart, his father's name, and the identity of officials of the Ohio section of the Communist party in 1936. On the name questions Bart raised the issue of pertinency, and on the last question he unequivocally pleaded the privilege against self-incrimination. In the court of appeals he abandoned his defense of lack of pertinency. The Supreme Court reversed by a 6-3 vote, holding that, contrary to the position of the court of appeals the abandonment of the defense of the lack of pertinency did not erase Bart's objections from the committee record. This being so, there still had to be an affirmative ruling from the committee, and this was never made. In fact, the chairman said at the time, "We don't rule on objections." Having objected, Bart was entitled to a clean-cut ruling from the committee, even though his claims were later abandoned or found to be invalid.

Justices Reed and Minton, dissenting, took the position that Bart had been sufficiently apprised of the disposition of his objections. Justice Harlan also dissented, arguing that Bart must have understood that the committee was insisting on his answering the questions. For example, as to his name, the committee asked and pressed the question four different ways. A man of Bart's intelligence, Justice Harlan insisted, must have known that the committee regarded his objections as unfounded.

While in these three cases the Supreme Court ruled for the first time that the privilege against self-incrimination may be invoked by witnesses testifying before congressional committees—a point long assumed and often affirmed by the lower federal courts—and while several interesting aspects of the privilege were explored, the net impact of these cases in practical terms will probably not be very great. Committees will simply have to be careful to reject explicitly a witness' objection to a question and direct him with equal explicitness to answer it. As a matter of fact, this has been the general practice of most investigating committees heretofore. There does not seem to be anything in the strictures of the Chief Justice which is likely to impose any undue burden upon the investigatory power of Congress.

Deportation of Aliens. Problems in connection with the deportation of aliens<sup>24</sup> continue to reach the Supreme Court. One of the most important is that of the nature and extent of judicial review of deportation orders. It will be recalled that in the Heikkila case,<sup>25</sup> decided in 1953, the Court held that the validity of a deportation order issued under the Immigration Act of 1917 may be challenged only by way of habeas corpus, and not by injunction or declaratory judgment pursuant to the Administrative Procedure Act (APA). When this question first arose with regard to the Immigration and Nationality Act of 1952, the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia held, in the Rubinstein case,<sup>26</sup> that under the new statute deportation orders may be reviewed in an action for declaratory and injunctive relief. The Supreme Court affirmed, without opinion, by a 4-4 vote.<sup>27</sup> Now, in Shaughnessy v. Pedreiro,<sup>28</sup> the Court has ruled squarely on the issue.

<sup>23</sup> 349 U.S. 219 (1955).

<sup>24</sup> See: Frank L. Auerbach, Immigration Laws of the United States (Indianapolis, 1955); Charles P. Schwartz, Jr., "American Immigration Policy," Columbia Law Review, Vol. 55, pp. 31-41 (March, 1955); Comment, "The Expatriation Act of 1954," Yale Law Journal, Vol. 64, pp. 1164-1200 (July, 1955); Laurent B. Frantz, "Deportation Deliriums," The Nation, Vol. 180, pp. 258-64 (March 26, 1955).

Following administrative hearings, Pedreiro, an alien, was ordered deported under the 1952 Immigration Act. He petitioned the federal district court to review the order, declare it void, and issue an injunction restraining execution pending final court action. Pedreiro alleged that there was no legal evidence to support the order, and that he had been compelled to incriminate himself at the hearings, contrary to due process. He sought relief only against the District Director of Immigration and Naturalization for the District of New York. The district court dismissed the petition on the ground that either the Attorney General or the Commissioner of Immigration and Naturalization was an indispensable party. It did not, therefore, rule on the other ground urged by the government for dismissal, that the 1952 Act precluded judicial review of deportation orders by any method except habeas corpus. The court of appeals reversed, rejecting both of the government's contentions, on the authority of the Rubinstein case. The Supreme Court agreed with the court of appeals by a 6-3 vote.

Section 10 of APA provides: "Any person suffering legal wrong because of any agency action, or adversely affected or aggrieved by such action within the meaning of any relevant statute, shall be entitled to judicial review thereof." Section 12 of APA provides that "no subsequent enacted legislation shall be held to supersede or modify the provisions of this Act except to the extent that such legislation shall do so expressly." In the 1952 Immigration Act there is no language which "expressly" supersedes or modifies the expanded right of review granted by Section 10 of APA.

The 1952 Act, however, provides, as did the 1917 Act, that deportation orders of the Attorney General are "final." But Justice Black, who delivered the opinion of the Court, held that to read the word "final" in the 1952 Act as it was read in the 1917 Act, which is what the government requested, would run counter to Sections 10 and 12 of APA, their purpose being "to remove obstacles to judicial review of agency action under subsequently enacted statutes like the 1952 Immigration Act." He went on to say: "It is more in harmony with the

<sup>25</sup> Heikkila v. Barber, 345 U.S. 229 (1953). See this REVIEW, Vol. 48, pp. 67-68 (March, 1954).

<sup>26</sup> Rubinstein v. Brownell, 92 App. D.C. 328, 206 F. 2d 449 (1953).

<sup>27</sup> 346 U.S. 929 (1954).

<sup>28</sup> 349 U.S. 48 (1955).

generous review provisions of the Administrative Procedure Act to construe the ambiguous word 'final' in the 1952 Immigration Act as referring to finality in administrative procedure rather than as cutting off the right of judicial review in whole or in part. And it would certainly not be in keeping with either of these Acts to require a person ordered deported to go to jail in order to obtain review by a court." Justice Black also ruled that full judicial review of deportation orders was supported by the legislative history of both APA and the 1952 Immigration Act. Senator McCarran and Congressman Walter, who sponsored both statutes, agreed that APA applied.

Finally, the Court held that the Commissioner was not an indispensable party, since the district directors are authorized by regulation to issue warrants of deportation, and actually enforce the orders. Any other interpretation would require every alien to try his case in the District of Columbia to get jurisdiction over the Commissioner, and such a view is completely inconsistent with the basic policy of APA to facilitate judicial review. As to whether a judgment against a district director alone would be final, Justice Black said that it should not be assumed that a decision on the merits in a court of appeals, subject to review by the Supreme Court, would be lightly disregarded by the immigration authorities. Nor could it be assumed that a second effort to have the same issue decided in a habeas corpus proceeding would impose any serious burden on the government, since in habeas corpus proceedings the district courts would have the duty to take into consideration previous court decisions on the same matter.

Speaking for the three dissenters, Justice Minton maintained that since on the point at issue the 1952 Immigration Act used the same language that appeared in the 1917 Act, the former is not "subsequently enacted legislation." Since 1891 the word "final" in the Immigration Acts has precluded judicial review except by habeas corpus. In view of this long history, and the 1952 reenactment, Justice Minton was reluctant to impute to Congress an intention to change the method of review in the absence of a clear showing.

The chief significance of the rule of the Pedraza case lies in the fact that the alien no longer has to wait until he is arrested to get judicial review of the deportation order. There will probably be little or no change in the scope of review, since the federal courts have over the years taken a very generous view of the term "jurisdiction" when reviewing deportation orders in habeas corpus proceedings.

An important procedural point was finally established in the second Accardi case.<sup>29</sup> Again it will be recalled that in 1954 the Court held that when the Board of Immigration Appeals deals with an application for a suspension of deportation, the board must exercise its own discretion.<sup>30</sup> Accardi had claimed that the denial of his application by the Board was prejudged by the fact that the Attorney General had previously included his name in a confidential list of

<sup>29</sup> Shaughnessy v. U.S. ex rel. Accardi, 349 U.S. 286 (1955).

<sup>30</sup> U.S. ex rel. Accardi v. Shaughnessy, 347 U.S. 260 (1954). See this REVIEW, Vol. 49, pp. 70-71 (March, 1955).

"unsavory characters" who should be deported. In his habeas corpus proceeding the district court refused to give him a hearing on this issue. By a 5-4 vote the Supreme Court remanded the petition for such a hearing.

Accardi got his hearing. The district court concluded that each member of the Board had reached his own decision on the merits, free from dictation or suggestion, and dismissed the petition. The court of appeals reversed on the ground that the Attorney General's statement had unconsciously influenced the Board members. A concurring judge thought that all the Supreme Court's opinion required Accardi to do was to prove that there was a list as alleged, and that it was known to the Board that he was on it. One judge dissented on the ground that all Accardi was entitled to was a hearing on the question of whether the Board's decision was its own or one dictated by the Attorney General, and concluded that the trial judge was not clearly erroneous. Six Justices agreed with this dissenting judge, holding that Accardi had to prove not only that a majority of the Board knew about the list, but also that they were affected by it. Justice Clark noted that there was uncontradicted testimony of a number of witnesses, including the Board members, that the Board made its own decision, and that in the light of all the evidence this conclusion was not incredible. In fact, the record shows that there was no list at all, but only publicity dealing with the deportation program, and the Attorney General himself testified that there was no such list, and that he had never discussed the matter with any member of the Board. "In the face of such evidence," said Justice Clark, "we do not believe that speculation on the effect of subconscious psychological pressures provides sufficient justification for rejecting the District Court's finding as clearly erroneous."

Justice Frankfurter joined in a dissenting opinion written by Justice Black, who argued that the Court was giving the former opinion too narrow a meaning. He thought that Accardi did prove that the Attorney General had prejudiced his case. In his reading of the record, what the district court held was that Accardi could have relief only if he proved that the Board felt itself "dictated to" by the Attorney General. Justice Black thought that it was a bad practice to subject administrative officers acting in a quasi-judicial capacity to a probe of the mental processes which led them to decide as they did, and that the Attorney General's statements placed the Board, the members of which hold office completely at his will, in a position in which no judicial agency should be put. He noted that there was not a single case where an alien on the proscribed list has ever been granted final discretionary relief.

A third deportation case, Marcello v. Bonds<sup>21</sup>, raised a number of interesting procedural questions which the Court resolved by a 5-3 vote. Marcello, a native of Tunis, was ordered deported, after a hearing, pursuant to Section 242(b) of the Immigration Act of 1952, for the reason that he had been convicted in 1938 of violating the Marihuana Tax Act and sentenced to one year in jail. Section 241(a) (11) of the 1952 Act makes conviction at any time ground for deportation. Section 241(d) declares that the deportation provisions of Section 241(a) shall apply even though the facts giving rise to the alien's deportability occurred prior to 1952. Marcello advanced the following contentions in a habeas corpus proceeding: (1) the hearing failed to comply with APA because the special inquiry officer was under the supervision and control of officials in the Immigration Service who performed both investigative and prosecuting functions; (2) in the absence of a fair hearing, due process was violated; (3) a public statement on the day of his arrest by the Attorney General that he was an undesirable who ought to be deported, and his inclusion in the Attorney General's list of 152 persons he wanted to deport, prejudiced the hearing officer; (4) the retroactive application of Section 241(e) (1) was ex post facto.

<sup>21</sup> 349 U.S. 302 (1955).

The Supreme Court rejected all of these contentions. As to the first, while it is true that the Court once ruled, in Wong Yang Sung v. McGrath,<sup>32</sup> that deportation proceedings were subject to several sections of APA, this holding was promptly set aside by an act of Congress<sup>33</sup> which provided that proceedings dealing with the exclusion or expulsion of aliens were not to be governed by Sections 5, 7, and 8 of APA. Justice Clark decided that Congress did not reverse itself when it adopted the 1952 Immigration Act, whose detailed provisions on procedure indicate that Congress set up a special administrative procedure for deportation hearings. The Court could not agree that due process had been denied because the hearing officer was subject to the supervision and control of officials in the Immigration Service charged with investigative and prosecuting functions. Such an inference was contradicted by "the long-standing practice in deportation proceedings, judicially approved in numerous decisions in the federal courts, and . . . the special considerations applicable to deportation which the Congress may take into account in exercising its particularly broad discretion in immigration matters."

As for the claim of prejudgment, Justice Clark pointed out that it was not alleged that the inquiry officer or the Appeals Board had seen the list, had known of its existence, or had been influenced by it. No evidence on this point was supplied to the Board, though it had been promised. So far as the unfavorable newspaper publicity was concerned, it was noted that the hearing officer could not have been influenced, since all he had to do was merely apply the statute to the undisputed facts. Finally, the Court repeated the well-established rule that the ex post facto doctrine does not apply to deportation proceedings, a rule recently reaffirmed.<sup>34</sup>

Justice Black wrote a dissenting opinion with which Justice Frankfurter indicated agreement. Starting with the premise that "a fair hearing necessarily includes an impartial tribunal," he maintained that since the hearing officer adjudicated the very case which his superiors initiated and prosecuted, a serious due process issue existed not to be dismissed lightly. Furthermore, he thought that Section 5 of APA applied to this situation, on the theory that the 1952

<sup>32</sup> 339 U.S. 33 (1950).

<sup>33</sup> 64 Stat. 1048 (1951).

<sup>34</sup> Golan v. Press, 347 U.S. 522 (1954); Harisiades v. Shaughnessy, 342 U.S. 580 (1952).

Immigration Act repealed the 1950 statute which set aside the Wong Yang Sung case, and that this was amply supported by legislative history. Justice Douglas chose to reopen in his dissenting opinion an old debate about the meaning of the ex post facto doctrine. He argued that it had not always been limited to criminal prosecutions,<sup>35</sup> and that "deportation may be as severe a punishment as loss of livelihood."

Urban Redevelopment and Rights of Property Owners. By unanimous vote the Court upheld the constitutionality of the District of Columbia Redevelopment Act of 1945 in Berman v. Parker.<sup>36</sup> Congress made a legislative determination that there were substandard and blighted areas in Washington, a fact which is obvious to any casual observer with eyes to see, that these areas were injurious to health, safety, morals, and welfare, that the acquisition of property was necessary to eliminate these housing conditions, and that this could not be accomplished by the ordinary operations of private enterprise. The statute created a District of Columbia Redevelopment Land Agency with the power to acquire and assemble by eminent domain and otherwise real property in blighted areas. The National Capital Planning Commission was directed to make a comprehensive or general plan for the District, including a land-use plan, and to make specific plans for specific project areas, subject to the approval of the District Commissioners after public hearing. The Agency may then acquire and assemble the real property in the area, and it is authorized to transfer to public authorities the land which is to be devoted to public purposes (streets, utilities, recreation, schools), and lease or sell the remainder as an entirety or in parts to a redevelopment company, individual, or partnership. The leases or sales must provide that the lessees or purchasers will carry out the plan. Preference is given to private enterprise over public agencies in executing the redevelopment plan.

Berman owned a small department store in the area of one of the projects. Since this was commercial and not residential property, he claimed that it was not slum housing, and that therefore it was not necessary to condemn it for slum clearance. He also stressed the fact that it will be put into a project under the management of a private, not a public agency, and argued that it would be redeveloped for private and not public use. The Court sustained the program against all constitutional objections. Above all, it went farther than it ever has in the past in approving the regulation of property through the police power for aesthetic purposes.

<sup>35</sup> Citing as examples Fletcher v. Peck, 6 Cranch 87, 138-39 (1810); Cummings v. Missouri, 4 Wall. 277 (1867); Ex parte Garland, 4 Wall. 333 (1867).

<sup>36</sup> 348 U.S. 26 (1954). The problems growing out of urban redevelopment were explored extensively during the year. See: Symposium, "Land Planning in a Democracy," Law and Contemporary Problems, Vol. 20, pp. 197-350 (Spring, 1955), and especially, Corwin W. Johnson, "Constitutional Law and Community Planning," pp. 199-217; Symposium, "Urban Housing and Planning," Law and Contemporary Problems, Vol. 20, pp. 351-529 (Summer, 1955); Note, "Public Use as a Limitation on Eminent Domain in Urban Renewal," Harvard Law Review, Vol. 68, pp. 1422-36 (June, 1955); Richard A. Lavine, "Extent of Judicial Inquiry into Power of Eminent Domain," Southern California Law Review, Vol. 28, pp. 369-83 (July, 1955); Clinton Rodda, "The Accomplishment of Aesthetic Purposes under the Police Power," Southern California Law Review, Vol. 27, pp. 149-79 (Feb., 1954); Robert A. Bergs, "Aesthetics as a Justification for the Exercise of the Police Power or Eminent Domain," George Washington Law Review, Vol. 23, pp. 730-50 (June, 1955).

Speaking for the Court, Justice Douglas noted that the power of Congress over the District of Columbia included all the legislative powers of a state, among them the police power, as to which the legislative discretion is not only very broad, but also "well-nigh conclusive." And this principle is no different merely because eminent domain is involved. The judiciary's function in determining whether the police power is being exercised for a public purpose is "an extremely narrow one." Pointing out that the police power extends to many traditional purposes, such as safety, health, morality, and public order, Justice Douglas declared: "Miserable and disreputable housing conditions may do more than spread disease and crime and immorality. They may also suffocate the spirit by reducing the people who live there to the status of cattle. They may indeed make living an almost insufferable burden. They may also be an ugly sore, a blight on the community which robs it of charm, which makes it a place from which men turn. The misery of housing may despoil a community as an open-sewer may ruin a river."

Since the concept of public welfare is broad, Justice Douglas insisted that it was not for the Court to decide whether a particular housing project is desirable. "The values it represents are spiritual as well as physical, aesthetic as well as monetary. It is within the power of the legislature to determine that the community should be beautiful as well as healthy, spacious as well as clean, well-balanced as well as carefully patrolled. . . . If those who govern the District of Columbia decide that the Nation's Capital should be beautiful as well as sanitary, there is nothing in the Fifth Amendment that stands in the way."

Since the power of eminent domain is merely a means to an end, it is within the discretion of Congress to utilize private enterprise rather than public ownership, to permit certain property owners in the area to repurchase their properties for redevelopment, and to approach the problem on an area instead of a building-by-building basis. It was held that the standards set out in the Act were sufficiently definite, and that it was not for the courts to decide upon the boundary lines of an area or review the size of a project. The rights of the property owners are satisfied when they receive that just compensation which the Fifth Amendment exacts as the price of the taking.<sup>37</sup>

<sup>37</sup> Compare this decision with City of New Orleans v. Levy 23 La. 14, 64 So. 2d 798 (1953), wherein the Supreme Court of Louisiana held constitutional a city ordinance providing for the preservation of the quaint and distinctive character of the Vieux Carré section of New Orleans by imposing restrictions on the use of signs and on building alterations. The court said that "perhaps aesthetic considerations alone would not warrant an imposition" of these restrictions, and therefore went on to argue that the legislation had commercial value also, and would promote the welfare of the community. For recent comparable decisions see: Opinion of the Justices to the Senate, 128 N.E. 2d 557 (Mass. 1955); State ex rel. Cleveland Park Holding Corp. v. Wislanc, 269 Wis. 263, 69 N.W. 2d 217 (1955), certiorari denied, 76 S. Ct. 81 (1955).

Eminent Domain and Compensable Interests. An old question of Indian law came up from the Court of Claims in Tee-Hit-Ton Indians v. United States.<sup>38</sup> An identifiable group of some 60 to 70 Alaskan Indians claimed compensation for a taking by the United States of certain timber from Alaskan lands allegedly belonging to the group. These Indians had no substantive statute to rely upon, but grounded their suit entirely on the Fifth Amendment right to compensation. The United States denied that the Indians had any compensable interest, arguing that they had only a right to use the land in question at the will of the government. An act of 1947 authorized the Secretary of Agriculture to sell the timber on this land. By a 5-3 vote the Court affirmed the holding of the Court of Claims in favor of the government. Justice Reed pointed out that where, by treaty or other agreement, Congress has declared that Indians were to hold lands permanently, then compensation must be paid for a later taking. But in this instance he could find no legislation to indicate that Congress ever intended to vest in these Indians any permanent rights in Alaskan lands occupied by them with the permission of Congress. It was clear to him that Congress merely intended to retain the status quo until further action was taken. While congressional recognition of the Indian right of permanent occupancy need not take any particular form, "there must be the definite intention by congressional action or authority to accord legal rights, not merely permissive occupation." After the conquest, said Justice Reed, where Congress did not specifically recognize ownership, the Indians had mere possession, and this is not a property right but only a right of occupancy which the sovereign protects against third party intrusion and may terminate without any legally enforceable obligation to pay compensation. The rule has always been that the taking of unrecognized Indian title is not compensable under the Fifth Amendment, since the Indian occupation of land without government recognition of ownership creates no rights against a taking by the United States which is protected by any legal principle. Thus in this instance compensation was held to be altogether a policy question for Congress to decide on, and not the requirement of a constitutional principle.

The three dissenters called attention to Section 8 of the first Organic Act for Alaska, 1884, which declared that Indians "shall not be disturbed in the possession of any lands actually in their use or occupation or now claimed by them but the terms under which such persons may acquire title to such lands is reserved for future legislation by Congress." They thought that legislative history supported the conclusion that Congress had recognized the claims of these Indians to their Alaskan lands.

This decision probably has a very limited significance, in the light of the enactment by Congress in 1946 of the Indians Claims Commission Act,<sup>39</sup> under which claims may be brought against the United States based either on positive law or on "fair and honorable dealings that are not recognized by any existing rule of law or equity." However, this statute specifically applies only to claims which accrued before the date of its enactment, August 13, 1946, and the Tee-Hit-Ton claim arose from a taking by the government authorized by Congress in 1947. The Court of Claims recently ruled that original Indian title is compensable under the 1946 statute, and the Supreme Court refused certiorari to review the decision.<sup>40</sup>

<sup>38</sup> 348 U.S. 272 (1955).

<sup>39</sup> 60 Stat. 1049.

Lawyer Troubles: Disbarment. After Abraham J. Isserman, one of the lawyers who represented the Communist leaders in the Dennis case,<sup>41</sup> was given a jail sentence by Judge Medina for contempt<sup>42</sup> the highest court of New Jersey disbarred him, and the Supreme Court refused to grant certiorari.<sup>43</sup> Then the Supreme Court disbarred him by a 4-4 vote this result following from the fact that as the pertinent Rule 2(5) then stood a lawyer already disbarred by a state court had the burden of showing cause why he should not be disbarred by the Supreme Court.<sup>44</sup> But soon afterwards the Court adopted a set of Revised Rules which went into effect July 1, 1954,<sup>45</sup> and Rule 8 now states: "No order of disbarment will be entered except with the concurrence of a majority of the justices participating." On the strength of the new Rule, a motion for rehearing was granted and the previous order of disbarment was set aside.<sup>46</sup> Three Justices dissented, and two did not participate.

Admission to the Bar. Under the Local Rules of the United States District Court for the Southern District of Texas, an attorney may not be admitted to its bar unless, among other things, his "private and personal character shall be unexceptional." Following an informal hearing before the local Bar Committee, and an adverse recommendation by it, a three-judge district court denied the application of Ben G. Levy for admission, and the Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit affirmed on technical procedural grounds.<sup>47</sup> Apparently he was denied admission because it was found that he associated with a man who was "generally considered" to be a member of the Communist party. The Supreme Court reversed with a mere per curiam observation that the record did not disclose "sufficient grounds" for refusing to admit Levy to the bar of the district court.<sup>48</sup>

Contempt of Court by Counsel. Throughout a long fourteen-day trial of a man accused of abortion, his lawyer, Offutt, and the judge clashed, with more and more personal overtones, the judge often warning counsel that he was exceeding the limits of aggressive advocacy. Following a trial, pursuant to Rule 42(a) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, and on the authority of the Sacher

<sup>40</sup> Oce and Missouri Tribe of Indians v. United States, 31 F. Supp. 265 (1955), certiorari denied, 76 S. Ct. 82 (1955).

<sup>41</sup> Dennis v. United States, 341 U.S. 494 (1951).

<sup>42</sup> Confirmed in Sacher v. United States, 343 U.S. 1 (1952).

<sup>43</sup> Isserman v. Ethics Committee, 345 U.S. 927 (1953).

<sup>44</sup> In re Isserman, 345 U.S. 286 (1953). Justice Clark did not participate.

<sup>45</sup> 246 U.S. 949-1018.

<sup>46</sup> In re Disbarment of Isserman, 348 U.S. 1 (1954).

<sup>47</sup> Application of Levy, 214 F. 2d 331 (1954).

<sup>48</sup> In re Levy, 348 U.S. 978 (1955).

decision,<sup>49</sup> the judge summarily found Offutt guilty of criminal contempt on the basis of a certificate which recited twelve findings of "contumacious and unethical conduct," and sentenced him to ten days in jail. The court of appeals affirmed, holding that four of the twelve findings amply supported the commitment, but reduced the sentence to 48 hours because of the judge's own conduct. By a 6-3 vote, the Supreme Court reversed the conviction of Offutt for criminal contempt and remanded for a hearing before another judge.<sup>50</sup>

Speaking for the Court, Justice Frankfurter made it clear that the extraordinary power of the judge to punish for contempt summarily is required for the proper administration of justice. But he also noted that the Court has ruled that a district judge should not himself sit in judgment where the contempt charged is entangled with his personal feeling against the lawyer. The "vital point," he said, is that the judge "should not himself give vent to personal spleen or respond to a personal grievance." As Chief Justice Taft once ruled in the Cooke case,<sup>51</sup> where delay will not hurt, and conditions do not make it impracticable, "a judge called upon to act in a case of contempt by personal attack upon him, may, without flinching from his duty, properly ask that one of his fellow judges take his place." Thus, under this rule the judge should not have decided the contempt question himself, since the record shows clearly that he allowed himself to get embroiled personally with Offutt. It should be noted that in the Cooke case the Chief Justice said that the district judge "may" ask another judge to decide the contempt question; now the Court seems to say "shall" instead of "may."

Justices Black and Douglas concurred, but repeated a point they had previously made,<sup>52</sup> that on the remand Offutt should be given a jury trial. Three Justices dissented, with Justice Minton asserting that they were dealing with a "piddling case," and that the Cooke rule had been supplanted by the Sacher decision. The only issue he could see here was the severity of the punishment, and the two-day sentence approved by the court of appeals seemed satisfactory to him.

2. THE FEDERAL TAXING POWER

In 1953, in United States v. Kahriger,<sup>53</sup> the Court sustained over the objections of Justices Frankfurter, Douglas, and Black, and with the reluctant concurrence of Justice Jackson, the constitutionality of the Gamblers' Occupation Tax Act of 1951. This Act levies an occupational tax of $50 a year upon all persons "engaged in the business of accepting wagers," requires registration with the Collector of Internal Revenue, and imposes a tax of 10 per cent upon all wagers except parimutuel wagering licensed by the states. The violation in Kahriger occurred in Pennsylvania. In contrast, in Lewis v. United States,<sup>54</sup> the petitioner

<sup>49</sup> Sacher v. United States, 343 U.S. 1 (1952).

<sup>50</sup> Offutt v. United States, 348 U.S. 11 (1954).

<sup>51</sup> Cooke v. United States, 287 U.S. 517, 539 (1925).

<sup>52</sup> In dissenting opinions in Sacher v. United States, 343 U.S. 1 (1952) and Isserman v. Ethics Committee, 345 U.S. 927 (1953).

<sup>53</sup> 345 U.S. 22.

<sup>54</sup> 348 U.S. 419 (1955).

was prosecuted in the District of Columbia. With the same Justices dissenting, the Court again upheld the statute, notwithstanding the fact that wagering is by federal law a crime in the District. As in Kahriger, the Court emphasized that the $50 tax must be paid before one engages in the business of accepting wagers. Justice Minton, who delivered the opinion of the Court, noted that it was settled in Kahriger that this Act was a constitutional exercise of the taxing power, and not a penalty under the guise of a tax. The short answer to the argument that wagering was defined as a crime in the District by federal law was that "this Court has long held that the Federal Government may tax what it also forbids."

As in the previous case, the principal issue was whether the Act was consistent with the Self-Incrimination Clause of the Fifth Amendment. With regard to the individual's protection, Justice Minton emphasized that "the Fifth Amendment provides that one cannot be compelled, in a criminal case, to be a witness against himself." Furthermore, he insisted that the Act was not retrospective. It does not mean that one must first have made a wager before paying the tax. On the contrary, the tax is wholly prospective, for one must pay the tax before engaging in the business of wagering. "If petitioner desires to engage in an unlawful business," declared Justice Minton, "he does so only on his own volition. . . . There is nothing compulsory about it. . . ." If he does not pay the occupational tax, accepts wagers, and is prosecuted, he can then claim his privilege. Men "may have to give up gambling, but there is no constitutional right to gamble. If they elect to wager, though it be unlawful, they must pay the tax." As for the argument that to require the petitioner to pay the tax and exhibit the stamp is to furnish probable cause for the issuance of a warrant, Justice Minton declared that "the ready answer is that the petitioner has no stamp." That is to say, since he has no stamp he is in no position to raise the issue of what might happen to him if he had one.

In a brief statement Justice Frankfurter described the Act in question as "a spurious use of the taxing power as a means of facilitating prosecution of federal offenses." Justice Black dissented at greater length, arguing that this decision reduces the Fifth Amendment protection even more than the Kahriger decision did. For Kahriger had to confess only to state law violations; here the statute requires a man to supply evidence which may be useful and even sufficient to convict him of felonies. Justice Black agreed that there was no constitutional right to gamble, but he insisted that gamblers, like other people, have a right to invoke the safeguards of the Bill of Rights.

In a group of cases important for the administration of the income tax laws, the Court by unanimous vote reviewed fully and approved of criminal prosecution for income tax evasion by use of the net worth method, now one of the government's most important techniques in dealing with tax evaders.<sup>45</sup> Briefly, with this method the government seeks to establish the taxpayer's net worth at the beginning of the period on which the indictment is based, and then to compare it with his net worth at the end of the period. These cases dealt with no constitutional law questions, the Court reviewing in its capacity as supervisor of the administration of the criminal law in the federal trial courts. While the net worth method was upheld, the Court warned of the "pitfalls" inherent in the method and stressed that it must be used with "great care and restraint." Justice Clark made the following points:

<sup>45</sup> Holland v. United States, 348 U.S. 121 (1955); Friedberg v. United States, 348 U.S. 142 (1955); Smita v. United States, 348 U.S. 147 (1955); United States v. Calderon, 348 U.S. 160 (1955). Since 1943, when the Court last reviewed a case involving the net worth approach, United States v. Johnson, 319 U.S. 502 (1943), it had consistently refused to

1. Care must be taken that the charges are clear.
2. The government must investigate all leads furnished by the taxpayer, and must effectively negate all reasonable explanations by the taxpayer inconsistent with guilt.
3. Increases in net worth, standing alone, cannot be assumed to be attributable to currently taxable income.
4. The burden of proof rests on the government to prove a likely source.
5. The government must prove wilfulness.<sup>56</sup>
6. While the government may use extrajudicial admissions by the taxpayer establishing a low opening net worth, they must be sufficiently corroborated.<sup>57</sup> Emphasized was the federal rule, which is indeed the rule in most states, that an accused may not be convicted on his own uncorroborated confession. There are good reasons for this rule: "sound law enforcement requires police investigations which extend beyond the words of the accused"; confessions may be unreliable because coerced or induced; the defendant may not be able to prove the involuntary nature of his statements; police investigations exert pressure, and the accused is subject to strain and confusion. The requirement of corroboration may properly be applied to the crime of tax evasion, even though there is no tangible corpus delicti, as in the case of crimes of violence, in connection with which the corroboration rule had its inception. The corroboration rule applies to a statement concerning opening net worth, because it is vital to the case.
7. As for the quantum of corroborative evidence, it does not have to prove the offense beyond a reasonable doubt, or even by a preponderance, "as long as there is substantial independent evidence that the offense has been committed, and the evidence as a whole proves beyond a reasonable doubt that defendant is guilty." Corroboration is necessary for all elements of the offense established by admissions alone, but it is sufficient if the corroboration merely fortifies the truth of the confession, without independently establishing the crime charged.

3. THE FEDERAL COMMERCE POWER

There were, as usual, several antitrust cases in the 1954 Term which tested the scope of federal power under the Commerce Clause. They also tested the grant certiorari in such cases. See Leslie Mills, "The Net Worth Approach in Determining Income," Virginia Law Review, Vol. 41, pp. 927-57 (Nov., 1955); J. W. Burns and M. L. Racklin, "Trial by Net Worth," Taxes, Vol. 33, pp. 121-30 (Feb., 1955).

---

<sup>56</sup> Holland v. United States, supra.

<sup>57</sup> Smith v. United States, supra.

Court's capacity to make distinctions, which may confidently be described as practically limitless. The problem in United States v. Shubert<sup>58</sup> was whether the business of producing, booking, and presenting legitimate stage attractions on a multi-state basis constituted interstate commerce within the meaning of the Sherman Act. The government brought a civil action against three individuals and three corporations controlled by them who produced theatrical attractions, booked them in theatres throughout the country, and operated about 40 theatres in eight states. The district court dismissed the complaint on the authority of the 1922 decision in the Federal Baseball Club case,<sup>59</sup> which was reaffirmed in 1953 in the Toolson decision.<sup>60</sup> These cases held that professional baseball was not covered by the antitrust laws, on the theory that the business of giving exhibitions was purely local, and the transportation of players and equipment incidental.

The complaint described the interstate phases of the business of the defendants. There was a continuous stream of trade and commerce, including the assemblage and transportation of personnel and property, the making and performance of contracts under which attractions are routed and presented in various states, and the transmission of applications, letters, memoranda, communications, commitments, contracts, money, checks, drafts, and other exchange media across state lines. The complaint alleged restraint of this commerce, and a conspiracy to monopolize certain phases by means of such practices as compelling exclusive booking by other producers, prevention of competition, discrimination, and combination to maintain a dominant position. The government asked mainly for the divorce of the booking and presentation branches of the business.

In reversing the district court, Chief Justice Warren emphasized that the Court has construed the term "trade or commerce" broadly to include such diverse activities as the production, distribution and exhibition of motion pictures, real estate brokerage, the gathering and distribution of news, medical services to members of a health cooperative, and insurance underwriting. Similarly the term "among the several states" has been held to embrace a "continuous and indivisible stream of intercourse among the states," including the transmission of large sums of money and communications by mail, telephone, and telegraph, in the great insurance case.<sup>61</sup>

The main problem was to explain away the baseball decisions. So far as the 1922 case was concerned, it was insisted that Justice Holmes was dealing there with the business of baseball and nothing else. And at the very next Term, in the Hart case,<sup>62</sup> Justice Holmes, speaking for a unanimous Court, ruled that the baseball case did not automatically immunize the theatrical business from the

<sup>58</sup> 348 U.S. 222 (1955).

<sup>59</sup> Federal Baseball Club v. National League, 259 U.S. 204 (1922).

<sup>60</sup> Toolson v. New York Yankees, 346 U.S. 358 (1953). See this REVIEW, Vol. 49, pp. 74-75 (March, 1955).

<sup>61</sup> United States v. South-Eastern Underwriters Assn., 333 U.S. 533 (1944).

<sup>62</sup> Hart v. B. F. Keith Vaudeville Exchange, 262 U.S. 271 (1923).

antitrust laws, holding that the transportation may not be incidental. As for the Toolson case, the Chief Justice explained that the Court was confronted with the unique fact that for over 30 years the earlier decision had fixed specifically the status of baseball under the antitrust laws, and baseball developed in reliance upon this decision. Even so, he insisted that the Court did not necessarily reaffirm in 1953 all that was said in Federal Baseball. Instead, the Court had asserted that it was not re-examining the underlying issues, but was adhering to the 1922 precedent so far as that decision determined that Congress had no intention of including baseball within the scope of the Sherman Act. "In short, Toolson was a narrow application of the rule of stare decisis."

But the Court refused to convert the narrow interpretation of Toolson into a sweeping rule giving immunity to every business based on the live presentation of local exhibitions, regardless of how extensive its interstate phases may be. The Chief Justice suggested that if the Toolson rule is to be expanded or contracted, it is up to Congress to do it. Furthermore, far from holding that the theatrical business is not subject to the Sherman Act, the Court served notice within less than a year after Federal Baseball, in the Hart case, that the theatrical business could not rely upon the baseball case as a basis for exemption from the antitrust laws. The controlling decisions were held to be the Hart case and the motion picture cases.<sup>63</sup>

It was difficult enough to distinguish between baseball games and theatrical presentations. It was much more difficult to distinguish between baseball and boxing, but a majority of the Court were equal to the occasion in United States v. International Boxing Club.<sup>64</sup> This case involved a civil antitrust action against two individuals and three corporations engaged in the business of promoting professional boxing contests. The district court dismissed the complaint on the authority of the baseball cases.

The complaint alleged that the defendants utilized the channels of interstate commerce to negotiate contracts with boxers, advertising agencies, seconds, referees, judges, etc., that they maintained training quarters in states other than those in which the promoters reside, that they leased arenas in various states, sold tickets across state lines, sold rights to make and distribute motion pictures of boxing contests in thousands of theatres, and above all sold rights to broadcast and telecast boxing contests through more than 3,000 radio and 100 television stations, and to telecast boxing contests to some 200 motion picture houses. Promoters' receipts from the sale of television, radio, and motion picture rights, according to the complaint, represent on the average over 25 per cent of their total revenue. The government alleged that there existed a conspiracy to exclude competition by various practices, such as requiring agreements from each title contender to engage only in bouts promoted by the defendants for a period of several years.

<sup>63</sup> Justices Burton and Reed concurred for the reasons given by Justice Burton in his dissenting opinion in the Toolson case. Justice Minton concurred because he thought this case was controlled by the Hart case.

<sup>64</sup> 348 U.S. 236 (1955).

The Court held that the business activities in question fell within the scope of the Sherman Act. Noting that the antitrust status of the boxing business had never before been considered by the Court, Chief Justice Warren conceded that like the showing of a motion picture or the performance of a stage attraction, a boxing match is a local affair. "But that fact alone," he said, "does not bar application of the Sherman Act to a business based on the promotion of such matches, if the business is itself engaged in interstate commerce or if the business imposes illegal restraints on interstate commerce." He ruled that the fact that 25 per cent of the revenue was derived from interstate operations through the sale of radio, television, and motion picture rights was sufficient to support the conclusion that the business was within the ambit of the statute.

The Court rejected the argument that the baseball cases immunized businesses that involve exhibitions of an athletic nature, just as in the Shubert case it refused to accept the contention that the immunity extended to any and all live presentations of local exhibitions. The Shubert ruling, that Toolson is not authority for exempting other businesses merely because they involve the performance of local exhibitions, was held to apply fully to boxing. Finally, the Chief Justice pointed out that none of the facts underlying the Toolson decision was present here. No court has ever held that the boxing business is not subject to the antitrust laws. In the Hart case, decided within a year after the first baseball case, Justice Holmes did not draw a line between athletic and non-athletic entertainment. What was controlling was the degree of interstate activity involved in the particular business under review. Thus, Federal Baseball did not hold that all businesses based on professional sports are outside the scope of the antitrust laws. Whether there should be such an exemption is for Congress to decide.<sup>68</sup> Actually, it was pointed out, this issue was before Congress in 1951, when four bills were introduced to exempt all professional sports, but the subcommittee of the House Judiciary Committee was unanimously opposed to them, and that is as far as they got.

It is difficult to avoid the conclusion that in the thinking of a majority of the Justices baseball holds a preferred position. This was the argument of Justice Frankfurter who, in dissenting, maintained that "it would baffle the subtlest ingenuity" to find any differentiating factor between other sports and baseball so far as the applicability of the Sherman Act is concerned. In fact, he thought that the interstate aspects of baseball were far more extensive than those of boxing. Congress is free to yield to sentiment and be capricious, but he insisted that under the doctrine of stare decisis whimsy has no place in the Court. Justice Minton dissented for the quite different reason that he thought boxing was not trade or commerce and was as much a matter of local exhibitions as baseball. It should be added that Justices Burton and Reed concurred separately for the reasons given in the Burton dissent in Toolson.

<sup>68</sup> Congress has on occasion exempted particular activities from the antitrust laws: e.g., labor organizations, 38 Stat. 731 (1914), agricultural associations, 42 Stat. 388 (1922), and insurance, 59 Stat. 34 (1945).

They too saw no difference between boxing and baseball, but thought both were in interstate commerce.

In a third antitrust case, Moore v. Mead's Fine Bread,<sup>66</sup> the plaintiff brought a suit for treble damages for violation of the Clayton and Robinson-Patman Acts. Moore ran a bakery business in Santa Rosa, New Mexico, and none of his activities was in interstate commerce. The defendant corporation was in the baking business at Clovis, New Mexico, but was one of several corporations having interlocking ownership and management, and in the hands of the same group. These corporations owned plants in two Texas towns and two in New Mexico, all marketing bread under the same name and with a common advertising program, and buying their flour and bread wrappers as a unit. The plaintiff and the defendant were in competition in Santa Rosa. There was evidence that on Moore's threat to move his bakery to another town, Santa Rosa merchants agreed to buy his products exclusively. Regarding this as a boycott, the defendant company cut in half its wholesale price of bread in Santa Rosa, without reducing its prices in Texas, to which bread baked in New Mexico was trucked. The price war continued until Moore was forced out of business. The court of appeals reversed a judgment for Moore on the ground that the injury resulting from the price cutting was to a purely local competitor whose business was in no way related to interstate commerce.

By unanimous vote the Supreme Court reversed, holding that it is clear that by the Clayton and Robinson-Patman Acts Congress barred the use of interstate commerce or business to destroy local business, and outlawed the price-cutting employed by the defendant company. "We have here," said Justice Douglas, "an interstate industry increasing its domain through outlawed competitive practices. The victim, to be sure, is only a local merchant; and no interstate transactions are used to destroy him. But the beneficiary is an interstate business. . . ." And this business drew its resources from interstate as well as local sources, and kept its interstate prices high while the local prices were lowered. Thus "the profits made in interstate activities would underwrite the losses of local price-cutting campaigns."

One of the most important developments in the antitrust field during the period under review was the publication on March 31, 1955, of the Report of the Attorney General's National Committee to Study the Antitrust Laws.<sup>67</sup> This large committee of 59 members had been appointed on August 27, 1953, with Stanley N. Barnes, head of the Antitrust Division in the Department of Justice, and Professor S. C. Oppenheim of the University of Michigan Law School serving as co-chairmen. While the Committee made far more recommendations than can be mentioned here, it is of interest to note that the report is thickly studded with dissenting and special concurring opinions.<sup>68</sup> Perhaps the greatest amount of public attention has been drawn to the recommendations dealing with antitrust administration and enforcement (chapter 8).<sup>66</sup> Here the Committee recommended that the investigative powers of the Department of Justice be expanded, that in private antitrust suits the award of treble damages be made discretionary with the trial court rather than mandatory as at present, that a uniform four-year statute of limitations be applied to private antitrust actions in place of the various state statutes which control today, that the maximum criminal fine of $5,000 per count be doubled,<sup>70</sup> that the United States be permitted to sue for single damages,<sup>71</sup> that civil proceedings be favored over criminal actions, that enforcement procedures be encouraged and strengthened, and that trial procedures be improved, especially through greater use of pretrial conferences and interrogatories.

<sup>66</sup> 348 U.S. 115 (1954).

<sup>67</sup> On sale by the Superintendent of Documents, U.S. Government Printing Office, Washington 25, D.C., for $1.00.

<sup>68</sup> See especially the general dissent of Professor Louis B. Schwartz, Report, pp. 390-92.

Another issue of coverage under the Fair Labor Standards Act was dealt with by the Court in Mitchell v. Vollmer Co.<sup>72</sup> The work in question was performed in the construction of an earthwork embankment and concrete platform for the Algiers Lock in Louisiana, a unit in the Gulf Intracoastal Waterway, which extends from Florida to the Mexican border. This lock is designed to give better passage into and across the Mississippi River. Both lower courts ruled that employees working on the Algiers Lock were not engaged in interstate commerce, relying upon the Raymond case<sup>73</sup> which held that an employee at work on a new tunnel for an interstate carrier was not subject to the Federal Employers' Liability Act, even though the tunnel, when completed, would be an interstate facility. The Supreme Court reversed, holding that the Fair Labor Standards Act is a different act, and one which has always been given a liberal construction. Whether an employee is engaged in interstate commerce within the meaning of the Act in question, said Justice Douglas, is determined by "practical considerations, not by technical conceptions." He went on to say: "The test is whether the work is so directly and vitally related to the functioning of an instrumentality or facility of interstate commerce as to be, in practical effect, a part of it, rather than isolated, local activity. . . . Repair of facilities of interstate commerce is activity 'in commerce' within the meaning of the Act." The Raymond case was distinguished on the ground that here the employees were not working on a new facility, but only improving existing facilities of interstate commerce.

Justices Minton and Frankfurter thought the "new construction rule" of the

<sup>66</sup> See the symposium on this section of the Report in the North-western University Law Review, Vol. 50, pp. 305-48 (July-Aug., 1955). See also George W. Stocking, "The Rule of Reason, Workable Competition, and Monopoly," Yale Law Journal, Vol. 64, pp. 1107-62 (July, 1955).

<sup>70</sup> Congress raised the maximum fine to $50,000 per count in 1955, Act of July 7, 1955, Public Law 135, 84th Cong., 1st sess., c. 281.

<sup>71</sup> Congress has passed such a law, Act of July 7, 1955, Public Law 137, 84th Cong., 1st sess., c. 233.

<sup>72</sup> 349 U.S. 427 (1955). See Loren P. Beth, "Essentiality to Production for Commerce," Missouri Law Review, Vol. 20, pp. 256-72 (June, 1955).

<sup>73</sup> Raymond v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co., 243 U.S. 83 (1917).

FELA cases was controlling, that the administrative interpretation in the Wage and Hour Interpretative Bulletin adopted this rule, and that on the facts this was a case of new construction and not one of improving or repairing existing facilities. Perhaps the Court would have been more forthright if it had frankly overruled the Raymond case, since the difference between new construction and improvement of existing facilities, so far as their relation to interstate commerce is concerned, would seem to be somewhat less than cosmic.

4. FEDERAL CONTROL OVER TERRITORIES

Recently the Virgin Islands, an unincorporated territory, went into the divorce business by amending its divorce law to permit a plaintiff to file suit if he or she has resided there continuously for six weeks, and if the defendant has been served personally in the district or enters a general appearance. A wife filed suit after living there 43 days, and the husband entered an appearance, waived personal service, and denied the allegations in the complaint. The district court dismissed the complaint for want of jurisdiction over the petitioner, and the court of appeals, sitting en banc,<sup>74</sup> affirmed on the ground that the statute violated both the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment and the Organic Act. By a 5-3 vote the Supreme Court affirmed, though it held that it was unnecessary to decide any constitutional issue since in its judgment Congress did not give the Legislative Assembly of the Virgin Islands the power to enact the law in question.<sup>75</sup>

The Organic Act of 1936 authorizes the Virgin Islands Legislative Assembly to enact laws on "all subjects of local application" not inconsistent with the laws of the United States. Justice Frankfurter, who spoke for the Court, pointed out that in the organic acts of the incorporated territories of Alaska and Hawaii there is a specific provision requiring at least two years' residence for the divorce jurisdiction. It was "hardly reasonable" to believe, he declared, that Congress intended to give an unincorporated territory "unrestricted freedom in this sensitive field of legislation." The term "local application," he said, "obviously implies limitation to subjects having relevant ties within the territory, to laws growing out of the needs of the Islands and governing relations within them." In practice, Justice Frankfurter maintained, the statute in question had no point for Virgin Islanders, and was obviously designed for outsiders. It was noted that whereas in 1940 only 34 divorces were granted there, in 1951, with the same population, the number jumped to 312, and to 343 in 1952. It was also noted that most divorces were given where the tourist facilities were the greatest. "It is inadmissible to assume," said the Justice, "that Congress authorized the Assembly to traffic in easy divorces for citizens of the States as a stimulus to money-making by the Islanders." In short, the challenged divorce law was not on a subject of "local application," and was therefore ultra vires.

<sup>74</sup> See Richard J. Fay, "En Banc Proceedings in the United States Courts of Appeals," George Washington Law Review, Vol. 22, pp. 482-92 (March, 1954).

<sup>75</sup> Granville-Smith v. Granville-Smith, 349 U.S. 1 (1955).

The three dissenters protested that Congress has always granted the territories full authority to legislate on divorce, and that the Caribbean territories were not placed on a different footing than the others. As for the law reaching out beyond the borders of the territory, Justice Clark pointed out that many states have laws designed to attract outsiders, the Delaware corporation laws, for example. He thought the fact that Congress imposed a two-year residence requirement on Hawaii and Alaska was irrelevant, and that indeed it proved the opposite, since the fair inference would be that in the absence of the limitation these territories could do as they pleased in this respect. Justice Clark also insisted on discussing the constitutional issues which the majority had avoided. The marital relationship, in his view, does not come within the protection of the Due Process Clause. The Full Faith and Credit Clause did not apply in this case because the wife was not asking the Court to make her divorce, if granted, valid in the states. Finally, he thought the petitioner had established the fact of domicile. If a couple want a divorce, he argued, they can get one. "This being true, I see no sense in striking down the Islands' law. There is no virtue in a state of the law the only practical effect of which would be to make New Yorkers fly 2,400 miles over land to Reno instead of 1,450 miles over water to the Virgin Islands."

5. FEDERAL JUDICIAL POWER

Judicial Review of Draft Classifications.<sup>76</sup> There were four important cases during the 1954 Term dealing with several aspects of the problem of judicial review of draft classifications. All involved claims of members of Jehovah's Witnesses to exemption from military service as conscientious objectors. Section 6(j) of the Universal Military Training and Service Act provides that no person who "by reason of religious training and belief, is conscientiously opposed to participation in war in any form" shall be required to undergo combatant training or service. Briefly, the procedure is as follows: If the local board denies the claim to exemption, the registrant may appeal to the Appeal Board. But before this Board makes its decision, the file is sent to the Department of Justice for "inquiry and hearing." The FBI makes an investigation and prepares a report, which is referred to a hearing officer of the Department. The registrant may appear before this officer and present evidence and witnesses. The Department then sends a recommendation to the Appeal Board. The statute requires this Board to consider the recommendation, but it is not bound to follow it. On the basis of the registrant's full file, the Appeal Board makes a final determination. No direct review of Appeal Board decisions is possible. The only way a registrant can secure any judicial review is by defense to a criminal prosecution for failure to submit to induction or by a habeas corpus proceeding.

<sup>76</sup> For recent writings on administrative law topics see: Note, "Judicial Review of Reversals of Policies by Administrative Agencies," Harvard Law Review, Vol. 68, pp. 1251-60 (May, 1955); Ralph F. Fuchs, "The Hearing Officer Problem—Symptom and Symbol," Tornell Law Quarterly, Vol. 40, pp. 281-225 (Winter, 1955); Kenneth Culp Davis, "Standing to Challenge Governmental Action," Minnesota Law Review, Vol. 39, pp. 353-420 (March, 1955); "Ripeness of Governmental Action for Judicial Review," Harvard Law Review, Vol. 68, pp. 1122-53, 1326-73 (May, June, 1955).

Among recent precedents it should be recalled that in Estep v. United States<sup>77</sup> the Court ruled that while the statutory provision that classification orders of the selective service authorities shall be "final" precludes the customary scope of judicial review, and forbids courts to weigh the evidence to determine whether the classification was justified, a board may not act without jurisdiction, and it lacks jurisdiction "if there is no basis in fact for the classification which it gave the registrant." The Court went a step further in Dickinson v. United States,<sup>78</sup> which held that once the registrant has demonstrated that he falls prima facie within the exempted class of ministers of the gospel, the board cannot make an adverse decision merely by refusing to believe his evidence, but must develop other evidence to support its conclusion. And in Nugent v. United States,<sup>79</sup> the Court ruled, with three Justices dissenting, that neither the statutory grant of a "hearing" nor due process requires the Department of Justice to show the registrant a copy of the FBI report, so long as he is given a fair résumé of the adverse evidence in the investigator's report.

That the scope of review is narrower in cases involving conscientious objectors than it is in the case of ministers was brought out last Term in Witmer v. United States.<sup>80</sup> In the course of his proceedings, Witmer made a number of inconsistent statements and claims. Affirming his conviction for failing to submit to induction, the Court noted that the scope of judicial review is narrow, that the courts are not "super draft boards," that judges should not substitute their judgments on the weight of the evidence for those of the administrators, and that the substantial evidence rule does not apply. Justice Clark made it clear that a classification can be overturned only if it has "no basis in fact." Furthermore, it was pointed out that in the Dickinson case there were objective, undisputed facts which placed the registrant squarely within the ministerial exemption, there being no evidence at all to rebut the prima facie case. But Witmer cannot make out a prima facie case from objective facts alone, because the ultimate question in conscientious objector cases is the sincerity of the registrant, a purely subjective question. In such cases, any facts which cast doubt on the veracity of the registrant are relevant. "In short," said Justice Clark, "the nature of a registrant's prima facie case determines the type of evidence needed to rebut his claim. If the issue is the nature of his activities, as in Dickinson, the evidence providing 'basis in fact' must tend to show that his activities are other than as stated. If, as here, the issue is the registrant's sincerity and good faith belief, then there must be some inference of insincerity or bad faith." On this view of the matter, the Court proceeded to find a "basis

<sup>77</sup> 327 U.S. 114 (1946).

<sup>78</sup> 346 U.S. 389 (1953). See this REVIEW, Vol. 49, pp. 84-85 (March, 1955).

<sup>79</sup> 346 U.S. 1 (1953). See this REVIEW, Vol. 48, p. 75 (March, 1954).

<sup>80</sup> 348 U.S. 375 (1955). See J. B. Tietz, "Jehovah's Witnesses: Conscientious Objectors," Southern California Law Review, Vol. 28, pp. 123-37 (Feb., 1955).

in fact" for the administrative decision. Thus, when Witmer asked for classification as a farmer, he knew the land involved had not been cultivated for 23 years. He first swore that the ministerial exemption did not apply to him, but after he was denied the farmer exemption he just as fervently claimed he was a full-time minister. Though he asked for a conscientious objector status from the outset, he also promised to contribute to the war effort but later took the opposite position. "These inconsistent statements in themselves cast considerable doubt on the sincerity of petitioner's claim." It follows that it would not be mere suspicion or speculation for the Board to conclude that Witmer was insincere in his claim to being a conscientious objector. "Even firemen become dubious after two false alarms."

Justice Minton concurred, merely stating that the Board's order was an allowable one under the law and not taken arbitrarily. Justices Black and Douglas dissented without opinion.

The second case, Sicurella v. United States<sup>21</sup> involved a young ordained Jehovah's Witness who, in response to the question whether he believed in the use of force under any circumstances, replied that he was willing to fight in defense of "his ministry, Kingdom Interests and . . . his fellow brethren." Overruling the hearing officer, the Department of Justice recommended that Sicurella's claim to a conscientious objector classification be denied because he was not opposed to war in any form, his reply showing that he was in favor of a theocratic war. Unlike the Witmer case, it was admitted that Sicurella was sincere, and the FBI report contained nothing unfavorable to his claim. The controlling statute provides that a conscientious objector must be opposed to "participation in war in any form."

The Court held that the Department of Justice recommendation was based on an error of law and reversed the conviction. Justice Clark declared that throughout Sicurella had emphasized that his weapons of warfare were spiritual, not carnal, his statements having "neither the bark nor the bite of war." As to the literature in which Jehovah's Witnesses speak of their readiness to engage in theocratic wars, Justice Clark declared that "the test is not whether the registrant is opposed to all war, but whether he is opposed, on religious grounds, to participation in war." He did not believe that Congress intended to include within its measure "such spiritual wars between the powers of good and evil where the Jehovah's Witnesses, if they participate will do so without carnal weapons." Congress had in mind "real shooting wars," military conflicts between nations, "wars with bombs and bullets, tanks, planes and rockets."

Justice Eed dissented on the ground that since Sicurella believed in theocratic wars he was not within the statutory exemption. Dissenting at greater length, Justice Minton argued that the administrative findings were final, and not subject to correction by a court unless errors were made "so wanton, arbitrary and capricious as to destroy the jurisdiction of the Board." Even in the case of an honest mistake in judgment, he maintained, the Court ought not to interfere, there being not the slightest intimation of arbitrary or capricious conduct.

<sup>21</sup> 348 U.S. 385 (1955).

In Simmons v. United States,<sup>32</sup> the registrant made no request as to the "general nature and character" of adverse evidence in the FBI report before his hearing, as the form notice then required, but did make such a request at the hearing. The hearing officer did not disclose all of the important unfavorable items in the FBI report. The Supreme Court reversed Simmons' conviction, pointing out that the requirement of the Nugent case that the registrant be given "a fair résumé" of any adverse evidence was not a matter of grace within the Department's discretion, but rather an essential element in the procedure. The notice given to the registrant, Justice Clark declared, did not clearly convey to a layman the idea that he must request the résumé prior to the hearing or forever waive his rights in this respect. Neither the statute nor the regulations were found to authorize such a waiver. Justice Clark had no doubt that Simmons never received a fair résumé of the unfavorable evidence gathered by the FBI. For example, he was not informed at all about alleged gambling and drinking, and abusiveness towards his wife. "A fair résumé," said Justice Clark, "is one which will permit the registrant to defend against the adverse evidence—to explain it, rebut it, or otherwise detract from its damaging force." At most, the hearing officer's remarks were vague hints. In providing for a hearing, the Justice declared, Congress "did not intend for it to be conducted on the level of a game of blindman's buff." Finally, the Court rejected the government's argument that no prejudice resulted. Wrote Justice Clark: "This is not an incidental infringement of technical rights. Petitioner has been deprived of the fair hearing required by the Act, a fundamental safeguard, and he need not specify the precise manner in which he would have used this right—and how such use would have aided his cause—in order to complain of the deprivation."

Justices Black and Douglas concurred, but recorded adherence to the views expressed in their dissent in the Nugent case. Justice Reed dissented on the ground that since no summary was requested, none had to be given. Justice Minton also dissented, arguing that even if the board had denied a fair résumé, it had not acted arbitrarily or capriciously, and that its judgment was allowable even if erroneous. "It takes more than disagreement with the Board," he wrote, "to destroy jurisdiction, the only condition upon which courts may interfere."

In the final draft classification case, Gonzales v. United States,<sup>33</sup> the Court ruled that the registrant was entitled to receive a copy of the recommendation made by the Department of Justice to the Appeal Board. The silence of the statute on this point was held not to be conclusive, just as a similar silence did not mean, in the Nugent case, that the registrant was not entitled to a fair résumé of adverse evidence in the FBI reports. Said Justice Clark: "... we believe it also to be implicit in the Act and Regulations—viewed against our underlying concepts of procedural regularity and basic fair play—that a copy of the recommendation of the Department be furnished the registrant at the time it is forwarded to the Appeal Board, and that he be afforded an opportunity to reply.” Since the recommendation of the Department is advisory only, a considerable latitude is permitted at the hearing. But “a natural corollary” is that the registrant ought to be given a chance to rebut the recommendation when it reaches the agency having the ultimate responsibility of making a decision. Furthermore, it was noted that the Appeal Board is the first Selective Service agency to receive the Department’s recommendation, and is usually the only decision-making body to pass on the entire file. An opportunity for the registrant to reply to this recommendation is the only means of making certain that the Board will have all the relevant facts brought to its attention. And if the registrant is to present his case to the Appeal Board effectively, he must be cognizant of all the facts before the Board. It was pointed out, for example, that the Department claimed that Gonzales became a Jehovah’s Witness one month after registration, whereas he maintained it was one month before registration that his conversion occurred.

<sup>32</sup> 348 U.S. 397 (1955).

<sup>33</sup> 348 U.S. 407 (1955).

The Court felt that it would not interfere unduly with the registration procedure to require that a copy of the Department’s recommendation be mailed to the registrant, and that he be permitted to reply to the Board. Noting that under the existing regulations the registrant already had the right to file a statement with the Appeal Board, Justice Clark observed that the right to file a statement includes the right to file a “meaningful statement, one based on all the facts in the file and made with awareness of the recommendations and arguments to be countered.” It did not suffice, the Court held, that the regulations permit rehearings, since this remedy is too little, in that the rehearing can only seek to correct “errors,” and too late, in that it is difficult to reopen a case. Two Justices dissented.

Federal Judicial Power and the State Courts. Of the several cases of the 1954 Term dealing with federal review of state court decisions, the most widely-noted was Ellis v. Dixon.<sup>84</sup> The litigation arose from the refusal of the Yonkers Board of Education to permit the Yonkers Committee for Peace to use the schoolhouse for a forum on “peace and war.” The Committee alleged denial of freedom of speech and assembly and the equal protection of the laws. The Committee conceded that a state may withhold its school facilities altogether from use by non-academic groups, and that a state may make reasonable classifications in determining the extent to which its school buildings will be made available for non-academic purposes. A New York statute permits boards of education to adopt “reasonable regulations” with regard to the use of school property “for holding social, civic and recreational meetings and entertainments, and other uses pertaining to the welfare of the community.” The Committee’s principal grievance was that the school board applied the statute to similar groups differently. But it failed to allege in its pleadings that other organizations of a similar character had been allowed to use the Yonkers school buildings. The allegation in the pleadings simply was that unnamed organizations had been permitted to use the buildings for the purpose of public assembly and discussion. Whether these organizations were in any way comparable to the Committee for Peace appeared nowhere in the pleadings, nor was the practice of the board described. After losing in the state courts, the Committee applied for and was granted certiorari by the Supreme Court. Following argument and reargument a bare majority of the Court agreed that the writ should be dismissed as having been granted improvidently.

<sup>84</sup> 349 U.S. 458 (1955).

Justice Harlan, who delivered the opinion of the Court, declared that "what has been alleged is entirely too amorphous to permit adjudication of the constitutional issues asserted." Since the New York Court of Appeals denied leave to appeal without giving any reasons, the Court held that the most reasonable inference from this record was that its denial went on the ground of the inadequacy of the pleadings, for this was the basis of the decision of the Appellate Division. While it is established law that the Supreme Court is not finally bound by a state court's ruling as to the sufficiency of pleadings asserting a federal right, it may travel one of two roads. Some cases hold that the scope of Supreme Court review is limited to deciding whether the state court has bypassed the federal right under forms of local procedure. Other cases hold that the Supreme Court should accept jurisdiction and decide the sufficiency of the pleadings de novo. In this instance, Justice Harlan maintained, it would make no difference which road the Court took. There was no suggestion that the state was by-passing a federal right, and as for considering the case de novo, it was held to be altogether impossible to decide the constitutional issues on this "vague and empty record." If it could not decide the constitutional issues on this record, then by the same token the New York Court of Appeals was entirely justified in refusing to pass on them. Therefore its denial of the appeal must be regarded as resting on an adequate nonfederal ground. Four Justices dissented, merely noting that the allegations of the petition were sufficient, in their judgment, to state a case of discrimination under the Equal Protection Clause.

A much more complicated question dealing with the adequacy of the ground upon which the state courts disposed of a case was presented to the Court in Williams v. Georgia.<sup>85</sup> Williams, a Negro, was convicted in Fulton County of murdering a white man and was sentenced to death. Defended by a court-appointed lawyer, Williams took an appeal to the Supreme Court of Georgia, which affirmed the conviction. A few weeks later Williams' counsel filed in the trial court an extraordinary motion for a new trial, alleging for the first time that the accused had been denied the equal protection of the laws because of the manner of selection of the petit jury. It was alleged that jurors' names, if white, were on white tickets, and if Negro, on yellow tickets. Williams claimed that he had no knowledge at the time of the trial of the methods used to select the jury, and counsel filed an affidavit that this fact could not have been discovered by exercise of ordinary diligence. The trial court dismissed the extraordinary motion for a new trial, and the appeal to the state Supreme Court was based almost entirely upon Avery v. Georgia.<sup>25</sup> In this case, which involved a Negro defendant who had been tried in the same county, the Court had ruled unanimously that the use of the white and yellow tickets was obviously designed for a discriminatory purpose and violated the Equal Protection Clause. But Avery challenged the array, and Williams did not. As for the time sequence, certiorari was granted to Avery the day before Williams' jury was selected, and the Avery appeal was decided by the United States Supreme Court over two months after Williams' trial, but a month before an amended motion for a new trial had been filed. It was the denial of this motion that led to the first unsuccessful appeal to the state supreme court. Williams' lawyer did not rely upon the Avery doctrine until some six months later, when he filed his extraordinary motion for a new trial.

<sup>85</sup> 349 U.S. 375 (1955).

The Georgia Supreme Court held the second time the case reached it that by failing to challenge the array Williams had waived any objections to the jury's selection. It also held that its own ruling in the Avery case, before the Williams trial, had fully explained the method used in selecting jurors, and that counsel therefore should have known about it. On oral argument in the United States Supreme Court, the state admitted that the use of the white and yellow tickets in this instance was, in the light of the Avery decision, a denial of equal protection, and that a new trial would be required but for the failure to challenge the array.

Six Justices, speaking through Justice Frankfurter, voted to remand the case to the Georgia Supreme Court. While it was conceded that a state has the power to forbid the raising of federal questions at late stages of a case, or by any other than a prescribed method, the Justice reviewed the Georgia cases and concluded that it was clear that the state allowed objections of the sort that Williams raised to be brought up at a late stage and to be determined by the state courts as a matter of discretion. It follows that the United States Supreme Court has jurisdiction to decide whether the state court action in this instance in effect denied a federal right, apparently on the theory that an abuse of discretion might amount to a violation of the Equal Protection Clause. While under Georgia practice motions for new trial after verdict—especially extraordinary motions for new trial after final judgment—are not favored, Justice Frankfurter pointed out that the Georgia statute permits them, and he found that such a motion has been granted in "exceptional" or "extraordinary" cases.

But the Court also ruled that the fact that it has jurisdiction does not compel it to exercise it. Instead of reversing, it chose to remand the case to the state's highest court, for several reasons. The principal reason was that an important factor had intervened since the affirmance by the Georgia Supreme Court, namely the acknowledgement by the state before the United States Supreme Court that as a matter of substantive law Williams had been deprived of his constitutional right to equal protection. The contrary had been argued before the Georgia court, which may have been influenced by it. Another reason for the remand was the possibility, as intimated by the Attorney General of Georgia in his brief to the Georgia Supreme Court, that there may be another remedy. The Court also suggested that a remand was appropriate in the interests of orderly procedure. Justice Frankfurter concluded that he could not believe that the Georgia courts would allow a man to go to his death as the result of a conviction secured from a jury which the state admits was unconstitutionally impaneled.

<sup>25</sup> 345 U.S. 559 (1953).

Justices Clark, Reed, and Minton dissented. Justice Clark protested that the case had been decided on independent and adequate state grounds, since the Georgia Supreme Court had clearly stated that but for the procedural objection the Avery rule would control. He also maintained that the Court was determining state law, and misconstruing it at that. Furthermore, he argued that there was a good reason why Georgia requires that challenges to the array be made before trial. For example, to hold this one trial bad would upset all verdicts in the county returned during the tenure of this jury. This would be expensive, time-wasting, and disruptive of the proper administration of justice.

On the remand to the Georgia Supreme Court, Justice Frankfurter's elaborate circumlocutions went for naught, since on July 15, 1955,<sup>87</sup> that court unanimously announced its adherence to its earlier judgment. It held that the question was wholly one of state law, that there was no federal jurisdiction either to affirm or reverse, and that under Georgia law the judges had no discretion in the matter. It asserted flatly that Williams' point must be raised before trial and not otherwise. After quoting the Tenth Amendment, Chief Justice Duckworth tartly declared: "Even though executives and legislators, not being constitutional lawyers, might often overstep the foregoing unambiguous constitutional prohibition of Federal invasion of State jurisdiction, there can never be an acceptable excuse for judicial failure to observe it strictly. This court bows to the Supreme Court on all Federal questions of law but we will not supinely surrender sovereign powers of this State." It is apparent that Justice Frankfurter and some of his colleagues underestimated Georgia's passion for procedural regularity.

The great reluctance of the Supreme Court to permit the lower federal courts to enjoin proceedings in the state courts was reflected in Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America v. Richman Brothers,<sup>88</sup> decided by a 5-3 vote. Here an employer engaged in interstate commerce brought suit for an injunction in an Ohio court against the union, which was picketing the employer's retail stores to induce unionization of the factory. The union's motion to the state court to dismiss on the ground that the National Labor Relations Board had exclusive jurisdiction was denied. Thereupon the union sought an injunction in the federal district court to require the employer to withdraw the suit filed in the state court. The district court held that it had no power to do so, by virtue of

<sup>87</sup> Williams v. State, 88 S.E. 2d 376.

<sup>88</sup> 348 U.S. 511 (1955).

Section 2283 of Title 28 of the U. S. Code, which reads as follows: "A court of the United States may not grant an injunction to stay proceedings in a State court except as expressly authorized by Act of Congress, or where necessary in aid of its jurisdiction, or to protect or effectuate its judgments." The Supreme Court agreed that the district court lacked jurisdiction to grant the injunction prayed for, construing the exceptions in the statute strictly, and holding that the district court could not issue an injunction staying a state court proceeding even though the state court asked jurisdiction over the subject because it invaded a field pre-empted by Congress. The Court also rejected the assumption that federal rights will not be adequately protected in the state courts. Justice Frankfurter pointed out: "With limited exceptions, it was not until 1875 that the lower federal courts were given general jurisdiction over federal questions. . . . The prohibition of §2283 is but continuing evidence of confidence in the state courts, reinforced by a desire to avoid direct conflicts between state and federal courts." Three Justices dissented on the ground that the Court's reading of the statute was literal and ignored both legislative history and a century of judicial history. Chief Justice Warren pointed out that the Board cannot act until the employer has filed a charge, which the employer has no incentive to do so long as the state court injunction is outstanding. Thus federal policy is frustrated. Justice Douglas also emphasized that since the only way out under the Court's decision is a long, drawn-out appeal through the state courts and then to the United States Supreme Court, time alone will defeat the claim at issue. This is supported by the fact that in most states a temporary injunction cannot be appealed, even if the court lacks jurisdiction to grant it, and the Supreme Court recently ruled that a temporary injunction is not a "final" judgment, and therefore is not appealable under the federal Judicial Code (Section 1257).<sup>89</sup>

Diversity Jurisdiction. An interesting issue touching upon the diversity jurisdiction of the federal courts was raised in Lumbermen's Mutual Casualty Co. v. Elbert.<sup>90</sup> Elbert, a citizen of Louisiana, was injured in an automobile accident in Louisiana because of the alleged negligence of another citizen of Louisiana who was insured by an Illinois corporation. The policy had been applied for, issued, and delivered in Louisiana. As a condition for admission to do business in Louisiana, the insurer had consented to be sued directly for damages sustained in Louisiana accidents. The direct action statute provides that at his option the injured person has a right of direct action against the insurer, and the action may be brought against the insurer alone or against both the insurer and the insured. Alleging diversity and damages in excess of $3,000, Elbert brought an action in a federal district court in Louisiana without making the insured a codefendant. Since diversity existed only between the plaintiff and the wrongdoer's insurer, and not between the plaintiff and the wrongdoer, the district court dismissed the action for lack of jurisdiction. By unanimous vote the Supreme Court agreed with the Court of Appeals in holding that the district court did have jurisdiction.

<sup>89</sup> Montgomery Bldg. Council v. Ledbetter Brick Co., 344 U.S. 178 (1952).

<sup>90</sup> 348 U.S. 48 (1954).

Chief Justice Warren noted that the Louisiana courts have construed the statute as creating a separate and distinct cause of action against the insurer which an injured party may elect in lieu of his action against the tortfeasor. For example, in an action against the insurer alone, the insurer does not have certain defenses which would otherwise be available. Thus the insurer is not merely a nominal defendant, but the real party in interest, with "a direct financial interest in the outcome of this litigation." It was also noted that under the Louisiana statute and practice the tortfeasor was not an indispensable party to this litigation. By suing the insurer directly, the insured abandoned his action against the wrongdoer, and the one action will dispose of the entire claim completely. During some 25 years of experience with the direct action statute, there was no case where an injured party attempted to bring suit against the tortfeasor following an unsuccessful suit against the insurer in either state or federal courts.

Admiralty Law and Marine Insurance. A question of admiralty law with possibly significant implications was decided by a divided Court in Wilburn Boat Co. v. Fireman's Fund Insurance Co.<sup>91</sup> The Boat Company, a resident of Texas, insured a houseboat with Fireman's against loss from fire. The Boat Company used the boat for commercial carriage of passengers on Lake Texoma, an artificial inland lake lying between Texas and Oklahoma. After the boat was destroyed by fire, the Insurance Company refused to pay for the loss, and suit was filed in a Texas court. Fireman's removed to the federal district court on the ground of diversity, and denied liability because of an alleged breach of printed policy terms, or "warranties." The policy provided that without the insurer's consent the boat must be used solely for private pleasure purposes. According to Texas law the warranty in question might have been void, for under a Texas statute a breach of warranty is not a defense to a suit for loss unless the breach contributed to bring about the destruction of the property. But the district court refused to apply state law, holding that as a matter of federal admiralty law the "literal performance" rule applies. Under this rule every policy warranty must be fulfilled literally, and any breach bars recovery, even though a loss would have happened had the warranty been carried out to the letter. Both the district court and the court of appeals held in favor of the insurer, but the Supreme Court reversed, the opinion being delivered by Justice Black.

He agreed that since the insurance policy is a maritime contract, the Admiralty Clause of the Constitution brings it within the federal jurisdiction. "But it does not follow," said Justice Black, "as the courts below seemed to think, that every term in every maritime contract can only be controlled by some federally defined admiralty rule. In the field of maritime contracts as in that of maritime torts, the National Government has left much regulatory powers in the states." And the power of the states, exercised with federal consent or acquiescence, has always been especially broad with regard to insurance. Since Congress has not taken over the regulation of marine insurance contracts, and has not dealt with the effect of marine insurance warranties at all, the only issues were: (1) Is there a judicially established federal admiralty rule governing these warranties? (2) If not, should the Supreme Court fashion a rule?

<sup>91</sup> 348 U.S. 310 (1955).

After reviewing the case law on the subject, the Court answered the first question in the negative. As to the second question, Justice Black argued that the whole drift of judicial and legislative history of insurance regulation counsels against the Court's creating a rule governing marine policy terms and warranties. From the beginning, the states have controlled all types of insurance companies and contracts, and in 1895 the Court ruled that the states could regulate marine insurance, just as they could regulate other types of insurance.<sup>92</sup> Justice Black noted that there has been a vast amount of insurance litigation in the state courts throughout our history. Furthermore, Congress, the insurance companies, and the insured have all acted on the assumption that the states could regulate marine insurance. Justice Black also pointed out that these questions are complex and difficult, and that while Congress could establish a uniform national policy by legislation, it would be much more difficult for the courts to do so, since they can act only in a piecemeal fashion by the case-to-case method. He feared that "such a creeping approach would result in leaving marine insurance largely unregulated for years to come." It was concluded that since the insurance business has become one of the nation's greatest enterprises under the present system of diverse state regulations, and Congress has been exceedingly cautious to disturb it, the Court should also leave the matter where it has always been, with the states.

Justice Frankfurter wrote a concurring opinion to argue that no uniform rule was necessary in this particular situation, because the transaction was essentially localized, and had little to do with shipping in its national and international aspects. But since most maritime law has come from this Court, and not from Congress, he felt that the majority went too far. There may be situations involving national, coastal, intercoastal, or river commerce which require uniform law, to avoid the vagaries of state law and to keep harmony with other great maritime powers. Two Justices dissented, arguing that the "literal performance" rule was part of both federal and English admiralty law, and that the states do not have and should not be conceded to have the power to change the general substantive admiralty law, especially where uniformity is necessary or desirable.

Avoidance of Constitutional Issues. The very considerable talent of the Court for avoiding decisions on constitutional issues was displayed in Association of Westinghouse Salaried Employees v. Westinghouse Electric Corporation.<sup>93</sup> The plaintiff in this case was an unincorporated union that served as the collective bargaining representative of about 5,000 salaried employees of Westinghouse, a Pennsylvania corporation engaged in interstate commerce. The union filed this suit in a federal district court to enforce collective bargaining agreements then in effect between it and the Company. The suit was for pay allegedly due the workers for one day's work, and it was filed under Section 301 of the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947, the pertinent language of which is as follows: "(a) Suits for violation of contracts between an employer and a labor organization representing employees in an industry affecting commerce as defined in this Act, or between any such labor organizations, may be brought in any district court of the United States having jurisdiction of the parties, without respect to the amount in controversy or without regard to the citizenship of the parties. (b) . . . Any such labor organization may sue or be sued as an entity and in behalf of the employees whom it represents in the courts of the United States. . . ." The court of appeals held that each employee had an individual contract with the company, but that the collective contract itself was not a contract of hire. It therefore vacated, with directions to dismiss the complaint for lack of jurisdiction, the district court's judgment, which had dismissed the complaint on the merits. While six Justices voted to affirm, there was no agreement on a supporting rationale, and therefore no opinion of the court. Justice Frankfurter, who was joined by Justices Burton and Minton, wrote the lead opinion, an involved opinion singularly lacking in clarity. He pointed out that Congress has not defined the law which would determine the rights of the parties, and has not authorized the federal courts to fashion the rules. This gives rise to a serious constitutional issue, since it would follow that Congress merely provided a federal forum for state law. Justice Frankfurter concluded that despite the broad language of Section 301, Congress did not intend to confer jurisdiction over this type of suit. Legislative history shows that Section 301 was merely a procedural provision, requiring the federal courts to treat an unincorporated labor union as if it were a natural or corporate legal person, and he argued that the grant of federal question jurisdiction under Article 3, Section 2, of the Constitution must involve some aspect of federal law essential to the plaintiff's success. "We must, of course," he declared, "defer to the strong presumption—even as to such technical matters as federal jurisdiction—that Congress legislated in accordance with the Constitution." But Congress did not intend, in his view, to authorize the federal courts to work out a federal code governing collective bargaining contracts, for that would lead to several unpleasant consequences. It would invite conflict with state court interpretations of collective bargaining agreements. It would displace state law by federal law in the state courts. It would exclude state court jurisdiction. In short, "to turn §301 into an agency for working out a viable theory of the nature of a collective bargaining agreement smacks of unreality." It follows that "serious constitutional problems may be avoided, and indeed must be, through the orthodox process of limiting the scope of doubtful legislation."

<sup>92</sup> Hosper v. California, 155 U.S. 648 (1895).

<sup>93</sup> 348 U.S. 437 (1955). For an able discussion of the complexities involved in this litigation see: Donald H. Wollett and Harry H. Wellington, "Federalism and Breach of the Labor Agreement," Stanford Law Review, Vol. 7, pp. 445-79 (July, 1955).

Chief Justice Warren, who was joined by Justice Clark, argued that the language of Section 301 is not sufficiently explicit nor its legislative history sufficiently clear to indicate that Congress intended to authorize a union to enforce in a federal court the uniquely personal right of an employee for whom it had bargained to receive compensation for services rendered his employer. Thus in his view it was unnecessary to make labor policy or raise constitutional issues. In a third concurring opinion, Justice Reed maintained that the fact that a great deal of state law may be applied in Section 301 suits should not affect the validity of the statute. If state law is applied, it operates by permission of Congress, being incorporated by reference. In his judgment, it was immaterial whether the rules of substantive law applied by the federal courts are derived from federal or state sources. Justice Reed concurred because he thought that the claim for wages for the employees arises from separate hiring contracts between the employer and the employee, since the union does not undertake to do work for the employer, or even to furnish workers. Justices Douglas and Black dissented.

Sovereign Immunity from Suit. An interesting problem touching upon the position of a foreign sovereign in a federal court was resolved by a 4-3 vote of the Justices in National City Bank v. Republic of China.<sup>94</sup> In 1948, an official agency of the Republic of China established a $200,000 deposit account with the Bank. When, at a later date, the Republic sought to withdraw the funds, the Bank refused to pay, and the Republic brought suit in a federal district court. The Bank set up a counterclaim as a defense, seeking judgment for two defaulted Treasury Notes of the Republic which the Bank owned. The counterclaim was much larger than the amount sued for by China, but it should be added that the Bank did not seek affirmative relief. Both lower courts held that to entertain the counterclaim would be an invasion of the Republic's sovereign immunity. A majority of the Supreme Court speaking through Justice Frankfurter, disagreed, holding the counterclaim proper.

Although Justice Frankfurter agreed that the status of the Republic of China in our courts is for the Executive and not the courts to decide, and that China and its agencies enjoy the customary immunities, he emphasized that while indications of this Court have also established that a foreign sovereign is free from suit in court, this is not, unlike the state's Eleventh Amendment immunity, based on any explicit command of the Constitution. He went on to point out that even the immunity of the United States is a legal doctrine not favored by the test of time, noting that as early as 1797 Congress passed an act which provided that when the United States sues an individual, he can set off all debts properly due him from the sovereign. The liability of the United States was, of course, greatly expanded with the Court of Claims Act of 1855 and the Tort Liability Act of 1946. These developments are based on new views strongly held. "The claims of dominant opinion rooted in sentiments of justice and public morality are among the most powerful shaping-forces in lawmaking by courts." In addition, Justice Frankfurter noted that the State Department has adopted a restrictive policy toward the claim of immunity.

<sup>94</sup> 343 U.S. 356 (1955).

Its failure or refusal to suggest immunity has been given "significant weight" by the Court. Furthermore, in 1952 the State Department pronounced broadly against recognizing sovereign immunity for the commercial operations of a foreign government. Justice Frankfurter emphasized that in this case there was no attempt to bring a foreign government into one of our courts as a defendant. "We have a foreign government invoking our law but resisting a claim against it which fairly would curtail its recovery. It wants our law, like any other litigant, but it wants our law free from the claims of justice." Finally, it was noted that the State Department has not asked for allowance of counter-claims nor intimated in any way that their allowance in such a situation would embarrass friendly relations with China.

Speaking for the three dissenters, Justice Reed maintained that the Bank's counterclaim was entirely disconnected from the original action, and was like a suit against the foreign sovereign. He declared that immunity from suit does not mean irresponsibility, since liability may be satisfied in other ways, and that the sovereign's freedom from judicial control does not depend upon the will of the courts, but rather upon the will of the sovereign of the territory and upon international comity. He thought that the attitude of the State Department as to the desirability of relaxing the strict rule of immunity for acts of commerce was inapplicable here, because the Treasury Notes were sovereign obligations "of the highest public character."

II. QUESTIONS OF STATE POWER

1. DUE PROCESS OF LAW<sup>95</sup>

Regulation of Professions. An Oklahoma statute regulating ophthalmologists, optometrists, and opticians, parts of which had been held unconstitutional by a three-judge federal district court, was sustained in its entirety by a unanimous vote in Williamson v. Lee Optical of Oklahoma.<sup>96</sup> One section of the act makes it unlawful for any person not a licensed optometrist or ophthalmologist to fit lenses to a face or to duplicate or replace into frames lenses or other optical appliances, except upon written prescriptive authority of an Oklahoma licensed ophthalmologist or optometrist. This provision the district court held invalid because it could not see how the requirement of a prescription merely to take old lenses and place them in new frames, or to replace broken lenses, had any reasonable relationship to health and welfare. The Supreme Court disagreed, holding that this due process issue was controlled by Roschen v. Ward,<sup>97</sup> in which Justice Holmes upheld a New York law making it unlawful to sell eyeglasses at retail in any store, unless a duly licensed physician or optometrist was in charge and in personal attendance. While the Oklahoma law may in many cases "exact a needless, wasteful requirement" Justice Douglas declared that it is for the legislature and not the courts to balance the advantages and disadvantages of the new provision. Since there are some cases where the directions in a prescription are essential, the legislature might have decided that there are enough such occasions to justify this regulation. Furthermore, it may or may not be necessary to have a prescription for the purpose of duplicating lenses; this, too is for the legislature to decide. The legislature may also have thought that eye examinations are so critical that one should accompany every change in frames or duplication of a lens. Justice Douglas noted, however, that the law does not require a new examination every time frames are changed or lenses are duplicated, if the old prescription is on file with the optician. In any event, a state law need not be in every respect logically consistent with its aims to be constitutional. "The day is gone," said Justice Douglas, "when this Court uses the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to strike down state laws, regulatory of business and industrial conditions, because they may be unwise, improvident, or out of harmony with a particular school of thought." As was said in Munn v. Illinois,<sup>98</sup> for protection against abuses by legislatures, the people must resort to the polls, not the courts.

<sup>95</sup> On the due process clause see: Howard J. Graham, "Our 'Declaratory' Fourteenth Amendment," Stanford Law Review, Vol. 7, pp. 3-39 (Dec., 1954), "An Innocent Abroad: The Constitutional Corporate 'Person'," U.C.L.A. Law Review, Vol. 2, pp. 155-211 (Feb., 1955); Robert M. Holmes, "The Fourteenth Amendment and the Bill of Rights—An Historical Interpretation," South Carolina Law Quarterly, Vol. 7, pp. 596-619 (Summer, 1955); Albert R. Beisel, Jr., "Control over Illegal Enforcement of the Criminal Law: Role of the Supreme Court," Boston University Law Review, Vol. 34, pp. 413-48 (Nov., 1954), Vol. 35, pp. 1-76 (Jan., 1955); Rex A. Collings, Jr., "Unconstitutional Uncertainty—An Appraisal," Cornell Law Quarterly, Vol. 40, pp. 195-237 (Winter, 1955); Note, "The Right of State Appeal in Criminal Cases," Rutgers Law Review, Vol. 9, pp. 545-54 (Spring, 1955).

<sup>96</sup> 348 U.S. 483 (1955).

Another section of the statute provides that while opticians are subject to this regulatory system, all sellers of ready-to-wear glasses are exempt. The district court decided that this violated the Equal Protection Clause. The Supreme Court held, however, that the legislature has very wide powers of classification, that a reform may take one step at a time, that the legislature may deal with whatever phase of a field of activity is regarded as most acute, and neglect the others, and that all the Equal Protection Clause forbids is "the invidious discrimination," a point not reached here.

Another section, making it unlawful "to solicit the sale of . . . frames, mountings . . . or any other optical appliances" was held unconstitutional by the district court as going too far in regulating the advertising of frames, in which it could see no harm. But the Supreme Court ruled that an eyeglass frame is not merely a piece of merchandise; it is used with lenses, and lenses enter the field of health. The legislature might well have concluded that to regulate one effectively it would have to regulate the other, or the legislature might think that sellers of frames and lenses are in a business where advertising should be limited or even abolished in the public interest. Finally, the Court held valid a section providing that "no person, firm, or corporation engaged in the business of retailing merchandise to the general public shall rent space, sublease departments, or otherwise permit any person purporting to do eye examination or visual care to occupy space in such retail store." This regulation was likened to the statute, previously sustained, which denied corporations the right to practice dentistry.<sup>99</sup> Since the Oklahoma Act attempts, as far as possible, to free a profession from all taints of commercialism, it might be deemed important that the eye doctor be limited to geographical locations which reduce the temptations of commercialism.

<sup>97</sup> 273 U.S. 337 (1929).

<sup>98</sup> 94 U.S. 113 (1876).

Fair Procedure: The Right to an Unbiased Judge. Under Michigan law any judge of a court of record may serve as a one-man grand jury, and compel witnesses to appear in secret and testify about suspected crimes. In the case of In re Oliver,<sup>100</sup> the Court held that the judge-grand jury may not summarily convict a witness of contempt for conduct in the secret hearing, that due process requires a public trial after reasonable notice, with the right to call witnesses, cross-examine adverse witnesses, and be represented by counsel. In In re Murchison<sup>101</sup>, the Court decided, by a 6-3 vote, that due process has been violated if the judge who was the one-man grand jury presides at the contempt hearing. Said Justice Black: "A fair trial in a fair tribunal is a basic requirement of due process. Fairness of course requires an absence of actual bias in the trial of cases. But our system of law has always endeavored to prevent even the probability of unfairness. To this end no man can be a judge in his own case and no man is permitted to try cases where he has an interest in the outcome." This case, he held, came within the rule of the famous Tumey decision,<sup>102</sup> that the measure of bias is possible temptation to the average man as judge. Since the single judge-grand jury was part of the accusatory process, he cannot "in the very nature of things," be wholly disinterested in the results. Furthermore, as a practical matter, Justice Black insisted, it is difficult if not impossible for a judge to free himself from the influence of what happened in the secret session. His recollection is likely to weigh more heavily than the testimony given in open court. For example, the judge's remarks about a defendant's inscilent attitude are not subject to refutation by witnesses. In addition, the judge himself might have to be a witness, and in that event he would either testify in a case he would have to decide, or deprive the accused of the right to cross-examine, which is essential to a fair trial.

Three Justices dissented on the ground that it had not been proved that the judge was actually biased in any way. They also called attention to the rule of the Sacher case,<sup>103</sup> under which a federal district judge can summarily punish a contempt previously committed in his presence. The only difference was that in Sacher the contempt was committed in open court at a public trial. When the contempt is not committed in open court, a full trial is required on the contempt, which the defendants had, and which was all they are entitled to. Thus

<sup>99</sup> See Semler v. Oregon State Dental Examiners, 294 U.S. 608, 611 (1935).

<sup>100</sup> 333 U.S. 257 (1948).

<sup>101</sup> 349 U.S. 133 (1955).

<sup>102</sup> Tumey v. Ohio, 273 U.S. 510 (1927).

<sup>103</sup> Sacher v. United States, 343 U.S. 1 (1952).

the dissenters maintained that the Court was imposing a more stringent requirement on state judges than has been imposed upon the federal judges. The Turney case was distinguished on the ground that it involved the judge's compensation.

Coerced Testimony. Regan refused to testify before a New York grand jury which was investigating the relation between the police and criminal elements, and was convicted of criminal contempt. The New York Constitution provides that no person shall "be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself." At the time this case arose, Section 331 of the New York Penal Law provided that testimony regarding bribery cannot be withheld on the ground of self-incrimination, but conferred immunity from any prosecution for any criminal activity revealed in such testimony. According to Section 903 of the Charter of the City of New York, any city employee who refuses to sign a waiver of his immunity against later prosecution upon any matter of an official nature about which he is asked to testify must be discharged from his job and disqualified from future employment with the city. The state constitution has a similar provision, except that the disqualification is limited to five years. When first called to testify before the grand jury on March 7, 1951, Regan was a member of the police department of New York. Before being sworn, he signed a waiver of immunity against prosecution, and after being sworn he testified that the waiver had been executed voluntarily and with full understanding of its meaning. He was given a financial questionnaire to fill out, but on March 27, 1951, he resigned from the force. He was called, on October 22, 1952, and again failed to fill out the questionnaire. On December 21, 1952, he was called once more and asked whether he had accepted bribes while a policeman. When he refused to answer on the ground of self-incrimination, he was convicted of criminal contempt after a jury trial. On appeal he claimed that he did not understand the waiver when he signed it, and that the Fourteenth Amendment prevents a state from jailing a person for refusing to give self-incriminatory testimony.

Six Justices voted to affirm Regan's conviction.<sup>104</sup> Speaking for the Court, Justice Reed held that the immunity statute was crucial, since it removed any possible justification for not testifying. In his view it was immaterial whether the waiver was valid or not, voluntary or coerced, since in either case the obligation to testify remained unimpaired. For if the waiver was valid, Regan had voluntarily waived the immunity, and if invalid, then immunity from prosecution still exists. Stressing that this was a conviction for refusing to testify, Justice Reed pointed out that while the invalidity of the waiver may be made a defense to a later prosecution, it is no defense to a refusal to testify. The Chief Justice wrote a brief concurring opinion to emphasize that substantial federal questions may arise if Regan is again called upon to testify concerning bribery on the police force while he was an officer, and is then denied immunity as to any offenses related to the investigation. At that point he might contend that the waiver was coerced, or improper because of its use so many months after his public employment ended.

<sup>104</sup> Regan v. New York, 349 U.S. 58 (1955).

Justice Black, with whom Justice Douglas agreed, wrote a dissenting opinion, insisting, as he has so often in the past, that the Fourteenth Amendment applied the Fifth Amendment to the states. But even if it does not, he argued that this case falls within the rule so often applied by the Court that due process does not permit a state to convict a person on testimony it coerced from him. And he declared that "it is certainly coercion to throw a man into jail unless he agrees to testify against himself."

Appeal Procedure. An interesting procedural point was at issue in National Union of Marine Cooks and Stewards v. Arnold.<sup>105</sup> This litigation was the result of a "blacklisting" letter written by a Union agent to persons able to affect the employment of some 95 men who were stewards in the Alaska trade. The Washington state court in which the suit was brought held the letter libelous per se, and awarded judgment for $475,000. The next day, the Union filed a notice of appeal, but offered no supersedeas bond, and obtained no stay of proceedings. Later the trial court discovered in supplementary proceedings that the Union owned no substantial assets in Washington, but had United States bonds worth $298,000 in California. The court ordered the Union to deliver these bonds to it for safekeeping pending the disposition of the appeal. Two months later, on failure of the Union to deliver the bonds, the court held it in contempt, ruling that its conduct frustrated the enforcement of the judgment. The following month the state supreme court struck from its calendar the Union's appeal on the merits, pending its review of the adjudication of contempt, unless the Union sooner purged itself of the contempt. The following week this court affirmed the adjudication of contempt, and dismissed the main appeal unless, within fifteen days, the Union purged itself of the contempt by delivering the bonds.

The Supreme Court approved of this procedure by a 6-2 vote, holding that dismissal of an appeal for a money judgment does not violate due process where it constitutes a reasonable means of safeguarding the collectibility of that judgment. The earlier case of Hovey v. Elliott<sup>106</sup> was distinguished, for in that case the trial court did not even permit the defendant to make an answer because he refused to deliver certain funds which were the subject of the litigation to a court-appointed receiver. This was held by the Supreme Court to be a denial to the defendant of his constitutional right to a day in court. But the Union had its day in court. The dismissal cut off only a statutory right of review, after a full trial by judge and jury. It is established, said Justice Burton, that "while a statutory review is important and must be exercised without discrimination, such a review is not a requirement of due process." He went on to say: "Where the effectiveness of a money judgment is jeopardized by the judgment debtor, he has no constitutional right to an appeal extending that frustration." Justices

<sup>105</sup> 348 U.S. 37 (1954).

<sup>106</sup> 167 U.S. 409 (1897).

Black and Douglas dissented on the theory that the right to defend is basic to justice, and that the appeal is but a continuation of the Union's defense.

Right to Counsel. Ever since Betts v. Brady,<sup>107</sup> the Court has taken the position that in noncapital cases a state has not violated due process by refusing to appoint counsel to represent the accused at the trial unless it could be shown that the absence of counsel resulted in injustice. But by a unanimous vote the Court made it clear, in Chandler v. Fretag,<sup>108</sup> that while the right to appointed counsel is qualified, the defendant's right to be heard through a lawyer of his own choice is unqualified. That is to say, a defendant's right to get a lawyer of his own does not depend upon the existence of a situation where he would have been entitled to appointed counsel. Thus, where a defendant appears for trial without a lawyer, and asks the court for a continuance in order to get one, the judge violates due process by denying the request. The Court also held in this case that waiver of the right to counsel on a felony charge does not also constitute a waiver on an habitual criminal charge, which was held to be an essentially independent proceeding under state law.

A situation calling for application of the rule of Betts v. Brady was before the Court in Massey v. Moore.<sup>109</sup> Massey was serving a life sentence in a Texas prison following conviction for a third felony. He filed a petition for a writ of habeas corpus in the federal district court on the ground that he was of unsound mind and had been unassisted by counsel at the trial. He alleged that he had been in the state psychopathic hospital for several months before the trial, and had been removed from a straitjacket only four days before trial. He had entered a plea of not guilty, but apparently made no attempt to conduct any defense. The Texas courts had denied relief because under state law the question of whether he was insane and thus unable to conduct his own defense could be raised only on appeal, and not collaterally. The federal district court denied the petition without a hearing, and the court of appeals affirmed on the following grounds: (1) an issue is now raised which could and should have been raised at the trial; (2) the insanity issue had been decided against the petitioner by the district court in a previous proceeding in 1948; (3) the allegations presented no substantial federal question.

The Supreme Court Justices were unanimous in holding that on the allegations Massey was entitled to a hearing on his petition for the writ.<sup>110</sup> As regards

<sup>107</sup> 316 U.S. 455 (1942).

<sup>108</sup> 348 U.S. 3 (1954). Consult: William M. Eeany, The Right to Counsel in American Courts (Ann Arbor, 1955), and see the review by Richard C. Donnelly in Yale Law Journal, Vol. 65, pp. 1039-95 (June, 1955); David Fellman, "The Right to Counsel under State Law," Wisconsin Law Review, Vol. 1955, pp. 28-328 (March, 1955). It is of interest that once again the Judicial Conference of the United States has approved proposed legislation which would provide for the appointment of public defenders by federal district courts which wanted them, or in the alternative would allow compensation to counsel appointed to represent indigent defendants. Report of the Proceedings of a Special Session of the Judicial Conference of the United States, March 21, 23, 1955, Washington D.C., p. 21.

<sup>109</sup> 348 U.S. 105 (1954).

<sup>110</sup> See Note, "Federal Habeas Corpus for State Prisoners," Columbia Law Review, Vol. 65, pp. 196-209 (Feb., 1955).

the 1948 decision, it was noted that the district court had made its ruling on the erroneous assumption that the accused had had a lawyer; not until 1952 was the record corrected to show that he did not have one. Thus the earlier finding that he was competent to stand trial with counsel does not necessarily support the conclusion that he was competent to stand trial without counsel. Since the allegation of mental incapacity at the time of the trial must, on the present pleadings, be taken as true, it follows, said Justice Douglas, that he was effectively foreclosed from defending himself. "We cannot hold an insane man tried without counsel to the requirement of tendering the issue of his insanity at the trial. If he is insane, his need of a lawyer to tender the defense is too plain for argument." The Fourteenth Amendment requires a fair trial, and "no trial can be fair that leaves the defense to a man who is insane, unaided by counsel, and who by reason of his mental condition stands helpless and alone before the court. Even the sane layman may have difficulty discovering in a particular case the defenses which the law allows." It follows that the failure of an insane man to raise the question of his insanity on appeal merely underscores his need for counsel, and does not result in the waiver or loss of his constitutional right.

2. EQUAL PROTECTION OF THE LAWS

School Segregation. When the Court ruled, on May 17, 1954, that the "separate but equal" doctrine did not square with the command of the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, it postponed to a later date the fashioning of a decree.<sup>111</sup> Oral argument on the decree was originally scheduled for December 6, 1954, but it was postponed until April 11, 1955, probably because of the Senate's long delay in confirming the nomination of Justice Harlan. The issues were discussed with unusual amplitude, the Court allowing 14 hours of argument. The Attorney General of the United States and the Attorneys General of all states requiring or permitting racial discrimination in public education were invited to present their views. Briefs were filed by the parties, by the United States, and by Florida, North Carolina, Arkansas, Oklahoma, Maryland, and Texas, and they all participated in the oral argument.

<sup>111</sup> Brown v. Board of Education, 347 U.S. 483 (1954). See this REVIEW, Vol. 49, pp. 96-99 (March, 1955). There was much discussion of the problem of school segregation during the Term. See: C. Vann Woodward, The Strange Career of Jim Crow (New York, 1955); Robin M. Williams, Jr., and Margaret W. Ryan, Schools in Transition (Chapel Hill, 1954); Truman Pierce and others, White and Negro Schools in the South (Englewood Cliffs, N.J., 1955); James C. N. Paul, The School Segregation Decision (Chapel Hill: Institute of Government, University of North Carolina, 1954); Herbert Hill and Jack Greenberg, Citizen's Guide to De-Segregation (Boston, 1955); Lillian Smith, Now Is the Time (New York, 1955); Symposium, "Segregation in the Public Schools," Journal of Public Law, Vol. 3, pp. 5-170 (Spring, 1954); Arthur E. Sutherland, "Segregation by Race in Public Schools: Retrospect and Prospect," Law and Contemporary Problems, Vol. 20, pp. 169-83 (Winter, 1955); George J. Bertain, Jr., "Racial Segregation in the Public Schools," Catholic University of America Law Review, Vol. 5, pp. 141-56 (May, 1955); James Rorty, "Desegregation along the Mason-Dixon Line," Commentary, Vol. 18, pp. 493-503 (Dec., 1954). For a brilliant discussion of the school segregation cases see Edmond Cahn, "1954 Annual Survey of American Law: Jurisprudence," New York University Law Review, Vol. 30, pp. 150-69 (Jan., 1955).

Speaking again for a unanimous Court, Chief Justice Warren made it clear that the 1954 decision established the fundamental principle "that racial discrimination in public education is unconstitutional."<sup>112</sup> Therefore, he added, "all provisions of federal, state, or local law requiring or permitting such discrimination must yield to this principle." Nevertheless he explained that reargument had been requested on the question of relief because the cases arose under different local conditions, and their disposition will involve a variety of local problems. Indeed, said the Chief Justice the arguments presented to the Court showed the complexities involved in making the transition, and also indicated that substantial steps have already been taken to eliminate racial discrimination.

The decree remanded the cases to the courts which originally heard them "because of their proximity to local conditions and the possible need for further hearings. . . ." In fashioning and enforcing their decrees, these courts were directed to be guided by "equitable principles." The Chief Justice explained: "Traditionally, equity has been characterized by a practical flexibility in shaping its remedies and by a facility for adjusting and reconciling public and private needs. These cases call for the exercise of these traditional attributes of equity power. At stake is the personal interest of the plaintiffs in admission to public schools as soon as practicable on a nondiscriminatory basis. To effectuate this interest may call for elimination of a variety of obstacles in making the transition to school systems operated in accordance with the constitutional principles set forth in our May 17, 1954, decision. Courts of equity may properly take into account the public interest in the elimination of such obstacles in a systematic and effective manner. But it should go without saying that the vitality of these constitutional principles cannot be allowed to yield simply because of disagreement with them."

Giving weight to these public and private considerations, the trial courts were enjoined to require the defendants to make "a prompt and reasonable start toward full compliance" with the ruling. Having started, they may find that additional time is needed, but the burden of proof will be on the defendants to demonstrate that such time is necessary in the public interest, and "consistent with good faith compliance at the earliest practicable date." To this end, these courts may consider problems of administration, the physical condition of the school plant, the school transportation system, personnel, revision of school districts and attendance areas, and the revision of local laws and regulations. Thus four of the five judgments appealed from were reversed and remanded, and while the Delaware decision was affirmed, it was remanded to the state supreme court for such further proceedings as it may deem necessary in the light of this opinion.

The Court's refusal to issue a forthright decree ordering compliance with the Constitution within a specified period of time is, of course, an open invitation to prolong the controversy. The great drama of implementing the Supreme Court's decree has now begun.<sup>113</sup> Those who wish to keep abreast of the subject are advised to consult a new monthly publication, the Southern School News, prepared by the Southern Education Reporting Service, an organization of Southern newspaper editors and educators, with the assistance of a grant from the Fund for the Advancement of Education.<sup>114</sup> The developments are far too numerous and complex for adequate discussion here. A good example is the Hawkins case, in which a Negro sought admission to the College of Law of the University of Florida, and which the Supreme Court remanded to the highest court in Florida in 1954 for reconsideration in the light of the new position created by the Segregation Cases.<sup>115</sup> The Florida Supreme Court had ruled against Hawkins in 1952 for the reason that he could get a legal education at the Law School of the Florida A. & M. University for Negroes, the facilities of which, while not identical, were found to be substantially equal.<sup>116</sup> On the remand, the Florida court emphasized that the 1955 decree does not require the state to admit Hawkins immediately, or at any particular time in the future, took note of current serious problems in relation to desegregation, and, accordingly, refused to issue the peremptory writ of mandamus prayed for.<sup>117</sup> Instead, the court appointed a circuit judge to serve as a commissioner of the court, to take testimony on the problems involved in desegregation. The commissioner was directed to file the transcript of the testimony, without recommendations or findings of fact, within four months. Two judges dissented. Judge Terrell filed a fascinating concurring opinion in which he argued that segregation has always been "the unvarying law of the animal kingdom." Thus he noted that "the dove and the quail, the turkey and the turkey buzzard, the chicken and the guinea, it matters not where they are found, are segregated; place the horse, the cow, the sheep, the goat and the pig in the same pasture and they instinctively segregate." Fish and birds have the same instinct. In fact, said the learned judge, "when God created man, he allotted each race to his own continent according to color, Europe to the white man, Asia to the yellow man, Africa to the black man and America to the red man. . . ." Accordingly, he took a very conservative view of what should be done, in the light of Chief Justice Warren's statement that the courts are to be governed by "equitable principles . . . characterized by a practicable flexibility."

<sup>112</sup> Brown v. Board of Education of Topeka, 349 U.S. 294 (1955).

Segregation in Cemeteries. There being no observable limits to the range of

<sup>113</sup> See Note, "Supreme Court Equity Jurisdiction: The Decrees in the Segregation Cases," Yale Law Journal, Vol. 64, pp. 124-36 (Nov., 1954); Note, "Implementation of the Segregation Decisions," Northwestern University Law Review, Vol. 49, pp. 557-66 (Sept.-Oct., 1954); F. B. Nicholson, "Legal Standing of the South's School Resistance Proposals," South Carolina Law Quarterly, Vol. 7, pp. 1-64 (Fall, 1954); William F. Winter, "Mississippi's Legislative Approach to the School Segregation Problem," Mississippi Law Review, Vol. 26, pp. 165-72 (March, 1955).

<sup>114</sup> Vol. 1, No. 1, appeared September 3, 1954. The subscription rate is $2 for a year, $3.75 for two years. The address is P.O. Box 6156, Acklen Station, Nashville 5, Tennessee.

<sup>115</sup> Florida ex rel. Hawkins v. Board of Control of Florida, 347 U.S. 971 (1954).

<sup>116</sup> State ex rel. Hawkins v. Board of Control, 60 So. 2d 162 (Fla. 1952).

<sup>117</sup> State ex rel. Hawkins v. Board of Control, 83 So. 2d 20 (Fla., Oct. 19, 1955).

man's fears, follies, and prejudices, the problem of segregation continues beyond our terrestrial existence to the cemetery. A case involving this ghoully issue finally reached the Court from Sioux City, Iowa, where a woman entered into a contract for the purchase of a burial lot in which to deposit the earthly remains of her husband, who had been killed in unsegregated action while in the United States army in Korea. After services had been conducted at the grave site, the cemetery company refused to bury the husband when it was discovered that he was an Indian (Winnebago), a fact not previously known to it. The contract of sale included a clause expressly forbidding the burial of non-Caucasians in the cemetery. Thereupon the widow brought suit for damages to compensate for mental suffering. The Iowa Supreme Court held<sup>118</sup> that allowing the defendant to rely upon this restrictive covenant did not constitute an exertion of governmental power to aid discrimination directly, and was therefore outside the ruling of the Shelley case<sup>119</sup> and a dictum in the Civil Rights Cases.<sup>120</sup> The Supreme Court affirmed the Iowa decision by a 4-4 vote, in 1954,<sup>121</sup> but later granted a petition for a rehearing, following which it dismissed the writ of certiorari, by a 5-3 vote, as having been granted improvidently.<sup>122</sup>

At the rehearing, attention was focussed upon an Iowa statute, enacted since the initiation of this litigation, which makes it impossible for this question ever to arise again. The Court's expert on certiorari, Justice Frankfurter, pointed out that under Rule 19 the writ is granted where there are "special and important reasons." A case may raise a question which presents intellectual or abstractly interesting problems: "but this Court does not sit to satisfy a scholarly interest in such issues. Nor does it sit for the benefit of the particular litigants." The problem of a case must be "beyond the academic or the episodic" before the Court will take it. Especially where constitutional issues are involved, said Justice Frankfurter, is it the duty of the Court to avoid decision "unless avoidance becomes evasion." Since Iowa now has a statute forbidding discrimination by cemeteries on the grounds of race or color, the present case assumes "an isolated significance." If there had been error, he asserted, Iowa has corrected it. Dismissal of certiorari he insisted, even after full argument, was not at all unique, there having already been over 60 such cases, "an impressive practice."

Justice Black, who was joined by Chief Justice Warren and Justice Douglas, was not impressed. Noting that serious Fourteenth Amendment questions were raised and remain unanswered, he wrote: "The Court dismisses the case because the Iowa Legislature has provided that every person in Iowa except one who has already filed a suit can prosecute claims like this. Apparently this law leaves everyone in Iowa free to vindicate this kind of right except the petitioner. This

<sup>118</sup> Rice v. Sioux City Memorial Park Cemetery, 245 Iowa 147, 60 N.W. 2d 110 (1953).

<sup>119</sup> Shelley v. Kraemer, 334 U.S. 1 (1948). See Clement E. Vose, "N.A.A.C.P. Strategy in the Covenant Cases," Western Reserve Law Review, Vol. 6, pp. 101-45 (Winter, 1945).

<sup>120</sup> 109 U.S. 3, 17 (1883).

<sup>121</sup> Rice v. Sioux City Memorial Park Cemetery, 348 U.S. 380 (1954).

<sup>122</sup> 349 U.S. 70 (1955).

raises a new question of denial of equal protection of the laws equally as grave as those which prompted us to take this case originally. We cannot agree that this dismissal is justified merely because this petitioner is the only one whose rights may have been unconstitutionally denied."<sup>123</sup>

3. STATE POWER AND THE COMMERCE CLAUSE

Hayes Freight Lines, Inc., is an interstate motor carrier transporting goods to and from many points in Illinois and seven other states under a certificate issued by the ICC under the Federal Motor Carrier Act. The company also carries on an intrastate carrier business in Illinois under a certificate issued by state authorities. An Illinois statute limits the weight of freight that can be carried in commercial trucks on the state's highways, and also provides that freight loads must be in balanced distribution with regard to truck axles. Repeated violation of these provisions is punishable by total suspension of the carrier's right to use Illinois roads for periods of time ranging from 90 days to one year. In an action brought to restrain Illinois officials from prosecuting the company as a repeated violator, the state's highest court ruled that the statutory suspension could not be imposed on the company's interstate operations without violating the Federal Motor Carrier Act. The Supreme Court affirmed unanimously.<sup>124</sup> Justice Black pointed out that the federal Act is a comprehensive plan for regulating the carriage of goods by motor truck in interstate commerce, so all-embracing that former state power over interstate commerce was greatly reduced. He added that "no power at all was left in states to determine what carriers could or could not operate in interstate commerce." The federal statute authorizes certificates and declares that they shall remain in effect until suspended or terminated as therein provided. It was noted that Congress narrowly limited the power of the ICC to suspend or revoke the certificate, requiring a hearing and a finding of wilful negligence. Justice Black held that the state's suspension of this carrier's right to use the highways of Illinois was the equivalent of a partial suspension of its federally-granted certificate. It was also noted that the states are free to use more conventional forms of punishment, and that the ICC can protect the state's interest on its own initiative or on complaint of the state by enforcing its own regulation which requires motor carriers to observe valid state highway regulations.

<sup>123</sup> The gentle reader will be delighted to know that we now have it on the authority of a California judge that God does not permit segregation in the hereafter. Dooling, J., concurring in Long v. Mountain View Cemetery Association, 130 C.A. 2d 328, 330, 278 P.2d 945, 946 (App. 1st Dist, 1955). The court held in this case that a cemetery was not a place of public accommodation within the meaning of the state equal rights law, and therefore dismissed an action for damages brought under it. The concurring judge denounced burial ground segregation as "a particularly stupid form of human arrogance and intolerance."

For writings on other equal protection issues see: Charles Abrams, Forbidden Neighbors: A Study of Prejudice in Housing (New York, 1955); Note, "The Operation of State Fair Employment Practices Commissions," Harvard Law Review, Vol. 68, pp. 685-97 (Feb., 1955); Elmer A. Carter, "Practical Considerations of Anti-Discrimination Legislation-Experience under the New York Law against Discrimination," Cornell Law Quarterly, Vol. 40, pp. 40-59 (Fall, 1954); Note, "Segregation in Recreation," Nebraska Law Review, Vol. 34, pp. 553-63 (March, 1955); Patrick J. Foley, "Class Discrimination in Selection of Jurors," Catholic University of America Law Review, Vol. 5, pp. 157-72 (May, 1955).

<sup>124</sup> Castle v. Hayes Freight Lines, Inc., 348 U.S. 61 (1954).

4. INTERGOVERNMENTAL RELATIONS

Federal Supremacy. An interesting federal supremacy question was before the Court in Weber v. Anheuser-Busch.<sup>125</sup> The International Association of Machinists (IAM) insisted that there be a provision in its collective bargaining agreement with Anheuser-Busch that when the repair or replacement of machinery was necessary, this would be given only to contractors having collective agreements with IAM. Since the Carpenters Union claimed the work for its members, IAM finally went out on strike to get this clause in the 1952 contract. On the day after the strike was called, Anheuser-Busch filed a charge of an unfair labor practice under a section of the Taft-Hartley Act against IAM. On November 18, 1952, the National Labor Relations Board held that there was no "dispute" within the meaning of the invoked section. In the meantime, after it had filed the charge but before the Board acted upon it, Anheuser-Busch sought an injunction in a state court on the ground that the strike was a secondary boycott under Missouri common law, and later on the ground that IAM's conduct was an illegal conspiracy under state law. The state court granted a permanent injunction. The Missouri Supreme Court held that the Labor Board's ruling was merely a determination that there was no basis for a charge of an unfair labor practice under Taft-Hartley, and that IAM's conduct violated the state's restraint of trade statute.

By unanimous vote the Supreme Court reversed, holding that the state court's jurisdiction was pre-empted by the authority vested in the Labor Board. A state may not prohibit the exercise of rights which federal statutes protect. Thus, Justice Frankfurter pointed out that the Board's machinery for dealing with certification problems also carries implications of exclusiveness. For example, a state may not certify a union as the collective bargaining agent for employees where the federal Board, if called upon, would use its own certification procedure. The Board found that there had been no violation of the particular subsection of the Act, as alleged; whether other subsections of the Act were violated is for the Board, and not the state courts, to decide. Furthermore, "controlling and therefore superseding federal power cannot be curtailed by the State even though the ground of intervention be different than that on which federal supremacy has been exercised." Regarding the conduct in question, it was ruled, Congress sufficiently expressed its purpose to bring it within federal supervision, and thus state action is prohibited. If the labor practices complained of are within the scope of the federal statute, and are found not to be prohibited by it, then they are within the protection of the Act, and the state court must decline jurisdiction in deference to the tribunal selected by Congress to determine such issues.

<sup>125</sup> 348 U.S. 468 (1955). See William W. Schwarzer, "Enforcing Federal Supremacy: Relief against Federal-State Regulatory Conflicts" California Law Review, Vol. 43, pp. 234-60 (May, 1955).

In another case,<sup>126</sup> the Court held that an action under the Jones Act does not fail because of noncompliance with a state statute governing the distribution of decedent estates which required filing of a notice of claim within eight months, because Congress decreed a three-year statute of limitations to operate uniformly throughout the nation. No state law can diminish this period.

Finally, in a group of three cases the Court upheld federal tax claims as having priority over competing local claims. In the first, a United States tax lien was held prior in right to an attachment lien obtained in an action for wrongful death, where the federal lien arose and was recorded before the date the attaching creditor obtained judgment, though after the date of the attachment lien.<sup>127</sup> The Court ruled that it was immaterial that under state law the attachment is designated as "an execution in advance" which is perfected at the time of the attachment. The relative priority of the United States tax lien is always a federal question to be determined finally by the federal courts, and the state's characterization of its liens, while good for all state purposes, does not necessarily bind the Supreme Court. It held that the state attachment lien is for federal tax purposes an inchoate lien because at the time the attachment was issued the fact and amount of the lien depended upon the outcome of a lawsuit for damages.

In the second case, a United States tax lien was held prior in right over a garnishment lien obtained by a creditor of the taxpayer in an action on an open account, where the tax lien arose and was filed prior to the date the garnisher obtained judgment against the taxpayer, though after the date of the garnishment lien.<sup>128</sup> In the third case, a United States tax lien was held prior in right over a landlord's distress lien where the tax lien was prior in time.<sup>129</sup> The Court ruled that the question as to when the distress lien was perfected is a matter of federal law.

Intergovernmental Taxation. It is established by Supreme Court holdings that a state may impose a tax upon the stockholder's interest in a corporation, measured by corporate asset values, without making any deduction on account of United States securities held by the corporation, on the theory that the stockholder's interest in a corporation represents a property interest separate from the corporation's ownership of its assets.<sup>130</sup> A variation of this situation was before the Court in Society for Savings v. Bowers.<sup>131</sup> Here Ohio assessed its prop-

<sup>126</sup> Cox v. Roth, 348 U.S. 207 (1955).

<sup>127</sup> United States v. Acri, 348 U.S. 211 (1955). See Arthur S. Keyser, "Federal Tax Liens under the Federal Tax and Priority Statutes," George Washington Law Review, Vol. 22, pp. 583-91 (April, 1954).

<sup>128</sup> United States v. Liverpool & London & Globe Insurance Co., 348 U.S. 215 (1955).

<sup>129</sup> United States v. Scovil, 348 U.S. 218 (1955).

<sup>130</sup> See Des Moines National Bank v. Fairweather, 263 U.S. 103 (1923).

<sup>131</sup> 349 U.S. 143 (1955). On problems of American federalism see William Anderson, The Nation and the States, Rivals or Partners? (Minneapolis, 1955); Federalism, Mature and Emergent, ed. Arthur W. Macmahon (Garden City, N.Y., 1955).

erty tax upon two mutual savings banks having no capital stock or shareholders. The banks were required to include United States bonds in the property values upon which the tax was computed. No claim was made that this was a franchise or some other kind of privilege tax. The Supreme Court of Ohio upheld the tax because, in its opinion, it was not levied upon the banks. It ruled that the depositors of a mutual savings bank have an interest similar to that of shareholders in other banks, and that therefore the tax was on the "intangible property interests" of the depositors as the owners of each bank. The banks' capital, surplus fund, and undivided profits were not themselves regarded as the subject matter of the tax, but as simply the measure of the tax against the depositors. In short, the banks were treated as tax-collecting agents rather than as taxpayers. The Supreme Court reversed in a unanimous decision announced by Justice Harlan. He observed that since a federal right was involved, the Court was not bound by the Ohio court's holding that this tax was imposed on the depositors. Reviewing the facts of the situation, he concluded that the tax was actually on the banks. No language in the statute expressly imposes this tax on the depositors. The ownership interests of the depositors in these banks are quite different from those of stockholders. Justice Harlan also pointed out that if the bank is unable to pay the tax, there is no provision entitling Ohio to collect it from the depositors. He concluded that "a tax against the depositors which is recoverable only from the bank looks like a tax against the bank."

Full Faith and Credit. Several constitutional issues, including full faith and credit, were presented in Watson v. Employers Liability Assurance Corp.,<sup>12</sup> which involved a rather complicated set of facts. Watson sued the company, a British corporation, in a Louisiana court under a state law authorizing direct actions against insurance companies. He alleged injury from use in Louisiana of a hair-waving product manufactured by an Illinois corporation which was a subsidiary of a Delaware corporation having its headquarters in Massachusetts. The insurance policy was negotiated and issued in Massachusetts and delivered there and in Illinois. This contract contains a clause, recognized as binding and enforceable under Massachusetts and Illinois law, which prohibits direct actions against the insurance company until after final determination of the manufacturing company's obligation to pay personal injury damages either by judgment or agreement. Contrary to the "no action" clause in the contract, the Louisiana statute permits injured persons to sue the insurance company before such final determination, and even though, as here, the insurance contract is made in another state and contains a clause forbidding such direct actions. Another Louisiana statute, with which the insurance company complied, requires foreign insurance companies to consent to such direct suits in order to get a certificate to do business in the state.

<sup>12</sup> 348 U.S. 66 (1954). See James D. Sumner, Jr., "Full Faith and Credit for Judicial Proceedings," U.C.L.A. Law Review, Vol. 2, pp. 441-99 (June, 1955); "The Full-Faith-and-Credit Clause—Its History and Purpose," Oregon Law Review, Vol. 34, pp. 224-49 (June, 1955).

The principal issue was whether the federal Constitution permits Louisiana to apply its own law, or whether it compels Louisiana to apply the law of Massachusetts or Illinois. The Court unanimously held the Louisiana statute constitutional. Equal Protection and Contract Clause objections were brushed aside. As for due process, Justice Black pointed out that because of the modern practice of conducting widespread business activities throughout the country, the Court has held in many cases that more states than one may seize hold of local activities which are part of multi-state activities, and may regulate to protect the interests of local people, even though other phases of the same transactions might justify regulatory legislation in other states. He noted that Louisiana's direct action statute was not "a mere intermeddling" in affairs of no concern to her. Persons killed or injured in the state are most likely to be Louisiana residents; injuries might require treatment in Louisiana homes or hospitals by Louisiana doctors; destitution may lead to public assistance. Furthermore, Louisiana courts are in most instances the most convenient forum for these cases.

Finally, Justice Black could find here no violation of the Full Faith and Credit Clause. This clause "does not automatically compel a state to subordinate its own contract laws to the laws of another state in which a contract happens to have been formally executed. Where, as here, a contract affects the people of several states, each may have interests that leave it free to enforce its own contract policies." Here there are vital interests of Louisiana in liability insurance that covers injuries to people in Louisiana. Of course, Massachusetts also has some interests in this policy, said Justice Black, but they do not outweigh the interests of Louisiana in taking care of persons injured in Louisiana. Therefore, the Full Faith and Credit Clause does not require Louisiana to subordinate its direct action policy to the contract law of Massachusetts.

The other case of the 1954 Term which presented a full faith and credit issue was Carroll v. Lanza,<sup>133</sup> decided by a 6-3 vote. Carroll was an employee of Hogan, a subcontractor doing work for Lanza, the prime contractor. Both Carroll and Hogan were residents of Missouri, and the former's employment contract with the latter was made in Missouri. However, Carroll was injured while working in Arkansas. Unaware that he had remedies under Arkansas law, Carroll received 34 weekly payments for the injury under the Missouri compensation act, which is applicable to injuries inside or outside the state if the employment contract is made in the state, and which also provides that every employer and employee shall be "conclusively presumed to have elected to accept" its provisions unless prior to the accident he shall have filed with the compensation commission a written notice electing to reject the compensation provision. No such notice had been filed in this instance. Arkansas' workman's compensation law provides the exclusive remedy of the employee against the employer, but not against a third party. Since under Arkansas law Lanza, the prime contractor, was a third party, Carroll sued him for common-law damages in an Arkansas court while receiving payments under the Missouri law. Lanza removed to the federal district court, where judgment was rendered for Carroll, but the court of appeals reversed on the basis of the Full Faith and Credit Clause, even though it agreed that the judgment was good as a matter of Arkansas law. The Supreme Court reversed.

<sup>133</sup> 349 U.S. 408 (1955).

The case of Magnolia Petroleum Co. v. Hunt<sup>134</sup> which the court of appeals thought was controlling, was distinguished on the ground that there the employee received a final award for compensation in the forum of the injury, whereas Carroll had no final award under the Missouri act. In fact, under this act payments started automatically, without any adjudication. Speaking for the Court, Justice Douglas held that Pacific Employers Insurance Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission<sup>135</sup> was controlling. In this case a resident of Massachusetts regularly employed in Massachusetts by a Massachusetts corporation was injured while doing temporary work in California. Although the Massachusetts act purported to give an exclusive remedy, even for injuries incurred beyond its borders, California also had a compensation act which fixed liability on employers without regard to any contract, rule, or regulation, and which California courts enforced strictly. The Supreme Court held that the exclusive nature of the Massachusetts act was "obnoxious" to the California policy.

The Court has often held, said Justice Douglas, "that the Full Faith and Credit Clause does not require a State to substitute for its own statute, applicable to persons and events within it, the statute of another State reflecting a conflicting and opposed policy." In these personal injury cases, he declared, the state where the injury occurs need not be a "rascal" to the home state, and permit only the remedy which the home state regards as the exclusive one, for "the state of the forum also has interests to serve and to protect." The interests of Arkansas in this situation were described as "large and considerable," since the state wherein the tort occurs is concerned with problems which follow an injury, such as medical care and possible dependents.

<sup>134</sup> 320 U.S. 430 (1943).

<sup>135</sup> 306 U.S. 493 (1939).

CULTURAL PREREQUISITES TO A SUCCESSFULLY FUNCTIONING DEMOCRACY: A SYMPOSIUM

ERNEST S. GRIFFITH, Library of Congress; JOHN PLAMENATZ, Oxford University; J. ROLAND PENNOCK, Swarthmore College

PREFACE

The problem of sustaining and strengthening democratic institutions is of the first magnitude. The stakes are high.

"Democracy," whatever else may be included, implies free discussion and popular election of governors, with alternative choices available. Presumably the governors will include a representative element, normally in the form of a legislative or policy-adopting body.

The term "cultural prerequisites" is less easily defined. The sociologists have an approach that sheds light upon that for which we are searching. They speak of the mores, those modes of thought as well as behavior by which men live and institutions are sustained. The mores are those elements of a culture which are regarded as essential for survival of the society itself. As regards democracy, our question is basically, "What is its cultural and psychological underpinning?" What cultural attitudes or mores will sustain democracy? In part they must do this by assuring its success in satisfying the psychological necessities of its citizens, in part by giving it and its institutions an emotional content which will make its survival a fighting matter for those who love it. Probing still more deeply, or moving, if you will, into another dimension, what will produce and sustain these attitudes? Is there, by chance, a central matrix of which they are derivatives?

Conversely, can the necessity of these attitudes be demonstrated by proving the probability of failure if they are absent?

Only as attitudes prevail that are relevant to or buttress a successful democracy will the latter really be safe. Loyalties felt only to an age that is past lack the necessary context of passion and devotion to sustain a contemporary pattern. The present becomes a parasite on the past, unable to sustain itself through deeply felt relevance to existing demands. Conversely, though the mores be deeply felt, if the institutions they sustain are not themselves adequate for today's problems and crises, those institutions are eventually doomed.

In this symposium, we have chosen to exclude any detailed discussion of political institutions as such, in part because these have so frequently been the subject of scholars' concern. We are united in asserting the importance and relevance to democracy and its flourishing survival of such institutions as the single-member constituency, constitutional responsibility, local self-government, the two-party system, a career civil service. Yet are not these more in the nature of by-products or derivatives of the attitudes which we regard as cultural prerequisites than themselves basic? They may in turn influence or condition individuals in such a fashion as to aid in producing deeply felt attitudes—but they are not themselves the attitudes. Government does not develop in a legal vacuum, unpenetrated by unfolding forces from other segments of a culture. In turn, the governmental institutions are no will-o'-the-wisps blown about without resistance by the gusts of a determinism, economic or otherwise. Governmental institutions are, of course, stimulus as well as response; positive conditioning factors as well as a product of conditioning. This dualism, this action and reaction must be borne in mind at all times, though it is not our immediate concern.

We are not over much concerned with an intellectual or rational demonstration of the advantages of democracy over alternative forms of governance. We believe such a demonstration is possible; we do not believe it is adequate in and of itself to sustain democratic institutions. Under given circumstances belief in the advantages of democracy can and has been undermined and even overthrown by a seeming demonstration to the contrary—and this demonstration has as often stemmed from the communist left as the fascist right. Even though a substantial majority of a people may give theoretical assent to the superior virtues of constitutional, democratic government, yet a passionate, dedicated, and organized minority can topple and has toppled over the enfeebled will of such a majority—and has used its consequent power to consolidate its position. Belief in democratic institutions may well be a cultural prerequisite to their survival; but such a belief must take the form of a fixating and deep conviction, which itself may well be a product of attitudes still more basic.

That there be no misunderstanding, it will not be enough for any of us to say that education is an answer. We are still left with the question: "What education?" In other words, what attitudes would we create, identify, intensify, transmit, motivate, make instruments of demonstrated satisfaction, in the educational process itself?

We shall delimit our problem by confining our attention to democracy in the large, modern, industrialized state.

We concede that democracy is more likely to survive, other things being equal, in small states. Such states are more manageable, in that the results of specific political action are more readily identifiable. Advantages and disadvantages are more clearly demonstrable. And there are other favorable circumstances which need not detain us here.

An agrarian state of small landowners is likely to present fewer difficulties. This combines the advantages of diffusion of property with economic homogeneity.

A state unthreatened by external enemies probably finds it relatively easy to develop and sustain democratic institutions, even though the latter may command a loyalty of relatively low temperature.

A state the tempo of whose social change is slow and devoid of stress and strain would seem to pose less of a problem in maintenance of its democratic institutions.

In the foregoing statements we freely concede the presence of a number of variables besetting our problem. While these variables are to a degree independent of the attitudes for which we are searching, they do affect measurably the necessity or otherwise of a strong psychological underpinning as regards democratic survival.

This brings us to the nub of our problem—the success or failure of representative government in the large industrialized states. Moreover, success must be in a day of a stepped-up tempo of social change, a tempo which makes no allowance for ease of adjustment. Then, too, success must be attained by these states in a situation in which they are so threatened by external enemies, and often by internal subversion as well, that the temptation is constantly present to sacrifice democratic values in order to further national survival. Our problem really focusses on France, West Germany, Great Britain, Italy, Japan, and the United States.

There are many points of view as to the necessary cultural prerequisites in this setting. Three are developed in the sections that follow.—E. S. G.

A

Knowledge by itself is not enough in the area of human behavior to assure conduct either right or wise. An appropriate motivation must be added to knowledge, and such motivation to prove lasting is best sustained by the kind of dynamic which religion and patriotism have at times illustrated. The field of political behavior is no exception. Motivation must be added to rationality, a motivation whereby faith and passion may reinforce or even create the attitudes which rationality would dictate.

It is my hypothesis that the Christian and Hebrew faiths constitute a powerful matrix, a common denominator of those attitudes most essential to a flourishing democracy. Moreover, it would appear that it is these faiths, and especially the Christian faith, that perhaps alone can cloak such attitudes with the character of “absolutes”—a character which is not only desirable, but perhaps even necessary to democratic survival.

In developing this hypothesis it will obviously be necessary to use terms and concepts which in many circles will in and of themselves evoke a negative response. So frequently have religious terms, symbols, and beliefs come to be associated with anti-intellectualism, that one is in danger of evoking, even when merely observing or analyzing their effect, something akin to that emotional distortion of objectivity of which those who profess these religious beliefs are themselves accused. I ask therefore no more—and no less—than that any whose predisposition is to react unfavorably to such an approach will consciously strive to retain that sense of objectivity which is the goal of all of us.

I suggest at the outset an examination of a cluster of basic attitudes or mores which, to the degree that they have been present, are apparently closely associated with democratic success. Each of these will be considered in turn. It will be my objective not merely to indicate the relevance of these attitudes in the matter of the survival and flourishing of democratic institutions (which for the most part would be agreed upon), but also to probe still more deeply to discover whether the hypothesis of religious belief as a common denominator, an ultimate sustainer, of these attitudes is the correct one. It will be my further contention that in a pragmatic sense it is in the strength of such faiths that the most serious dilemma facing contemporary free society may best be resolved. This is the dilemma between individualism and civic or social obligation.

Obviously the extent to which, and the degree of intensity with which, any or all of these various attitudes must be held are discussible. So also is the degree to which the faiths in question are practiced as well as held. Not all of these attitudes, all of the time must be generally accepted as mores; but for reasons that will appear later, I believe that they must be sufficiently widespread to be accepted as norms of desirable conduct, so that deviations therefrom are subject to questioning and usually social disapproval. A reasonable conformance thereto must be expected of public servants and leadership generally. Hypocrisy there will most certainly be, but the fact that persons who wish acceptance as leaders usually regard it as necessary at least to pretend to hold and practice these attitudes, would itself be evidence that they at least approach the status of mores. No government or society built primarily on hypocrisy can today survive widespread disillusionment arising from exposure of the gulf between its actual and its ideal—unless the latter has a substantial or prevailing core of acceptance among its citizenry on which a constructive rebound from disillusionment can build. Cynicism is the basis for decay of a society. It is at least worth mentioning at this point that a practicing Christian cannot be cynical.

In preliminary fashion, one may note how the absence of certain attitudes contributed to the collapse of the more fragile democracies. Surely lack of respect for the individual was a factor in the collapse of democratic institutions in Germany, Italy, and Japan, and in their failure to take root in Russia. Lack of integrity and dedication to the public interest cost the Kuomintang of China its existence. Lack of a strong sense of the basic unity necessary for an integrated political economy characterized Pre-Hitler Germany and casts serious doubt upon the viability of the democratic constitution of contemporary France—though the latter's love of freedom is more deeply rooted than Germany's. The mores of Japan included a sense of civic obligation but without respect for the individual; those of France involved individualism without the necessary concomitant of civic loyalty.

One must further accept the fact that there will often be a cultural lag in the governmental institutions. If and when France becomes essentially civic and socially minded, it is still highly probable that her present constitution will exaggerate or even be primarily an expression of the remnants of that egocentric individualism which has been her curse. On the other hand, both the British and the American constitutions, especially if their usages and customs are included, are reasonably well in harmony with—and may in fact be regarded as expressions of—many of the mores mentioned. Relatively few changes, and these of not too great importance, would appear to be required to adapt them to the imperatives of contemporary governance.

I

Let us now consider affirmatively each attitude of the series I propose as prerequisites. In doing this we may bear in mind that Montesquieu built much of his political theory upon the necessity for attitudes appropriate to the various forms of government so as to ensure their workability. "There is this difference between the nature and principle of government; its nature is that by which it is constituted, and its principle that by which it is made to act. One is its particular structure, and the other the human passions which set it in motion." Honor for monarchy; virtue (the love of laws and of country) for democracy—these were prerequisite to success. I differ with Montesquieu, not with respect to the validity of his insight as to the nature of the problem, but with respect to the adequacy of his answer in the more complex setting of the present time.

It is not accidental that I give first place to the value placed upon individual personality, or rather the view of the nature of the individual as being end and not means. The heart of freedom as a hallmark of democracy consists in a formal or informal constitutional allocation to the individual of certain areas of action which no government (or for that matter, no social institution, including business and labor organizations) may touch. Montesquieu's age called these areas "natural rights"—freedom of speech, freedom of worship, freedom from arbitrary or lawless acts. Jefferson spoke of the inalienable rights of "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness," and gave them a theological grounding.

The deepening insights of recent years have added to or expanded this area of rights, to give them an affirmative content. We speak of the right to work (that is, to contribute something useful to society); the right of children to educational or other opportunities; the right of each one to be treated with dignity as befits a free person—without reference to sex or creed or race or class. In other words, this view of the nature of individual personality leads straight to true equality of opportunity and treatment as well as to liberty.

I do not claim that only among those who profess and practice the Christian and Jewish faiths is such a value placed upon individual personality. I do call attention to the valiant witness of many thousands of churchmen against Hitler and his ilk, and against communism. I do point out that it is the church that is in the vanguard of contemporary responsible Southern leadership in working out a constructive program of racial integration in the schools. "Thus saith the Lord" resounds from a thousand pulpits against violations of the intrinsic dignity of man. It is an "absolute" in the creeds and doctrines of these faiths that men everywhere can find this dignity best in a society of the free—a society in which men are able to think and act spontaneously and responsibly. More and more the spiritual leaders are urging that practice conform to doctrine. As political scientists, we may at least observe the effect on attitude of regarding a man—any man—as a child of God. It provides a norm by which political and economic conduct is to be judged. There are things, if you will, which one who regards himself as a child of God just does not do to another child of God. One does not exploit him, for example; nor does one terrorize or cheat or deceive him; nor irrationally and arbitrarily coerce him. Conversely and affirmatively it leads straight to a conviction of the importance of justice for the individual. It also defines justice by providing norms.

It may not be enough to think of liberty or freedom merely as useful culture traits, to be adopted or discarded according to whether or not what appears to be a still more useful trait—security or national survival, for example—is advanced as preferable but incompatible. For democracy to survive in the large, complex, insecure industrialized state, it may well be essential that its participants shall love liberty—for others as well as for themselves—with a passion that finds it more precious than life. I raise the question as to whether anything less than a theological base is adequate upon which to build a society of the free.

In the second place, a democracy withers away if its people lose interest in its institutions and their constructive use for the general welfare. This is a much wider matter than merely voting or not voting, though this latter is certainly a relevant barometer. Its importance extends to every form of responsible citizen participation in community life: to business and industry, social work, religious activity, as well as to formal government. In government it also means alertness, and the communication of alertness, between elections. Willingness to accept or even to seek office must be sufficiently widespread among the civic minded to assure a measure of disinterested service. Careers in public administration must have attached to them a prestige and an appeal equal to those of other professions.

If such wide participation is lacking, or (if present) is largely self-centered, then greed, graft, negativism, materialism, sensualism will quickly erode the quality of civic life. A nation will become a nation of cynics. A neutralism in a far wider sense than the so-called appeasement of the present time will set in, whenever the maintenance of moral values in international affairs involves sacrifices. Even more serious will be the gradual insidious spread of that death rattle of a society known as "anomie," the state of mind of a person who feels he has no stake in his state or community—who no longer, if indeed he ever did, warms to the appeal of patriotism. So buffeted has such a man been by society, so in vain has he looked to leadership for recognition, so preoccupied has he been with the mere struggle for existence, that the ties of obligation to, or even of companionship with, his fellows scarcely exist. Millions and millions in this day and age exhibit this tragic phenomenon.

I am speaking here of the need for responsible participation. By this I mean an affirmative attitude toward society, an attitude that places obligations at least on a par with rights; that in blunt and governmental terms expects to pay taxes in return for services; that in larger terms accepts and welcomes the opportunity to expend effort in behalf of the general welfare or the good of all.

Here lies a possible danger in the so-called "welfare state," even when created under the rituals of democracy, unless in some way it is buttressed by responsible citizenship. It was the late Ortega y Gasset in his brilliant work, The Revolt of the Masses, who first dramatized this danger. Europe of the twentieth century he saw as the product of giving the masses the voting franchise, without their first having a corresponding sense of responsibility. In such a setting, power goes to him who promises most and exacts least. That there is another and brighter side to this picture surely owes much to whatever forces there have been and be that make for self-reliance as a basis for social responsibility. The high degree of success of the cooperative movement illustrates the principle involved. So also do many of the striking achievements arising out of the intimacy of local self-government.

But are these and others akin to them enough? Framed in another fashion, is, for example, the widespread pluralism of our society enough to assure responsible participation through the educational value of the satisfying experiences, including the social prestige, the actual accomplishments and the consequent sense of significance, the pleasures of cooperative effort and association, which this pluralism engenders? I freely and happily concede the strength of these experiences. I believe they are growing. I also believe that their growth is at least in part undergirded or motivated by that sense of the imperious responsibility of the individual for his own conduct which we call conscience. Among the attributes of such conduct, none looms larger in religious teachings than social responsibility, the governmental facet of which is participation looking toward the general welfare.

It is at this point, for want of a better, that note should be taken of the educational implications of this attitude. Toward childhood there are special obligations, and among these obligations is the development of a civic mindedness. I see the end product, the development of the child into an adult able to stand on his own feet, and himself ready to participate responsibly in building the good society.

Given men with an outlook of this sort, inspired by inner conviction, reinforced daily by a search for the will of God for themselves as individuals, one need not fear government or statism. With open eyes we shall use government when it seems right so to do; we shall refuse to use it when the impairment of individual responsibility outweighs any seemingly greater opportunity for flourishing of personality, or where what men want exceeds that for which they are ready to pay or sacrifice. I recognize that this is a formula, a generality, which may seem to some to have little concrete guidance to offer in the day-to-day issues of government. Yet I am saying that I have complete faith in the democratic process, if and when the conflict of issues is between those who believe it is God's will to use the state as a positive instrument for the betterment of society, and those who fear that such use will undermine the individual's responsibility before God to accept his share and more than his share of the world's work.

The reconciliation of these often incompatible objectives has been a preoccupation of the political theorist since the days of the Greeks. The religious faith of the Western world has potentialities in this reconciliation, for in this faith the individual is end and not means—but an end which includes responsible participating citizenship as not the least of its attributes. Without this faith or its equivalent (and where is this "equivalent" to be found?), I fear many things: the self-centered use of political power, indifference to political action, a footloose, aimless society, reluctance to accept civic responsibility. What are these but cancers eating away at the vitals of our Western world, archenemies of the democracy which we hold as a common and would-be fighting faith.

There is a third motive or principle necessary to sustain democracy. All definitions of democracy have at least this in common: they agree that discussion preceding decision (and, for that matter, free and critical discussion following a decision) is one of its major attributes. If such a discussion is to be full and free, if ideas are to win their way in the market place of reason, then characteristic institutions such as a free press, free communications, open sessions of parliaments and chambers and congresses, judicial processes allowing a man his "day in court" are corollaries. New institutions may be needed, better devised to bring technical competence to bear upon decisions or better able to clarify issues. But these are not primary.

What is the primary need is a certain assumption of integrity, the assumption that when a man advances an idea or makes a statement which he expects will influence the decisions of others concerning a governmental problem, he is telling the truth. There may well be "another side" to a question, but as far as it goes his statement is not a lie. And if in the market place of ideas, it turns out not to stand up under criticism, because of either superficiality or error, he must not expect the attention in the future he received in the past. In the long run we live governmentally by ideas grounded in experience arising from experiment. In this setting men advocate or oppose the various measures lying within the discussible sphere of state action. This is the governmental, the democratic counterpart of the scientific method; the extension into the field of politics of the laboratory method, the objectivity of the pure scientist. Party line, the Communist substitute for truth, is unthinkable.

What shall be the sanctions of integrity; what its motivating force? Shall we rely wholly or even primarily upon "the market place of ideas," when a primary objective of naked power has always been to control the avenues of communication? The ultimate sanctions are internal; the drive toward honor is of the spirit. Here again the voice of authority speaks, "Let your Yea be Yea, and your Nay, Nay." Jesus by spirit and example unmasked hypocrisy and deceit. He ever sought in simplicity, clarity, and guilelessness to isolate the heart of the matter in each and every issue of life. There are problems in today's government, economy, and society incomparably more complex than any in Christ's day. The facts that must be brought to bear upon the solution of these problems are sometimes so vast as to stagger the imagination. This very situation offers a greater and greater temptation to indulge in propaganda or, worse, to use specious arguments, to appeal to emotion and not to reason. The democratic process of discussion seems at times to falter or fail. One must not underestimate the force of the example and command of Jesus to His myriad followers today, as among the forces making for that substantial and necessary increment of integrity in discussion which must be added to democratic institutions to make them work.

The fourth prerequisite for a successfully functioning democracy carries one into the economic order.

We all know that the industrial age has brought with it specialization, and that this specialization has divided men into various economic groups—labor, industry, finance, the professions, agriculture, and others—and that these great groups are subdivided, sometimes sharply so, into all sorts of sub-groups: coal miners, bankers, physicians, dairy farmers, steel manufacturers, and literally thousands of others. These form the warp and woof of our economic life. We appreciate the extent to which they likewise characterize and at times dominate our political life as well. Each of these groups more or less lives in its own limited world; its members experience the same frustrations, enjoy the same advantages, and thus have come to a considerable extent to share the same political point of view, which in turn diverges to a greater or less extent from that held by other groups. In the United States these divergent points of view of this multitude of economic groups are the greatest single phenomenon in what we call politics and public opinion. Their group insistences furnish much, perhaps most, of the agenda of government. For these groups have long since learned that government intervention can be one of the most powerful tools in improving their economic status, or in bringing success to one side or the other in the economic struggle. Hence pressures for laws to promote their special interests. In fact, a cynic once defined politics as "the battle of interests masquerading as principles."

Still closer examination reveals that much of the consequent legislation of the present day consists of two parts: the declaration of an objective in behalf of a particular group or groups, and the creation of an agency in the bureaucracy to carry out this objective. The means chosen call for continuous intervention in the economic order on the part of the agency, so as to safeguard or advance the status of the economic groups whose political pressures brought the agency into existence, and which are now its clientele.

Neither in the economic nor in the political activity of these groups is there any inherent identity between group interests and national welfare. There is much that does so coincide, but it is largely unintended. Moreover, there is constant conflict between the aims of two or more groups, and it is not unusual for a government actually to pursue contradictory policies simultaneously as the result of rival pressures. To such a society of conflicting groups we apply the term "dispersive" and a government of which this is the predominant characteristic we call the "dispersive" state.

This state of affairs presents a very serious threat to the public interest. In their extreme form these group pressures may almost literally tear to pieces the body politic and economic. During the decade of the 30's, and earlier in some nations, they represented a basic political obstacle to effective dealing with the economic depression. Even today, they present a formidable hazard to fiscal solvency and national security. While in time of war appeals to patriotism are usually enough to induce groups to sink the extremes of their self-interest, in time of peace civic and social loyalties falter and rationalizations of selfishness take their place. The dictatorships of Hitler and Mussolini were in part the irrational responses to situations of this type.

There is a striking statement of St. Paul which is relevant at this point: "For the body is not one member, but many. If the foot shall say: Because I am not the hand, I am not of the body; is it therefore not of the body? And if the ear shall say, because I am not the eye, I am not of the body; is it therefore not of the body? If the whole body were an eye, where were the hearing? If the whole were hearing, where were the smelling? . . . But now are they many members, yet but one body. And the eye cannot say unto the hand, I have no need of you. . . . And whether one member suffer, all the members suffer with it; or one member be honored, all the members rejoice with it.'

The analogy goes to the heart of the problem. Each group performs a specialized function; society as a whole receives the benefit. Essentially this is the Christian insight which gives meaning to daily work. Whether the organizing mechanism of such an economy is found in the institutions of capitalism (which personally I prefer on practical grounds), the cooperative commonwealth, or socialism, or a mixture of all three is a question of expediency, and is largely irrelevant to the central problem. This problem, I repeat, is the discovery of an altruistic motivation so powerful, that the various economic groups will make the necessary sacrifices to dedicate themselves to the common good—and do this freely. Dictatorships, despairing of this ever being freely done, control the media of communication, and impose their solutions. A democracy whose economic groups and peoples have freedom but lack altruism is weak at its very heart and may well be doomed.

Adam Smith and the group utilitarianism which is his contemporary adaptation present economic fallacies and political hazards. In all history only patriotism and religion among the passions of men have ever been powerful enough on a scale large enough to weld an economic order into a unified, cooperative, viable whole. The greater the crisis, the more nearly patriotism by itself has revealed fascist tendencies. I freely grant that motive, however pure, is not enough; and that a disciplined knowledge of the economic order must accompany even an altruistically proposed solution. Yet if freedom is to be an element in that solution, team play must by definition be voluntary—and hence a matter of motive. We know enough now to know the limitations of an exclusive reliance upon price and the free play of the market as regulators. Far too large a portion of the economy is privately as well as publicly 'administered' to allow this. The layman's supreme expression of his religion may well be vocational, and such expression should be an effective aid to a service-oriented economy.

In the fifth place, the office holder, be he elected or appointed, occupies a key place in contemporary society. Leadership seems destined to be more and more concentrated. As life baffles more and more of us, there is an almost inevitable tendency to seek for and to follow the man who gives us the impression of adequacy. Such may be the demagogue whose noises coincide with our own prejudices. Such may also be the elected leader of character who moves surely, strongly, among the manifold problems and pitfalls of a world in disorder. Then, too, the sphere of government is enormously extended. This is true, not only of overt state action, but even more of the far wider sphere in which governmental decisions affect or influence decisions in what is technically the sector of private industry or spontaneous social behavior.

Moreover, the "mysteries" of technology and specialization multiply the opportunities of the office holder unobserved to behave irresponsibly through inertia, self-seeking, and undetected error.

Hunger for power, carelessness, self-seeking, intrigue, corruption—these hold dangers for our democracies, if once they come to characterize our men in public life. In the more simple days—of, shall we say, Restoration England or the period of Boss Tweed or the Grant administration in the United States—betrayals of public trust more crass and despicable in themselves than those of today did not have the far-reaching consequences which today follow a lowering of the tone of public life.

I recognize the secular factors making for civic righteousness, and I would not underrate them. I know the white heat of contemporary publicity that spares no nook or cranny even of the private life of any man who stands (or runs) for high public office. I know the growing professionalization and long, arduous technical training that are strengthening the whole field of public administration. I know the checks and safeguards of audit and accounting. Yet if the spark be lacking, the fire of public service cannot be kindled.

Recruiting, training, and retention of key administrators are serious problems in the United States. This is not a matter of salaries. Rather, the difficulty is to provide adequate alternative motivation in a situation far too often marked by frustration, buffeting, and even persecution. Relationships between administrators and Congress require a drastic and disciplined rethinking. An essential mutual respect is too often lacking. It would much more often be present if the spirit of public service could be assumed to pervade all parties concerned. Here surely is a special and important instance of what we have discussed above, namely, the necessity for free acceptance of an overriding public interest. "He that is greatest among you, let him be the servant of all," is a religious insight; it is also a governmental one.

The intellectual abstractions of pure reason may be adequate for the highly educated few, though even this is open to question. They are not adequate for the overwhelming majority who for a greater or less portion of their lives are moved by passion. Basically, the problem of a democracy is one of the acceptance of attitudes and customs which will channel passion into constructive lines. A social psychologist might state the problem as one of so canalizing man's inborn and acquired drives that personal satisfaction results from their socially desirable expression. Sublimation is frequently involved. Patriotism is one of the ways chosen, but Mussolini and Hitler revealed the distortions which such a channelling of passion could achieve. It must never be lost sight of that patriotism is agnostic as regards the nature of the individual, and in the modern industrialized state is never by itself very far from fascist overtones. There really remains then only a conditioned humanitarianism as an adequate and safe outlet for passion, and only religion has historically been able to evoke this on a sufficiently wide scale to be effective. The record of religion itself is ambivalent on the point. Only when one turns, not to religion's institutional expression, but to its fundamental teachings, does one perceive that in such concepts as "finding one's life by losing it," or "the abundant life," when these are coupled with a recognition of the infinite value of each human being, are there the necessary guide lines which can canalize passion in the direction of love for others. This, in ways too numerous and obvious to mention, can find remarkable outlet in a pluralistic democracy. In fact, such a democracy is virtually a prerequisite to those attitudes which will generate this constructive passion on any scale widespread enough to be reasonably adequate for an awakening individualism.

A final prerequisite for the present atomic age is an attitude toward humanity that transcends nationalism. It will not have to be argued with the vast majority of readers that the old loyalties of the nineteenth century are inadequate to the mid-twentieth century. The indivisibility of at least the free world is axiomatic, if for no other reason than its sharing of a common menace. It is not beyond the bounds of reason to say that the time may be not too far distant in which the free world and the iron curtain world may both see an uncontrolled science as their common enemy, an enemy so awful as to threaten both alike with destruction. In such a setting a widespread, deeply felt belief in world brotherhood may well be required, especially in the free world. Our greater strength may tempt us to forget our common humanity with the enslaved and deluded millions allegedly our enemies. Moreover, out from the more developed peoples of the free world there must flow to the underdeveloped peoples of other races and continents assistance in their self-emancipation from ignorance, disease, poverty, colonialism, exploitation, race discrimination, terror. Some of this help will continue to be through missionaries. Some will be through industry, capital and labor alike. More and more such aid is apparently destined to be governmental. This I take it is the meaning of the Technical Assistance Program under the United Nations, the Colombo Plan, the Point IV Program.

What then is to be the underlying philosophy of these international relations? Are they to be largely dominated, as in the past, by power politics, by search for economic advantage, by the diplomacy of self-interest? If so, I see no end to the tragic and ever more disastrous cycle of wars interspersed by periods of suspicion and struggle.

These are a few, inadequate suggestions on a theme too vast and complicated to be handled in brief compass. The central hypothesis is clear. It is that on the international front in its major relationships an inexorable series of events is forcing the necessity of widespread acceptance of inter-national obligations, which require a sense, a feeling, a conviction of a common humanity pervading the leadership and followership of the stronger nations especially. The broad horizons of Isaiah, the supra-national teachings of Jesus, the belief that we are all "children of a common Father"—by attitudes such as these are men convinced and inspired.

II

Let us summarize the course of argument thus far before considering certain probable rejoinders.

We have too often been content to treat the forms of government as being the heart of government. We have not looked to the substance. When we do look to the substance we find that the motives of men hold the key. I take it that the overwhelming majority of the readers subscribe to the democratic way. Do we see the price to be paid for its survival, over and above military strength or economic health? I submit the following as the necessary attitudes to sustain democratic institutions:

1. Love for and belief in freedom: best based upon belief in the sacredness of the individual as a child of God.

2. Active and constructive participation in community life: best based upon the obligation of the Christian, the Jew, and other believers to accept responsibilities, cooperating with and working for their brother men.

3. Integrity in discussion: best based upon the inner light of truth being primary in a world God meant to be righteous.

4. The freely assumed obligation of economic groups to serve society; best based upon the Christian insight into the nature of society as set forth, for example, by the parable of the body and its members.

5. Leadership and office holding regarded as public trusts: best based upon or inspired by the example and teachings of religious prophets, such as Jesus, who accepted such a service "to the death."

6. Attitudes assuring that passion will be channeled into constructive ends: best based upon religious faiths that unite an obligation to love and serve with a recognition of the primacy of individual personality.

7. Friendliness and cooperation among nations: best based upon the vision of world brotherhood derived from a faith that we are all children of a common Heavenly Father.

I freely grant that many of these attitudes would be helpful also to non-democratic forms of government, especially the fifth. I seriously doubt, however, that at least the basis of any of them could have anything but the most precarious existence except in a democracy.

The basic difference among the participants in this symposium is not so much as to the prerequisites in attitudes for democratic survival and flourishing, as it is with regard to the means by which such attitudes may be attained. As to the attitudes themselves, there are, of course, some differences, mostly in emphasis rather than in selection. The means to be employed constitute the core of the inquiry; they are the basic factors in disagreement. Consequently a few words are in order concerning critiques of the religious approach.

In the first place, does education constitute an alternative? This is the implicit assumption of the positivist, although the latter denies the validity of values except that of knowledge itself. In such a vacuum of values, and even more of the sanctions and motivations thereof, men have used their "emancipation" as an invitation to exploit as much as to serve. Moreover, positivism is essentially descriptive and not normative. The resultant relativism in morality is intrinsically a denial of any contemporary "categorical imperative." This pulls the rug out from under the resisters to totalitarianism. As Thomas Cook has so well said, it tempts the wise to deny freedom to the foolish<sup>1</sup>—and who is "wise"? Education is a part truth. Fact is a prerequisite to intelligent action; meaning is needed to assure that such action shall be humanistically oriented.

Cook would find such meaning and motivation in the "essence of man." Northrup would find norms in a philosophic interpretation of the natural sciences. Parnock seeks his in conditions giving rise to a healthy society of healthy personalities, chiefly institutional. Plamenatz urges pragmatic self-interest, but the self-interest of an essentially moral man.

Against such impressive and intellectually appealing counter-proposals I would urge two points. In the first place, I see little likelihood—far less likelihood than in the case of religion—of any or all of them gaining sufficient mass acceptance to prove effective, certainly within the time allowed. The second point is that I regard them, not as alternatives to the religious approach, but as co-partners. If the religious hypothesis is intellectually sound, then each of these becomes an aspect of it, arguing that man, by nature, is "created in the image of God," and hence in "essence" is democratic; that experience will reveal the satisfying nature of the democratic way; that the natural world is a part of the evolving purpose of a "good" God and reveals His nature; that the healthy personality is the one possessed of "inner peace" and the institutions sustaining a healthy society are the natural expression of the kind of religious faith I propose.

Actually Plamenatz offers, not so much an alternative, as his critique of the religious hypothesis. He calls attention to the acceptance by the early Christians of slavery and the absolute power of the Emperor, and rightly says that they were as sincerely Christian as those of today. He also says that they were as unequally Christian; but this I question. The centuries have brought their deeper insights, and the frontier of the understanding of the consequences of Christ's teachings has moved steadily onward until it now embraces fields of social action and community life of which the early Christians never dreamed.

Then, too, Plamenatz would distinguish between the theological view of the value of the human soul and the judicial and political expressions of the individualism of the good democrat. He concedes an historical nexus; he questions a logical one. It is at this point that I would make more explicit my concept of derivatives and corollaries. The rights and duties of a free man derive from his nature; they must be expressed (among other areas) in political and judicial institutions. My argument stands or falls on whether my reasoning has established this derivative character of rights and duties. I find no corresponding doctrine of origins in Plamenatz' reasoning.

Perhaps a "sense of justice" may be a broken reed as regards the sustaining of democracy, as Plamenatz suggests; but if it is so, this is by virtue of the absence of an accepted norm, theological or otherwise, which holds democratic values as absolutes. Pragmatic self-interest does not appear to me to be an adequate substitute.

<sup>1</sup> Thomas I. Cook, "The Prospects of Political Science," Journal of Politics, Vol. 17, pp. 265-74 (May, 1955).

I find most persuasive Plamentaz' reasoning as to the necessity of public confidence and his acutely drawn distinction between confidence in leaders and confidence in the democratic system—and the priority of the latter. I agree with him that charisma is a dangerous substitute.

Is my religious hypothesis intellectually sound? This is neither the time nor place to argue at length. I only suggest that in the contemporary world, a fair definition of faith is "a willingness to act on probabilities." I myself feel that the Hebrew-Christian faiths come under such a heading. I believe further that there is a not inconsiderable possibility that, especially in the leadership of the democracies and to a considerable extent among the rank and file, at least in the United States and Western Germany, there is a growing commitment to this faith in action.

Of the six nations which we submitted were decisive in the health of democracy, five—the United States, Great Britain, France, Germany, Italy—are Christian or Jewish-Christian in their tradition. The sixth, Japan, is Shinto, and this philosophy sustains some but not all of the prerequisites.<sup>2</sup>

Religion by nature is an absolute. It encompasses passion as well as reason. It undergirds with the "will of God" the attitudes and mores we have mentioned. Will anything less suffice as a cultural prerequisite for sustaining a democratic socio-political order? If not, for which religions may we claim adequacy to sustain the democratic way? These are coldly objective questions. Let those who resist the author's line of reasoning and conclusions, at least face the obligation to answer them.

ERNEST S. GRIFFITH.

B

The cultural conditions of successful democracy in the United States are not the same as in the forest cantons of Switzerland, nor are they what they were in the Athens of Pericles. Though democracy is more than a system of government, it is also a system of government. It is a set of political institutions together with the manners and morals, the ways of thinking and feeling, that go with those institutions. We may set greater store by what goes with the institutions than by the institutions themselves, but the institutions are what we most easily see and what we can most readily describe. It is therefore by reference to them that we define what goes with them. By the cultural prerequisites of democracy we mean the ways of thinking and feeling that go naturally with democratic institutions. This natural association does not mean that, wherever we find the institutions, we find their psychological and moral counterpart, but rather that the two, where they coexist, sustain one another, and that neither is enduring except where it can lean heavily on the other. The connection between them is unlike the connection between mind and body as either theology or science describes it. For theology gives to the mind or soul what is virtually a total independence of the body, making the link between them external and temporary; whereas science so describes the relations between them that it is impossible to conceive how either could be what it is except in the most intimate connection with the other. But political institutions can sometimes survive their moral and cultural conditions for some considerable time, and so too can these conditions survive them. In this case, both "body" and "soul" are mortal, and neither is lusty and strong without the other; but they are not always born nor do they die at the same moment, nor even always in quick succession.

<sup>2</sup> Note its shortcomings under 1, 3, and 7 above.

The vast democracy of the modern industrial state, whether American, French, or British, is not Athenian democracy; and the cultural conditions of its success are by no means the same. In discussing these conditions there is perhaps no need to discuss the institutions that make possible the vast democracies of today; but there is a need to keep them constantly in mind. And that for two reasons. For, unless we do so, how can we distinguish what makes for successful democracy from what makes for success in other kinds of government? And how can we distinguish belief in democracy and in the ends it serves from the habits of thought and feeling that make democracy work? There are peoples whose passion for freedom and justice is strong and sincere and who are yet not good democrats. They want what democrats want, they condemn what democrats condemn, they hate servility, they respect privacy they desire equality. All that democrats praise is attractive to them. They try to practice democracy, but they find it does not give them what it seemed to promise. They lose faith in it, not because they have ceased to want what democracy promises, but because they have ceased to believe that democracy can provide it. They have the ideals but not the temper and the habits of democrats. It would be foolish to accuse them of servility; they are as suspicious of power and as eager for freedom as anyone. If they are not free, it is not because their desire for freedom is weak but because they fail to work the institutions which alone can give freedom in the large industrial societies of the modern world. It is one thing to desire freedom and to accept the democratic ideal; it is quite another to have the moral preferences and habits that make democratic institutions function properly. It seems to me that, among the nations of European stock, the Latins have as strong a passion for freedom and as deep a respect for personal integrity as the English-speaking peoples; they are as strongly attracted by the ideals that democracy is intended to serve. But they have not, except the French, shown much aptitude for democracy. What people on earth are less servile, more suspicious of power, more jealous of personal independence, than the Spaniards, who have never known genuine democracy?

No doubt, there is something—and that something is important—common to all kinds of democracy, to American democracy and to the democracy of the small city-state. But the differences between them are perhaps greater than the similarities. That is yet another reason for keeping the institutions of modern democracy very much in mind. Administrative problems and administrative methods have a great deal in common in all large modern states, democratic or dictatorial. A modern industrial society cannot function unless all its adult members are literate. The modern state is concerned with its citizens more variously and more constantly than any state before it; it is concerned not only with their needs but with their minds, with all their reactions to itself. This state, democratic or not, seeks to win the active allegiance of its subjects, to work upon their minds and their feelings. A Roosevelt, a Stalin, and a Hitler have not only similar administrative, economic, and military problems to solve; they have also to use broadly similar devices to serve people's needs and to evoke from them the responses they look for. The methods of government are similar, not so much because the states they govern are large—for Chinese, Indian, Roman, and Russian emperors have ruled states larger or as large—as because their subjects are literate and belong to societies more intricate, mobile, and quickly-changing than any before them. The modernity of the modern state consists largely in this, that, however tyrannical it may in fact be, it cannot govern unless it uses many of the instruments and devices invented or adapted by liberals and democrats for the service of liberty, and unless it invokes at least some of the ideals of democracy. There is a sense in which every modern state is either a genuine or a false democracy. It is so even when its rulers expressly renounce democracy. Hitler and Mussolini did not, like the Bolsheviks, forbid democracy in practice while loudly proclaiming that their system of government was at bottom more democratic than what the West called democracy. On the contrary, they repudiated democracy. Yet they could not rule except behind a façade which often looked like an imitation of democracy; they could not do so in spite of the contempt they openly expressed for democracy. Modern tyranny, in some obvious ways, is more like modern democracy than either is like the systems which, in earlier times, went by the same names.

I

If we do not bear in mind the institutions of modern democracy, we are in danger, when we discuss its cultural prerequisites, of misapprehending the truth, or at least of falling short of it. Let me give an example. Hardly anyone will disagree with Griffith when he says that "respect for individual personality" is essential to democracy. There are even enemies of democracy who admit it. This respect, they say, is indeed essential to democracy, if democracy is to be genuine and enduring; but democracy, they hasten to add, does not really promote it, and probably cannot do so under modern conditions. For, today, government is impossible except through the exploitation of mass opinion and mass emotion, and this exploitation saps the moral autonomy of the individual. Modern society dwarfs its members, and the few that it exalts, it also debases, making demagogues of them, cynical players of stereotyped and vulgar parts.

We need not agree with these critics. The management of men has seldom been a scrupulous or clean business, either in small and simple societies or in vast and complex ones. The stench of corrupt monarchy or aristocracy is quite as nasty as the stench of corrupt democracy. Nor is it true that large societies are more apt to be oppressive and vulgar and inhibiting than small ones. At least we have no evidence that it must be so. But, though we need not agree with these critics who say that the very size of modern democracy defeats its purpose, we must press the question further: what is this "respect for individual personality" essential to modern democracy? Is it the old Greek respect for vitality and self-assertiveness, for the man who can play a fine part in the world, who can attract the admiration of his fellows? Is it the Christian sense that every soul is infinitely valuable in the eyes of God? Both the Greeks and the early Christians accepted slavery and the subjection of women. Were the Christians of the Roman Empire less deeply and less sincerely Christian than they are today? Yet they loyally accepted the absolute power of the Emperor in all temporal matters, and refused him nothing except a worship which they felt was due to God alone. Can we say that Christians, when they are democrats, are, if not more sincerely, then more adequately Christian than when they are not democrats? Surely, we ought to say nothing of the kind. When we are tempted to do so, it is, I think, only because we happen to be both Christians and democrats, who like to see a close connection logical and psychological, between our two faiths. But in themselves these faiths neither exclude nor suppose one another. The good Christian believes in the "infinite value" of the human soul; and the good democrat believes in what he calls individualism. But a good Christian need not be a democrat, nor a good democrat a Christian. It may well be, since modern democracy first arose among Christian peoples, that there are important historical connections between democratic ideals and Christian theology and ethics. It does not, however, follow that the individualism of the democrat and that of the Christian have much in common.

The individualism of the democrat, the sentiment which must be widespread and strong if democracy is to endure and to function properly, is a respect for the right of every man to order his life as he pleases provided he admits the same right in others. It is, indeed, more than that; for it has a less general, a less abstract side to it. It is a sense that, among all the positive rights and duties which a man has in modern society, some are more sacred than others because on them, more than on the others, depends his ability to be himself, to order his life according to his own notions of what it should be. No man's freedom is unlimited, for he must live in society with other men. Whatever his strength or his talents, he is much more dependent on the others collectively than they on him. The faith of the true democrat is that freedom should be as great as possible, that it should not be greater for some than for others, and that men's duties to one another follow from their fundamental right to freedom. These duties are, indeed, a kind of service to freedom, for, except where they are loyally done, the community cannot preserve the freedom of its members.

This individualism of the modern democrat is different both from the love of freedom of the ancient Greeks and from the Christian sense that the value of every human soul is infinite. It is love of a freedom differently conceived from the freedom dear to the Athenians, who cared so much less than we do for privacy, for every man's right to make for himself a world of his own in the larger world he shares with others. In a rough and general way, the individualism of the modern democrat can be defined without reference to democratic institutions; it is respect for certain rights called fundamental because, unless men have them, they cannot be free, and respect also for duties which must not be neglected if those rights are to be made good. But these rights cannot be fully and adequately defined except in relation to the judicial and political processes which make them actual: in other words, except in relation to democratic institutions.

The Greeks, it has often been observed, lacked our modern conception of rights and therefore our notion of freedom. Not even the Athenians had it. Their courts of law were different from ours in both spirit and procedure; they were less scrupulous, less judicial, less anxious that strict justice should be done to the individual even in defiance of public opinion and of the feelings of his neighbors. The Athenians, too, were individualists, but in a sense that is not quite ours. They lived more publicly, more under the eyes of their neighbors; they cared much less than we do, not only for privacy, but also for the kind of family life centered round the mother, which is the most intimate and personal of all. Athens, for our taste, was too much with the Athenian, who was less concerned than we are to protect the citizen from the state, to define and elaborate his rights as a private person, as a man seeking to make the best of his life according to his own lights. The Athenian was more concerned with man as a citizen than as a creature who, ordinary though he may seem to others, is always unique even among his own kind, a self separate from other selves and with its own peculiar way to make through the world. Athens was perhaps better able than the modern state to possess its citizens entirely without degrading and frustrating them. But today the democrat feels that, if he is to call his soul his own, if he is to preserve dignity and self-respect, he must be jealous of his privacy, he must guard his own little world against the state; he must do so in mere spiritual self-defense. To him, therefore, much more than to the Athenian, the state is a means and not an end.

II

After respect for personal rights, for privacy and independence, I should put, as a cultural prerequisite of democracy, respect for law, for judicial and political processes, not for their own sake, but as means to security and freedom. This, too, is something to be defined more particularly if it is to be shown how exactly it is a condition of democracy. I do not speak of respect for law merely as such. For that kind of respect has existed in many societies that were not democratic. What I speak of is the respect for law resulting from the love of freedom; it is a respect for the judicial and political processes which, in a large and intricate society, are known to be conditions of freedom. These processes are elaborate and difficult to describe. Most people do not, indeed cannot, understand them in the way that the professional student of politics or law tries to do; they cannot describe how they function. But they can acquire a considerable familiarity with them, and can understand the need for them, putting their true value on them. These processes preserve order and protect liberty, and yet do not prevent change. They make change easy and acceptable provided it is carried out according to definite rules.

This kind of respect for law is altogether different from respect for organized power and established authority; it is rooted in the love of freedom and the sense of justice of a community of equals and not in the mere need for order. This love of freedom is a lively sense that authority is tolerable only because it gives men what they most want and value, what they, and not those in authority over them, think is good for them; and it contains within it the understanding that freedom depends on law, which is an elaborate structure created over a long period of time, a structure more easily destroyed than rebuilt.

Like Pennock, I should put a high value on respect for law, for the "rules," for established judicial and legal processes, as a cultural prerequisite of democracy. I should distinguish this respect for law from the respect for custom of primitive communities, from respect for mere authority, and also from respect for justice in the more general sense. For this respect for law, as distinguished from respect for custom or abstract justice, is associated with a sophisticated conception of government as a changing means to changing ends, an instrument adaptable to human purposes, and which yet must not be adapted arbitrarily. It is constitutionalism of a kind which hardly existed in the Middle Ages and which first became powerful among Europeans, especially in England and in the English colonies across the Atlantic, in the seventeenth century.

This constitutionalism, or respect for a body of precise and intricate rules that preserve acquired liberties, is not to be confused with the mere love of order or with respect for authority. Respect for authority is habit or admiration of power or flows from the need of security; it is passive and unenterprising, looking to government for protection and guidance, and for little more. In itself, it is not evil or contemptible; and yet, unmixed with other motives, it seems, at least to people accustomed to democracy, a little base, a little servile.

Nor is constitutionalism merely a sense of justice. In all societies that are orderly, that are not a prey to anarchy, there is a strong sense of justice; there are rights and duties which almost everyone ordinarily respects or performs. We cannot say that this sense of justice is stronger in democracies than under other forms of government, nor even that democracies are more dependent on it than autocracies or oligarchies. Even in societies on the brink of civil war, there is usually a deep sense of justice. For men who willingly take up arms against their fellow-countrymen usually have strong moral motives for doing so; their sense of justice is deeply offended by the claims of the other party. It was not want of a sense of justice that brought the Americans to fratricidal war in the 1860's or the English in the 1640's. Nor, on the other hand, need differences of opinion about justice, even very deep differences, lead to civil war.

In few countries in Europe have inequalities of wealth and opportunity been greater than in England in past centuries. The poor, during the last century, ceased, perhaps for the first time, to accept these inequalities as right or inevitable, as their ancestors had always done. They acquired notions of justice profoundly different from those of their masters, notions which the entire structure of existing society daily outraged. They became radicals. Their conception of justice was surely more profoundly different from that of the privileged classes than, say, the conception of John Pym and John Hampden from that of the Cavaliers who fought for Charles I. Certainly, as great a political, and a much greater social, revolution happened in England in the nineteenth than in the seventeenth century; and wherever there is change on that scale and at that speed there are sharp clashes of interest and profound differences of opinion about the essentials of justice. These differences were not less sharp and profound in Victorian England than in the France of the July Monarchy, the Second Empire, and the Third Republic. Yet, whereas in the England of the Stuarts and in nineteenth-century France, there were civil wars and dictatorships, in the England of Victoria there was peaceful and, compared with all previous ages, rapid and many-sided change.

This happened, not because the English under Victoria were more united than they had been in previous ages, or than the French then were, about the essentials of justice. It happened because the English ruling classes were already strongly constitutional in temper, because they had a system of government that admitted change, because they were used to compromise, to frequent and peaceful political victories and defeats according to accepted rules, and because at least some of them were won over to the cause of the poor and the voteless. They gave way reluctantly but they had learnt how to give way; they gave way gradually and voluntarily, and were never humiliated or driven into exile or into the political wilderness; they were never turned into class enemies of the new England which, little by little, deprived them of most of their privileges.

This respect for law, for judicial and political processes known to be conditions of freedom, was at first confined to the ruling classes. The common people had only the more primitive respect for custom and established authority, and also conceptions of justice which, in the age of Victoria, were fast changing and causing them to make demands of a kind never before made on the wealthy and powerful. Because their rulers found it possible to make one concession after another to them, and because the privileges of the well-born and the rich were gradually extended to other classes, the common people acquired in time as strong a respect for law as their rulers had. They had always, like every people everywhere, had a strong sense of justice; and they had always, like the poor and humble in most places at most times, treated their superiors with deference. They had for centuries loved tradition and respected authority. But their conception of justice had changed quickly in a few decades, and this change, far from strengthening, had at first greatly weakened their love of tradition and their respect for authority. What they acquired, as a result of the peaceful and rapid concessions made to them, was a respect for law more sophisticated and refined than they had had before. The mass of the English people, from being the law-enduring servants of aristocracy, became the law-respecting citizens of democracy. I speak only of the English people because I happen to know them best, but I suspect that there was a similar course of events in the English-speaking parts of America, which were also, in the past, much more aristocratic than democratic, though aristocratic in a rather different way from the old world.

III

Among the seven prerequisites of democracy described by Griffith are a sense of obligation to take part in the business of government and a sense that public office is a public trust. I agree that these are both important conditions of success for democracy, though the second (the sense that public office is a public trust) is not less important to other systems. The prestige of the Prussian monarchy depended largely on it, and the absence or comparative weakness of it was not least among the causes that destroyed the old monarchy in France. It might even be argued that this second condition is more important in undemocratic than in democratic systems, for freedom to those who have learned to value it, will not seem too dearly bought even at the price of considerable corruption and inefficiency. And in any case, corruption and inefficiency, being less easily hidden in democracies than elsewhere have a way of seeming greater. The appearance of virtue is best preserved in the absence of criticism.

The difficulty about Griffith's first condition is that, in the modern world, it is not possible for the ordinary citizen to take more than a very small part in the business of government. There must always be, in a large state, however democratic, a small minority active in government and a large, almost passive majority. No doubt, where democracy is genuine the small part which the large majority take in government is vitally important, making all the difference. Because that part is what it is, all the other parts, the whole-time parts of the professionals, are altogether different from what they would otherwise be. It is not at all the same thing to be a civil servant, or a party official, or a trade union leader, or a spokesman for some pressure-group or professional body, in a democracy as in an undemocratic state. Only a small part of the people take a large and active part in government, only a few have any chance or perhaps much desire of getting power; but the terms on which those few compete for power, and get it, and keep it when they have it, are altogether different because the part in government of the vast majority the small and occasional part, is what it is.

There are local as well as central governments, but in the large industrial state, nearly all important decisions are taken at the center. Local autonomies ought to be preserved as far as they can be, but it matters even more that those who hold power at the center should be quickly responsive to the many demands and needs of the people, and should deal justly between them. Even in federal states, where local autonomies are the greatest, only a small part of the people devote much of their time to public business, national or local. Where too much is required of the people, where they are asked to elect to too many offices or to make too many separate decisions, there is always the danger that they will not do what is asked of them, that they will in fact (though not in law) surrender the right to elect and to decide to party officials of whom they may know nothing. In the United States, the people generally, if we consider the number of times they cast votes, take a much larger part in government than they do in England. Yet I have heard it said by Americans that in America there is more political apathy than in England. Nor is it obvious that frequency of voting makes for greater public spirit and honesty in civil servants and politicians. What matters more, I venture to think, is that the issues put before the people should be as clear as circumstances allow, and that their votes should be decisive.

I began this section by saying that I agreed with Griffith, and have ever since been arguing as if I did not agree. I must make my meaning clearer. For democracy to function properly, it is not necessary for all the people all the time to take a large part in government, but it is necessary that there should be, among all sections of the people, a considerable number willing to be active on behalf of the class, community, or profession they belong to. The politically active minority should be drawn from every class and section of the community, and no one should be excluded from that minority except by failure to win the confidence of the group on whose behalf he wishes to be active. The politically active minority should be infinitely various, strongly competitive among themselves, and never united as a single body against the mass of the people.

To call this minority an élite is to misunderstand its function in a democracy. It does not consist of persons who, by any standard generally accepted or indeed capable of definition, are wiser or better than other people; it consists only of persons who engage in the many kinds of activity called political because they either are governmental activities or are closely connected with government. Within this minority there are politicians, civil servants, judges, soldiers, policemen, and other public servants, and there are also the spokesmen of innumerable groups, professional, industrial, and cultural. These people, like all other sections of the community, have their professional standards, which in a democracy, as in any other political system, are affected by and affect the working of the entire system. The system works, not because these people, this minority, understand how it works, in the sense that they could describe its working, but because they all commonly behave in the ways that make it work. The successful working of the system is not deliberately aimed at by those who work it but is the result of their behaving as they do.

Soldiers, policemen, judges, civil servants, and all the spokesmen of industrial, cultural, and professional groups have, in every large modern state, broadly the same kinds of work to do. But when the state is democratic they do it in an entirely different spirit. Democracy makes subordinates less servile to their superiors. It also exposes everyone engaged at all prominently in public affairs to kinds of criticism unknown elsewhere. The fears and the hopes of politicians, public servants, trade union leaders, and captains of industry are, in a democracy, otherwise directed. Authority, merely as such, means a good deal less to them, and public opinion a good deal more. Loyalty to the community, in a democracy less than in other systems, means obedience to immediate superiors. It is, I think, this capacity to distinguish between loyalty and obedience, this devotion to law and to a way of life rather than to persons, or corporate bodies, or doctrines, that distinguishes the servants of democracy—or, rather, of constitutional government, which, for reasons I have not here space to go into, can scarcely be anything but democratic in the vast industrial state of today—from all other public servants.

Where holders of public office—using that word in the broadest sense to include the leaders of all groups seeking to exert political influence as well as persons actively engaged in government—have this spirit (and the democratic system tends to develop it in them) the people have a different kind of confidence in their rulers from the confidence of undemocratic peoples. No doubt, in all countries, the people like to idolize their favorites; but in a democracy those favorites are continuously subject to the criticism of political enemies. Their power is never secure. Even at the height of their popularity, they can be dismissed from power, as Winston Churchill was in 1945. Churchill was never spoken of more warmly and gratefully than during the election campaign of 1945, which he lost; he was then incomparably the most popular man in England. He may well have been more universally loved and admired at that time by his countrymen than Hitler ever was by the Germans. Yet the English people decided they could do without him, and that other and less admirable men might serve them better in their predicament.

The confidence of the people in leaders whose authority depends on their freely-given confidence is peculiar and not to be found outside democracy. It is strong but not unqualified; it is both persistent and variable. It is an effect of the democratic system and the cause of its strength. Where a democracy so functions that it is difficult for any political leader to acquire the influence that several American presidents and British prime ministers have had over their peoples, democracy is the weaker for it; as it is for instance, in France. For if the system does not produce strong leaders, or rather does not allow them to use their strength, there is always the danger that the people will look for leaders outside the system, leaders who can only make their power effective by weakening or destroying the system.

There are relations between leaders and followers possible only in a democracy (though not equally possible in all democracies), relations less rigid, less contrived, less uniform, less remote and absolute, less extravagant than those that bind a people to their dictator, but also more easy, human, and elastic. The people give a leader their confidence while they feel the need for him; and they often feel that need in spite of all the attacks made on him. When they get rid of him, they may still feel warmly towards him, or they may not; but he is dispensable. Their confidence in him is born of controversy, thrives on it, and is in the end weakened or destroyed by it. The democratic leader is not, indeed can scarcely be, what is called a "father-image" to his people. For there is no guilt felt at getting rid of him. The system survives and is scarcely altered by his going. The deepest loyalty is not to him but to the system making him and all his kind servants of the people.

This is, admittedly, an idealized picture. There are probably, in every democracy, many people who feel for some leader or other the kind of feelings that good Nazis or Fascists felt for Hitler or Mussolini, and in every "totalitarian" state some people whose political attitudes are more appropriate to democracy.

Some Germans are better democrats than many Americans, Frenchmen, or Englishmen. Nevertheless, a strong preservative of democracy is the kind of confidence that democrats have in their leaders. They prefer the system to the leaders produced by it, and yet, unless they trust those leaders, the system can hardly work.

It is not easy to describe the kind of confidence that a people must have in their leaders if democracy is to work smoothly among them. It is not, however, difficult to tell whether it is there. How the Americans felt towards Roosevelt and now feel towards Eisenhower, how the British felt towards Churchill and how (though with appropriate differences and lesser intensity) they now feel towards Eden, is far indeed from how most Germans felt towards Hitler or most Italians towards Mussolini. Though the difference is difficult to describe, it is obvious, as obvious as the difference in taste between wine and beer.

IV

Pennock has put "willingness to compromise" and "tolerance" high among the cultural conditions of successful democracy. Though I agree with him about "willingness to compromise," I shall not discuss it separately, for I think I have already, in my second section, said what I want to say about it. Democratic respect for law, for the judicial and political processes that make freedom and democracy possible, contains within it the willingness to compromise. These processes have for their object the peaceful settlement of every dispute, no matter what it is. To be a democrat is to believe that men should always, whatever the differences between them, be willing to make a settlement on two conditions: that all parties to a dispute have a right to put forward their demands and to have proper account taken of them in the settlement, and that they all (while this first condition holds) admit their duty to accept the settlement at least until it can be legally revised. The democrat, like everyone else, wants to get his way, but he admits that other men have an equal right to get theirs. He is willing to compromise about anything provided he is treated as an equal negotiator; but he will not compromise about the system that makes compromise possible.

I am not sure that tolerance is a prerequisite of democracy. Of course, if tolerance is merely a synonym for willingness to compromise, for respect for certain fundamental rights, it is a prerequisite; but that, I think, is not its usual, or at least not its whole, meaning. Tolerance is also, and perhaps above all, charity; it is slowness to condemn, it is a lively sense that others are as likely to be right and honest and sincere as we are. It seems to me that, whereas willingness to compromise is perhaps stronger among the English-speaking peoples, who have practiced democracy with conspicuous success, than among most other peoples of European stock, tolerance in this deeper sense quite certainly is not. Over a hundred years ago, Tocqueville was struck by the democratic intolerance of America, by the dislike felt by the ordinary American for anyone with a way of life markedly different from his own, a dislike apparently quite compatible with a passion for freedom and the rights of man. John Stuart Mill passed a similar judgment on the middle-class England of his day. In politics the French and the Italians have not been as respectful of fundamental rights, or as willing to compromise, or as loyal to a political system making compromise easy, as the Americans and the English; but outside politics they have often proved more charitable, more slow to condemn, less resentful of what does not fall within the necessarily rather narrow limits of their experience.

The Americans and the English are perhaps more tolerant today than they were some hundred years ago; and it may even be that this increased tolerance has come with democracy. Yet I do not believe that the aptness for democracy of these peoples owes much to their tolerance in this deeper sense. There is often about them a narrowness of judgment, a slowness of sympathy, which makes it unusually difficult for them to understand their neighbors and to accept them for what they are.

In the past, the Americans and the English have been, if not purer than other peoples, certainly more puritanical. And puritanism is not conspicuously tolerant. The Puritan is a man of independent temper; his self-respect is greater than his respect for others. He feels himself primarily responsible to himself alone among men for how he lives. No doubt when he prays, he takes care to address God with proper humility; but in his dealings with other men, he is apt to make too free a use of God's authority as if he were somehow on better terms with his Maker than other men are. The Puritan is not remarkably charitable, but his self-reliance and his common sense tend to make him a respecter of rules and of rights. He sees that he cannot, in practice, have the independence he requires for himself unless he allows it to others; and he has enough justice to admit that others should also have what he claims for himself. By temperament he is not mild and tolerant; he is too sure he is right, and sometimes even too pleased with himself, actually to think it good that there should be people in the world who think and behave quite differently from himself. He will not, however, have other people put upon him, and he knows from experience that he can get his way only if he holds fast to laws and conventions which enable them to get theirs. He loves freedom and justice more than he loves his neighbors. Independence and respect for law are his characteristic virtues, egotism and arrogance his characteristic vices. He becomes apt for self-government, for democracy; he becomes a respecter of rights and a champion of compromise, not because he is deeply tolerant, but in spite of his lack of true charity. His aptness for democracy comes above all from his self-reliance, his self-control, and his practical common sense.

I do not wish to make too much of this argument. Not only peoples influenced by puritanism are apt for democracy. I have spoken of the Puritans only because I have wanted to show that the deeper tolerance, which is a charitable mildness in our dealings with others, a respect for what they essentially are even more than for their rights, is perhaps not a condition of democracy. I do, however, think it likely of democracy that the longer it lasts, the more it disposes men to this tolerance. The enormous, intricate, swiftly-changing, modern state, subjecting its citizens to all kinds of strains and frustrations, probably makes them, in spite of their rationalism and their science, as much as ever susceptible to hysterical, absurd, and cruel passions. In modern society, there are many causes of fanaticism and intolerance, causes different from what they were in older societies but perhaps not less powerful. This, however, is quite compatible with democracy's being, on the whole, a force making for charity and a deeper tolerance.

Men who believe in themselves and put a high value on independence begin by putting up with what they call the errors and the wickedness of others because they see that they cannot pursue undisturbed their own virtuous courses, cannot be free, unless they respect rights, laws, and conventions making those errors and that wickedness possible. But the longer they put up with these errors, the more familiar they become with them, the less obviously erroneous they appear. It begins to seem possible to them that others beside themselves should be honest and pure, and perhaps also right, even in matters they feel strongly about. Men become nicer, more discriminating in their moral judgments. Sometimes, indeed, they even learn to distinguish between their local prejudices and evils more widely recognized as such because they diminish the freedom, the self-respect, the loyalties and affections that sweeten and enlarge men's lives.

Tolerance is an effect of democracy, and of other things besides democracy; but it is not, I think, a prerequisite of democracy, in the sense that individualism and respect for law undoubtedly are. It helps to make democracy work more smoothly, but democracy can emerge even in its absence. In the modern industrial state, owing to its very size and complexity and instability, there are powerful forces that disturb and demoralize men and incline them to intolerance. And intolerance can be fatal to democracy, even though tolerance is not a condition of its success. Love of independence, desire for freedom, respect for law can make the temperamentally uncharitable apt for democracy. When, however, this love and this respect are weakened—and there are many things in the modern world tending to weaken them—intolerance is almost entirely destructive. Charity is the flower rather than the root of democracy.

JOHN PLAMENATZ.

C

Many difficulties beset the path of one who would discuss the conditions or prerequisites of success for democratic institutions, even if the problem is narrowed by confining discussion to large, industrialized states. For example, we are dealing not only with matters of degree but also with interdependent variables. How much of a given favorable attitude is required may depend upon how much of another attitude prevails. If certain groups have a strong sense of noblesse oblige, less will be required of the obligation to participate in public affairs on the part of the rest of the society than would otherwise be the case. The greater the disagreement on the content of justice, the more will the satisfactory functioning of democratic institutions depend upon the willingness to compromise. Similarly, there is interplay between attitudinal and institutional factors. A widespread and deeply-rooted respect for freedom of speech or the rule of law may be to some extent a substitute for such an institution as judicial review, although without considerable measure of these attitudes judicial review will not of itself avail. It follows that we must beware of thinking of cultural prerequisites in terms of a checklist of unrelated conditions, each of which, in stated amounts, constitutes a necessary condition for democracy. No such mechanical approach would be realistic.

The example of judicial review may be used to illustrate another difficulty. We easily become embroiled with the question of what is cause and what is effect. Is judicial review made possible by an attitude favorable to the rule of law and individual rights, or is such an attitude fostered and supported by judicial review? Of course, the answer is that it works both ways. The relationship is reciprocal. Recognition of this fact contributes to understanding, but it also indicates a certain artificiality that may easily creep into a discussion of "prerequisites." This problem arises not only out of the connection between attitudes and governmental institutions but also out of that between attitudes and economic and social conditions, or indeed between attitudes and mores. A particular pattern of family life and child training or certain educational methods, for example, may foster authoritarian rather than democratic attitudes. It is a wise man who can resolve the problems of paternity involved in these relationships.

I may as well suggest at once that, in considering factors that support the attitudes favorable to democracy, I shall place more emphasis on economic and social conditions than does Griffith, and correspondingly less on religious beliefs. To be specific, if we give thought to the major examples of modern totalitarianism, the role played by economic and social conditions in preparing the way for these régimes is more striking, in my judgment, than any differences in religious belief between the peoples of these countries and those of successful democracies. It may be, as Griffith argues, that lack of respect for the individual and want of a sense of basic unity both contributed to the demise of the Weimar Republic, although it is at least worthy of remark that these two attitudes appear to be somewhat in opposition to each other. No study of that unfortunate chapter of democratic history, however, can get very far without raising such questions as: What was it that produced in the Germany of the twenties an effective minority of "true believers"? What enfeebled the will for democracy among the majority? This is not the place to embark upon an analysis of these questions, to which, anyhow, a great deal of study has already been given. While different students would rate the various causal factors differently, there would be general agreement that prolonged depression with attendant unemployment and a general sense of the failure of the government to cope with the situation was fundamental to the frustration and despair that swept the country. Out of these circumstances came both the Nazi "true believers" and the disillusioned democrats who had not the will to resist.

If we examine the rise of fascism in Italy, we again find that extensive unemployment played a large part in the growth of the movement. Even more, we find frustration arising out of disappointed war aims. Other factors have been mentioned by students of the subject but few if any have ascribed democracy's failure in Italy to lack of religion.

Finally, it is perhaps particularly fitting in considering prerequisites to have regard to a country in which democracy has never been practiced but in which there was an opportunity to give it a try. I refer to Soviet Russia. Why was Russia not fertile ground for democracy in 1917? Was it lack of religion? What student of the subject would not speak first of illiteracy, of lack of experience with free institutions, of the crisis situation produced by war's disorganization, and like factors?

I do not suggest that religious beliefs may not be favorable to democratic attitudes. Nor do I understand Griffith to argue that the mere existence in a country of a high proportion of communicants is a sufficient prerequisite for a successfully functioning democracy. But the remarks I have been making do point to a difference between us at least in emphasis. We are in agreement that certain attitudes are essential to democracy and also that it is important to go behind these attitudes in search of their source. He finds their common source in the religious beliefs of the Hebrew-Christian tradition. That is to say, he finds that specific convictions and attitudes are part of a larger complex. With the latter statement I am in full agreement. I would suggest, however, that even a system of religious beliefs forms part of a larger context. Why do some societies develop religions that give priority to democratic and humanitarian values, while others either develop religions that do not foster these values or else pervert such a religion as Christianity into anti-democratic forms? We must seek the conditions that give rise to a healthy society of healthy personalities, with all the mores, attitudes, and beliefs naturally attendant upon such a society, including a peaceful and democratic religion.

And it will do no harm to bear in mind the warning, just intimated, that even the Christian religion is not always productive of attitudes that are either peaceful or democratic. One does not need to appeal to the history of religious wars and Christian autocracies to prove this point. One need only mention Fascist Italy or contemporary Spain. Granted, religion is perverted when it is anti-liberal; that only raises the question: what causes the perversion?

I

Let me now turn to a brief discussion of certain attitudes I would stress as prerequisites to a successfully functioning democracy. It will be seen that they occupy much ground in common with Griffith's list. Surely, with John Stuart Mill, we must accept, as a fundamental prerequisite, a widespread desire to be self-governing. Democracy cannot be foisted upon an unwilling people. Moreover, to this we may add with Mill and with Griffith the willingness to accept the responsibilities that democracy entails. With the right must go the duty.

Whether the people of Portugal today are sufficiently interested in democracy that they could make a go of it if they were given the opportunity is at least a serious question. The casual observer gains the impression that the incidence of political apathy is too high to provide a congenial environment for democratic institutions. That impression may be perfectly sound, but to leave the subject at this point would be entirely too superficial a treatment. Whether political interest be considered as a condition prerequisite to the establishment of democracy or as one that must be maintained if democratic institutions are to continue to flourish, it cannot be considered as a homogeneous commodity, the nature and source of which are of no significance.<sup>1</sup> Intense and widespread political interest may be either a healthy or an unhealthy sign in a democratic society. It may be indicative of a degree of tension, of class or group conflict, that bodes ill for other prerequisites, such as the willingness to compromise. It may reflect an intense dissatisfaction with prevailing policies that finds no counterpart in agreement on alternatives. Such a condition is a likely prelude—almost a “prerequisite”—to that politics of desperation by virtue of which dictators so frequently come to power.

It should also be recognized that political interest will be in some measure a function of the extent of governmental activity. In a society in which government determines a large portion of the framework of action within which each individual finds his liberty, it may be expected that political interest will run higher than where market or other individual determinations play a larger role. Among the industrialized nations that are our present concern, the differences in this respect are not so large. Even so, the somewhat lesser amount of petty regulations and lower incidence of direct taxation in the United States may mean that a higher degree of political apathy can be tolerated here than in the other countries in question.

Political apathy may indeed spring from quite various sources. It may reflect a general feeling that all is going well. Even under such circumstances a lively concern for improvement, via political as well as other channels, is doubtless a desideratum; but it is difficult to feel that the absence of such a concern indicates a threat to the democracy in question. The record in this country gives clear indication of an inverse relationship between prosperity and political interest.

On the other hand, apathy may reflect cynicism rather than satisfaction. Pennsylvania politics in by-gone days earned itself the designation of “corrupt and contented.” Few would rise to the defense of such a situation. It suggests a corrosive contempt that can hardly fail to undermine the successful functioning of democratic institutions, if it is not corrected. Worst of all, perhaps, is a condition in which apathy is the product of a sense of hopelessness. If because of ignorance, poverty, inadequate communication and organization, or whatever, large numbers of people feel at once discontented with their government and yet incapable of doing anything about it, all but the most vigorous are likely to lapse into political quietism. Such a condition need not be a contra-indication for democracy if a non-democratic government is in power. The overthrow of that government may well bring about a sharp change in attitudes. With the sudden opening of new vistas of the possible, people's political interests may quickly spring to life. But if the government is already democratic in form, the stage is set for a charismatic leader to rise to power. Whether such a leader will operate within the forms and spirit of democracy will depend partly upon the extent to which democratic institutions have degenerated and partly upon pure chance.

<sup>1</sup> It will be noted that I have shifted the discussion from “the desire to be self-governing” to “political apathy” and thence to “political interest.” I am not unconscious of the change. It may well be that if I were to adhere to the original concept further discussion would be unnecessary and the proposition would hold true that the greater the desire to be self-governing the better. The trouble is that precisely the series of shifts just pointed out is often made unconsciously, with the result that an argument that begins with perfectly sound propositions winds up with statements about political apathy or political interest that are not supportable.

But democracy is much more than a technique of government. It is a technique that reflects certain values—notably those of individual liberty and equality. Unless the bulk of the society is committed to a high valuation for these ideals it can hardly be expected that institutions predicated upon them will work successfully or long endure. We need not haggle over the meaning of "equality." It is well understood that not equality of condition but the negation of special privilege and the recognition of what is generally called "the dignity of the individual" is what is meant by this term. The connotation of the last phrase is important, however; and it goes beyond what is literally implied by either "liberty" or "equality." The proposition that each vote should count for one and none for more than one is doubtless sufficiently implied by the word "equality." Likewise, "liberty" in this context clearly stands for limitations on the rights of majorities. It includes the proposition that rights, in the form of areas for individual choice, should not only be equal but should also be extensive. The kind of concern for the individual that carries with it unwillingness to tolerate the sacrifice of what is vital to any one person as a means to the realization of less essential benefits for even a large number of others seems also to be characteristic of the value system we are discussing. Perhaps the general disapproval of euthanasia, rightly or wrongly, is a typical reflection of this attitude.

At this point discussion of prerequisites runs a danger of crossing the line into the area of definition. It might be argued that the concept of democratic individualism, on which all three participants in this symposium are agreed, is not so much a prerequisite of democracy as a part of democracy as we define that term. Without denying that there would be some point in that remark, I should argue that majoritarian democracy carries within it the seeds of its own destruction; and, moreover, that even a system of legally protected individual rights is nowhere so well defended against the erosive effects of the regulations required by an industrial society as where it is grounded upon lively sympathy and sensitive conscience,<sup>2</sup> expressed in the value system we have been discussing.

<sup>2</sup> Whether the conscience need find its source in religion I do not know. It would certainly be a mistake to assume that men of good conscience are always religious. As to the specific question of the relationship between Christian beliefs about the individual and democratic individualism, I refer the reader to Plamenatz's remarks on this matter.

Mention may next be made of a concern for the general welfare and for individual justice. While not identical, they are closely related both to each other and to the ideal of equality. Probably no society could hold together without a measure of these attributes; it is also probably fair to say that democracy is especially dependent upon them for its successful operation.

One of the most important and distinctive elements of the democratic ethic, one certainly deserving of listing as a prerequisite, is an attitude of tolerance for difference, of willingness to compromise. Certainly no society can hope to govern itself democratically unless this spirit prevails. Nothing is a clearer contraindication for effective democratic institutions than the spirit of intransigence. The experience of French republics appears to be a case in point.

Closely related to the willingness to compromise is respect for rules and set procedures. Not only the basic rule of decision by majorities but also innumerable rules and understandings as to procedure are fundamental to successful operation of the democratic process. The American congressional system is completely dependent, for instance, on such understandings as that the majority party will allow adequate minority representation on committees and that the minority representatives will be allowed opportunities for effective participation. Only when participants in a democratic organization of any kind feel assured that the rules will be adhered to are they likely to accept willingly decisions that affect their interests adversely. Democracy is like a game: unless the participants adhere to the rules it fails of its purpose and will soon break down completely.

It is frequently suggested that "agreement on fundamentals" is a prerequisite to democracy. This contention provides a good illustration of one of the difficulties inherent in any discussion of this subject. "Agreement on fundamentals" is very much a matter of degree; moreover, the amount required varies inversely in proportion to the strength of certain other "prerequisites" present. Of course democracy, like other forms of government but to a greater extent, must rest upon a measure of consensus, upon a certain community of values. But can we say with any precision what must be the nature or extent of this consensus, what matters are so fundamental that they must be the subject of general agreement? I doubt it. Harold Lask used to argue that the general principles underlying the economic system must be agreed upon. He pushed his reasoning far enough to lead him to the conclusion that it was very unlikely that the British parliamentary system could survive an alternation of Labor and Conservative governments. Others have contended that no agreement as to the substance of policy, in the economic realm or any other, was necessary as long as there was agreement on the procedures to be used in determining policy. Yet surely no commitment to constitutionalism is likely to withstand a persistent deep and wide cleavage on policy. Nor are people so divided likely to be willing to compromise. In other words, in speaking of "agreement on fundamentals," "willingness to compromise," and "respect for rules and set procedures" (the essence of constitutionalism), we are dealing with three very closely interrelated factors. To a certain extent, a deficiency in any one can be offset by an adequate supply of the others. It seems likely that, taking into account all values that have any great political significance, the people of Britain have a greater agreement as to values than do Americans; and it is at least plausible that this disparity is not unrelated to the differences between our constitutional systems, to our greater reliance upon the mechanisms of constitutionalism. I am certainly not suggesting that Americans have a greater respect for rules and procedures than do Englishmen, but I do imply that our lower common denominator of agreed values (other than procedural) has forced us to erect more procedural restraints and so to rely more on this focus of agreement.

II

It will be apparent that, while Griffith's list of prerequisites and those that I have just discussed do not coincide, they have much in common. Nor should I be inclined to question the importance for democracy of any of the items in his list, although I should think that one or two of them are about as important for other forms of government as for democracy. It is with respect to the central role of religion in creating and maintaining these attitudes that we differ.

No one, I believe, would quarrel with the essentiality to democracy of the notion of the individual as an end in himself, nor dispute the contention that the concept of the "infinite value" of the individual is central to the Christian religion. Whether that concept necessarily carries with it all of the particular connotations that are seized upon by the democrat is probably more debatable, as is pointed out by Plamenatz.

Take, for instance, "love of liberty." Griffith does no more than hint that perhaps nothing less than a theological base is adequate for its foundation. In view of the fact that probably no people has possessed a more passionate love of liberty than the not-very-religious Athenians and the notorious fact that liberty has been more often suppressed than defended in the name of religion, it is easy to see why this connection is advanced so tentatively. I am in thorough agreement as to the importance for democracy of the attitude in question; but the proposition that it finds its surest foundation in religion calls for supporting evidence that I do not find at hand.

It is not only that a Voltaire or a John Stuart Mill—neither marked by religious commitment—may head the list of proponents of that fundamental liberty, freedom of speech, while a Luther or a de Maistre throws the weight of religion on the side of repressive authority—although these facts themselves must give pause to any who would assume any necessary connection between religion and liberty. Beyond this, one must raise the general question of the relationship between democracy and "absolutes." As Griffith remarks, religion is by nature an absolute. Unless one has some foundation for belief in propositions basic to democracy, such as that "the value of the individual is infinite" or that certain defined and equal areas of autonomy should be provided for each individual, then those propositions are built upon sand: this is the position of the democratic absolutist. If one has no metaphysical foundation for democratic values he is easy prey to the proponent of other and conflicting values. Moreover, if he is in a position of authority, he is subject to no ideological check that will put a brake on his temptation to use undemocratic means for the attainment of the ends he desires to promote.

The relativist sees the matter quite differently. He points out that his belief that no set of values can be verified is very different from a belief that all values are equal. He vigorously asserts that a relativist may be as firmly committed to his values as is the absolutist; and that his values are just as likely to be democratic. He can cite much history in his support. He may even attack the absolutist, arguing that he who believes there are ascertainable absolute truths is likely to be convinced that he knows what they are. And if he knows what they are, then he is under obligation to see that society is governed in accordance with these truths, whether or not the majority of people see the light. Those who think themselves wise will always be tempted to deny freedom to the foolish. Will they be less likely to do so if they are convinced that they are holy as well as right? History hardly supports such an assumption.

Conversely, history provides many examples of tolerant and democratic Christian leaders like Roger Williams and of anti-Christian tyrants like Hitler. My own conviction is that it is impossible to establish any necessary or even probable correlations in this area. Under severe stress the democratic commitment of either the relativist or the absolutist may break down; and if it does he can find a rationalization in his philosophy to support his new position. On the other hand, I firmly believe that under favorable conditions both the relativist and the absolutist, the skeptic and the believer, will place the dignity of man among their primary values.

In suggesting that the political implications of religious belief are ambivalent, I find support in Griffith's own argument. In his discussion of "active and constructive participation in community life," for example, it is interesting to observe that he himself notes the dilemma that arises out of conflict between those who think God's will calls for social action and those who believe it calls for individual liberty. The clash between collectivist and individualist may even be exacerbated when each relates his claim to divine command. Griffith's solution is to fall back upon faith in the democratic process. But surely this brings us back to the specifically democratic attitudes of willingness to compromise and respect for rules, to the relaxed attitude of the well-adjusted personality, and to the social conditions—adequate community life and favorable economic conditions, to mention two—which produce that type of personality. We have here, I suppose, one more instance of the functional interaction and reciprocity among the various factors under discussion.

Griffith rightly stresses the dangers of deference and what he calls "group utilitarianism." The sense of the importance of social responsibility he desiderates would be hard to exaggerate. No society, and especially no industrial society, can be governed democratically without it. Again the question arises: how do we achieve it? In this connection I would add two observations to his remarks, one negative and one positive.

On the negative side, I would suggest that here, too, religion is a two-edged sword. Certainly it is a potent force in reinforcing a sense of social responsibility. But it does not necessarily operate in democratic directions. St. Paul's poetic and moving passage about the body and the members, which Griffith quotes, does indeed express a deep Christian insight and one that is essential for any effectively functioning society. The point is precisely that it is essential for any effective society and that with but a slight shift of emphasis it can be made to sound like the credo of fascism. The specifically democratic attitudes are often so specific that they must find a less generalized foundation than that of religion.

On the positive side, there is much evidence to suggest that in modern society the very dynamics of democracy itself tends to generate the conditions for its survival. Without in any way belittling the dangers of dispersiveness, it is encouraging to note that Big Business is today increasingly public relations conscious. It knows full well that a "public be damned" attitude will not be tolerated. At no time has this been more clearly illustrated than when automobile manufacturers after the war kept their prices far below what the traffic would have borne. The steel industry and many areas of administered prices behaved in like manner. Even those newest giants in the industrial world, the trade unions, are aware of the fact that they must justify their actions before the public. What reader of this symposium is not constantly deluged with literature from both sides of the labor-management fence seeking to explain and defend their positions in each major conflict situation as it arises? I hope I shall not be accused of undue skepticism if I suggest that religious concern is not the major motivating factor in the sense of responsibility that this activity betokens.

The last several paragraphs have expressed a view that differs from what Griffith has to say about the support given to democratic prerequisites by religion. I have suggested that while religion should work this way, it in fact often works in the opposite direction. I have also hinted that there are other directions in which we may look for factors favorable to democratic attitudes. What has just been said in the preceding paragraph is pertinent here. I should like to move on from that to a consideration of conditions that underlie and tend to the development of that "concern for the general welfare" which I listed as a democratic prerequisite. (While Griffith does not use this phrase, what he says about "active and constructive participation in community life," about the "obligation of economic groups to serve society," and about "attitudes assuring that passions will be channeled into constructive ends"—also described as "conditioned humanitarianism"—might be brought under this general heading.)

It is interesting and perhaps instructive to note how we begin to inculcate a concern for the welfare of others in small children. Long before they are able to grasp the concept of God we make substantial progress in drawing out their altruistic side. We build on sympathy. We appeal to a sense of fairness. One need not spell out the well-known stages and devices by which Johnnie comes to care for baby sister's welfare. In short, under favorable circumstances, where a loving and cooperative family unit is not distorted by the harshness of the struggle with nature or against human marauders such a concern seems to develop quite naturally.

The qualifications just noted, however, are important. Self-preservation is indeed the primal instinct. When all of people's energies are absorbed in the struggle to keep alive, the personality is stunted. Sympathy is restricted. Altruism has no opportunity to grow. Man's concern for himself blocks out all else and his development is checked short of that social being which it is his nature to become. It has sometimes been argued that democracy is the tender flower of a prosperous economy; that only where the vicissitudes of the struggle against nature have already been met to the extent that there is an economy of abundance can democratic institutions flourish. Such a position is clearly an exaggeration. Not only is it over-drawn but the suggestion that democratic institutions cannot cope with adversity is ill-founded. However, I believe it to be true that the democratic attitudes mature only where men have attained some margin above the bare subsistence level. Aristotle was wrong in arguing that only a man of leisure could be a good citizen; but he would have been right if he had said that some leisure and some opportunities for inviting the soul were essential to the development of the political (and democratic) virtues.

I have allowed myself to be diverted from the main line of my argument. While I would stress the importance of an "economic margin" for the development of attitudes favorable to democracy—and especially I would urge the disqualifying effects of extreme poverty—it would be far from my point to urge any one-to-one correlation between prosperity and democracy. It is even possible that too much prosperity may be unfavorable to democratic attitudes. What I am contending is that "conditioned humanitarianism" grows naturally out of a situation where individuals have time and opportunity for forming free and relatively permanent associations in many types of groups, ranging from the family up. Some will be professional and vocational, others will be of the "service" variety. Some will have neighborhood or other geographical bases, while many will unite individuals from different areas. Certainly one of the most important forms of voluntary association will be the church; and the political scientist will recognize that it contributes to the development of democratic value systems as much by provision of opportunities for satisfying and dedicated group activities as by its teachings.

Cities have historically been the birthplaces of democracy—a fact frequently overlooked in romanticized discussions of rural living—but it is true that the modern metropolis often tends to destroy the sociological foundations of a healthy community. We have here one of the points at which it is possible to attack the problem under discussion. Decentralization of industry and many other aspects of city and community planning are subject to our control. We have within our grasp the means for altering the conditions that produce the uprooted, "lost" individual, a problem brought forcibly to our attention by John Dewey long before it became a focus of attention of sociology and social psychology. What Dewey failed to stress is now fortunately generally acknowledged in this country: namely, that the individual cannot safely find himself in commitment to any single organization, loyalty, or enthusiasm. His quest for community and his sense of belonging must be satisfied pluralistically in order both to do justice to the varieties of personality and to prevent the formation of totalitarian sentiments and organization. The human psyche must not be starved; but if all souls are fed at the same table the din will be deafening. To shift to the currently popular figure, the problem of satisfying the sense of belonging in a constructive fashion may be likened to the building of an atomic pile. Fission taking place in relative isolation is sterile, but concentration of radiation beyond a certain critical point produces an explosion.

III

In conclusion, let me say that I have conceived it to be my role in this symposium to develop a somewhat different point of view from that set forth in Griffith's opening statement. In doing so I may have given the impression of a wider divergence of opinion than actually exists. As he remarks, in large measure the varying points of view of the contributors to this symposium are complementary. Most of our differences are matters of emphasis. Plamenatz, for instance, questions my inclusion of "tolerance" among democratic prerequisites; but intolerance, he admits, "can be fatal to democracy." I would not contend for more. But I am glad I gave him the opening to make his very wise remarks on this subject. I might take slight issue with some of what he says about public confidence. I think he overdoes the generality of public confidence that has been commanded by such democratic leaders as Hoover, Roosevelt, Attlee, or Truman. Like Griffith, I would place more emphasis on confidence in the system than on confidence in particular leaders. But I suspect there is no important difference of opinion between us here. With Griffith, too, my differences are largely matters of emphasis. Where he stresses religious faith as a means of reinforcing democratic attitudes, I would incline to give priority to familial, social, and economic mores, institutions, and conditions that favor the healthy development of "the essence of man."

J. ROLAND PENNOCK.

TOWARD A MODEL STATE PRESIDENTIAL PRIMARY LAW

MANNING J. DAUER

University of Florida

WITH

WILLIAM A. F. STEPHENSON, HARRY MACY, AND DAVID TEMPLE

Since 1948, there has been a marked revival of interest in the presidential primary.<sup>1</sup> In all probability this has come about because of the cleavage between the bulk of the regular Republican leadership, most of whom favored Taft, and the rank and file of the Republican party, who, together with many independent voters, favored Eisenhower. Concurrently, in the Democratic party there was in 1952 a "free convention" for the first time since 1932. As a result, there was revived interest in the presidential primary, and in the system of selecting delegates to the national nominating conventions, during the pre-convention campaigns of 1952. Since the untimely heart attack suffered by President Dwight D. Eisenhower in 1955, interest in the nominating process for the presidential candidates of the major parties is again at a high point. This article, after reviewing briefly recent developments with respect to presidential primaries, discusses in some detail the legislation enacted in 1955 by the state of Florida.

I

During the period of the 1952 contest, interest in the presidential primary was expressed in four ways. In the first place, Eisenhower's decisive show of strength in primary contests in New Hampshire, Minnesota, and New Jersey drew public attention to the contrast between the preference primary and the methods of delegate selection in other states. Texas is a prime example of the manipulations that characterized the worst use of the convention system.

In the second place, proposals for a nationwide system of presidential preferential primaries were introduced in Congress. These proposals received more attention in 1952 than had been given the issue for a number of years.<sup>2</sup> Two different systems were suggested. One, advocated by Senator George Smathers,<sup>3</sup> called for a constitutional amendment to abolish the national party nominating conventions and replace them with two primaries in each major political party. The first primary was to be held on the first Tuesday after the first Monday in June of each presidential election year; the second primary was to be held on the first Monday in August of that same year. The computation of votes in each party was to be based on the proportion of the votes received by each candidate in every state. The second primary was to be held only if no candidate received an absolute majority in the first primary, and was to be limited to the two candidates receiving the highest vote. As an alternative to this procedure, Senator Smathers proposed another constitutional amendment<sup>4</sup> which was less detailed and simply specified that Congress should enact appropriate legislation to provide for the presidential nominations "in a simultaneous, nationwide individual party primary."

<sup>1</sup> The term presidential primary is used in this article to describe what are actually three different systems. First, there is the preferential primary, in which presidential aspirants are listed and the voters in the primary choose between them. Second, there is the primary for electing delegates to the national convention. A third system, favored by the authors, provides for a combination system in which the voters select among delegate slates pledged to particular candidates. This inclusive definition follows Charles Merriam and Louise Overacker, Primary Elections (Chicago, 1928), p. 141. See also Louise Overacker, The Presidential Primary (New York, 1926).

<sup>2</sup> For earlier proposals see S. 1726, 72nd Cong., 1st sess., Dec. 14, 1931, Congressional Record, Vol. 75, p. 443; and George W. Norris, Fighting Liberal (New York, 1945), p. 336. The first major reference in Congress to such legislation was in the 61st Congress. Speech of Sen. Jonathan Bourne (R) of Oregon, 61st Cong., 3d sess., Feb. 27, 1911, Congressional Record, Vol. 46, p. 3550. Reference was to the Oregon state law.

A less elaborate procedure which retained the national convention was proposed in a bill sponsored by Senator Paul Douglas of Illinois and Representative Charles Bennett of Florida.<sup>5</sup> This measure provided for compensating each state which conducted a presidential preferential primary with an amount of money equal to the cost of the primary. An appropriation of $10,000,000 was authorized for this purpose. Only parties which polled 10,000,000 or more popular votes in the election of 1948 were to participate in these primaries. Obviously, this would restrict the primaries to the Republican and Democratic parties. This bill and the Smathers proposals have been analyzed in Paul T. David, et al., Presidential Nominating Politics in 1952; the National Story,<sup>6</sup> and will not be further considered here.

The Douglas-Bennett bill did not eliminate the national nominating convention. Moreover, it left the choice of delegates to be determined by individual states or the rules of the parties themselves. In 1953 the Douglas-Bennett bill was revised and introduced in the 83rd Congress.<sup>7</sup> After further study, still another version of the bill has been introduced in the current Congress.<sup>8</sup> This proposes a bipartisan commission of five appointed by the President. This commission is to receive from participating states a statement of the provision under which the states will hold primaries. It will certify dates for participation in the primaries if they conform to the general provision of the national legislation outlined below.

<sup>3</sup> S.J.R. 125, 82nd Cong., 2nd sess., Jan. 20, 1952.

<sup>4</sup> S.J.R. 145, 82nd Cong., 2nd sess., March 25, 1952.

<sup>5</sup> H.R. 8374, 82nd Cong., 2nd sess., June 26, 1952; S. 2570, 82nd Cong., 2nd sess.; Cf. Hearing before the Subcommittee on Rules of the Committee on Rules and Administration, U.S. Senate, 82nd Cong., 2nd Sess., on S. 2570 (March 28, 1952, G.P.O., 1952).

<sup>6</sup> (Baltimore, 1954), pp. 194-224.

<sup>7</sup> H.R. 96, 83rd Cong. 1st sess., Jan. 3, 1953, Congressional Record, Vol. 99, pp. 55-56; also S. 1049, 83rd Cong., 1st sess., Feb. 20, 1953, Congressional Record, Vol. 99, p. 1294.

<sup>8</sup> H.R. 2532, 84th Cong., 1st sess., Jan. 20, 1955, Congressional Record, Vol. 101, p. 417. S. 652, 84th Cong., 1st sess., Jan. 20, 1955, Congressional Record, Vol. 101, p. 441, and "analysis," ibid., pp. 445-46.

Candidates shall be eligible to participate if they are certified to the commission by petitions containing at least 1,000 signatures from each state participating, if no more than four states participate. If more than four states participate, petitions containing at least 1,000 signatures for each candidate must be submitted from at least 75 per cent of the participating states. Petitions are received until March 1 and a candidate who does not withdraw by March 20 is then certified to the states. A candidate may be listed in only one party primary, and voter participation is restricted to the party in which the voter is registered (the closed primary). The primary must be held between April 1 and July 31. State law must pledge the delegates selected to the party national convention to vote for the winning candidate of that party or the first ballot. The proposed statute does not fix the method for selecting delegates. However, it binds the delegates to the candidate to whom they are pledged so long as he does not withdraw and so long as he received at least 10 per cent of the vote on the first ballot, 20 per cent on the third ballot, and 30 per cent or more on the fifth ballot. Each state holding such a primary shall receive from federal funds 20 cents for each vote cast in the primary.

The Douglas-Bennett Bill has thus been revised, but the aim at a national system of presidential preferential primaries remains the same. The primary is designed to supplement but not to supplant the national convention. The bill also seeks, by providing for the closed primary, to meet the criticism that it would weaken party discipline. The bill has been further refined in attempting to avoid a convention deadlock by liberalizing the provisions for pledging delegates. As the convention advances, a larger proportion of the vote must be polled or the delegates are released from their pledges.<sup>9</sup> This attitude of reconciling the primary with party machinery is typical of most present-day proponents of the presidential preferential primary. Such an attitude is in contrast with earlier proposals of the Progressive Era, which showed little or no such concern.<sup>10</sup>

A third manifestation of interest in the presidential primary in 1952 was the American Political Science Association project for the study of the nominating process in the two major national parties. The enthusiasm of Association members, together with the financial assistance of the Stern Family Fund, resulted in a complete study of the pre-convention process in all states, and of the nominating conventions themselves. After two years of intensive work, the separate state studies were published in four volumes; the editors of these volumes, Paul T. David, Malcolm Moos, and Ralph M. Coldman, wrote a summary volume, Presidential Nominating Politics in 1952: The National Story.

The fourth major development was the increase in voter participation in <sup>9</sup> Paul H. Douglas, "Conventions and the Popular Will," New Republic, Vol. 132, pp. 11-15, May 28, 1955.

<sup>10</sup> The same may be said for most political scientists. See the American Political Science Association Report, "Toward a More Responsible Two-Party System," this REVIEW, Vol. 44 (Sept., 1950), Supplement; also Malcolm Moos, "New Light on the Nominating Process," in Research Frontiers in Politics and Government (Washington, 1955), pp. 135-67.

presidential preferential primaries, the enactment of improved laws, and the addition of new states to the list of those having primaries. In 1948 only 3,622,117 votes were cast in presidential preferential primaries.<sup>11</sup> In 1952 the number of votes cast in such primaries rose to 10,735,122 (see Table I) in the 14 states in which there were opposed candidates. In addition, there were elections for delegate slates in the primaries of other states, but these contests were not of great significance.<sup>12</sup>

Of additional importance are the redrafting and improvement of state primary laws and the adoption of the presidential preference primary by certain states

TABLE I. PRESIDENTIAL PREFERENCE PRIMARIES: POPULAR VOTES, 1952*

State	Popular Votes	State	Popular Votes
California	2,954,791	New Hampshire	136,159
Florida	653,333*	New Jersey	800,862
Illinois	1,872,435	Oregon	392,024
Maryland	154,269	Pennsylvania	1,290,618
Massachusetts	434,922	South Dakota	162,150
Minnesota	418,789	West Virginia	128,026
Nebraska	318,590	Wisconsin	1,018,149
Total			10,735,122

* Data from Congressional Record, 82nd Cong., 1st sess., July 3, 1952, Vol. 98, p. 9082.

* Democrats only.

and by Congress for the District of Columbia. Between 1948 and 1952 there were important changes in state laws. These included adoption of the new Minnesota statute and important revision in the state laws for the presidential primaries in Wisconsin, New Hampshire, and Nebraska.<sup>13</sup> In the period 1952-54 there have been other changes in state laws and 1955 saw Congress grant a type of franchise to the District of Columbia for the first time.<sup>14</sup> A general <sup>11</sup> See Congressional Record, July 3, 1952, Vol. 98, p. 9082 for tabulation; as to the number of states holding primaries, a check was made with David, et al., Presidential Nominating Politics in 1952, especially The National Story, pp. 173 ff. For changes, statutes of all 48 states were checked through 1954. Except for the Florida developments and those in the District of Columbia, 1954 is the end of the period for which legislation in the separate states is considered in this article. Legal supplements and other data for the 1955 legislatures were not available when this article was being written.

<sup>12</sup> Congressional Record, Apr. 9, 1952, Vol. 98, p. A 2720; Roma K. McNickle, "Presidential Primaries, 1952" in Editorial Research Reports, Vol. 1, p. 46 (1952). Also Paul T. David, et al., op. cit., chapters on Ohio, Alabama, New York.

<sup>13</sup> David, et al., chapters on the states mentioned. Nebraska added in 1951 an amendment which required the consent of the candidate, which changed a traditional feature of her system that was known as the "all star contest." Vol. 4, p. 286.

<sup>14</sup> A different version of this bill was adopted in 1954 but vetoed by the President because of interference with principles of the Hatch Act in one clause. For the 1955 Act, see Congressional Record, 84th Cong., 1st sess., July 12, 1955, pp. 8839-41, for amended version and for Senate action. This became Public Law 376, 84th Cong., approved Aug. 12, 1955.

primary law was enacted which provided for election of party officials for the District in the two major parties. This provided as well for a presidential preferential primary among candidates who (1) are certified by the party committee; and (2) consent to having their names on the ballot. This law marks the first enactment of presidential primary legislation by Congress.

Changes in state laws between 1952 and 1955 show that New Jersey enacted a few unimportant changes and three states, Indiana, Montana, and Nevada, adopted presidential primary statutes in 1953. The Nevada statute, however, was repealed in 1955. Montana provided in 1953 for election of pledged delegates in the primary, but the 1955 Montana legislature modified this to provide for selection of delegates by a state convention. A presidential preferential primary is required, however, with the delegates to remain pledged to the candidate winning the primary unless he shall release the delegates, or unless his vote drops below 20 per cent of the total vote received in the convention.<sup>16</sup>

The Indiana act simply provides for listing the candidates for president on the primary ballot and having the voter make his choice. Delegates who are selected by the state convention are required to take an oath to vote on the first ballot for the presidential candidate winning the state-wide party primary. District delegates are similarly bound to the winner of the district primary. The addition of Indiana and Montana as presidential primary states raises the number having names of delegates or candidates for the presidency on the primary ballot from 17 in 1952 to 19 authorized by mid-1955. In addition, Arkansas and Georgia have optional statutes seldom or never used. But it should be noted that this total number of states is lower than the peak around 1916 when half the states had the primary in operation. Then a decline set in. It is the position of the present writers, following W. O. Key, Jr., that the misconceptions about the primary, faulty laws establishing such a primary, and faulty ballot procedures did not permit a valid test of the presidential primary.<sup>17</sup> Consequently, analysis of proper principles for such a primary and construction of a proper ballot are of importance.

II

The recent enactment of a new ballot form for the Florida presidential preferential primary was preceded by careful analysis of these factors. At the same time considerable attention was given to the encouragement of a two-party system within the framework of the proposed law. Some attention had to be given to the background of existing legislation. Consequently, these factors necessitate the tracing of a story which considers the background, an analysis of the principles, and the ultimate ballot and law.

<sup>16</sup> For 1953 acts see Title 19-31, New Jersey Statutes Annotated, 1954 Supp.; Annotated Indiana Statutes, 1953 Supp., Title 29-3619, giving Ch. 193 of 1953 Acts.; Ch. 214, Laws, Resolutions . . . by the 33rd Legislative Assembly [of Montana], 1953; Ch. 299, Statutes of Nevada passed at the 46th Session of the Legislative Assembly.

<sup>16</sup> For changes in Nevada in 1955 see Ch. 304, Statutes of Nevada, 1955 and for changes in Montana, Sec. 29-909 (639), Sec. 23-1006 (673) 1955 Supp. to Election Laws of Montana.

<sup>17</sup> Politics, Parties and Pressure Groups, 2nd ed. (New York, 1947), p. 392.

The Florida law on primary elections has been modified by almost every session of the legislature since the primary was first authorized in 1901.<sup>18</sup> The original 1901 act was typical of those acts of the Progressive Era which regulated the holding of primaries. It empowered a state party executive committee, congressional district party committee, or county committee, to hold a primary election for the choice of any party nominee. Under this permissive act the first state-wide primaries were held in 1902. Then, in 1904, the state committee of the Democratic party called a primary election on May 10 of that year. The 1904 primary provided for the election of delegates to the Democratic National Convention, four from the state-at-large and the remainder from congressional districts.<sup>19</sup> It should be noted that this election of the Florida delegates to the Democratic National Convention is four years earlier than any previously noted presidential preferential primaries.<sup>20</sup>

The Florida primary in 1913<sup>21</sup> was made mandatory for the Democratic party for all candidates for elective offices, and made permissive for all party offices, including delegates to the nominating convention. The state executive committee was empowered to set up a form of ballot for party offices and determine which party officers should be chosen in the primary. Subsequently, in 1915, the nomination of delegates to the national convention was made mandatory in the primary.<sup>22</sup> This provision, with various changes, has remained a part of the law to the present. Until 1955 none of these features were mandatory upon the minority party. In addition to the election of delegates in the primary, the state party committee was empowered by this early legislation to provide for listing the leading candidates for president and vice-president on the primary ballot. The earliest date for which there was a separate vote for these candidates was in the primary of 1912 when Oscar W. Underwood and Woodrow Wilson were listed.<sup>23</sup> Since 1943 the power of the state committee to provide for a specific listing of presidential candidates on the primary ballot has been required by statute.<sup>24</sup>

Finally, since 1945, candidates for delegates to the national convention may list after their names their choice for a presidential nominee. The act also provides for those delegates running unpledged to be carried as unpledged on the ballot.<sup>25</sup> This resulted in an extremely complicated situation in the 1952 Demo-

<sup>18</sup> Ch. 5014, Acts of Florida, 1901.

<sup>19</sup> Jacksonville, Florida Times Union, May 1, 1904, p. 15, cols. 1-2; May 10, 1904, p. 3, cols. 4-5; May 22, 1904, p. 2, cols. 1-5.

<sup>20</sup> See Overacker, The Presidential Primary, which considers early statutes and lists the Wisconsin law of 1905 and the Oregon law of 1910, and Merriam and Overacker, Primary Elections, p. 141.

<sup>21</sup> Ch. 6469, Laws of Florida, 1913.

<sup>22</sup> Ch. 6874, Laws of Florida, 1915.

<sup>23</sup> Jacksonville, Florida Times Union, May 10, 1912, p. 13, cols. 1-2, p. 17, cols. 1-2.

<sup>24</sup> Ch. 22058, Laws of Florida, 1943.

<sup>25</sup> Ch. 22729, Laws of Florida, 1945.

cratic primary. At the time of the first primary the names of Estes Kefauver and Richard Russell appeared on the ballot. Then in the second primary in May the names of the delegates appeared. However, there were further complications in 1952 because three competing slates, all pledged for Russell, appeared on the ballot for the second primary. Since the delegates were listed in alphabetical order, this produced a very long ballot and one which was definitely confusing. It resulted, moreover, in splitting the Russell vote so that Kefauver received more delegates than would otherwise have been the case. Among statewide delegates, there were eight to be elected. Sixty-one per cent of the vote was cast for Russell but only five of the eight delegate vacancies went to the Russell candidates.<sup>26</sup> All this created an atmosphere in which the Florida legislature was quite receptive to a clarification of the ballot.

There was another factor which produced a legislative atmosphere favorable to the adoption of an improved system. The present governor of Florida, LeRoy Collins, campaigning in 1954 for the two-year vacancy created by the death of the previous governor, had made "improvement of campaign laws" a plank of his platform. He was generally concerned with clarification of the ballot but more concerned with the reduction of the campaign period and the reduction in campaign expenditures. Recommendations to accomplish this were made in the governor's message at the opening of the legislature on April 5th.<sup>27</sup> A final factor which produced a favorable atmosphere for the improvement of the presidential preferential primary in Florida was the general desire of many officials of both parties to improve election laws and to recognize the two-party situation existing in many parts of the state. In 1952 Eisenhower carried the state. Then, in the 1954 elections to the United States House of Representatives, a Republican, W. C. Cramer, was elected from the district which includes St. Petersburg and Tampa. In other areas of South Florida some Republican county officials were elected. All of this called for a rejuvenation of both Democratic and Republican campaign machinery.

Late in 1954, four independent moves were made toward redrafting the election code. Governor LeRoy Collins appointed a Citizens Committee, headed by former State Senator Henry Baynard of St. Petersburg, Florida, to work on certain phases of the law. The Democratic State Committee, headed by James Milligan of Orlando, Florida, proposed legislation to strengthen the loyalty oath for both candidates and voters within the closed Florida primary system. The committee also wished to improve party finances by asking for a law which would transfer the filing fees required of all candidates from the state treasury to the party committees. It had a complete program supported by a lobby representative throughout the legislative session. W. A. F. Stephenson, Chairman of the Democratic Executive Committee for Pinellas County (St. Petersburg and Clearwater), began an independent move to recraft the code with special emphasis on adapting to the two-party situation in central and South Florida. Finally, members of the minority faction of the Republican party wanted the Republican primary of 1956 to include the choice of delegates to the national convention. The Alexander majority faction of the Republicans also was willing for the Republican delegates to the 1956 convention to be elected. The Republicans held six of the 95 seats in the Florida House of Representatives and one of the 38 seats in the Florida Senate. Their strength in voting was therefore of no importance, but both the regular Democratic organization and the minority Republicans were mutually interested in encouraging the registration of voters under the respective party labels. Under the closed primary system, this would assure elimination of many voters from the Democratic primary with an increase in the Republican registration.

<sup>26</sup> Manning J. Dauer, et al., "Florida" in Davis, et al., op. cit. Vol. 3, p. 137.

<sup>27</sup> Jacksonville, Florida Times Union, April 6, 1955, p. 1.

While other phases of the election code received the attention of different groups, the initial move to modernize the presidential preferential primary section of the election code was made by William Stephenson. In January, 1955, he wrote to Paul T. David requesting David's advice on the redrafting of the Florida primary law. David replied on January 24, 1955 outlining in a four-page memorandum "Proposed Specifications for a Presidential Primary System in Florida." David also wrote to the author of this article and by agreement with Stephenson, Dauer, and Professor Bruce B. Mason, also of the Department of Political Science of the University of Florida, undertook to draft the proposed changes in this section in the Florida law.<sup>28</sup> Mason and Dauer then studied the existing Florida law, the David proposal, the January, 1955 memorandum by Richard Childs of the National Municipal League,<sup>29</sup> and the South Dakota law, which was deemed to have the best ballot arrangement. Before the final version was ready for the legislature, several conferences were held with Stephenson and there was also an interchange of correspondence by David with Professors Louise Overacker, Arthur N. Holcombe, and Joseph P. Harris. The final draft of the law met with the general approval of all those named, except that Mr. Richard Childs, while approving the law in part, remained committed to certain different proposals.

III

In the opinion of the senior author, the object of a presidential preferential primary should be to permit the expression of a popular choice in each state. However, the preference primary should be incorporated within the framework of existing party structure. This calls for the continuation of the national nominating convention, and the election of delegate slates favorable to the candidate named in the preference primary. Finally, the delegates at the convention should be loyal to the candidate, but should be free to compromise or change as the convention develops.

It is also desirable that the presidential preferential primary not lead to the long ballot. This led Paul T. David to state:

The basic proposal is for the type of system in which the voter is required to make only one choice and one mark in order to vote the presidential primary ballot. The voter would choose among slates of delegates. But the specifications that follow could be expected to give the voter in each party a frequent choice between candidates for the presidential nomination as an aspect of his choosing between groups of candidates for delegate. In its basic structure, the proposed system contemplates and assumes that occasionally there may be a desirable candidate for President who is unwilling to campaign openly for the nomination, and who may have to be drafted if he is to be nominated at all.<sup>20</sup>

<sup>28</sup> Florida Statutes Annotated, Sec. 103.101.

<sup>29</sup> "Outline of a Model State Primary Law" (mimeographed).

The specific proposals of David to carry out these principles are as follows:

1. The presidential primary would be a closed primary; voters would be allowed to vote only the ballot of the political party in which they are registered.

2. The ballot would carry organized slates of delegates; a would-be delegate would be allowed to run for election not as an individual, but only as a part of an organized slate that includes a full list of candidates for delegate-at-large, together with a full quota of district delegates in at least half of the congressional districts of the state.

3. Delegates-at-large would be elected on the basis of the state-wide vote; district delegates on the basis of the vote in their respective districts.

4. In each congressional district, the ballot would carry only the portions of the slates to be voted on in that district: the candidates for delegate-at-large and for district delegates for that congressional district.

5. Organized slates that prefer a particular individual for the presidential nomination would be allowed to indicate their preference on the ballot, in a position prominently associated with the box or circle in which the voter places his mark. The consent of the potential nominee would not be required for the inclusion of such expression of preference on the ballot.

6. If two or more slates are filed in support of the same candidate, he would be given an opportunity to choose the one to appear on the ballot. If he declined the making of a choice, the first slate filed would be placed on the ballot.

7. Delegates would not be required to execute any formal pledge of support for the candidate they favor, the moral commitment implied in association on the ballot being deemed sufficient if the candidate proves to be available.

8. The ballot would carry organized slates running on a "no preference" basis where such slates are offered.

9. If two or more "no preference" slates meet the filing requirements in a presidential primary of the same party, all would appear on the ballot.

10. In each slate of delegates carried on the ballot, the individual to serve as delegation chairman should be clearly indicated and he should head the list of candidates for delegate-at-large.

11. Members of each slate accepted for the ballot should be required to file a public statement of not more than 1000 words in which they set forth so far as possible the position they propose to take on known issues that will come before the national convention and on which it is expected that the convention will be divided.

12. There would be no provision for a separate presidential preference poll in which the voters would vote on candidates for the presidential nomination, as distinguished from slates of delegates supporting a particular candidate.

<sup>20</sup> David's "proposals," Jan., 1955. In preparing his "Proposed Specifications," David drew on research at the Brookings Institution, financed by a grant from The John Randolph Haynes and Dora Haynes Foundation of Los Angeles, as well as on the earlier work for The American Political Science Association.

The David proposals were all incorporated in the Florida law except for point 11. The main differences between the general principles of Richard Childs and the David proposals were: first, no direct effort was made to include Childs' suggestion that there be a form of proportional representation. This was contrary to the experience in Florida and would not have been deemed acceptable. On the other hand, it was equally certain that a single vote for all the delegates, electing them from the state at large, would not be acceptable. Consequently, David's point 3, that "delegates-at-large would be elected on the basis of the state-wide vote; district delegates on the basis of the vote in their respective districts," was deemed to accomplish both what was feasible in this direction and what would reflect the voters' opinion in instances where the minority

Candidates Preferring JOHN GREEN for President	Candidates Preferring JAMES BROWN for President	Candidates Expressing No Preference

Delegates-at-Large	Delegates-at-Large	Delegates-at-Large
Organizing Chairman Sam White	Organizing Chairman Robert Gray	Organizing Chairman John Williams
John Jones Belle Brooks	Charles Smith Hildred Casey	Peter Kyne Wilbur Collins
District Delegates John Doe Mary Roe	District Delegates William Jones Peter Sands	District Delegates Tom Burt Susie Brown

FIG. 1. Florida Presidential Primary Ballot.

might be concentrated in one or more congressional districts. At the same time this was accomplished without the need for further marking on the ballot by the provision of the Florida Law, Sec. 101.180, Florida Statutes Annotated, and Sec. 103.101, sub-section 7, which simply specifies that a vote on the ballot shall be counted separately for the state-at-large delegates and within each congressional district. (See Figure 1.)

One other feature, found both in the South Dakota law and in the Childs proposal, was rejected: requiring a candidate's approval before his name be put on the ballot. It was believed to be desirable, both by David and in Florida practice, that the Florida law should not require approval of candidates for president before delegates pledged to him might file. On the other hand, if the presidential candidate does take an active interest in the delegates, the Secretary of State is directed to enter on the ballot only the slate approved by the candidate. In case he does not indicate a choice of delegates and more than one slate files for him, only the first slate which files with the Secretary of State shall appear on the ballot. In subsequent discussion with the Election Committees of the Florida House and Senate, the only objection raised to this feature was by Representative Fred C. Peterson, Republican, of Pinellas. He pointed out that this would discriminate against the minority faction of the Republican party, of which he was a member, when his party was in power nationally. If the national party recognized only the state organization as the official representative of the administration, a delegate who might win in a congressional district could be omitted from the official party slate.

In accord with Florida practice, the law Florida Statutes Annotated, Sec. 103.101 provides that half the delegation shall be men, and half women. It also provides that each delegate shall select his or her own alternate. Finally, it provides for filling vacancies in district delegates in case a slate carries the district, but its list is incomplete in that district by action of the state-at-large delegation, if that group is elected which also is pledged to the same presidential candidate.

No attempt was made in Florida to pledge the delegates for a given number of ballots. The assumption was that in the average case those delegates who appear on the ballot will have the approval of the candidate for president and will have a point of view sufficiently favorable to him that they will remain loyal as long as there is any practical chance of the convention nominating the candidate. David's own view is that the delegates and the convention should be allowed reasonable freedom of action. He states: "I would be inclined to emphasize the desirability of leaving the delegate in a position to represent his constituents in accordance with his best judgment after having informed them of the preference by which he intends to be guided, particularly since the delegate does not receive any pledge that his preferred candidate will in fact be available. My view is that most delegates who are formally pledged stay frozen too long rather than not long enough, in terms of the major interests of their own constituents. However, we expect to have additional data on this after we complete studies currently in process."<sup>1</sup>

IV

Stephenson had worked for five months in the winter of 1954-55 on the proposed revision of the election code. He also did considerable spadework prior to the convening of the legislature in April to secure support for the proposals, including the presidential preferential primary section. He explained the legislation to the officials of the State Democratic Executive Committee, who agreed to adopt an attitude of benevolent neutrality. To have taken a positive stand would have required a vote of the entire state committee; this was not considered feasible. In Florida, those officials most concerned with the election machinery are the county supervisors of registration, who are elected in each county. Stephenson appeared before their state organization at their annual meeting and explained the proposed changes. This was an important group to consider because they maintain a lobby of at least three members who attend all meetings of the Elections Committees during the session of the legislature and also have contact with the other organizations of county officials. The author also studied the provisions of the general bill and participated in their presentation to other groups.

<sup>1</sup> David to Dauer, Aug. 3, 1955.

Further work was done by Stephenson with the Speaker of the Florida House, Ted David, of Ft. Lauderdale, H. T. Cook, Chairman of the House Elections Committee, and Farris Bryant, retiring Speaker and powerful House leader. All subsequently supported the legislation strongly. This was possible prior to the session, because the Florida legislature is organized as a continuous body, although it meets only biennially. The Speaker for the next session is nominated by the Democratic caucus of the House at its meeting two years before the convening of the new legislature. This act is binding on newly-elected members of the legislature by custom. The Speaker-designate then names the committees which also work in the period between sessions.

The senior author of this article had been appointed to two of the Governor's Citizens Advisory Committees, Reapportionment and Constitutional Revision. This enabled him to clear the proposed legislation with the Governor and his legislative aides for the House and Senate respectively. The Governor expressed interest in the general revision but specified that his own program of cutting campaign costs should have priority in case of deadlock over some of the more sweeping changes, such as the change of primary date to the fall. The Governor gave permission to incorporate his own program in the general bill revising the election code.

One cross-current that appeared throughout the session was the continuing battle between the Democratic State Committee, which had campaigned for Adlai Stevenson and wanted to strengthen the loyalty pledge, and the National committeeman, Mr. Richard Barker, who had refused to campaign for Stevenson and who opposed strengthening the loyalty pledge.

A final complicating factor was the split in the Republican party. The dominant faction in the state is the Alexander-Spades faction, which controls the State Committee and represents the state on the Republican National Committee. In part its control depends on the existing composition of the State Committee, i.e., two members from each county. This constitutes a serious underrepresentation for the populous counties with a large Republican registration. Members of the opposing faction are anxious for a more representative State Committee. Also, this opposition faction has long stood for electing delegates to the national convention in the party primary. This division in the Republican delegation, however, affected the attitude of the Republicans on the election laws.

The main provisions of the proposed code, in addition to the presidential preference primary, were:

1. The bill incorporated a recommendation by the Governor, based on that of his own Citizens Committee, that the cost of campaigning be limited by prohibiting all campaigning before a first filing date and that the last filing date for candidates for state-wide offices be moved to 63 days before the first primary.<sup>32</sup> Prior to this first date it would not be possible to set up county campaign headquarters, distribute literature, and publish advertising.

2. Stephenson also proposed a change in primary dates from the regular primary dates in May. The first primary was to be held seven weeks before the general election in November, followed by the second primary four weeks before the general election. These provisions were combined with the Governor's recommendation as to the filing date. Coming from a two-party county, Pinellas, Stephenson felt this to be important in the interest of securing higher calibre candidates. Under existing law the primary campaign lasts from January to May, and is followed by the general election campaign. This takes too much time and results in many capable individuals, refusing to run for office.

3. The proposed change of primary dates from May to September would require the holding of a special primary—the presidential preference primary—every four years. The time for this was fixed at the third Tuesday in June. It was estimated that the cost of this primary every four years would be about $250,000.

4. In order to assure a primary for the Republican party, the percentage of vote required was reduced. Presidential primaries were now to be required for any party polling 10 per cent of the vote for governor in the last election; or any party having 10 per cent of the total number of registered voters.<sup>33</sup>

5. The composition of the State Executive Committee would affect the presidential preferential primary law in one particular case. This would occur when the national party in power recognized only the state executive committee. In such a case it would be important to make the state committee representative of population and not of counties, for under the proposed law the state committee would control the state delegate slate approved by a president running for re-election. It was also believed that a more representative state committee would be otherwise more effective. Accordingly, a section of the proposed law also changed the composition of the State Executive Committee by abolishing the system of two members (one man and one woman) from each county. Instead, the State Executive Committee was to have four members (two men and two women) from each congressional district with a bonus of one additional man and one additional woman from each congressional district in which the party had 20,000 registered electors. An additional two members would be added for each additional 20,000 registered electors, provided that not more than eight men and eight women might be qualified from a single congressional district.

6. Other provisions of the law will not be considered in detail. In general they aimed at tightening up the law concerning campaign contributions, including an enforcement section.<sup>34</sup> Registration provisions were liberalized by providing that registration books may be placed in precincts during certain periods.<sup>35</sup> The party circle type of ballot and party lever on the voting machine by county option was likewise proposed.<sup>36</sup> An alternative, to eliminate statewide the circle and single lever for all unopposed candidates in general elections, was adopted.

<sup>32</sup> Subsequently enacted as Ch. 29,936, Laws of Florida, 1955.

<sup>33</sup> Subsequently enacted Ch. 29,947, Laws of Florida, 1955. Also Florida Statutes Annotated, 97.021 (6) (b) requires a party primary to nominate for all elective county, state, and national offices when a party registers over five per cent of the voters under its designation.

<sup>34</sup> Subsequently enacted as Ch. 29,936, Laws of Florida, 1955; for earlier provision, see

V

The senior author and Stephenson registered as lobbyists<sup>37</sup> and presented the entire program to the House Election Committee on April 6. The reception was favorable, both by the committee and by the press and public.<sup>38</sup> However, the bill was sufficiently complex that a number of sessions of the House Committee were devoted to consideration of it. The presidential preferential primary section (subsequently a separate bill as H.B. 1584, S.B. 1130) was never in question. The provisions designed to limit campaign costs were also unquestioned. Certain changes in registration procedures were approved. Finally, the sections increasing party funds by turning over to them the filing fees of candidates in the primaries were also approved.

On the other hand, opposition resulted in the elimination of:

1. Any strengthening of the party loyalty oath for candidates or voters.
2. The provision to make the state committees of the parties more representative of population.
3. The party column ballot.
4. The change of primary dates.<sup>39</sup>

---

Elston Roady, "Florida's New Campaign Expense Law, and the 1952 Democratic Gubernatorial Primaries," this REVIEW, Vol. 48, pp. 465-76, at pp. 465-66 (June, 1954).

<sup>35</sup> Subsequently enacted as Ch. 29,934, Laws of Florida, 1955.

<sup>36</sup> The omnibus law, H.B., 1204, was 62 double-space legal pages long. It was introduced on May 11, 1955 by H. T. Cook, chairman, and other members of the election committee in an effort to get something in print for public hearings. For summary see Florida Legislative Service, Summaries of House Bills, Tallahassee, May 11, 1955.

<sup>37</sup> The Florida law and Florida Senate Rules have no requirements for lobbyist registration. The Florida House Rules require such registration of all those who appear and testify before any House committee. The senior author appeared eight times before the committee; Stephenson appeared innumerable times and worked with the House Committee and the bill drafting section of the Attorney General's office continuously in Tallahassee for the last four weeks of the legislature. In addition, both worked with the Senate Committee headed by Senator J. C. Getzen, and the Senate sub-committee headed by Senator George Tapper. Among the House and Senate members who were delegates to the 1952 Democratic Convention there was strong support for the presidential primary bill. These included the Chairman of the Florida delegation, former House Speaker Farris Bryant, Rep. J. A. Boyd, and Senator John Rawls.

<sup>38</sup> For editorial comment see, for example, Tampa Tribune, April 8, 1955; Ft. Pierce, News-Tribune, April 8, 1955; Ocala Star-Banner, April 17, 1955; and feature article in St. Petersburg Times, June 13, 14, 15, 1955.

<sup>39</sup> This provision backfired. At one stage there was favorable report on Florida HJR 260 to shorten the campaign by moving all general elections except the vote for President to the third Tuesday in June, retaining the primary dates in May. This constitutional amendment was dropped when it was found to be contrary to federal law covering the election of senators and representatives in Congress.

5. The prohibition against party officers serving as paid polls officials or as deputy sheriffs on election day.

Once these sections were stricken from the omnibus bill, Stephenson reassembled it over a weekend as six different bills, which were introduced in the House and Senate on May 24, 1955, ten days before the end of the session.<sup>40</sup> The Senate passed the bills on May 30, 31, and June 1. The Presidential Primary Bill, S.B. 1130, was adopted by a vote of 34-2. In the House all bills were passed on the night of June 2. One amendment to S.B. 1130 to strike sub-sections (2) and (3) was proposed by Republican Representative Fred Petersen but was overwhelmed. Thereupon the bill passed by a vote of 77-2, with the Republican vote divided between the YEAS and NAYS.<sup>41</sup> The House accepted without question the assurance of its Elections Committee Chairman, H. T. Cook, a representative of 20 years' experience without whose quiet and powerful assistance the legislation could not have passed. The Governor signed the presidential primary bill on June 18 and the other bills on June 20.<sup>42</sup> The State Committee's program died on the calendar, by understanding within the House Elections Committee, since all its provisions except the candidate and voter loyalty pledges had been incorporated into the six bills.

VI

Since enactment of the Florida presidential preferential primary law, national reaction has been generally favorable. In the New York Times, Arthur Krock considered the law "... a great improvement over any other now in effect." He also pointed out that "Florida's new law is derived from a five-volume study which the Brookings Institution made for the American Political Science Association."<sup>43</sup> In this last statement, there is a certain degree of elipsis.

Senator Paul Douglas in a letter to W. F. Stephenson said:

"... It is easily the best presidential primary bill in the United States and should serve as a model. I suppose that the absence of a formal pledge to stick by the candidates approved in the primary will not be a serious detriment in Florida, although I think in some states it distinctly might be. The same issue came up about 1912 in some states in the election of Senators by the State Legislatures, and as to how binding a popular and advisory vote was to be. . . ."<sup>44</sup>

Congressman Charles Bennett has also stated:

"The Florida legislature recently took a forward step in the art of democratic government. It enacted an improved presidential primary statute which pioneers in a number of re-

<sup>40</sup> See Florida Senate Journal, May 24, 1955. The bills were: S.B. 1130 (H.B. 1584 companion bill), presidential preferential primary; S.B. 1131 (H.B. 1591) registration procedures; S.B. 1132 (H.B. 1588), filing fees to state committees; S.B. 1133 (H.B. 1589) campaign expenditures and contributions; S.B. 1134 (H.B. 1590) changes in primary and general election ballot forms; S.B. 1157 (H.B. 1587), filling vacancies in party nominations. For summary see Florida, Attorney General, Summary of Election Law Changes Made by 1955 Legislature (Tallahassee, June, 1955).

<sup>41</sup> Florida Senate Journal, 1955, May 30, 1955 p. 1.90; Florida House Journal, 1955, June 2, 1955, p. 1955.

<sup>42</sup> Telegram, Governor LeRoy Collins to Daurer, June 21, 1955.

<sup>43</sup> July 8, 1955, p. 22, col. 5.

<sup>44</sup> Douglas to Stephenson, July 11, 1955.

spects. This statute may be the model for similar statutes in other States which share Florida's objective of giving the American people more voice in the nomination of candidates for President and Vice President."<sup>45</sup>

Governor Leroy Collins, in a statement on July 27 to the meeting of the National Municipal League, thanked Paul David and Richard S. Childs for their aid and stated that if the experience of Florida is favorable, he hopes that the law may be useful to other states.<sup>46</sup> At present the Florida law is also under consideration as a model law before the Subcommittee on Elections of the Drafting Committee of the Council of State Governments.<sup>47</sup> Finally, as to potential use of the law, while the filing date for candidates for the 1956 primaries does not close until noon March 6, contests between opposing delegate slates are developing in both major party primaries. Stevenson and Kefauver have begun campaigning in Florida in the Democratic primary, and there has been discussion that a conservative Democratic slate might also be entered. In preparation for the Republican primary Senator Knowland has appeared in the state, while the party's state committee has announced the entry of a slate of delegates pledged to Eisenhower.

Both Senator Douglas and Congressman Bennett continue to criticize the system of separate state primaries, however. Douglas also still feels that the pledging of delegates by law is important. Both he and Bennett desire the uniformity among states which their law would encourage. Bennett likewise believes that: "Without . . . Federal legislation, each candidate would continue to enter the primaries of the states in which his chances of success would be best."<sup>48</sup> No law of a single state can, of course, assure the uniformity desired by Douglas and Bennett. However, Senator Douglas' objections concerning the pledging of delegates do not seem very serious. An active presidential candidate, who has an organization in a state, would find it more advantageous to have selected a slate than to have a pledged slate which he does not select.

There is, finally, the traditional objection that the presidential primary weakens the party organization in a state. The answer to this objection is that the Florida law does provide for the closed primary. It should help to draw lines between the parties by assuring the Republicans of an additional reason for registering in the Republican party. They may expect to have more real contests in their primaries. Moreover, the law assumes that the choice of presidential nominees is a matter of vital concern to the party members as a whole. Furthermore, the Florida preference primary continues to operate within the framework of the national conventions. It assumes that conventions will be more representative and can therefore make the strongest choice for the party leadership. If the preference primary enables the convention to make a better choice, parties will in the future be more effective than they are today.

<sup>45</sup> Congressional Record, July 13, 1955, Vol. 101, pp. 8997-98.

<sup>46</sup> Press Release to National Meeting of the League, July 27, 1955.

<sup>47</sup> This committee has as its chairman Mr. Willoughby A. Colby of New Hampshire, and one of the members is Mr. Charles Tom Henderson, Assistant Attorney General of Florida. David to Dauer, Oct. 21, 1955.

<sup>48</sup> Congressional Record, July 13, 1955, Vol. 101, p. 8998.

EXPERIMENTAL PROPAGANDA TECHNIQUES AND VOTING BEHAVIOR*

SAMUEL J. ELDERSVELD

University of Michigan

During 1953 and 1954 two different experiments designed to determine the comparative effectiveness of personalized and impersonalized propaganda techniques were conducted in Ann Arbor. Although "scientific" in orientation, both of them were carried out in conjunction with the teaching of a political science course in public opinion. This not only provided a unique pedagogical opportunity but also made possible the execution of a particularly difficult type of research. In the report following the first year's experiment, the class procedure used and the drawbacks resulting from the use of students were discussed.<sup>1</sup> Here we will present the major findings and interpretations of two years of such experimental work.

Personal contact in political campaigns in the United States today receives a prominent emphasis in the thinking and planning of party strategists. Despite technological improvements in the mass media, especially television, there is today no diminution in attention to programs for personalized appeals to "get out the vote," unsystematic though such programs may often be. Successful political campaigners in recent years invariably relate their success in part, at least, to the volume of their handshaking, their extensive itineraries, and the intensity of personalized organizational work. In November, 1954 President Eisenhower made history with his initiation of a Republican "talkathon" by telephoning ten party workers around the nation just before election day. This personal contact emphasis in American political campaigns, while not as extensive nor as systematic as the alleged 100 per cent house-to-house canvassing in many British constituencies, stands in decided contrast to the impersonal conduct of campaigns in some other countries. House-to-house canvassing is frowned upon or just not done in countries like the Netherlands, Germany, and Japan. In the Netherlands this is not only because of compulsory attendance at the polls, but also because of the attitudes the Dutch people have about the propriety of certain canvassing techniques. In a recent sample survey of the attitudes of Dutch adults toward their political system, three-fifths of the respondents said it was not important to know the party candidates they were voting for, and less than 30 per cent thought it was a good idea for candidates to go around the country speaking and promising the people what they would do if elected. American political strategists operate in terms of quite different political action premises.

* Ford Foundation funds of the University of Michigan which were allocated for political behavior research supported these projects. Several individuals assisted considerably in the research: Elizabeth Marvick, Dwaine Marvick, S. J. Vodka, A. A. Applegate, Irwin Goldberg, R. W. Dodge, and Sidney Beland. Appreciation is expressed here also to Ann Arbor city government officials, as well as to Professors Harold D. Lasswell, Morris Janowitz, and Theodore N. Newcomb, all of whom made helpful suggestions for the successful prosecution of the research.

<sup>1</sup> See S. J. Eldersveld and R. W. Dodge, "Personal Contact or Mail Propaganda? An Experiment in Voting Turnout and Attitude Change," in Daniel Katz, Dorwin Cartwright, Samuel Eldersveld, and Alfred McClung Lee (eds.), Public Opinion and Propaganda (New York, 1954), pp. 532-42.

The efficacy of different types of canvassing techniques in political campaigns and the conditions under which a propaganda "breakthrough" occurs have not been clearly established. We do know more today than previously, however, about the extent of such efforts and their possible relationship to other voting behavior determinants. In the Survey Research Center (University of Michigan) study of the 1952 election the authors point out that, while the mass media are "the chief avenues by which the parties seek to reach the electorate," 12 per cent of their sample reported that they had been solicited by party canvassers on the doorstep or by telephone.<sup>2</sup> Using these data, a careful analysis of the interrelationship of party canvassing, political predispositions of the respondents, and primary group pressures was made by Morris Janowitz and Dwaine Marvick.<sup>3</sup> This analysis revealed that canvassing efforts were closely related to voter activation and, to a certain extent, were also linked to a larger vote for the party canvassing, although a "boomerang effect" was also detected. More important were the findings of differential effects for predispositional types, with "apathetic" persons staying home more than "effective citizens," despite party canvassing. These investigators also found a contrast in the effectiveness of canvassing those under concerted primary group pressure for a candidate and those in a "conflict" or neutral primary group situation. There was only limited effectiveness as a result of canvassing those already under concerted pro-Eisenhower or pro-Stevenson primary group pressure, but individuals in a conflict or neutral primary group situation had less tendency to stay home if they were canvassed. These findings indicate, therefore, certain conditions under which personalized voter activation appeals can succeed.

Certain basic questions remain, however: (1) What type of personalized canvassing is most effective, and when; and what is the extent and nature of the advantage of personal contact over propaganda efforts of an impersonal type? (2) Does the impact vary in different election contexts and types of campaigns? (3) Can the point of diminishing returns be precisely established; that is, is there a category of voters whom personal contact does not influence? (4) Is the substantive content of the appeal relevant to the effect? (5) Are other variables besides "political predisposition" and "primary group pressure" as significant for specifying the limits of canvassing effectiveness? (6) What is the cost, particularly the time-cost, for such efforts relative to success? (7) What are the implications for party success, as well as for the democratic political system? Such are the questions which it is hoped the propaganda experiments we have conducted may eventually answer.

<sup>2</sup> Angus Campbell, Gerald Gurin, and Warren Miller, The Voter Decides (Evanston, Ill., 1954), pp. 31-33.

<sup>3</sup> Morris Janowitz and Dwaine Marvick, Competitive Pressure and Democratic Consent: An Interpretation of the Politics of the 1952 Presidential Election (Ann Arbor, Mich., 1956).

The field experiment, controlled for propaganda technique, substantive appeal, and the characteristics of the propagandees, is a research tool of great value for such problems. Employed over time in a series of similar and contrasting electoral situations in a given community, it permits replication, in a qualified sense, as well as a great number of investigative permutations. It is particularly suited, furthermore, to a careful analysis of the relationship of community structure differences and unique local institutional practices and conditions, factors which the non-experimental national survey cannot introduce as well. Our Ann Arbor experiments have attempted to exploit some of these research opportunities.

I. THE RESEARCH SETTING IN 1954

In the 1953 Ann Arbor experiment two experimental groups were used, one exposed to four waves of mail propaganda, the other to personal house-to-house canvassing. The objectives were to activate the voter and to alter attitudes to favor revision of the municipal charter. The propagandees were purposely selected because of their lack of information about a charter revision question (which was to appear on the ballot) or because they had previously expressed opinions which were considered unfavorable on the question. The post-experiment interviews revealed that personal contact was most successful in activating people to vote and in changing attitudes, although it was difficult to isolate these two effects. One-third of the control group voted (which was the same percentage as the turnout for the city as a whole, according to the election statistics), 59 per cent of those who had received our mail voted, and 75 per cent of those who had been personally contacted in the experiment voted. (About the same proportions obtained so far as attitude change was concerned, except that only 46 per cent of the mail propagandees voted in favor of charter revision.) In addition, it was found that the personal contact group recalled the stimulus more frequently, had a greater tendency to be exposed to other media during the campaign (especially newspaper coverage), and, paradoxically, rated personal contact as less effective an influence medium than newspapers. The mail propaganda group had greater difficulty with recall, were less exposed to other media, and rated personal contact as the most influential medium.

In the Spring of 1954 these experiments were continued in connection with the annual Spring election in Ann Arbor. The general objective was to check up on our findings of 1953, but we were also interested in pushing the research further, both in the sense of coping with a somewhat different electoral situation and by introducing additional experimental techniques. We were concerned primarily with voter activation in 1954. Briefly, the 1954 experiments differed in the following ways: (1) the election and campaign situation was different; (2) the propagandees were selected differently and were a special "apathetic" group in the electorate; (3) further refinements in canvassing techniques were introduced; and (4) some variations in the substantive content of the propaganda appeal were attempted.

The Ann Arbor election of April 5, 1954 permitted voters again to elect aldermen and county supervisors from each of the seven wards of the city in a partisan election. The voters also had the opportunity to vote "yes" or "no" on three proposals: a general proposal for the construction of a new city hall; the location of the new city hall at a particular site, "the Ann Street site"—controversial because it would mean displacement of Negroes living in that block; and a change in the retirement pay for city employees. The campaign was fiercely contested by both political parties. It was also characterized by continuous and extensive discussion of the city hall question in community groups, in the newspapers, and by radio. This issue cut across party lines to a certain extent, with the Republican mayor (who was not up for re-election) opposed by a significant group in his own party, as well as becoming involved in a well-publicized verbal battle with the Democratic city chairman over it. The city hall proposals were defeated. The Democrats increased their strength in almost all wards in this traditionally Republican community and elected an alderman in one ward which had previously been safe Republican territory. This description of the election is presented to indicate that the "attention-demanding" aspects of the campaign and election in 1954 appear to have been more numerous and intense than in 1953. Voting turnout was only slightly lower in 1954 than in 1953, despite the fact that 1953 had a mayoralty race and had the charter revision question on the ballot. Charter revision had passed by a nine to one vote in 1953; the proposal for the new city hall was defeated in 1954. In many respects the election was more competitive in 1954, especially because the issues-controversy was of a different order and more sharply delineated. The city hall controversy brought into play more obviously than in the previous year certain personal values and motivations, due to the possibility of financial deprivations and the displacement of a minority group, as well as certain environmental-change perspectives and values.

II. THE RESEARCH PLAN AND PROCEDURE

We selected 500 individuals as our special group of "local election apathetics." This was done by checking through the records of the city clerk and taking every person living in the four precincts of central Ann Arbor who had voted regularly in the state and national elections of 1948, 1950, and 1952 but who had never voted in local elections.<sup>4</sup> These were, then, persons who had lived in Ann Arbor several years but apparently had little interest in local government affairs. They were not the hard core of consistent nonvoters in all elections, but only the local elections nonvoting hard core. This contrasted with the 1953 propagandee group, which was composed of attitudinal "indifferents" and "hostiles" on charter revision, many of whom, however, had voted in local elections. The assumption made in 1954 was that our job of voter activation would be much more difficult. The 500 persons selected, it must also be remembered, were not a representative sample of "apathetics" in Ann Arbor, although they did reside in three wards characterized by different population and socio-economic class characteristics. This was not crucial for our experiment, however, since we were not seeking to generalize voting behavior in the city of Ann Arbor.

<sup>4</sup> Later we found that some of these individuals had left the city, moved to another ward, or died.

Initially the propagandees were divided into six experimental groups and one control group by a random assignment procedure (Table I). This was done in order to repeat the 1953 distinction between mail propaganda and personal contact while at the same time distinguishing two types of mail propaganda and four types of personal canvassing. We distinguished between "rational" mail propaganda (which made a factual and somewhat intellectual appeal) and "moral" mail propaganda (which made a "super-go" appeal and emphasized the "citizen duty" aspects of voting). The canvassing techniques which differentiated the experimental groups were as follows: one group, as in 1953, was subjected to personal canvassing on the doorstep by students of a political science class in public opinion. But since we wanted to approach more closely a "reality canvassing situation," arrangements were made for party canvassers to contact a second group. A third group was contacted by telephone in the last two days preceding the election. A fourth group not only was canvassed by students but also was sent rational mail propaganda, a technique presumably permitting us to analyze the "reinforcement" effect of the two efforts. Those

TABLE I. PLANNED AND ACTUAL SAMPLE SIZES

Group	Planned Sample Size	Actual Sample* Size Personal Contact:
By students	20	40
By party canvassers	20	24
By telephone	27	25
By students and mail	28	33
Total	95	122
Mail Contact:
"Rational" mail	76	39
"Moral" mail	72	42
Total	148	81
Control	107	187†

* The reduced size of the actual sample was the result of "mortality" in our groups, either because of failure to complete a possible contact, inaccuracy in the city clerk's records, death, change in residence, or other reasons resulting in inaccessibility.

† This figure was obtained by adding to the estimated 67 persons accessible from the planned control group 120 persons who were in the planned experimental groups but for some reason or other were not contacted. This group of 187 is referred to as the "residual" group. When it is possible to isolate the original control group, figures are given for it as well as for the residual group.

who were canvassed by party workers, we found out later, were individuals with whom the parties would not ordinarily bother. The students emphasized the rational type of appeal in their canvassing, but the line of argument used in the party canvass was not controlled as easily and may have been a mixture of the two appeals.

The students in the class devoted their spare time during approximately three months to the innumerable jobs connected with the experiment. The initial selection of respondents by using the city clerk's files took five people one afternoon. The study design had to be carefully worked out by staff and students. The content of four waves of two types of mail propaganda was decided in committees, the mimeographing or printing had to be arranged, and the stuffing and addressing of envelopes had to be done at specified times. In the meantime the content and method of the personal contact which the students were to make had to be formulated, as well as the nature of the report they were to make after each contact, and careful training for the contact job was necessary. The same was done for those students responsible for the telephone canvass. After the election of April 5th a complete check was again made of the city clerk's records and a sample of 102 respondents, selected at random from the original groups, was interviewed. This in itself took much time, for it required the preparation of a questionnaire as well as other activities associated with the conduct of a field survey. Throughout the entire research operation a staff of four graduate students worked with the course instructor. The usual problems in such a research operation arose: the "disappearance" of propagandees, the inaccuracy of official records, the difficulty of contact despite frequent callbacks, the inexperience of students, and the necessity of telescoping research into the short time of a school semester. (Even with this telescoping the students could not be properly involved in the analysis stage at the close of the semester.) These conditions suggest that caution should be used in the acceptance of the results. However, although this is exploratory research and not as "scientific" as we would like, the data are interesting and of possible value for understanding the type of problem posed here.<sup>5</sup>

III. FINDINGS

Of primary interest, of course, was the extent to which our 1953 findings on voting turnout were corroborated in 1954 when we were dealing with a group which was politically more apathetic. Table II compares the 1953 and 1954 findings with respect to this point. Both experiments produced significant results among those personally contacted. The 1954 results are as important as those of the previous year, although only 25 percent of the personally canvassed group voted, compared with 75 per cent in 1953. It must be kept in mind that our propagandees in 1954 had never voted in Ann Arbor elections. On the other hand, the mail propaganda effort, which produced results in 1953, was a failure in 1954, relatively speaking. This was so despite the use of the same general procedure both years. Tentatively, there is evidence here that it is possible to get some of the "hard core" of local election "apathetics" to vote, but this cannot be accomplished primarily through the use of mail propaganda,

<sup>5</sup> The chi-square test was used to test the statistical significance of our principal findings in the 1953 and 1954 studies. The voting turnout (Table II) results of each of these studies were found significant at least at the .05 level, i.e., the probability of obtaining these results by chance is less than one in twenty. The findings presented in other tables here do not achieve this level of significance because the number of cases in most of the cells of the tables is small. The fact that larger frequencies might yield statistically significant results serves to emphasize the desirability of future replications.

TABLE II. VOTING BEHAVIOR FOR EXPERIMENTAL AND CONTROL GROUPS, 1953 AND 1954*

Voting Behavior	1953			1954
	Type of Contact		Control	Type of Contact		Residual
	Personal Contact	Mail		Personal Contact	Mail
	(N = 20)	(N = 22)	(N = 27)	(N = 122)	(N = 81)	(N = 187)
Voted	75%	59%	33%	55%	10%	6%
Did Not Vote	25	51	67	75	90	95
Total	100%	100%	100%	100%	100%	100%

* The results of both the 1953 and the 1954 experiments are statistically significant at the commonly accepted levels. The 1953 results yield a chi-square of 7.6. The probability of getting these results by chance is less than .05 (i.e., less than one in twenty). The 1954 results given here yield a chi-square of 24.3. The probability of getting these results by chance is less than .001. Two other sets of figures might be given in the third column of the 1954 table. Of the original control group of 147 eight per cent were found to have voted. Of the 67 individuals in the control group who were estimated still to live in Ann Arbor, 13 per cent voted. The substitution of either of these sets of figures does not disturb the statistical significance of the 1954 results. If the entire control group is used, the results yield a chi-square of 15.1, significant at the .001 level. If the reduced control group is used, the results yield a chi-square of 9.2, significant at the .02 level.

of whatever type, even when the campaign is intense, widely publicized, attention-demanding, and characterized by emotionally controversial public issues. Although the activation effect of personal contact was greater than that of mail propaganda, it too was of limited success.

A second question the 1954 study sought to answer was: are differential propaganda techniques of the personal contact variety related to voting turnout? The results for each of the personal contact groups are given in Table III. From these results it appears that there may be practically no advantage of one personal contact technique over another. The voting results for the group canvassed by telephone (24 per cent) were only slightly lower, surprisingly enough, than for those canvassed on the doorstep by party workers (29 per cent) or by students (25 per cent). These results certainly need verification in future experiments.

The argument might well be made, of course, that for some reason those in our experimental group were exposed to other campaign stimuli than those in the control group, or that those who voted in each group may have been individuals who were under particular types of non-experimental pressure. In an experiment of this type the individuals are assigned to the groups randomly and, therefore, we assume randomness of exposure to a wide variety of get-out-the-vote stimuli. But, as a check, we carefully compared the experimental and control groups on several possible campaign stimuli, using the data from our post-election survey. We found a strikingly similar pattern of exposure for all groups, particularly for the personal contact experimental groups in relation

TABLE III. TYPE OF CONTACT AND VOTING BEHAVIOR

Voting Behavior	Personal Contact				Mail		Residual
	Students	Party	Telephone	Students and Mail	"Rational"	"Moral"
	(N = 40)	(N = 24)	(N = 33)	(N = 25)	(N = 39)	(N = 42)	(N = 187)
Voted	25%	29%	24%	24%	8%	12%	6%
Did Not Vote	75%	71%	76%	76%	92%	88%	94%
Total	100%	100%	100%	100%	100%	100%	100%

to the other groups. About 86 per cent of all groups read the Ann Arbor News daily; 30 per cent of those not personally contacted and 39 per cent of the personal contact group listened to local radio programs; 65 per cent of the personal contact group received election propaganda in the mail from sources other than our group, while 75 per cent of the control group did; 29 per cent of both groups received telephone calls from groups other than our own; 33 per cent discussed the election with their friends; 10 per cent of both groups were political party "activists." It seems clear that randomness of exposure to campaign sources and stimuli did exist and that the results of the experiment, therefore, cannot be explained away in terms of differential non-experimental stimuli. There is strong evidence that our personal contacts constituted an experimental force which was responsible for differential voting behavior.

An analysis was again made, as in 1953, of the extent to which individuals recalled the experimental stimulus. There was obviously much more pamphlet-eering going on in 1954, since 87 per cent of our post-election sample recalled receiving mail. But it was striking again that our personal contact stimulus was recalled much more frequently than the reception of our mail—50 per cent compared to 18 per cent recalling in the relevant experimental groups. (Seventy-three per cent of the telephone group also recalled such a stimulus but we were less sure in this case that it was the call we had made.) Further, there was a tendency for more of those recalling a personal contact to vote than was true of those not remembering—38 per cent as compared to 30 per cent. The opposite was true for those who recalled the reception of mail—31 per cent voted, whereas 40 per cent of those not recalling mail voted.

Although those personally contacted read the Ann Arbor News no more than the other groups, there was a tendency again, as in 1953, for those personally contacted to be more aware of the coverage of the campaign in the newspaper. The difference was not as marked as in 1953, however, probably because of the greater intensity of the 1954 campaign. We also asked our respondents to rate the media and propaganda techniques as to effectiveness, as we had in 1953, and the pattern of response was somewhat different. The majority of all groups rated personal contact the most effective medium, which was not the case in 1953, although again those who had been personally contacted supported this technique least. This may be, ironically, a "boomerang" reaction.

A basic question in research such as this concerns the personal characteristics of those who can be influenced by propaganda pressures. Did personal contact activate only those who belong to demographic groups traditionally predisposed to vote? Although the demographic differences between those induced to vote and those remaining apathetic are not sharp, we have found some patterns. Table IV presents some of the differences found. If we compare the

TABLE IV. VOTING BEHAVIOR AND PERSONAL CHARACTERISTICS

Personal Characteristics	Personal Contact		Residual		Per Cent Difference between Residual and Personal Contact
	Number Possessing Characteristic	Per Cent of Number Who Voted	Number Possessing Characteristic	Per Cent of Number Who Voted Sex:
Male	23	52%	20	40%	+12%
Female	42	24	17	18	+6
Age:
Under 36	21	29	14	43	-14
36 to 50	14	64	8	38	+26
Over 50	26	27	13	15	+12
Home Ownership:
Owms home	17	41	8	83	-22
Rents home	36	28	22	18	+10
Social Class (By occupation):
Middle	35	29	22	27	+2
Lower	18	44	14	29	+15

personal contact group with the "residual" group we find that, with the exception of those under 36 years old and those who owned their own homes, voting turnout was higher for those personally contacted in all demographic groups.

We also found that voting was increased by personal contact for those with only a high school education, those who lived in small households, or lived alone, and those who had moved to Ann Arbor from somewhere other than in the Midwest. These data suggest that our experimental stimulus not only activated those demographic groups which are predisposed to vote, but also brought out some voters in the demographic groups which traditionally are less predisposed to vote. The effect of person-to-person pressures, we may conclude, was to penetrate beyond those characteristics which already predisposed persons to vote and compensate for the absence of such predisposing factors in a number of instances.

The level of "political competence"—defined here as the level of political information—of those voting under experimental pressures is another type of analysis which can be made. The important question here is: how did those who were brought out to vote by personal contact compare in competence with those in the other groups who voted?<sup>6</sup> It is evident from Table V that voting

TABLE V. VOTING BEHAVIOR AND LEVEL OF POLITICAL INFORMATION

Level of Political Information	Voted		Did Not Vote
	Personal Contact	Residual	Personal Contact	Residual
Knowledge of Candidates:	(N = 22)	(N = 11)	(N = 43)	(N = 26)
Adequate	23%	64%	12%	11%
Medium	18	—	12	8
Low	59	36	74	81
Not ascertained	—	—	2	—
Total	100%	100%	100%	100%
Knowledge of Issues:	(N = 22)	(N = 11)	(N = 43)	(N = 26)
Adequate	64%	82%	44%	50%
Medium	—	—	19	8
Low	36	18	35	38
Not ascertained	—	—	2	4
Total	100%	100%	100%	100%

was associated with a fairly high level of competence in the "residual" group. For example, among those not personally contacted, three out of five of the voters were familiar with the candidates, while only one out of eight of the nonvoters was so well informed. Similarly, there was a high degree of awareness of the city hall issue among the voters in the group not personally contacted. On the other hand, those persons who were contacted in our experiment and who voted were much lower in political information level—three out of five did not know the candidates and one-third did not mention the city hall as an important issue. Thus we seem to have an interesting dilemma. Our personal contacts, since they were more effective in bringing out the vote than any other technique, appear to have induced some competent and well-informed people to vote who otherwise might have stayed home, but also brought out to the polls some who were very poorly informed. Although the number of cases we are dealing with here is small and the findings certainly tentative, this is a result which cannot be overlooked.

<sup>6</sup> It should be borne in mind that political information may have been secured by those contacted during the personal contact.

The attitudes of those influenced to vote are also interesting. Our analysis indicates that personal contact brought out as voters those who held favorable views as to their political efficacy. We asked several questions in the post-election survey designed to determine the respondents' feelings about the worthwhileness of voting, the importance of elections, and the efficacy of participating in the political process by such means as writing public officials and working for political parties. We found that two-thirds of those personally contacted had optimistic attitudes toward voting efficacy while only about half of the others did. (This difference may be a result of the contact itself, of course.) Of those who were optimistic, there was a slightly higher tendency for them to vote if they had been contacted (38 per cent) than if they were not contacted (30 per cent). There was no evidence that personal contact had any differential effect on those who were cynical or pessimistic. We did find, however, that personal contact brought out a larger percentage of people who had unfavorable attitudes towards Ann Arbor's local government. About 37 per cent of this sample of apathetics had such attitudes. Personal contact brought out a little better than one in three of these people, while only one in five of this group voted among those not contacted.

IV. CONCLUSIONS

We have secured evidence from our experiments, admittedly exploratory and tentative, that the impact of propaganda techniques to get out the vote varies with the electoral context and the nature of the group on which influence is exerted. The consistent nonvoters in local elections were more resistant to pressures of this type than the 1953 experimental group, which included many who had voted in local elections. It would probably be still more difficult to activate consistent nonvoters in all elections. Yet, under certain circumstances these apathetics can be brought to the polls. The personalized approach seems more effective than mail propaganda, whether the latter is of an informative, "rational" type or of a "moral" type. It seems to make little difference what variety of personal contact is made. The people who are induced to vote by personal contact come from both the traditional nonvoting and the voting demographic groups. They are often individuals with little political information, although they may be quite critical of local government. It must be said in their favor that they are usually optimistic about the efficacy of political participation. They also tend to be more exposed politically to other media and more sensitized to campaign controversy than those who are contacted and do not vote. Some of these attitudes, however, may be derivative effects of the personal contact. The time-cost factor is fairly high for such a propaganda operation. The 50 students in the public opinion class, plus four staff members, devoted an estimated total of 400 hours, exclusive of class time and the post-election work, to the experiment. This effort was necessary to bring out 39 individuals among 203 experimentally contacted—an average of approximately ten hours per propagandee successfully induced to vote.

It seems from this that the popular base of local democracy can be broadened by such efforts, an important conclusion for a community like Ann Arbor, where ordinarily no more than a third of the eligible voters participate in local elections. And it is possible in this process of personalized influence to bring voters who are informed and accept the necessity and worth of such participation to the polls. It is more likely, however, that these people will not be well informed and politically aware unless more educative work is done in the personal contact. This suggests that the "deliberative" aspects of the democratic election process are not always and necessarily maximized by bringing out the vote through personal contact. Such techniques may result in elections of a more highly manipulative character.

Furthermore, certain limits seem to be suggested as to the effectiveness of personal contact, although these limits are difficult to specify. Those in the potential electorate who are in the lower socio-economic classes, who have not developed real roots in the community, and who are pessimistic about the worthwhileness of political action are most difficult to activate, even though we had some success with these in our experiments. There is some evidence also that those who have favorable, perhaps status quo, attitudes towards local government, and who possess some of the above characteristics, resist such personalized pressures. Additional verification of the relevance of these factors is necessary and additional factors, too, need to be explored in future research. For the present, the possible dilemma facing voter activation enthusiasts and advocates of compulsory voting should be clearly recognized. Mere mobilization of voters may take place, adequate deliberation over candidates and issues may not result, and thus the "democratic consent" aspects of the election may be jeopardized.

THE ADMINISTRATIVE STAFF COLLEGE: EXECUTIVE DEVELOPMENT IN GOVERNMENT AND INDUSTRY*

MARSHALL E. DIMICK

New York University

The most interesting educational experiment in the world today for the student of comparative administration and business and government is the Administrative Staff College at Henley-on-Thames, England. This College is pioneering the methods which, in any industrialized nation, are needed to restore the flexibility and initiative that must always accompany free enterprise. The College also provides a new approach to leadership training in that enrollees are recruited in fixed proportions from public and private employment by a method that produces balanced management teams among the members (as the "students" are called), and the teaching procedure stresses group work and self-instruction rather than formal lectures.

This original venture, headed by Princeton-trained Noel F. Hall, was founded in 1946 and opened in 1948. Already it is being imitated in widely scattered parts of the world. Henley has turned out some 1,500 policy administrators of the average age of 39, all of whom had been tapped for higher responsibilities by their employers—who incidentally foot the bill—before going to Henley for the three months' session. Each session—there are three a year—is limited to 60 members; six of the 60 members may be drawn from overseas and the rest come from private business, the central civil service, local government, the nationalized industries, and banking. If Henley succeeds, even in a measure, in overcoming the depressing effects of bureaucracy and if it succeeds also in turning out leaders in both business and government who understand public policy and the power to govern, it will have gone far toward solving the problem that Adolf Berle calls the dilemma of modern capitalism,<sup>1</sup> which, he argues, cannot survive if we do not soon master the "power to govern."

The Henley program is also attempting to solve another problem that has long perplexed political scientists: how to articulate policy and management so as to produce a blend. The College gives almost equal consideration to techniques of management and to issues of policy decision, combining them in such a way that even the labels are kept from sight. This is done by stressing a series of familiar situations in which administrative and public policy issues are in the nature of the case so intertwined that it would take a forced interpretation to separate them.

* This article is the result of two stays at Henley, in 1952 and in 1954. On the second occasion the Principal invited me to join the staff of the College for the three months of the Fall session in order to participate as general observer of the College program and as adviser on research. The assignment also involved conferences with university and management people in various parts of England. I am deeply grateful to my hosts for their generous assistance.

<sup>1</sup> See his The 20th Century Capitalist Revolution (New York, 1954), pp. 15-16.

I

Before turning to the objectives, the methods, and the results of this interesting experiment in leadership training, a word may be said about the need that evoked this response.

As specialization and hierarchical organization increase in scope and as business administration becomes more and more political—that is, concerned with policy decision, group relations, and institutional influence and survival—the bureaucratic problems and executive needs of business and government become increasingly alike. The study of power and public policy becomes as important for the business corporation and the trade union as for the politically organized state. In all major governing institutions a central difficulty is how to balance the potential efficiencies of careful planning and logical organization against the equal need for individual initiative and institutional flexibility and responsiveness.

Already in the 1930's top business executives in the United States were concerned with the inherent nature of bureaucracy, the possibility of exceeding the optimum of size and managerial capacity, the stultifying effect of seniority promotions, and similar evidences of institutional arteriosclerosis.<sup>2</sup> In the twenty years since then the continued growth of giantism, combined with a drying up of new sources of executive leadership from smaller enterprises, has forced large institutions to train from within or lose their drive. This is the background need out of which the Henley program grew immediately after World War II when Britain, battered by war and anxious about her economic future, began to devote to reconstruction the same kind of quiet determination and resourcefulness that she had demonstrated during the war.

Henley's chief concern is to see that initiative and enterprise are fostered and that this élan is carried over into the civil service and the nationalized industries as much as into domestic and overseas trade. Although concerned with techniques and practicalities, the Henley program stresses more than do most courses in this country the importance of public policy, the public interest, the idea of a growing political economy, the importance of character, the values of a civilization; at the same time—and perhaps this is a necessary consequence of the above—the College pays less attention to manipulation and personality as determiners of administrative results.

The seed out of which Henley grew was a long time germinating. It was in the minds of men like Sir Hector Hetherington, for example, who, a year before the College was announced, stated his views concerning the need for such a civil leadership academy in an article in the London Times:

. . . Administration is not an end in itself. The Administrator's business is to provide the conditions under which the work of a team can come to good effect in the achievement of some co-operative purpose. . . . Every enterprise calls for the capacity to hold in mind a total and perhaps distant situation, to plan ahead imaginatively and firmly and yet with the necessary margins, to assemble in the right relation and at the right time diverse managerial and human resources, to take consistent decisions on points of detail and, indispensably, to see that junior executives in the several spheres know how to do the same. In these things there is an order and a technique which are not simply gifts of nature. Training helps.

<sup>2</sup> Howard Hyde and I dealt with some of these problems in Temporary National Economic Commission Monograph No. 11, Bureaucracy and Trusteeship in Large Corporations (G.P.O., 1940).

Moreover, continued Hetherington, a skilled administrator is the product of the conditioning factors of a lifetime, early as well as adult. What then is the special virtue of a concentrated and high-level training program when a man is, say, 35 or 40? After recruitment and early experience in administration a new stage and a new problem emerge in the development of the individual:

A time comes in eight or ten or fifteen years, when, having learned and practised his calling, a man does well to cease for a little from action, and to think what he is doing and why and how he is doing it. That is apt to be the most fruitful educational phase of all. The best thinking springs from practice, and a man who by thinking has more thoroughly possessed himself of what he is and does is ripe for great responsibility.<sup>2</sup>

A special virtue of the Henley program is its recognition that government and business leaders must be trained in common problems of policy and administration if they are to understand each other and take independent but consistent action designed to further the common interest of the nation. In the United States, on the other hand, we have all too often assumed that the best way to keep free enterprise free is to train businessmen and government officials separately, as though they were two distinct, opposed, and antagonistic breeds of animal requiring differing settings and indoctrinations. I feel sure that sooner than we think we shall find our assumption false and turn to the alternative approach. Again quoting Hetherington:

The College ought to be a meeting place of the two main categories of administrators—the officers of the private and of the public service. In future, as increasingly during the war, they must work together. It is important that they should understand the very different responsibilities which they carry. Much frustration will be saved thereby. It is even more important that each should acquire, so far as may be, the characteristic virtues of the other, and know its own characteristic defects. That is the way of amendment. For the final objective of all this enterprise is not theory, but better practice directed to the fuller service of the public interest. That is how the Administrative Staff College will be judged, and how it will wish to be judged.

Each side has something to offer to the other; together they have a common need and a common purpose. After seeing equally keen civil servants and top business executives adjust to each other and come to respect each other during a twelve-week term, I came away from Henley with the firm impression that this is one of the most valuable achievements Henley has to offer.

II

Henley is strictly a residential program. Its large manor house, called Greenlands, situated on the banks of the Thames not far from Oxford, supplemented by other dormitory and recreational buildings and all set on a beautiful estate away from the bustle of business and traffic, was purchased from the third Viscount Hambledon. The twelve-week course is a seven-day-a-week program making it almost necessary for its members to forget all about the office, wife, and children, and to become fully absorbed in the intellectual and social life of the institution. At the end of each three-weeks' period, however, a long free weekend makes it possible for members to go home to catch up on their business and family affairs. The remoteness of the place and its self-contained character are essential features of the Henley plan.

<sup>2</sup> London Times, Nov. 7, 1945.

Within these congenial surroundings a great deal of hard work is done. Henley may have the outward trappings of a country club but, except for free recreation time in the afternoons devoted to walks, sports, informal conferences, reflection, and reading, what goes on at the College is hard, concentrated work. It is no nine-to-five affair. There are three group-work periods each day—two in the morning and one in the late afternoon—and on four evenings of each week there is something on from 8:30 to 10.

The College is supported entirely by private funds from business institutions and individuals and from the fees paid by employers on behalf of the members, which at present amount to £300 per member. Most of the funds required to buy the property and to make up the difference between a £300 fee and a £350 cost per member are supplied through seven-year covenants under which contributions are partially tax-exempt. So far as fees are concerned, members from the public service are on an equal footing with those from industry.

The College is a non-profit-making corporation run by a Board of Governors, who in turn employ the Principal. The Governors are drawn widely from business, governmental, educational, and ecclesiastical life and the College has succeeded in keeping free from political, social, and economic bias. It has not succeeded in officially interesting the trade unions in its program (although this was part of the original plan) but it has compensated for this loss by getting a number of prominent trade union officials to participate as consultants and official visitors.

Executive development courses in the United States are generally for a shorter term than the one at Henley and it seems clear that the longer period is one secret of Henley's success. A "quickie" may impart information but is unlikely to change attitudes or to ripen one's reflections and insights. The test of a program like Henley's is the changes that occur in individuals which, if not strictly measurable, are at least observable to colleagues and office associates. It is usually when only two or three weeks of the course are left that these changes become apparent, and in most cases the fastest period of growth occurs during the tenth week.

The men and women (there have been some women) who go to Henley are not seeking degrees, because none are given. They are not even seeking academic achievement as a means to promotion, because most of them have already been marked for promotion and all are expected to return to their employments. Having eliminated these incentives to effort, it is plain that motivation must come from the felt need of the member, seconded by his employer, to share what the College has to offer. And because of the thoroughness of the recruitment and interview method used, no member is chosen unless he personally wants the experience and is prepared to work at it.

There is no magic about the number 60, but this total for the student body is probably about right. It makes possible individual attention and good social relationships, and at the same time affords adequate representation from the main working groups and administrative specialties of modern-day society. A group of 60 also allows for six syndicates<sup>4</sup> of 10 members each, and in each syndicate there is a cross-section of skills. Let us see what this means in terms of practical detail, because the build-up and structuring of the session are distinctive features of the Henley program.

In each session there are 30 places for representatives of commerce and industry and 30 for the public services, the nationalized industries, and banking. The 30 places in the first category are parcelled out 15 to large corporations, nine to small ones, and six to the distributive trades. Those in the second category of 30 include six for the central civil service, two for local government, two for the fighting forces, six for banking, and eight for the nationalized industries.

Now bear in mind that each syndicate of 10 must be so constructed as to reflect work specialties and not merely the segments of the economy just listed. The number of members in each skill category is 15 for higher and general management, 18 for factory and works management, six for research and development, nine for commercial and selling, six for controllership, six for financial, and six for overseas. Except for those in the last group, all are carefully analyzed in advance as to their specialized skills. All the other skills that one might think of, including personnel managers, purchasing agents, budget officers, public relations directors, and the like are represented in the major classifications mentioned above.

Why is it done this way? Consider the objectives of the program and the answer appears: to make possible in each syndicate a balanced management team drawn from the main segments of the economy. Thus, in the deliberations of each work group all of the skills found in an actual management situation are brought to bear on each problem taken up by the group, thereby providing a working equivalent of what is found in actual administration.

The basic strategy is to improve the skills that specialists already have by making the specialists more perceptive, and at the same time to retool and broaden these men so that they will acquire an additional skill in general administration, where the test of fitness is an ability to analyze the diverse elements that enter into policy decision and to synthesize the work of experts.

The College attracts a superb mixture of people, and I stress mixture on purpose. To begin with, they are not all, by any means, university graduates; in fact, the percentage of such graduates in the first 21 sessions varied from one-fourth to one-half of the whole membership, with the average about one-third. Moreover, all kinds of personalities are included, from the rather dour scientist who needs to be "brought out" to the somewhat flamboyant sales manager who must be "toned down." As a matter of fact, these differences in educational background, character, and temperament are looked for when the Principal and his associates undertake to build up a balanced membership for a particular session.

<sup>4</sup> A term brought into use during World War II by the armed forces when men were trained for special missions in small groups.

Henley sets out to leave its stamp on the men who go there by finding out in advance what each individual's weaknesses are and at what points he needs to be strengthened. Indeed, skill in recruitment and in counselling are additional reasons for Henley's success. The Principal has absolute freedom as to whom he shall choose;<sup>5</sup> those who make financial contributions know this and respect his independence and judgment. Finally, there is a carefully thought out plan for each syndicate and for each member in it because only as this is painstakingly done in advance can the College make its full impact on a man's attitudes and his combination of executive traits in 12 weeks. It is partly for this reason that the enrollment is kept small, an important respect in which Henley differs from most American experiments in the same field.

III

Although there are several distinctive and imaginative features about the Henley program, probably the most original is the teaching method, which is highly diversified. The main feature is the use of the syndicate of 10 members. Each syndicate operates under the chairmanship of one of its members, a different chairman and secretary being appointed by the College for each separate subject in the course. At some time during the session, therefore, each member has the experience of chairing a project and of presenting and defending it before the entire membership of the College, usually at an evening meeting. He is given his assignment by the faculty in the form of a brief, works on a fixed time schedule, and must supervise the preparation of a written report representing the consensus of his syndicate.

What happens within the syndicate is a major aspect of the Henley program. Everything revolves around it. It is here that one must go to see attitudes change, men learn to accommodate themselves to each other, men who make good first impressions turn out to be lacking in other respects, and vice versa. Each syndicate has its own room. Briefs are prepared by the teaching staff, and mimeographed materials by the research staff. There is an excellent specialized library. The services of consultants from the outside are made available, and field trips are sometimes arranged in connection with particular subjects.

<sup>5</sup> The selection process, in brief, is as follows: After a business firm or a government department makes the nomination and the papers on the candidate have been received, the Principal usually talks in person with the employer to find out why he wants to send the man at that particular time, what the candidate's promotion prospects are, something about his qualities, and so on. Next, the candidate visits the College for interviews which may last most of a day, a technique that has been developed to a fine point. At this stage the Principal and his colleagues also consider such questions as: How would this man fit in with the group? How would he get along with the faculty member assigned to the particular syndicate? Would he make a good chairman of a project and, if so, should it be a major one or a minor one and should it come early in the session or late? So far as possible, nothing is left to guesswork or to chance.

There is also a certain originality in the recruitment and functioning of the faculty at Henley. There is one directing staff member, so-called, assigned to each syndicate, but he sits at a small table in a corner of the room, not at the roundtable where the chairman presides. The staff member rarely speaks unless the chairman calls on him or unless he thinks the discussion is getting off the track. And yet, modest as his role appears to be, the staff member makes or breaks the plan because the faculty decide the grand strategy of the course, prepare the briefs and working materials, study and influence the individual members, and at the end help to evaluate them as only men can who work together, drink together at the College bar, take walks around the College grounds and the countryside, or go off with a syndicate after hours.

The directing staff come from almost as mixed a background as do the members themselves: a former official of the Indian Civil Service, a former works manager, a former personnel manager in a large London establishment, an ex-Army officer who later saw service in Washington with the combined chiefs of staff and was Military Secretary to the Cabinet, a civil servant on loan from the Board of Trade. But all have in common a knowledge of and interest in the field, practical experience, skill in sizing up men and working with them. They are not, generally speaking, the so-called academic type and for that reason some university people are critical of them. Nevertheless, as Elton Mayo would doubtless have said, the directing staff have the combination of social skills needed for their type of work.

The faculty is small because a large one is not necessary when in each session some 40 outside experts are brought in to meet with the syndicates as consultants. The chairman of each project and the syndicate members know as soon as a particular assignment is received that a particular expert is coming on a certain day at a certain hour, and they are told in what his expertness consists. Hence the job of the syndicate is to decide in advance just what help they want and the result is a give-and-take, not a lecture.

There is much merit in this group method of self-instruction. To begin with, it teaches the chairman to draw on the skills of his own syndicate and the outside specialists and to work to a deadline. It forces the members to draw on their own resources and to overcome their own difficulties. It gets away from spoon-feeding and encourages originality, innovation, and dissent. But most of all it teaches men, through long hours of knock-down-and-drag-out discussion, to respect each others' opinions, whether they represent private or public employment backgrounds and no matter what the conceits of the different skill groups may be. Sit in a syndicate, as I have, and you can trace the decline of aggressive behavior and the growth of understanding based on a knowledge of common concerns. After about the third week the brassy sales manager of a large commercial outfit finds himself saying, "I hadn't realized it before but those people in the civil service, they're up against pretty much the same problems we are." Or at the College bar before lunch one overhears a civil servant say to another, "You know, that Jones, with International Brass, he isn't a bad fellow at all; those men who didn't go to university have something we could use." Or a nationally-known scientist at the end of the tenth week remarks, "I believe there's something to this administration business after all, even if it isn't an exact science."

All features of the Henley program are carefully tied in around group work. There are two sets of lectures, for example, one by the Principal on money and foreign exchange leading up to a project on export markets, and a second by one of his colleagues on the use of financial data as a tool of executive planning and control. There are also occasional evening lectures by outsiders. Again, twice during the session each syndicate reports on the biography of some well-known person, the idea being to try to identify the characteristics that made him a successful leader. Cases also are used in dealing with particular problems, some being recorded and personally observed and investigated. Thus in the section of the course dealing with technological change, a syndicate may visit a town 30 miles away to study at first-hand how a firm adjusted and survived when India developed its own calico industry and employed modern methods. Sources of current information also are emphasized to encourage the systematic use of tools like The Economist, The Times, and professional journals. In short, the attempt is to achieve a balance by using a number of methods, all centering around the syndicates working on a series of major problems eventually reported on in oral presentations before the whole membership and faculty. Unity comes from the subject-matter, not the method.

IV

It is simple enough to set forth the course outline, but harder to explain the subtleties and purposes behind it. Moreover, if one starts by saying that the course is in 17 parts, that sounds like good solid information. Actually the use of the figure is likely to mislead because no part is separated from the others. Noel Hall has said that "there are seventeen parts that look to be discontinuous, but it is of universal experience that round about the tenth and eleventh week of each session, the men begin to see for themselves that there is an intellectual plan and that all these parts are converging to a general dovetailing towards the last ten days of the session." I must confess that I was skeptical about this claim until I saw it made good.

What is the unifying element in this general dovetailing? Although it is hard to put into words, I think it is best described as "dynamic economy." By this I mean an attempt to get men to think about what is involved in keeping the individual administrator, the individual business, and the economy as a whole from becoming traditional and stagnant. At this point I could reproduce the official course outline<sup>6</sup> and let it go at that, but let us see if we cannot get behind that formal presentation.

<sup>6</sup> The main parts of the course are comparative administrative structures, internal organization and administration, external relations, constructive administration, and con-

As a mature executive about to graduate into top management, the member at Henley is encouraged to become progressive-minded by a series of four steps: First in his syndicate he looks at his own job to see if he really understands how it relates to the whole operation, and how he might improve his cooperative relationships. Second, while remaining in his own syndicate, he temporarily joins a specially-constituted "specialist" syndicate, where experts in his own field—personnel, finance, or something else—work together for two or three weeks on a subject that closely concerns them, and where he is asked such questions as, "Do you see how you could have been more effective if you had realized that other specialists don't fully understand and appreciate you, or you them?" Third, he is induced to take a look outside his own employment (this is called external relations) to see how group relations complicate policy-formulation and decision-making; how consumers, organized labor, and businessmen divide into separate interests that must nevertheless learn to work together and develop something more rational than antipathy if each is to prosper and the public interest is to be safeguarded. Fourth and finally, this maturing administrator is encouraged to think about what can be done to make himself, his firm, and the economy more dynamic. This requires a hard look at technological and economic change, at human relations in administration, at the need to utilize the services of researchers and scientists more effectively than in the past, and at the need to strengthen world trade because in Britain, at least, world trade is the key to national prosperity.

Another source of unity in the course is that the syndicates usually work on three or four different projects simultaneously instead of completing one before undertaking the next. Consequently, each day's work must be divided up under different chairmen and the members must turn from one subject to another just as all executives must learn to do. And because they are working on so many subjects, the main problems running through all of them tend to stand out clearly. For example, the first item under the course heading of internal organization and administration is called management of the individual and deals with personnel policies and practices. One of these policies relates to collective bargaining and the role of trade union. Is this an administrative problem or a policy problem? Obviously it is both, but most of the policy aspect of it is reserved for discussion under another part of the course where the role of clusions. Comparative administrative structures is used largely to break the ice and get things started. The subheads under internal organization and administration are management of the individual, the structure of organization and interrelation of departments, delegation, control and accountability, and organization for production. The subdivisions under this last are dealt with by so-called specialist syndicates and are related to works management, research and development, office services, management accounting, and the personnel department. The section on external relations deals with commercial relationships (consumers, purchasing, sources of finance, trade associations), organized labor, central government, and local government. Under constructive administration come sections on adaptation to economic change, adaptation to technological change, and imparting and maintaining vitality. Finally, the part called conclusions usually deals with some immediate practical issue, especially foreign trade.

---

organized labor comes in for full-dress treatment. At that point the question arises: "Must labor unions necessarily divide and weaken the unified responsibilities of top management, or can this difficulty be surmounted by a wise use of work councils?" Thus the focus shifts back again to organizational and administrative matters.

What kind of issues are presented to the syndicate for study and report? Some are major, some seemingly minor, but even the minor ones assume importance when they relate to the central theme of how to remain progressive and achieve a dynamic economy. How can a particular department of a business be induced not to encroach on the work of others and to center on its own main show? Which recent employment practices have improved morale and which have not? Should the state continue to provide financial incentives to industries to locate in unemployment pockets of large cities? How can highly centralized industries like the Coal Board be helped to decentralize, if they should? Is the enforcement of the monopolies law too slow and can better methods be devised? And in what respects have foreign competitors outdistanced British firms in the competition for world markets?

The working briefs on each subject are detailed and precise and each is accompanied by a select bibliography and materials extracted or prepared by the research department of the College. In general the subject of each brief is a large one but the members must make it as concrete as possible by applying assumptions gained by their past experience with actual situations. The result is that in the remarkably short time available some syndicates have written excellent case studies relating to actual firms and particular situations. When 60 promising men, each with from 15 to 20 years of experience, pool their knowledge, as the syndicate method enables them to do, it produces quite a respectable body of experience and turns up some practical problems where the principles emerge from the context. Finally, each project culminates in an oral presentation before the whole College in one of the finest forensic demonstrations one is likely to witness anywhere. It is truly amazing to see the character and leadership traits that emerge from this carefully planned but spontaneous discussion.

V

The connection of the members with the Administrative Staff College is not entirely over when they leave Henley. They will have had personal conferences with the Principal, who does not shrink from plain talk in the few cases where this is desirable. He and the directing staff will have discussed in detail the work of the session and the performance of each member, and there is frequent unanimity in their conclusions. There is no degree, certificate, or diploma, but the Principal does generally report orally to each employer on the progress of the member in whom he is interested.

On leaving Henley each member may thereafter belong to an association of former members in his own community, a series of clubs that have spontaneously appeared as the "graduates" multiply. And some 15 months after a class has gone out, the members return for a two-day refresher session at the College where a nearly 100 per cent attendance is the rule. This session revolves around a definite theme, often relating to a major problem previously considered.

The College is now in process of adding to its follow-up and extension work. Encouraged by the fact that former members wish to go on discussing subjects studied at the College, the faculty are considering a number of activities that might be undertaken by the various club groups without detracting from the main show. There might be a newsletter, for example; the publications of the research department could be sent out to all ex-members; prominent speakers from at home or abroad might be routed to a circuit of clubs; and informal steps are already underway to establish cooperative research relationships with teaching and research programs of a similar character in the nation's universities.

The program at Henley will be interesting to watch. Administrative skills differentiate countries as much as do differences in resources. "The British," said Sir Hector Hetherington, not immodestly, may reasonably suppose themselves to have some natural talent for administration," a typical understatement about a nation with some 200 years of capitalist experience behind it. What may be even more significant is that since World War II, Britain has staged an economic revival, a recrudescence of enterprise that transcends party divisions. In all classes and circles there is agreement with Sir Oliver Franks who, in his Reith Lectures, remarked that "Towadays part of the definition of nationhood is industrial development. . . . Perpetual innovation, this ever-repeated assertion of man's power over nature, has an absolute value. . . . These activities are the triumph of the spirit of man." This is the same spirit I found at Henley.

<sup>1</sup> In "The Will to Greatness," The Listener, Dec. 13, 1954, p. 1357.

BOOK REVIEWS, NOTES, AND BIBLIOGRAPHY

BIBLIOGRAPHICAL ARTICLE.....	179
A Survey of the Background Material for the Study of Government in French Tropical Africa. KENNETH ROBINSON.....	179
REVIEWS OF BOOKS.....	199
Hunt , Marxism: Past and Present; Meyer , Marxism: The Unity of Theory and Practice; A Critical Essay; Mayo , Democracy and Marxism; Plamenatz , German Marxism and Russian Communism. WILLIAM EBENSTEIN.....	199
The Commission on Intergovernmental Relations: A Report to the President for Transmittal to the Congress. K. C. WHEARE.....	208
Lippmann , Essays in the Public Philosophy. FREDERICK M. WATKINS	212
Wright , The Study of International Relations. RUPERT EMERSON....	216
Goodrich and Simons , The United Nations and the Maintenance of International Peace and Security. NORMAN HILL.....	218
Report of a Study Group Sponsored by the Woodrow Wilson Foundation         and the National Planning Association , The Political Economy of American Foreign Policy: Its Concepts, Strategy, and Limits. WALTER H. C. LAVES.....	220
Claude , National Minorities: An International Problem. KENNETH WALTZ.....	222
Stouffer , Communism, Conformity, and Civil Liberties: A Cross-section of the Nation Speaks Its Mind. ROBERT E. LANE.....	223
Reischauer , Wanted: An Asian Policy; Rostow in Collaboration with         Hatch , An American Policy in Asia. HAROLD S. QUIGLEY.....	225
McKenzie , British Political Parties: The Distribution of Power within the Conservative and Labour Parties. LESLIE LIPSON.....	227
Kelsall , Higher Civil Servants in Britain: From 1870 to the Present Day. WALLACE S. SAYRE.....	229
Mallory , Social Credit and the Federal Power in Canada. F. R. SCOTT	230
Birch , Federalism, Finance and Social Legislation in Canada, Australia and the United States. EDWARD MCWHINNEY.....	232
Mayers , The American Legal System: The Administration of Justice in the United States by Judicial, Administrative, Military, and Arbitral Tribunals. CARL Q. CHRISTOL.....	234

Chinoy, Automobile Workers and the American Dream. DONALD R. MATTHEWS.....	235
BOOK NOTES AND BIBLIOGRAPHY.....	237
AMERICAN GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS.....	237
FOREIGN AND COMPARATIVE GOVERNMENT.....	246
INTERNATIONAL LAW AND RELATIONS.....	258
POLITICAL THEORY, RESEARCH, AND METHODOLOGY.....	267

BIBLIOGRAPHICAL ARTICLE

A SURVEY OF THE BACKGROUND MATERIAL FOR THE STUDY OF GOVERNMENT IN FRENCH TROPICAL AFRICA*

I. INTRODUCTION

The French territories in Tropical Africa with which this article is concerned are the so-called Federations of French West Africa and French Equatorial Africa, the two Trust Territories of the Cameroons and Togoland, and the island of Madagascar. The two small territories of the Comores, formerly a dependency of Madagascar, and French Somaliland are not considered. These French territories have shared, though only to a limited extent, in the generally increased interest in African affairs since the end of World War II. Even in France, however, they have excited much less interest than French North Africa, which is of greater economic importance, geographically much nearer, and whose problems have assumed a more dramatic, indeed menacing, character. Outside France, these French territories in Tropical Africa have been overshadowed not only by the greater international significance of recent developments in North Africa, but also by the more publicized changes in British African territories, notably the Gold Coast, Nigeria, and the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland, and by the Mau Mau rebellion in Kenya. Yet any consideration of the political, social, and economic problems of contemporary Africa which excludes French Tropical Africa, which covers about a quarter of the area of the continent and includes about one-seventh of its 200 million inhabitants, must obviously be very incomplete. For the student of government, however, these territories present an additional interest. While they often closely resemble, ethnically and geographically, neighboring territory under the control of other European powers, especially Great Britain, the policies pursued in them, and the legal, social, and political structures which the French have sought to create to give expression to those policies, differ substantially from those of Great Britain, and considerably from those of Belgium or Portugal. There are thus particular opportunities for the student of comparative government in these areas.

The French literature and materials relating to these territories, though much less than that concerned with French North Africa, are considerable in quantity but very uneven in quality. The treatment of political and administrative subjects is usually highly generalized and often stereotyped. There are hardly any monographic studies of the actual working of administration, and before the end of World War II there was little scope for overt political activity in these territories. Students of government from English-speaking countries should not, however, allow their realization of the often large gap between formal legal structures and the practical working of institutions to result in their ignoring the large literature in French devoted to the former: a thorough understanding of the legal and juridical structure, and indeed of metropolitan French institutions, is essential for any realistic study of contemporary problems of government in French Tropical Africa. It is indeed the all too common neglect of this consideration which makes so much of the relatively small number of writings in English about these territories of slight value. Special attention is accordingly given in this article to the legal background, on which there is much French work of considerable value, and to the various official sources of information in French government publications which are essential. Although the intention is to discuss the literature from the point of view of the student of government, some attention has been given to materials relating primarily to the social and economic background which are thought likely to be useful to such students, and the main sources of statistical data have also been indicated. Unless otherwise stated, the place of publication is in all cases Paris.

* Much of the research on which this article is based was made possible by a Leverhulme Research Fellowship in 1953. The author is greatly indebted to Mr. Thomas Hodgkin and Dr. Virginia Thompson for commenting on the manuscript.

II. BIBLIOGRAPHIES

There is no up-to-date bibliography of works relating to the French Union or French Africa as a whole. For the older books, reference may be made to the Bibliographie d'Histoire Coloniale (1900-1930) by Alfred Martineau and others (Larose, 1932), which includes sections relating to French West Africa, French Equatorial Africa, and Madagascar, as well as one on general works on French colonial history, each prefaced by a brief discussion of the literature and sources. Perhaps more useful to the student of government, for the period which it covers, is the bibliography appended to the second volume of Stephen H. Roberts' History of French Colonial Policy 1870-1925 (P. S. King, London, 1929). A large-scale Bibliographie Générale des Colonies Françaises was begun in 1931 with the encouragement and help of the metropolitan government and the various territorial governments, under the editorship of G. Grandidier and E. Joucla (Société d'Éditions Géographiques, Maritimes et Coloniales). A volume on Madagascar by G. Grandidier appeared in 1935 and contained works published between 1904 and 1933, supplementing an earlier volume containing works published before 1904, which had originally been published in 1905. A volume on French West Africa by E. Joucla was published in 1937. For French Equatorial Africa, no comprehensive bibliography has appeared since the Bibliographie de l'Afrique Equatoriale Française by G. Bruel (Larose, 1914), but P. Sanner has produced a supplement covering works published between 1914 and 1948, entitled Bibliographie Ethnographique de l'Afrique Equatoriale Française (Imprimerie Nationale, 1949).<sup>1</sup> For more recent material, the older collections, which contain little of direct relevance to the study of contemporary political problems, must be supplemented by the bibliographies published in Africa, the journal of the International African Institute (quarterly, Oxford University Press, London, since 1928), and in the Journal de la Société des Africanistes (quarterly, Musée de l'Homme, since 1931), both of which include sections devoted to administration, although their main interest is in ethnography. Since 1948, a very useful annotated Bulletin Bibliographique has been issued bi-monthly in mimeographed form by the Service des Statistiques of the Ministry of Overseas France. Although this gives a more extensive coverage relating to economic conditions, it includes a useful section on "Les Institutions Politiques: L'État." It is, on the whole, the most useful guide to the articles and books currently published on the political and economic problems in the French Overseas Territories, but is not on sale.

<sup>1</sup> The "Bibliographie Économique et Sociale de l'A.E.F.," which appeared as a "numéro hors série" in the Bulletin d'Informations Économiques et Sociales de l'A.E.F. (Sept., 1947), seems to have been an earlier version of this work and is practically identical with it.

III. GENERAL WORKS: OFFICIAL PUBLICATIONS

By far the most important official publication containing information relating to the Overseas Territories of the French Union is the Journal Officiel de la République Française (Imprimerie des Journaux Officiels). This at present includes the following separate series:

1. Débats Parlementaires: Assemblée Nationale.
2. Débats Parlementaires: Conseil de la République.
3. Documents Parlementaires: Assemblée Nationale.
4. Documents Parlementaires: Conseil de la République.
5. Débats de l'Assemblée de l'Union Française.
6. Documents de l'Assemblée de l'Union Française.
7. Avis et Rapports du Conseil Économique.
8. Lois et Décrets.
9. Documents Administratifs, also called Annexe Administratif.
10. Bulletin du Conseil Économique (Compte Rendu Analytique des Séances).

All these contain essential material for the student of government in French Tropical Africa. In particular, the documents of the various assemblies contain numerous committee reports which often discuss a particular territory or topic very fully. A few examples may be instanced: Documents Parlementaires: Conseil de la République, Séance du 2 mai 1950, Annexe No. 259 was a report made by the mission which visited Madagascar and French Somaliland in September and October, 1949 on behalf of the Overseas France Committee of the Council of the Republic and includes, inter alia, an account of Malgache political parties, nationalism and communism in Madagascar, and the activities of the missions and of local administration. Avis et Rapports du Conseil Économique, Séances des 14 et 15 Février 1950 included a "Report on the Economic, Social and Monetary Policy of the French Union," with three subsidiary reports and some statistical appendices. Documents de l'Assemblée de l'Union Française, 2<sup>e</sup> Séance du 26 Août 1954, No. 318 was a report made by a mission which visited French Equatorial Africa on behalf of the Social Affairs Committee of the Assembly to investigate the application there of the Labor Code for Overseas Territories enacted in 1952.

The Jurisclasser de la France d'Outre-Mer, issued, since 1948, by the Ministry of Overseas France (Éditions Techniques), is divided into two parts.

The first, in one volume, contains Codes; the second at present in 15 volumes, contains laws, decrees, and administrative documents. This is a loose-leaf compilation of the legislation currently in force in the Overseas Territories, excluding North Africa, and is kept up to date by regular issuances to subscribers. New legislation, both statutes and executive decrees and orders, is of course published at the time of its enactment in the Journal Officiel series called Lois et Décrets, as well as in the Journaux Officiels of the various territorial administrations.

The Statistical Service of the Ministry of Overseas France, together with the National Institute of Statistics and Economic Studies, publishes bi-monthly (in spite of its title) a Bulletin Mensuel de Statistique d'Outre-Mer, which includes, besides data relating to production and trade, transport, prices and money, tables of current budgetary receipts in the individual territories and of development expenditure. Two series of supplements—Série Statistiques and Série Études—are published at irregular intervals. The former contains the results of the census of population, and the latter includes such special studies as the results of a public opinion survey taken in metropolitan France in 1950 under the title "Connaissez-vous la France d'Outre-Mer." An Annuaire Statistique de l'Union Française Outre-Mer, 1939-1949 was published in two volumes in 1951 (Imprimerie Nationale). This includes much information of great value to the student of government, such as tables relating to education, labor, and public finance. Another valuable series of studies is issued by the Statistical Service of the Ministry of Overseas France under the title Documents et Statistiques. These include La Monnaie et le Crédit dans les Territoires d'Outre-Mer (No. IV, 1950) and a pioneer study which deserves to be much more widely known, Les Budgets des Territoires d'Outre-Mer pour l'Exercice 1952 (No. VI, 1952), by P. Sanner and H. Le Polotec. The most comprehensive description and analysis of the monetary system of the French Union is in Premier Rapport Annuel du Comité Monétaire de la Zone Franc 1943, to be found in Statistiques et Études Financières: Supplément Finances Françaises No. 24, 1954 (Imprimerie Nationale).

A monthly magazine containing, besides official news items, articles on current issues, descriptions of economic and social development services, and a survey of current foreign press comment on French and other overseas territories is issued by the Ministry of Overseas France under the title Chroniques d'Outre-Mer. Before 1951 it was known as Bulletin d'Information de la France d'Outre-Mer. It is published for the Ministry by La Documentation Française, which also publishes at irregular intervals (about 150 per annum) a series of official documents and studies called Notes et Études Documentaires. This includes many issues relating to the Overseas Territories of the French Union, a number of examples of which are mentioned below. A recent issue (No. 1847) of particular value to the student of government, containing much otherwise inaccessible data relating to postwar political development, is L'Évolution Récente des Institutions Politiques dans les Territoires d'Outre-Mer et Territoires Associés.

Les Élections Législatives de Juin 1951 (La Documentation Française, 1953) includes the results of the general election for the National Assembly in 1951. Some data relating to the previous general election of 1946 are contained in Volume I of the Annuaire Statistique de l'Union Française d'Outre-Mer and in Élections et Referendums: 13 Octobre, 10 et 24 Novembre et 8 Décembre 1946; Résultats par Département et Canton (Le Monde, 1947).

IV. GENERAL WORKS: PERIODICALS

There is a relatively large number of periodicals devoted to various aspects of French Union affairs, but many of them are somewhat propagandist in tone, and those which deal with topics in a scholarly manner are not numerous and tend to devote a high proportion of their space to parts of the French Union other than Tropical Africa. The most valuable for the student of government is the Revue Juridique et Politique de l'Union Française (Librairie Générale de Droit et de Jurisprudence, quarterly since 1947), which is concerned primarily but not exclusively with legal and constitutional questions. It publishes articles of high quality and of essential importance, such as that by P. F. Gonidec on "Les Assemblées Locales des Territoires d'Outre-Mer," in Volumes VI and VII. Another useful legal journal is the Recueil Penant: Recueil Général de Jurisprudence de Doctrine et de Législation d'Outre-Mer, which has appeared continuously since 1891 (Éditions de l'Union Française, monthly). Besides articles on social and administrative as well as purely legal subjects, this contains the full text of the more important new laws, decrees, and other documents. The quarterly journal of the Centre des Hautes Études d'Administration Musulmane, L'Afrique et l'Asie (Imprimerie Administrative Centrale, since 1948), has included a number of articles on the social background in Tropical African territories, as well as a few dealing with more specifically political topics. These are short but are generally written by those with substantial practical experience in Africa, usually as administrators. Somewhat more polemical, or at least defensive of the "colonial" point of view, are the Comptes Rendus de l'Académie des Sciences Coloniales (bi-monthly, published by the Academy) and L'Afrique Française: Bulletin du Comité de l'Afrique Française et du Comité du Maroc (Comité de l'Afrique Française). This was published from 1891 to 1940 and a new series began in 1952. The Encyclopédie Mensuelle d'Outre-Mer (Éditions de l'Union Française, monthly since 1950) contains articles on almost all aspects of life in the overseas territories, though little on directly political as opposed to social and administrative questions. It includes a supplement, Documents Politiques, Économiques et Sociaux.

Most valuable of the more journalistic periodicals is Marchés Coloniaux du Monde (Logier et Cie, weekly since 1945). Besides well-documented articles by leading men in commerce, politics, and administration, this also contains regular summaries of the proceedings of the various metropolitan assemblies, so far as these are concerned with the affairs of the French Union, as well as those of the representative assemblies in the territories themselves. Another interesting monthly magazine which has appeared since 1948, mainly political in its emphasis, is Union Française et Parlement, though its articles are very short. L'Année Politique (Éditions du Grand Siècle, annually since 1944) prints a number of documents relating to the affairs of the French Union and since 1952 has had a substantial section devoted to them in its narrative part, though little of this has so far dealt with Tropical Africa. Présence Africaine (Éditions Africaines), which began as a periodical but after No. 7 appeared irregularly in issues devoted each to a particular topic, has, since No. 16, begun a Nouvelle Série which will apparently appear as a periodical. It contains many contributions from Africans. Of the original series No. 8 was entitled Le Monde Noir, No. 13 Le Travail en Afrique Noire, and No. 15 Les Étudiants Noirs Parlent. Although definitely "anti-colonial" in tendency, the mimeographed periodical Afrique Informations, which appears irregularly (Claude Gérard, 5 Rue Lamartine, Paris, 9<sup>e</sup>), is a useful source of information on current political developments. African Abstracts (International African Institute, London, quarterly since 1950) contains abstracts of articles selected from periodicals, including many French ones, but they are predominantly of an ethnographic character and many articles in learned journals not specifically "African" or ethnographic are not abstracted. Nevertheless, this is of some value to those interested in administrative problems, as is the geographical journal published by the University of Bordeaux, Cahiers d'Outre-Mer (quarterly since 1948). The latter contains many studies of the human and social geography of overseas territories which provide valuable "background" material for the student of government and economics.

Among French journals not specializing in African or "colonial" subjects, the Revue d'Économie Politique (Recueil Sirey, bi-monthly since 1891) published two special numbers on L'Économie de l'Union Française in 1951 and 1954, respectively, both edited by G. Leduc, which include much material of interest relating to public finance, development policy, and monetary organization. Its annual volume on La France Économique has, since 1947, contained a section on the French Union Overseas. Politique Étrangère (Centre d'Étude de Politique Étrangère, bi-monthly since 1935) published special numbers devoted to the French Union and its problems in September, 1953 and October, 1954. Cahiers Internationaux de Sociologie (1946-1953 Éditions du Seuil, since 1954 Presses Universitaires de France, twice yearly) has also printed a number of articles on African topics. There are frequently articles on the overseas territories in French literary reviews, particularly in the "left-wing" Catholic journal Esprit (monthly since 1931) and in Les Temps Modernes (edited by J.-P. Sartre, monthly since 1946).

V. GENERAL WORKS: BOOKS AND ARTICLES

For those primarily concerned with French Tropical Africa, the development of administration before 1939 can be best studied in E. L. Buell, The Native Problem in Africa (2 vols., Macmillan, New York, 1928), and in Lord Hailey's An African Survey (Oxford University Press, London, 1928). The historical background is given very fully in S. H. Roberts, History of French Colonial Policy, 1870-1925 (P. S. King, London, 1929), and H. I. Priestley, France Overseas: A Study of Modern Imperialism (Appleton-Century, New York, 1938), while some account of developments during and immediately after the war will be found in M. Devèze, La France d'Outre-Mer de l'Empire Colonial à l'Union Française, 1938-1947 (Hachette, 1948).

The best general account of the legal and juridical system is by L. Rolland and P. Lampué, Précis de Droit des Pays d'Outre-Mer (2nd edition, Dalloz, 1952). K. Robinson, The Public Law of Overseas France since the War (Oxford University, Institute of Colonial Studies, Reprint Series No. 1A, Oxford, 2nd ed., 1954) is a brief discussion with fairly full references to the literature. Two works dealing with more specialized aspects, an understanding of which is particularly important for the non-French student, are C. Rossillion, Le Régime Législatif de la France d'Outre-Mer (Éditions de l'Union Française, 1954), and J. Ravanel's article "Le Conseil d'État et les Assemblées des Territoires d'Outre-Mer," in Études et Documents du Conseil d'État, No. IV (Imprimerie Nationale, 1950), which describes the supervisory and advisory functions of the Conseil d'État in respect of the territorial assemblies and their activities.

The best recent study of French ideas about colonial policy is H. Deschamps, Les Méthodes et les Doctrines Coloniales de la France (du XVI<sup>e</sup> Siècle à Nos Jours) (Colin, 1953). Based on personal experience as well as research, this displays a discriminating judgment and penetration which may not be realized by those not already familiar with the subject. Although primarily suggested by and concerned with experience in Indochina, P. Mus' Le Destin de l'Union Française (Éditions du Seuil, 1954) is a work of great value to the student of French colonization, learned, subtle, and fully rewarding the effort which its complex thought demands from the reader. A useful account of the postwar institutional changes is D. Boisdon, Les Institutions Politiques de l'Union Française (Berger-Levrault, 1949). Short surveys in English are Ch.-A. Julien, "From the French Empire to the French Union," in International Affairs (Oct., 1950), General Catroux, "The French Union," in International Conciliation (Nov., 1953), and K. E. Robinson, "French Africa and the French Union," in Africa Today, edited by C. Grove Haines (Johns Hopkins Press, Baltimore, 1955).

The student of the political and administrative problems of French Tropical Africa will soon realize the need to acquire some knowledge of the economic and financial institutions of the French Union. Besides the two special numbers of the Revue d'Économie Politique already mentioned, he will find in J. C. Haumant, Initiation aux Finances Publiques des Territoires d'Outre-Mer (Éditions de l'Union Française, 1953) a clearly-written and authoritative guide to the public finance of the Overseas Territories, including their various budgets, tax systems, and arrangements for governmental financing of development expenditure. On this last point, L. B. de Carbon's L'Investissement dans les Territoires d'Outre-Mer (2 vols., mimeographed, Institut de Science Économique Appliquée, 1951) and L. Postel-Vinay's Aspects Financiers et Budgétaires du développement Économique de l'Union Française (La Documentation Française, 1952, Notes et Études Documentaires No. 1568) should also be consulted.

VI. FRENCH WEST AFRICA

The best short survey of French West Africa is J. Richard-Molard, L'Afrique Occidentale Française (Berger-Levrault, 2nd ed., 1952), an excellent example of the work of French geographers, which includes moreover a very useful account of the social and economic background. Rather more "administrative" in tone, but nevertheless solid and workmanlike is G. Spitz, L'Ouest-Africain Français in the Terres Lointaines series (Société d'Éditions Géographiques, Maritimes et Coloniales, 1947). F. J. Pedler, West Africa (Methuen, London, 1951), is a brief introductory survey, the work of a British business man, previously a civil servant, with much practical experience in both British and French territories. The same author's Economic Geography of West Africa (Longmans, London, 1955) is primarily concerned with the affairs of the four British territories in West Africa but contains a number of incidental references to the French territories. Still useful, though somewhat dated in economic matters, is A. Berrard's volume in the Géographie Universelle, Afrique Septentrionale et Occidentale, 2nd Part, "Sahara-Afrique Occidentale" (Colin, 1939). Much of the Sahara is within the boundaries of French West Africa and R. Capot-Rey's outstanding work, Le Sahara Français (Presses Universitaires de France, 1953), is valuable for its discussion of economic possibilities and of the social order in Mauretania, Niger, and parts of the French Sudan. The Centre des Hautes Études d'Administration Musulmane has produced a map of Le Sahara des Nomades accompanied by a short study of L'Économie Pastorale Saharienne (La Documentation Française, 1953, Note et Études Documentaires No. 1730). Most comprehensive of all, the two volumes of L'Afrique Occidentale Française, edited by E. Guernier (Encyclopédie Coloniale et Maritime, 1949), contain articles on almost all aspects of its history, geography, economy, and administration, many by acknowledged authorities, with useful bibliographical indications. The first volume contains a section on the political and administrative structure, including public finance, justice, education, health services, labor conditions, and similar topics. It also contains "Les Groupes Ethniques," by J. Richard-Molard (also reprinted in Homages to Richard-Molard, Présence Africaine No. 15, 1954), which is probably the most useful introduction for the non-specialist to the ethnography of the region.

The pioneer work of M. Delafosse, Haut-Séga-Niger (3 vols., Larose, 1912), is still unsurpassed for many areas and peoples. There are chapters on the ethnography of French West Africa, as well as a full bibliography, in Ethnologie de l'Union Française, Vol. I: Afrique, by A. Leroi-Gourhan and J. Poirier (Presses Universitaires de France, 1952). More useful to those interested in administration, as an introductory account of traditional African society, is H. Labouret, Paysans d'Afrique Occidentale (Galliard, 1941), which emphasizes such features as the systems of land holding, economics of land holding, economic organization at the family and village level, and the division of labor, and also includes some pioneer work on family expenditure and the measurement of the standard of living. The administration collected information about customary systems of law and published three volumes of Coutumiers Juridiques de l'A.O.F. (Larose, 1939), the first devoted to Senegal, the second to the Sudan, and the third to the remaining territories in French West Africa. Three volumes relating to parts of French West Africa have so far been published in the Ethnographic Survey of Africa under the auspices of the International African Institute: V. Paques, Les Bambara (1954); J. Rouch, Les Songhay (1954); and M. de Lestrangé, Les Coniagui et les Bassari (Presses Universitaires de France, 1955).

The large monographic literature is of varying quality and still more varying utility to the student who is primarily interested in politics, but a few studies important either by virtue of the size of the ethnic group in question or because of their outstanding merit, may be mentioned: L. Tauxier, Mœurs et Histoire des Peuls (Payot, 1937) and Histoire des Bambara (Gueuthier, 1942); M. J. Herskovits, Dahomey, An Ancient West African Kingdom (2 vols., Augustin, New York, 1938); D. Paulme, L'Organisation Sociale des Dogon (Domat Montchrestien, 1930) and Les Gens du Riz (Pion, 1954); G. Dierterlen, Essai sur la Religion Bambara (Presses Universitaires de France, 1950); and L. Urvoy, Histoire des Populations du Soudan Central (Larose, 1936). H. Labouret's Les Manding et Leur Langue (Larose, 1934) is largely linguistic. The Institut Français d'Afrique Noire at Dakar, and its various centers in the individual territories, publish much material of an ethnographic kind. The Bulletins of the Comité des Études Historiques et Scientifiques de l'A.O.F., published from 1916 to 1938, at which time they were succeeded by the Bulletin de l'Institut Français d'Afrique Noire, also contain many ethnographic studies, mostly by administrative officers. Since 1953, the Bulletin de l'I.F.A.N. has been published in two series, of which Series B is devoted to the "Sciences Humaines." The Institut Français de l'Afrique Noire also publishes Notes Africaines (quarterly) and a series of Mémoires at irregular intervals, as well as a series called Initiations Africaines, which includes a most useful introduction to the study of contemporary problems of sociological interest in West Africa, Les Tâches de la Sociologie, by P. Mercier (IFAN, Dakar, 1951). This small book will be invaluable to the student of political science and administration who is unfamiliar with the African scene. It includes a short bibliography.

Relatively little sociological study of the impact of Western society and the social disintegration it has brought about has as yet been undertaken in French West Africa, though the recent formation of a Sociological Section at I.F.A.N. is already remedying this situation. L'Agglomération Dakaroise, by P. Mercier and others (Études Sénégalaises V, Centre IFAN, Saint-Louis, 1954), contains some preliminary results of a series of studies of certain Senegal towns—Dakar, Thiès, Saint-Louis—undertaken by the Sociological Section. P. Mercier has published L'Affaiblissement des Processus d'Intégration dans les Sociétés en Changement (Bulletin de l'I.F.A.N. Série B, Vol. 16, Dakar, 1954) and another study on Aspects des Problèmes de Stratification Sociale dans l'Ouest Africain (Cahiers Internationaux de Sociologie, Vol. 16, 1954). The latter is of special interest with respect to the political implications of social differentiation and conflicts between "traditional" and "Western" criteria of differentiation.

At least as important as a knowledge of the ethnographic and sociological background for the student of government and administration is a knowledge of the character and development of French rule in West Africa. Unfortunately there is no satisfactory historical account of this. The best of the available general descriptions is that of P. Delafosse in Volume 4 of the Histoire des Colonies Françaises, edited by G. Hanotaux and A. Marinier (Plon, 1933). This is, however, now very much out of date and the part relating to the period after the First World War was very slight. J. L. Monod, Histoire de l'Afrique Occidentale Française, is a school textbook based on Delafosse (Delagrave, 1934). C. Scheffer, Instructions Générales sur l'Afrique Occidentale (Larose 1921), is in two volumes, of which the second contains the instructions between 1831 and 1870. There is a large literature dealing with the period of the French conquest, of which A. Terrier and C. Mourer, L'Expansion Française et la Formation Territoriale (Gouvernement Général de l'A.O.F., Larose, 1910), remains useful.

The only part of French West Africa on which much historical work has been done is Senegal. P. Cultru, Histoire du Sénégal du XVe Siècle à 1870 (Larose, 1910), is a solid work based on archival materials but concerned mainly with the period before the nineteenth century, for the early part of which G. Hardy's two books, L'Enseignement au Sénégal de 1817 à 1854 (Larose, 1920) and La Mise en Valeur du Sénégal de 1817 à 1865 (Larose, 1921), are interesting. More useful for the subsequent period is A. Villard, Histoire du Sénégal (Viale, Dakar, 1943), with an annotated bibliography. There is an interesting study of the development of the Ivory Coast by F. J. Amou d'Fly, La Côte d'Ivoire dans La Cité Africaine (Larose, 1951), which contains a discussion of political parties and some account of the local press.

No studies of the actual working of administration in French territories, comparable for example with Margery Perham's Native Administration in Nigeria, exist. Two books which give a lively and intelligent impression of the work of a French administrator during the interwar period are R. Delavignette's Les Paysans Noirs (Stock, rev. ed., 1946) and the same author's Service Africain (Gallimard, 1946; English translation Freedom and Authority in French West Africa, Oxford University Press, London, 1950). His account of the work of a district officer in the latter book may be compared with that of R. Grivot in Le Cercle de Lahou (Côte d'Ivoire), one of the few available accounts of administrative action in one district (Bulletin de l'I.F.A.N., Vol. 4, 1942). M. Grivot has recently published a useful and interesting discussion of current political and administrative problems in Dahomey, Réactions Dahoméennes (Berger-Levrault, 1954). Discussion of administrative problems during the interwar period was preoccupied largely with the question of the position of the chief, particularly in relation to the requirements of administration and the claims of the philosophy of African rule then dominant in British territories under the somewhat misleading label of "indirect rule." Although these issues no longer find a prominent place in contemporary discussion, the problems involved in the transformation of "traditional" societies into a larger scale "bureaucratic" society, with certain aspects of which this controversy was essentially concerned, remain fundamental here as elsewhere in Tropical Africa. For French discussion of it, reference should be made to J. van Vollenhoven, Une Ame de Chef (Plon, 1920), H. Labouret, A la Recherche d'une Politique Indigène dans l'Ouest-Africain (Comité de l'Afrique Française, 1931), and J. Brevié, Circulaires sur la Politique et l'Administration Indigènes en A.O.F. (Imprimerie du Gouvernement, Gorée, 1932). Although it was concerned specifically with French Equatorial Africa, it is probably best to mention here the last contribution to this discussion, which is to be found in F. Eboué, Politique Indigène de l'Afrique Equatoriale Française (Imprimerie Officielle de l'A.E.F., Brazzaville, 1941; English translation The Eboué Memoranda of 1941, in Sudan Notes and Records, Vol. 25, 1943).

French policy in Africa was officially examined during the Second World War at a conference of governors and their principal assistants held in Brazzaville in February, 1944, under the presidency of M. René Plevin, at that time Commissioner for Colonies in the Provisional Government of Algiers. Its conclusions were published in La Conférence Africaine Française (Ministère des Colonies, 1945). Postwar developments have been summarized and discussed in relation to the situation between the wars in K. Robinson, "Political Development in French West Africa," in Africa in the Modern World, edited by C. Stillman (University Press, Chicago, 1955), and in a series of articles by T. Hodgkin entitled "Background to A.O.F." and appearing in the issues of West Africa—a weekly periodical published in London—between January 2 and March 6, 1954. H. Deschamps, L'Eveil Politique Africain (Presses Universitaires de France, 1952), is a very brief discussion of postwar reactions, including a summary account of "traditional" society and prewar colonial policies. There is little published work on the newly-instituted electoral systems. G. Gayet, "Évolution Récente des Collège Electoraux en Afrique Occidentale," in the Comptes Rendus de l'Académie des Sciences Coloniales, 1952, is a short but useful article. There is a good official account of the postwar changes in J. Aurillac, Régime Politique et Administratif de l'A.O.F. (Service d'Information du Haut Commissariat de l'A.O.F., Dakar, 1949). The material relating to French West Africa submitted to the United Nations in accordance with the provisions of Article 73(e) of the Charter is issued in mimeographed form and is available in some libraries. La Situation Économique et Sociale de l'Afrique Française (in three parts, Notes et Études Documentaires Nos. 1832-34, La Documentation Française, 1954) also contains an account of the political and administrative organization as well as material on public finance, labor, and social welfare. It includes a list of newspapers and similar periodicals published in West Africa at the beginning of 1953.

African comment on recent political and economic changes is confined largely to articles in periodicals, such as that by Leopold Senghor, Deputy for Senegal, in Politique Étrangère, October, 1954, or in Où va l'Union Française? (Les Cahiers de la NEF, June, 1955). Two recent works which are significant examples of African thinking are Mamadou Dia's Réflexions sur l'Économie de l'Afrique Noire (Éditions Africaines, 1955) and Lamine Gueye's Étapes et Perspectives de l'Union Française (Éditions de l'Union Française, 1955).

On more specialized aspects of the administrative problems of West Africa, there are a number of books and articles of which a few may be cited. J. Chabas, La Justice Indigène en Afrique Occidentale Française (Annales Africaines No. 1, École Supérieure de Droit, Dakar, 1954), is a useful account of the various tribunals administering African customary law, their organization and working. A characteristic feature of French administration has been the form of compulsory "cooperative" for rural development known as the Provident Society. A brief description will be found in K. Robinson, "The Sociétés de Prévoyance in French West Africa," Journal of African Administration (Vol. II, London, 1950), and a more detailed discussion of their earlier development in J. Boyer, Les Sociétés Indigènes de Prévoyance en A.O.F. (Comat-Montchrétien, 1936). The position of women has been discussed by Sœur Marie-André du Sacré Coeur in La Condition Humaine en Afrique Noire (Grasset, 1953) and "L'Activité Politique de la Femme en Afrique Noire," Revue Juridique et Politique de l'Union Française (Vol. 8, 1954). A. Gailly, L'Islam dans L'Afrique Occidentale Française (Larose, 1952), should be supplemented by the earlier works of P. Marty, Études sur l'Islam Maroc (1916), Études sur l'Islam au Sénégal (2 vols., 1917), L'Islam et les Tribus du Soudan (4 vols., 1920), L'Islam en Guinée (1921), L'Islam en Côte d'Ivoire (1922), L'Islam au Dahomey (1922), all published by Leroux, and J. Brevié, Islamisme contre "Naturisme" au Soudan Français (Leroux, 1923). On education, Africans Learn to be French: Educational Activity in French Africa, by W. B. Mumford in consultation with G. St. J. Orde Browne (Evans, London, 1937), is rather slight and very much out of date. There is no comprehensive study of postwar educational development: the nearest approach is J. Capelle, Education in French West Africa (Overseas Education, Vol. 21, Her Majesty's Stationery Office, London, 1949). The educational service in French West Africa has for many years published the journal L'Éducation Africaine, of which a new series began in 1949 (Direction de l'Enseignement, Dakar, quarterly). On the application of the Labor Code, enacted in 1952, there are several books, of which P. Huguet, Code du Travail d'Outre-Mer: Texte et Commentaire (Recueil Sirey, 1953), is probably the best. Two articles by P. Riviere and P. Devinat, "The Labour Code for French Overseas Territories," International Labour Review (Vol. 33, pp. 232, 245, Sept., 1953), give a general account of the Code and its possible economic consequences. Economic development schemes have been discussed in L'Équipement de l'Afrique Occidentale Française: Aperçu des Réalisations du Fonds d'Investissement pour le Développement Economique et Social au 1<sup>er</sup> Juillet 1950 (La Documentation Française, 1951). More recent activities in this sphere are most conveniently followed in the annual reports of the Commissariat Général du Plan de Modernisation et d'Équipement of which the latest is that for 1953, Rapport Annuel sur l'Exécution du Plan de Modernisation et d'Équipement de l'Union Française (Imprimerie Nationale, 1954). The programs proposed for the Second Four Year Plan are described and discussed in Rapport Général de la Commission d'Étude et de Co-ordination des Plans de Modernisation et d'Équipement des Territoires d'Outre-Mer (Imprimerie Nationale, 1954). The system of public finance is briefly outlined in Régime Financier de l'A.O.F., by R. Bargues (Service d'Information du Haut Commissariat, Dakar, 1949), and in a valuable article by J. Ehrhard and J. Lecaillon, "Les Budgets de L'Afrique Occidentale Française," Revue de Science et de Législation Financières (Recueil Sirey, January-March, 1954).

There is an elected assembly in each of the eight component territories of French West Africa, but the records of their proceedings have not always been printed and they are very difficult to find even in the major libraries in Paris. So too, unfortunately, are those of the Grand Council for French West Africa as a whole, published since its initiation in 1947 (Grand Conseil de l'A.O.F., Procès Verbaux des Délibérations, Grande Imprimerie Africaine, Dakar). The Annuaire Statistique de l'Afrique Occidentale Française, Volume I, edition of 1949 (Imprimerie Nationale, 1950) and Volume 2, edition of 1951 (Imprimerie Nationale, 1951), is an essential work of reference. Besides the usual statistics of external trade, agricultural production, and population, it contains a useful note on the budget, statistics relating to public finance from 1939 to 1950, and valuable data relating to education, the administration of justice, and labor. There is also a quarterly Bulletin de la Statistique Générale (Service des Statistiques, Dakar).

VII. FRENCH EQUATORIAL AFRICA

The literature dealing with French Equatorial Africa is much less considerable than that about French West Africa, though of course a good deal of the latter, especially that dealing with French policies and methods of administration, applies equally to the other French territories in "Black Africa." None of the general surveys of French Equatorial Africa are as outstanding in quality as that of Richard-Molard on French West Africa. H. Ziégélé, Afrique Équatoriale Française (Berger-Levrault, 1952), and E. Trézenem, "Afrique Équatoriale Française," in La France Équatoriale (Société d'Éditions Géographiques, Maritimes et Coloniales, 1950), are on the usual lines, including some discussion of the natural environment, ethnography, history, and social and economic "development," with a brief description of political and administrative organization. There is a volume in the Encyclopédie Coloniale et Maritime, Afrique Équatoriale Française (Éditions de l'Union Française, 1950), which includes chapters on political organization, the administration of justice, educational services, and public finance. Of the older books, G. Bruel, L'Afrique Équatoriale Française (Larose, 1935), is still worth consulting for both its general account of the peoples of the area and its careful description of the main features of administration during the interwar years. The periodical Encyclopédie Mensuelle d'Outre-Mer published in 1953 a special number, A.E.F., with contributions by the heads of the various branches of the public service, which provides a supplement to the volume in the Encyclopédie de l'Afrique Française.

There is no satisfactory general survey of the ethnography of the area, though reference should be made to Volume 1 of the Ethnologie de l'Union Française, cited above. Among the monographs, the standard account of the Fang is by G. Tessmann, Die Pangwe: Völker Kundliche Monographie eines Westafrika- nischen Negerstammes (2 vols., Wasmuth, Berlin, 1913), and of the Baongo by Father van Wing, Études Bakongo: Vol. I, Histoire et Sociologie; Vol. II: Religion et Magie (Brussels, 1921 and 1938, respectively). J.-P. Lebeuf and A. Masson Detourbet, La Civilisation du Tchad (Payot, 1950), is a study of the extinct Sao civilization in the Lake Tchad region. Owing, however, to the work of a group of research workers at the Institut d'Études Centrafricaines at Brazzaville, there are a number of valuable studies of a sociological kind, dealing with the impact of colonialism on certain groups. These are of first-class interest and importance to the political scientist in respect not only to French Equatorial Africa but to tropical Africa generally. G. Balandier, Sociologie Actuelle de l'Afrique Noire (Bibliothèque de Sociologie Contemporaine, Presses Universitaires de France 1955), is a major work which examines the different "reactions" of two ethnic groups, the Baongo of the French Congo and the Fang of Gabon, to the impact of social changes brought about by the missionary, economic, and administrative activities of the West, and in particular discusses the relationship between those reactions and the internal social structure and organization of these two African peoples. This includes a valuable analysis of the movements known as Kibanguism, Aricalism, and Khakism among the Baongo and political and social movements among the Fang. Professor Balandier and his associates studied both the new African urban areas near Brazzaville and the rural environment from which their populations had migrated, and their results are published in G. Balandier and J.-C. Pauvert, Les Villages Gabonais (Mémoire No. 5 of the Institut d'Études Centrafricaines, Brazzaville, 1952) and in G. Balandier, Sociologie de Brazzavilles Noires (Cahier No. 67 de la Fondation Nationale des Sciences Politiques, Colin, 1955). More detailed material on the demographic factors in the process of urbanization is contained in M. Soret, Démographie et Problèmes Urbains en A.E.F. (Mémoire No. 7 of the Institut d'Études Centrafricaines, Brazzaville, 1954). The Institut d'Études Centrafricaines has published a quarterly Bulletin since 1950, which contains articles of sociological and economic interest, such as that by G. Sautter, "Le Cacao dans l'Économie Rurale du Foleu-Ntem" (Vol. I). It succeeds an early series of which two numbers only appeared in 1945 and 1947 and was preceded by the Bulletin de la Société pour les Recherches Congolaises, published from 1919 to 1939. J.-P. Lebeuf has written two small monographs on urban areas in French Equatorial Africa, Fort-Lamy (Tchad, A.E.F.) and Bangui (Oubangui-Chari, A.E.F.), both published by Éditions de l'Union Française. These are, however, restricted to "les milieux africains." This appears to be a somewhat unrealistic approach to the problems raised by these areas, but the studies contain some interesting information about associations, trades and occupations, and social organization.

Two official surveys which are useful are La Situation Économique et la Mise en Valeur de l'Afrique Equatoriale Française (Notes et Études Documentaires, No. 1461) and La Situation Économique et Sociale de l'Afrique Equatoriale Française (Notes et Études Documentaires, Nos. 1815 & 1816). These can be brought up to date in certain respects from the Bulletin d'Informations Éco- nomiques et Sociales de l'Afrique Equatoriale Française (Imprimerie Officielle, monthly since 1947), earlier numbers of which in particular contained short articles on demographic and economic topics besides the usual data on external trade, credit, and public finance. One volume has been published of an Annuaire Statistique de l'A.E.F., containing figures for the period 1936-1950 (Service de la Statistique Générale, Brazzaville, 1951). This includes data relating to population, education, labor, communications, and external trade and also revenue and expenditure of the General and Local Budgets from 1925-1934, of the General Budget from 1935-1944, and for General and Territorial Budgets since 1945. The debates of the Grand Council and the deliberations of its permanent committee are also published: Débats du Grand Conseil de l'A.E.F. and Recueil des Délibérations de la Commission Permanente du Grand Conseil de l'A.E.F. (both Imprimerie Officielle, Brazzaville, 1947—irregularly). The Journal Officiel de l'Afrique Equatoriale Française has been published since 1904 and at present appears fortnightly.

Practically nothing of special interest to the student of politics has been published regarding individual territories in Equatorial Africa. Two famous books by André Gide, Voyage au Congo and Le Retour du Tchad (Gallimard, 1928), are still worth reading though they deal with administration at a much earlier phase. There is a brief and very general account of Oubangui, with particular emphasis on its economic possibilities, in A. Teulière, L'Oubangui Face à l'Avenir (Éditions de l'Union Française, 1953).

VIII. CAMEROONS AND TOGOLAND

Official material relating to the two Trust Territories is somewhat more plentiful since the annual reports rendered by the French government to the United Nations, and before the Second World War to the League of Nations under the terms of the Mandate, are published. These, together with the discussions of them in the Permanent Mandates Commission and the Trusteeship Council, provide a substantial body of material. The Rapport du Gouvernement Français au Conseil de la Société des Nations sur l'Administration du Territoire sous Mandat du Cameroun (and the similar report on Togoland) was published annually from 1922 to 1936 by Lahure, that for 1937 by Larose, and the last, that for 1938, by the Imprimerie Logery. The Rapport Annuel du Gouvernement Français à l'Assemblée Générale des Nations Unies sur l'Administration du Cameroun Placé sous la Tutelle de la France, and the corresponding Togoland reports, have been published annually since 1947 (Imprimerie Officielle). The postwar series are lavishly illustrated and contain some brief accounts of political movements as well as full details of the administrative organization. In addition, there are the reports of the United Nations Visiting Missions, of which two have so far appeared: Reports of the U.N. Visiting Mission to Trust Territories in West Africa, 1950 (T/798), which contains, in addition to the mission's reports on both the Cameroons and Togoland under French trusteeship, a special report on the problem of Ewe reunification. (The Ewes are an intelligent and vigorous people, at present divided by international boundaries, with some in the Gold Coast, some in Togoland under British trusteeship, and some in Togoland under French trusteeship.) This subject (and the related problem of the reunification of the two Togolands) has also been discussed in the Special Report of the United Nations Visiting Mission to Trust Territories in West Africa, 1952 on the Ewe and Togoland Unification Problem (T/1105). The report of the 1952 mission on the Cameroons under French administration is in U.N. document T/1110 and that on Togoland in U.N. document T/1008. The Journal Officiel du Cameroun Français (Imprimerie du Gouvernement, Yaoundé) has been published since 1916 and at present appears weekly, and the Procès Verbaux de l'Assemblée Représentative du Cameroun have appeared in a supplement thereto since 1949. The Journal Officiel du Territoire du Togo (Imprimerie de l'École Professionnelle, Lomé) has been published since 1920 and at present appears fortnightly.

There are not many books about either of the Trust Territories. For the Cameroons, there is a useful survey in B. Imbert, Le Cameroun (Éditions Maritimes et Coloniales, 3rd ed., 1954); Togoland generally receives a special section in books on French West Africa. One volume of the Encyclopédie de l'Afrique Française, Cameroun-Togo, is devoted to both territories (Éditions de l'Union Française, 1951). H. Labouret published a brief survey of the pre-war mandatory régime: Le Cameroun (Centre d'Étude de Politique Étrangère, 1937), which is still worth consulting though it is rather slight. L. Péchoux, Le Mandat Français sur le Togo (Pédone, 1933), is a doctoral thesis by an administrative officer who later became Commissaire de la République in Togoland. R. R. Kuczynski, The Cameroons and Togoland (Oxford University Press, London, 1939), is an elaborate examination of published documents and assertions relating to the demography of the two former German colonies. It is not possible to refer to the historical literature, particularly that dealing with the period of German rule, but an exception should be made of H. Rudin's Germans in the Cameroons, 1884-1914 (Cape, London, 1938), which includes a great deal of interesting information about the German administration and its efforts to promote the economic development of the Cameroons.

For the ethnography of the Southern Cameroons, there is one invaluable work by I. Dugast, Inventaire Ethnique du Sud-Cameroun (Institut Français d'Afrique Noire, Douala, 1949), while the same author contributed to M. McCulloch, M. Littlewood, and I. Dugast, Peoples of the Central Cameroons, a volume in the Ethnographic Survey of Africa (London, International African Institute, 1954). J. Binet has written Communément Africain au Cameroun (Penant, 1954), which discusses some of the effects of recent political and social change on the traditional chiefdoms, and a study of the customary law of land-holding, Droit Foncier Coutumier au Cameroun (Le Monde Non Chrétien, 1951). There is an admirable study of "Les Bamileké" by R. Delarozère, in the Études Camerounaises, Vol. 2, 1949. These are published quarterly, by the Centre for African Studies at Douala. A doctoral thesis by Ph. Antoine (Faculté de Droit, 1954) examines Les Sociétés de Prévoyance au Cameroun, from a practical as well as a legal point of view. B. Douvrou contributed a short account of the Representative Assembly to the Études et Documents du Conseil d'État, Vol. III (Imprimerie Nationale, 1949), under the title "Les Débuts d'une Assemblée Locale d'Outre-Mer," and T. Hodgkin has published a series of articles in West Africa (November 20 to December 18, 1954) briefly discussing political developments since the beginning of the Second World War.

IX. MADAGASCAR

The literature on Madagascar is, considering Madagascar's relative importance in comparison with French West Africa, more considerable both in quantity and quality, though there is a similar lack of academic studies of politics as opposed to the more or less technical discussion of administrative problems. Of the modern general surveys, the best is that of H. Deschamps, Madagascar (Berger-Levrault, 2nd ed. 1951), but there are several others of real merit. La France de l'Océan Indien, by R. Decary (Société d'Éditions Géographiques, Maritimes et Coloniales, 1951), is the work of a former administrative officer who has made a number of ethnographic studies. O. Hatzfield's Madagascar in the Que Sais-je series (Presses Universitaires de France, 1951) is marked by a vigorous independence of judgment and is more outspoken on political issues. H. Isnard's Madagascar (Collection Armand Colin, 1955) is the work of a geographer and is particularly valuable on agricultural production, both Malagasy and European. It contrives, however, barely to mention the rebellion of 1947. There are two volumes, Madagascar—Réunion, in the Encyclopédie de l'Afrique Française (Éditions de l'Union Française, 1947). These have chapters by the leading specialists and public officials. Of the older surveys, the best is that by A. You and G. Gayet, Madagascar, Colonie Française (Société d'Éditions Géographiques, Maritimes et Coloniales, 1931).

The origins of the people of Madagascar are obscure and there is no doubt that they are ethnically very mixed, though their language and many of the major features of their culture are Indonesian. R. Decary gives a general description of them in Moeurs et Coutumes des Malgaches (Payot, 1951). R. F. Gray, Anthropological Problems of Madagascar (Northwestern University, Chicago, 1954), is a useful bibliographical survey. There are a number of studies of the various ethnic groups, among which may be mentioned R. Decary, L'Androy (2 vols, Société d'Éditions Géographiques, Maritimes et Coloniales, 1930); G. Jullien, Les Institutions Politiques et Sociales de Madagascar (2 vols, Guilmoto, 1909), an account of the Merina, the inhabitants of the central plateau who dominated the island before the French conquests; H. M. Dubois, Monographie des Betsiléo (Institut d'Ethnologie, 1938); R. Linton, The Tanala: A Hill Tribe of Madagascar (Field Museum of Natural History, Chicago, 1933); H. Deschamps, Les Antaisaka (2 vols, Imprimerie Pitot de Beaujardinière, Tananarive, 1938); V. Cotte, Regardons Vivre Une Tribu Malgache: Les Betsimisaraka (La Nouvelle Edition, 1947); and J. Faublée, La Cohésion des Société Baras (Presses Universitaires de France, 1954).

There is at present little sociological, as opposed to ethnographic, work. A useful examination of demographic problems was made by L. Chevalier in connection with certain proposals for the settlement of immigrants from other French territories in Madagascar: Population et Ressources (Presses Universitaires de France, 1952, Cahier No. 15 of the Institut National des Études Démographiques). In this book much use is made of district administration records to which the author had access and it includes an interesting discussion of the social and economic background of the rebellion of 1947. Madagascar: Essai de Planification Organique (Service Géographique du Haut Commissariat, Tananarive, 1952) is an attempt to set out in elaborate diagrams the social and economic factors to be taken account of in regard to the development of the island. There is a more or less factual description of the island in Madagascar à travers ses Provinces (Imprimerie Officielle, Tananarive, 1952) and a comprehensive account of the growth of Tananarive by H. Ecurmier in the Mémoires de l'Institut Scientifique de Madagascar (Serie C, Sciences Humaines, Tôme I, Fascicule I, Institut de Recherche Scientifique de Madagascar, 1952).

There is a large literature concerned with the history of the island before the French occupation, for which reference must be made to the Bibliographie de Madagascar, by Grandidier, cited above. The student of government will need to know something of the ideas of Gallieni, which to a large extent dominated French administration down to the Second World War. For these he will be well advised to read Gallieni's own writings, especially Neuf Ans à Madagascar (Hachette, 1908) and the selection of them in Gallieni Pacificateur, by H. Deschamps and P. Chauvet (Presses Universitaires de France, 1949). There is no definitive study of Gallieni, but there is much of interest in G. Grandidier's Le Myre de Vilers, Duchesne, Gallieni: Quarante Années de l'Histoire de Madagascar, 1885-1920 (Société d'Éditions Géographiques, Maritimes et Coloniales, 1923). Lyantey, who served in Madagascar under Gallieni, was in charge of the pacification of the southern part of the island and his Lettres du Sud de Madagascar (Colin, 1935) are a valuable source of information on many aspects of the early years of the French occupation. Marcel Olivier who was Governor-General from 1924 to 1929, wrote an account of his administration in Six Ans de Politique Sociale à Madagascar (Grasset, 1931), which is especially important with respect to the policy of industrial conscription (or forced labor) which, at a later stage, played a considerable part among the more general predisposing factors in the rebellion of 1947.

Of all the French territories in Africa (North Africa excepted), Madagascar is the only one which has some pretensions to a genuinely "political" literature. This centers on the Malagasy nationalist movement and the rebellion of 1947. La Situation Politique de Madagascar (Notes Documentaires et Études, Nos. 713 & 714, La Documentation Française, 1947) contains material on the Second World War, together with speeches by the High Commissioner and the Minister of Overseas France after the outbreak of the rebellion. On the whole, the best published discussion of the origins and nature of the rebellion is in L'Insurrection Malgache (Bulletin des Missions, Vol. 24, Bruges, 1950), though this reflects largely a liberal "administrative" point of view. There is a well-informed, though "right-wing French," account of the origins and development of the nationalist movement in Madagascar in H. Benazet, L'Afrique Française en Danger (Fayard, 1947). A series of articles dealing with the nationalist movement, the position of Malagasy workers, and the Madagascar problem from a left-wing anti-administration point of view were published in a special number of Esprit (Vol. 16, 1948). R. Rabemananjara, brother of one of the leaders of the Mouvement Démocratique de la Rénovation Malgache, has written and himself published an account of the history of the island from a nationalist point of view in Madagascar: Histoire de la Nation Malgache (Rabemananjara, 1952) and has also given a somewhat fuller account of the formation and objects of the M.D.R.M. in Madagascar sous la Rénovation Malgache (Rabemananjara, 1953). An important and original work which seeks to discover the psychological basis of the rebellion by the use of psychoanalytical materials (analysis of dreams, etc. recounted by Malagasy) and to suggest a general theory of the "psychology of dependence" is that by O. Mannoni, for many years a teacher in the lycée at Tananarive, Psychologie de la Colonisation (Éditions du Seuil, 1950). The trials of the nationalist leaders for instigating the rebellion (responsibility for which they have denied) were the subject of much criticism of the sûreté in Madagascar and the methods it allegedly used to obtain "confessions." P. Stibbe, Justice pour les Malgaches (Éditions du Seuil, 1954), is a book by the leading advocate for their defense which includes a number of extracts from the proceedings of the trial. As the title suggests, this is a polemic in favor of the nationalist leaders. H. de Casseville, L'Île Ensanglantée (Fasquelle, 1948), is a curious little book by the general commanding troops in Madagascar at the time, written in fictional form and violently attacking the administration. The report of the mission which visited Madagascar in 1950 has already been cited.

There is not much published work on the administrative problems of the island since the war, but much of the prewar literature is still of some value, especially in relation to the origins of the rebellion. On labor problems, the book by Olivier, already cited, should be supplemented by M. de Coppet, "Manpower Problems and Prospects in Madagascar," International Labour Review (Vol. 59, 1949). The village community or Fokon'olona plays an important rôle in Malagasy social organization, especially that of the Merina and the Betsilé, and an attempt has been made to harness it for purposes of social and economic development. F. Arbousset, in Le Fokon'olona à Madagascar (Domat-Montchrestien, 1950), gives an account of its place in Merina society and in French law and administration, and in Les Collectivités Autochtones Rurales à Madagascar, Part II (Recueil Penant, 1951) he describes experiments in rural betterment based on these Malagasy bodies but inspired by the experiments in the "modernisation du paysannat" in North Africa. A. Martin, Les Délégations Économiques et Financières de Madagascar (Les Presses Modernes, 1939), describes the activities of the prewar consultative assembly in the island, while G. Fénard, Les Indigènes Fonctionnaires à Madagascar (Domat-Montchrestien, 1939), gives an account of the origin and development of an important group in the administration. The volume on Madagascar in the Cahiers Charles de Foucauld (6th Series, Vol. 21, 1951) contains an interesting article by P. Radcady-Ralassory on "Les Médecins dans les Relations Franco-Malgaches." O. Hatzfield has discussed "La France Éducative à Madagascar", in Le Monde Non-Chrétien, 1949. A well-informed, if somewhat conventionally "colonial" account of French administration and of the problems of the Protestant missions is that by J. T. Hardyman, Madagascar on the Move (Livingstone Press, London, 1950). The British occupation in 1942 is described and discussed, from somewhat different points of view, in R. Coft-Cooke, The Blood-Red Isle (Staples Press, London, 1953), and by the French Governor-General, A. Annet, in Aux Heures Troublées de l'Afrique Française, 1939-48 (Éditions du Conquistador, 1951).

The proceedings of the Territorial Assembly and of its permanent committee have been published since its inauguration in 1947 (Imprimerie Officielle, Tananarive), as were those of its predecessor, the Conseil Représentatif, established in 1945. There is, besides the Journal Officiel, published since 1885 (Imprimerie Officielle, Tananarive, weekly), a very useful Bulletin de Madagascar, which publishes well-informed articles and prepared official statements on economic and social development (Imprimerie Officielle, Tananarive, monthly). The information supplied annually to the United Nations in accordance with Chapter XI of the Charter is issued in mimeographed volumes but is not published. La Situation Économique et Sociale de Madagascar (Notes et Études Documentaires, Nos. 1799-1801, La Documentation Française, 1953) is an official assessment at the end of 1952. The first volume of an Annuaire Statistique de Madagascar (1938-1951) was published in 1954 (Service de Statistique Générale, Tananarive) and a Bulletin de Statistique Générale de Madagascar et Dépendances has appeared quarterly since 1949 (Imprimerie Officielle, Tananarive). Annual reports in the carrying out of the development plans have been published since 1951 under the title Plan décennal d'Équipement Économique et Social: Rapport d'Exécution de la Section de Madagascar (Imprimerie Officielle, Tananarive).

KENNETH ROBINSON.

Nuffield College, Oxford.

BOOK REVIEWS

Marxism: Past and Present. BY R. N. CAREW HUNT. (New York: Macmillan Co. 1954. Pp. xi, 180. $2.75.)

Marxism: The Unity of Theory and Practice; A Critical Essay. BY ALFRED G. MEYER. (Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press. 1954. Pp. xx, 181. $3.50.)

Democracy and Marxism. BY H. B. MAYO. (New York: Oxford University Press. 1955. Pp. xi, 364. $4.00.)

German Marxism and Russian Communism. BY JOHN PLAMENATZ. (New York: Longmans, Green and Co. 1954. Pp. xxiii, 356. $4.25.)

In the two decades between World Wars I and II, the main threat to the free world was fascism, merged with the imperial ambitions of Germany, Japan, and Italy. For a time, fascism was so successful that even in democratic states it was hailed by some as the "wave of the future" which would irresistibly conquer all rival creeds and powers. World War II destroyed the military ambitions of the fascist Axis. The strains and stresses of war revealed the hollowness of fascism's claim to have inaugurated a new way of life that combined scientific and industrial efficiency with youthful and dynamic heroism.

Yet World War II was hardly over when communism emerged as the new, and principal, enemy of democracy. At the end of World War I, when Russia was the only communist state in existence, and when her industrial and military power seemed to be low, communism was generally interpreted as a specifically Russian phenomenon without much practical applicability elsewhere. But the defeat of the Wehrmacht by the Russian armies in World War II revealed the extent to which the strength of Communist Russia had been underrated. When the war was over, Russia was the dominant military power in Europe, and she quickly communized Eastern Germany, Eastern Europe, and the Balkans. Though the Russian armies were the principal instruments in spreading communism, the force of communist ideology was of substantial significance. Whereas fascism did not possess a single creative or constructive idea that went beyond crass national egotism and lust for power, communism—unhampered, in particular, by the deadly burden of fascist racialism—addresses itself to the world as the true heir of the libertarian, equalitarian, democratic tradition. Also, whereas fascism proudly proclaimed its "pagan" character in relation to the democratic way of life, which it rejected in toto, communism appears more "heretical" in terms of the democratic tradition; it professes to accept the democratic ideals of liberty, equality, and fraternity, and its charge against Western democracy is not, as was the charge of fascism, that democracy is too faithful to its ideals, but that it has, in fact, betrayed them. Just as in religion paganism tends to be less dangerous than heresy, because the former rejects truth in its entirety, whereas the latter mingles the true with the false, so communism is, in the long run, much more dangerous than fascism ever was, precisely because communism arrogates to itself important elements of the democratic tradition, distorted and perverted as they appear in the reality of communist life.

Communism cannot therefore be simply dismissed as another eruption of "Asia" into the West. Karl Marx and Frederick Engels derived their main inspiration from the study of German philosophy, British economics, and French revolutionary politics—and not from the social philosophy of Outer Mongolia or the political economy of Afghanistan. The Western struggle with communism is not against a geographical entity, but against a way of life which knows of no geographical (or racial) barriers. Unless one is fully aware of the fact that Marx is not an ideological meteor, erupting from outer space and exploding on an otherwise peaceful earth, but that all the elements of his thought are organic links in the main strands of the Western tradition, it will be difficult, not to say impossible, to analyze critically the whole system of Marxism in an intelligent and fruitful way. What was new in Marx was the way in which he combined individual ideas into a whole system, rather than the originality of the ideas making up that system. Moreover, Marxism has also served for many of its adherents as a sort of religion, which complicates ab initio any attempt to deal with it in terms of purely rational consistency or logical validity. The theory that communism is solely the product of conspiracy and terror is the product of self-deception, and is potentially very harmful. Men embrace communism, despite its known violence and ruthlessness, when no peaceful ways of social change seem to be left open, when the resources of patience, compromise, and reason appear exhausted. The Utopian element in Marxism and communism appeals particularly to those who are most in need of it, the desperate, despondent, and derelict who seek a new faith. Marxism is to them not "scientific socialism," but a religion.

Until quite recently, critical analyses of Marxism were aimed chiefly at Stalin, whose main shortcoming (not only in the eyes of out-and-out Trotskyites) seemed to be his betrayal of Lenin. More lately, the awareness has grown that much of what Stalin thought and did fitted into the Leninist heritage, and that it would be futile to exaggerate differences of detail between Lenin and Stalin at the expense of their similarity of outlook with respect to fundamentals. Now we are more and more reaching the stage where the last barrier of differentiation in the traditional study of Marxism is gradually being subjected to critical analysis: the theory that Marx was a democratic liberal at heart, only to be sadly betrayed by Lenin the despot. All four books reviewed here perform an important service for serious students of Marxism by boldly attacking Marx and Marxism (rather than Lenin or Stalin) as the principal sources of the communist totalitarian creed, which (despite occasional moments of relaxation at Big Four meetings at Geneva or garden parties at the Kremlin in Moscow) confronts the free world with a challenge more momentous and fatal than any it has hitherto had to face.

R. N. Carew Hunt is well known to students of Marxist theory as the author of an earlier book, The Theory and Practice of Communism (1950). In it, Hunt gave a trenchant analysis of Leninism and Stalinism against the background of Marxist thought and the development of European socialism up to 1914. One of the reasons why Hunt felt impelled to write the new volume on Marxism was, as he candidly states in the preface (p. v), his tendency in the earlier book to be too "indulgent" to Marx and Engels. The purpose of his new book, Marxism: Past and Present, is to redress the balance, and to demonstrate that the continuity between Marx and Lenin-Stalin is more organic and uninterrupted than many non-communist Marxists (or even non-Marxists) still widely assume.

When Hunt speaks of Marxism in the present, he has in mind the Moscow version of Marxism exclusively. Had he gone more deeply into other—non-Leninist-Stalinist—recent and contemporary approaches to Marxism, the author would have been able to present some of the more complex facets of Marxism, which are barely touched upon in the present volume. Thus, to take but one illustration, the life and thought of Karl Kautsky, the outstanding Marxian theoretician on the European continent for almost 40 years, receive altogether inadequate attention. Kautsky's evolution from revolutionary Marxism to unflinching anti-Leninism is one of the most interesting chapters in the history of Marxian thought; Hunt's brief summary of this development (p. 169) is not so much factually erroneous in specific points as it is highly oversimplified—largely because of the lack of space to develop an important theme in a manner worthy of its intrinsic significance.

Similarly, the author charges that "although Soviet policies have aroused the hostility of the West, all socialist parties have contained groups prepared to support or at least to condone them, as is only to be expected in view of the Marxist heritage which the socialists and the communists share" (p. 173). This is another illustration of presenting things in a somewhat distorted perspective, partly because of lack of space, and partly perhaps because of a tendency to identify Marxism with socialism. To say that some (or many) socialists accepted in the past some key elements of Marxian doctrine, would be an oversimplification, but one which would be substantially correct. But to say that the socialists share with communists (now) the Marxian heritage is an oversimplification which, as presented, is undoubtedly more untrue than true.

As usual, Mr. Hunt's style is clear, forceful, and vigorous, apart from occasional lapses into ugly, pseudo-scientific jargon (e. g., "economic restructuring," p. 174), a jargon which originated in Germany and more recently has become a serious threat to American social science, but which so far has been successfully resisted by British scholars. Mr. Hunt's ability to master, and present, complex subjects in clear language is particularly apparent in the first four chapters of Marxism: Past and Present, in which he deals with the philosophical foundations of Marxism, such as dialectics, materialism, and determinism. These dreary tenets of the Marxian theology are analyzed by Hunt with considerable skill and liveliness, and the beginning student of Marx in particular will owe a debt of gratitude to the author for having reduced pseudo-philosophical pomposities to plain, intelligible English. However, it may be argued that Mr. Hunt devoted too much space (four out of ten chapters) to the philosophical background of Marx' thought. Whatever claim to greatness or originality Marx had was founded on his contribution to political economy, not philosophy. Philosophical materialists and idealists have attacked capitalism for reasons which have little to do with their metaphysics, and most, if not all, of Marx' economic interpretation of history and his theories of class war and revolution can be accepted, or refuted, without reference to his philosophical beliefs. Mr. Hunt does an excellent job in showing the inherent logical, philosophical, and moral inconsistencies in the main social, economic, and political doctrines of Marx, and he always manages to blend theory and practice into a coherent scheme of analysis. And while the present volume is devoted chiefly to Marx, the author nevertheless rightly points out how the Marxian theories of state and economic organization have worked out since the death of Marx.

Mr. Hunt makes no bones as to where he stands ideologically and philosophically in dissecting Marxism. His general viewpoint reflects British common sense at its best, combined with a staunch liberality of outlook; in substance, Mr. Hunt is consistently firm, without being devoured by hatred or fanaticism. In manner of thought and expression, the author is moderate, and frequent flashes of dry and gentle humor illuminate his writing.

One major gap in Mr. Hunt's approach to an overall historical evaluation of Marxism is the relatively slight attention paid to Marxian economics. Since the days when Marx first formulated his concepts of value, surplus value, capital accumulation, and exploitation of labor, professional economists have argued, and will continue to argue, how sound Marxian economic theory is in terms of verifiable economic observation and behavior. However, what is even more important, from the viewpoint of the political scientist at least, is that those Marxian economic theories—frequently in a popularized and vulgarized fashion—became powerful political weapons in the arsenal of revolutionary movements throughout the world, in Europe and, even more, in the underdeveloped areas of the other continents. Whereas Marx dialectical materialism may have appealed to intellectuals in search of a new philosophy or faith, Marxian economics, in a simplified and sloganized version, had a tremendous appeal to masses of people for whom dialectical materialism must remain another manifestation of black magic. Yet despite such shortcomings, Mr. Hunt's Marxism: Past and Present is likely to establish itself as a reliable brief guide through the labyrinths of Marxian ideology, particularly with regard to its philosophical and historical doctrines.

Like Hunt, Professor Meyer has been led to the study of Marxist theory through a preceding study of Leninism; his Marxism: The Unity of Theory and Practice is a short book which is in some respects more general than Hunt's book, and in some respects more specialized. The book assumes a considerable familiarity with Marxism, and it does not purport to present a general analysis of Marx's thought, but is rather concerned with a few selected issues of a fundamental nature. The author does not deal helter-skelter with the vast corpus of Marxian doctrine, but organizes his approach in a manner which shows both intellectual acumen and a perceptive mind strong in both analysis and synthesis.

Part I takes up two-thirds of the book, and is entitled "Exposition." The leitmotif of Part I of the book is that Marxism must be understood in terms of three principal characteristics. In addition to its aspiration to being social science, Marxism has two elements which have nothing to do with that aim: first, a political or moral attitude of radical criticism of social reality, and, second, "a faith which is essentially metaphysical: an unshakable belief in progress" (p. 45). The contradictions between these basic aspects of Marxism are the main theme of Professor Meyer's investigations. After a brief discussion of materialism and determinism, the author turns to a more detailed analysis of Marxian dialectics, which he analyzes and defines as a conceptual framework of functional thought. Borrowing from contemporary sociological analysis (Parsons and others), Professor Meyer argues that the functional analysis of society has much in common with Marx's dialectics and with some basic aspects of his economic interpretation. Much that the author has to say on this subject is interesting and penetrating, and it is therefore to be doubly regretted that, in making use of modern sociological analysis for the analysis of Marxian dialectics, he has also taken over much of its obtuse jargon, which characteristically emphasizes the obvious in inflated verbosity, while simultaneously lessening or concealing original or provocative ideas.

In discussing the second aspect of Marxism, its radical criticism of existing social reality, Professor Meyer relates Marxian thought to the broader framework of European thought in general, and to German thought in particular. The author emphasizes the key importance of Marx' concept of "alienation," and shows to what extent it derives from a more general cultural and literary situation of the nineteenth century, and in what way it is distinct from more contemporary approaches to the problem of alienation. As to the third basic aspect of Marxism, faith in inevitable progress, Professor Meyer manages again to show how Marxian thought evolved from, and was related to, a broader tradition in the West. One of the strands picked up by Marx from that humanist tradition, writes the author, "is an idealized image of natural man unspoiled by civilization, an idea of an altruistic, cooperative, kind, social animal with a child-like, sunny disposition" (p. 74). Yet Marx did not wish to go back to a golden age of the past, but looked forward to the future good society.

Professor Meyer shows the contradictions between Marx's faith in progress through rational use of intelligence and his concept of alienation, in which man's inborn intelligence is stultified and frustrated by distorted economic forces, such as capitalism. These internal ideological contradictions of Marxism are more fully spelled out in Part II of the book, entitled "The Disintegration of Marxism." In this last third of his work, Professor Meyer traces the development of European Marxism from 1848 to date, and shows to what extent it has been challenged from within as well as from without. The author argues that the decline of Marxian doctrine is but one instance of the vanishing outlook of the nineteenth century with its conviction that science could both demonstrate the inevitability of progress and lead mankind along that road of progress. In this century, the author says, we have become more "stoical," and "we have no faith in any class, group, or nation, to deliver us from evil" (p. 147). In his concluding remarks, Professor Meyer notes many important parallels between the declining influence of both liberal and Marxian ideas; while such parallels contain an element of truth, they will seem overdone to some readers of the book.

In the preface to his Democracy and Marxism, Professor H. B. Mayo, a Canadian political scientist, frankly admits that he lacks one valuable asset in being an expert on communism, namely, former membership in the Communist party. However, he does not seem to feel overly depressed by that fact, because in his view ex-communists are less reliable guides to an understanding of democracy, "although by some curious gap in reasoning, being anticommunist is always taken as a guarantee that one is a democrat. How short are our memories of Hitler!" (p. ix). As the title suggests, the author starts out from the premise that the ideologies of democracy and communism are the two main protagonists for the mind of man in the world of today, and he therefore considers it necessary to re-evaluate the main principles of democracy in their relation to the key concepts of Marxism. Like Hunt and Meyer, Professor Mayo conceives of Marxism today largely in the version of the "Moscow orthodoxy"; this simplification omits much that would be interesting from the viewpoint of the student of the history of ideas, yet is probably defensible from the viewpoint of political effects. Occasionally, there are references and brief comments on non-Moscow versions of Marxism today, such as on Titoism, but such references are all too short to do justice to their subject. Had the author gone more deeply into Titoism and perhaps Trotskyism, his whole analysis might have gained in subtlety and complexity.

In his first chapter, Professor Mayo extensively describes, analyzes, and refutes dialectical materialism, the underlying philosophy of Marxism. After 35 pages of painstaking and patient reflection, the author concludes that Marx' dialectic of nature is totally irrelevant, and "consequently why Marxism contributes nothing to perception, philosophy, or science" (p. 36). One wonders whether he might not have arrived at the same conclusion—and with equal conviction for himself and his readers—after a briefer journey. Another aspect of Marxian theory, its claim to be scientific, more rightly deserves the detailed attention which the author devotes to it in Chapter VI.

As always, Professor Mayo treats his material with admirable fairness and sense of proportion, and while conceding that there is an element of truth in Marxian social analysis, he feels that the tragedy of Marxism consists in the fact that this element "has been elevated into dogma, a process which began with Marx himself in his self-confident youth" (p. 220). Similarly, the chapters on the economic interpretation of history and Marxism as a philosophy of history are well-balanced both in stating accurately the Marxian position and in presenting its analysis and critique from the viewpoint of a reasonable, reflective liberal mind sine ira et studio.

Professor Mayo's chapters on the class struggle, the dictatorship of the proletariat, and the relationships of Marxism to morality and religion are even more interesting to the student of political thought than is his treatment of the more philosophical aspects of Marxism. Particularly, his chapter on Marxism's relations to morality and religion contains many thoughts which are illuminating and provocative. The author not only comments on the Russian Orthodox Church, but also makes some very shrewd and penetrating remarks on the vulnerable position of many religions and churches in the West with regard to the issues posed by industrial capitalism, and so long neglected by the churches. Probing more deeply, however, Professor Mayo finds that the gulf that separates Marxism from Western religions is due not so much to different approaches concerning the social problem as to the much deeper spiritual differences concerning the conceptions of the nature and destiny of man.

The last two chapters deal with democracy and its relation to Marxism. The chapter on democracy, while not containing anything strikingly new, is a fresh and useful summary of the various approaches—moral, political, and economic—toward an integrated theory of democracy. The author's comments on the relations of democracy to forms of economic organization, be they capitalist, socialist, or a mixture of the two, are timely and free from hysteria and bias. He also devotes considerable attention to the problem of what to do with subversive, revolutionary parties in Western democracies. This is a complex issue, for which there are no final answers valid under all circumstances, and Professor Mayo successfully avoids any extreme positions or solutions. His words of warning, coming from a friendly student and observer of the United States, express his anxiety lest a "creeping miasma of intimidation" spread throughout the free world under the guise of anti-communism: "The totalitarian and conformist spirit is abroad in the West, notably in the United States, a country where above all others it should find no home, a country whose chief traditions are dissent and variety. It is sad and disturbing to see the wealthiest and most powerful liberal society in the world so lacking in a sense of security and self-confidence that it appears to all its friends abroad to be frightened far more by 'subversive' ideas than by the real danger of espionage" (p. 317).

All in all, Professor Mayo's book is a welcome contribution to the study of Marxism; it is broader in scope than either of the two books reviewed above, and it will appeal to the general reader or the beginning student of Marxism and communism, who wants to know what it is all about, and how the liberal democrat can most intelligently and effectively meet the ideological challenge of Marxism and communism. The style of the book lacks perhaps fire and verve, but it gradually builds up strength on the scores of clarity, fairness, restraint, and moderation. It is not simply another book on, or against, communism, but an appraisal of some of the most pressing spiritual, social, and political problems of our day in the light of the great ideological antagonism that pervades the contemporary world.

John Plamenatz' German Marxism and Russian Communism overlaps to some extent the material covered in the three volumes reviewed above; yet such overlaps do not minimize the importance of the book, as its principal aim is rather different from that of the other three works. What Mr. Plamenatz (a teacher of political philosophy at Oxford University) tries to do is two-fold: first, to show how Marxism, despite its liberal origin, has come to deviate from that source; second, to examine what happened to German Marxism following its spread to the most backward of the great European states, Russia, both before and after the Bolshevik Revolution of November, 1917. It might be argued that the author overstates the liberal origins of Marxism; although such links undoubtedly exist, Marx's opposition to that heritage, rather than his indebtedness to it, is possibly the more important factor in an appraisal of Marxism. Mr. Plamenatz holds that what makes Marxian social theory an alien and repugnant creed to Englishmen, Frenchmen, or Americans, is not so much the doctrinal content of Marxism as the kind of emotions expressed through it. This view is defensible up to a point, but on balance probably more wrong than true. German Marxism has historically differed as much from Western socialism as the whole German political tradition, its institutions and ideas, have from the Western political tradition. If Mr. Plamenatz were to study the history of German liberalism as contrasted with that of English liberalism, he would find that the differences were not much less than in the case of German Marxism in relation to Western socialism.

Unlike most other writers on Marxism, who heroically wade through the morass of Marxian philosophy, particularly dialectical materialism, Mr. Plamenatz has the courage of his conviction to state quite frankly that he has no intention to do so, because "Marx's philosophy, as distinguished from his theory of society, is not worth discussing" (p. 9). The author does not stick literally to this approach, but contents himself with analyzing only the very basic points raised by dialectical materialism for the professional student of social, economic, and political problems. In the opinion of this reviewer, Mr. Plamenatz is quite right in emphasizing that there is no necessary connection between Marx' philosophical materialism and his economic interpretation, and that, in any case, Marx was no philosopher, although in the fashion of contemporary German intellectuals, he dabbled in philosophy, particularly as authoritatively expounded by Hegel.

Briefly disposing of the philosophical foundations of Marxism, Mr. Plamenatz devotes the bulk of Part I to Marxian theories of politics and economics. The material is systematically arranged, and the author examines how the economic and political analyses and predictions of Marx have worked out in practice, in his own life-time as well as in the subsequent period. One of the most valuable sections in the first half of the book dealing with German Marxism is the chapter on "The Marxian Analysis of Capitalism." Here, the author covers much ground in greater detail than any of the three books reviewed above. Though Marx's account of the capitalist system, the author concludes, "will not bear too close analysis it is something altogether more impressive than historical materialism. It is more impressive because it is more humane, because it is inspired, not by German metaphysics, but by pity and indignation" (p. 114).

Before turning to the migration of German Marxism to Russia, Mr. Plamenatz examines "The Decay of German Marxism." In this relatively brief chapter, he shows both the loss of vitality and relevance of Marxism throughout the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries in Germany, and how the German Social Democrats were unable to resolve the conflict between verbal incantations of Marxian dogmas and the needs and policies of real life. Mr. Plamenatz thinks that the German Social Democrats would "have done well to follow the lead of Bernstein, for, had they done so, they might have become resolute Revisionists and not remained irresolute Marxists" (p. 184). Though the conditions for a proletarian revolution existed in Germany, at least as seen by Marx, there was no desire among the workers to make it; conversely, Mr. Plamenatz argues, precisely because the "objective" conditions for a successful proletarian revolution as envisaged by Marx did not exist in Russia, "Lenin was able to seize power in the name of Marx and the proletariat" (p. 187).

In dealing with German Marxism, the author devotes most of his attention to a critical evaluation of the main ideas inherent in Marxism, providing only a minimum of historical and social background. In dealing with Russian communism, by contrast, Mr. Plamenatz follows the opposite method: he gives a very full picture of the social, economic, and political conditions in Russia in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, and then shows how the ideas of Marx were transplanted to Russia and used by a group of revolutionaries bent on the conquest of political power. Mr. Plamenatz feels that this difference of approach is justified, because he considers Marx a thinker of major importance but is unable to do so in the case of Lenin, whom he considers no more than a practical politician and successful revolutionary leader. This difference of approach has its merits, although—in the opinion of this reviewer at least—Mr. Plamenatz overstates his case. While nearly every non-communist will agree with Mr. Plamenatz that Joseph Stalin was completely unimportant as an original thinker, and that he did not make a single contribution to the theory of Marxism, there will be more disagreement concerning Lenin. Mr. Plamenatz dismisses Lenin's concept of the professional revolutionary, as first expounded in his pamphlet What Is To Be Done? (1902), in a manner which sharply conflicts with the opinion of the majority of present-day students of communism. Moreover, it is doubtful whether communism could have appealed to so many in the underdeveloped countries had it been presented to them in the original Marxian version rather than in the Leninist transformation. This communist challenge to the free world via the underdeveloped areas has long been underestimated, and one need not follow the General MacArthur-Senator Knowland school of thought to comprehend the danger of underestimating the impact of Leninist communism on Asia and Africa in particular.

Concerning the possibility of coexistence with communism, Mr. Plamenatz attributes to the leaders of world communism an international outlook which some readers will find a little too optimistic. Mr. Plamenatz' general conclusion is that the best hope for staving off conflict is for the Western countries to put their own houses in order, to build up strong economic systems resting on sound and equitable social foundations, and to lend generous assistance to Asian and African peoples, so as to make them less vulnerable to the impact of communist propaganda. Few will quarrel with his general viewpoint that, in the long run, the best answer to communist propaganda is not more counter-propaganda, but the living example of a free world, morally conscious of its purpose, economically healthy, socially just, and militarily strong.

All four books reviewed above, fair and scholarly as they are, tend to emphasize what is wrong with communism, particularly its ideological foundations. The question of how ideas so manifestly dogmatic, contradictory, and erroneous can exercise such a tremendous appeal to so many is largely left unanswered. As yet, we know very little of the psychological motivations inducing an individual to embrace communism, or of the social forces which incline groups, classes, and nations toward the communist ideology. The conventional study of political theory may not suffice in trying to find answers for such questions, and new resources and disciplines, new types of inquiry and research may have to be used.

WILLIAM EBENSTEIN.

Princeton University.

The Commission on Intergovernmental Relations: A Report to the President for Transmittal to the Congress. (Washington: Government Printing Office, 1955. Pp. xi, 311. $1.25).

A Description of Twenty-five Federal Grant-in-Aid Programs (Pp. vii, 179); A Staff Report on Civil Defense and Urban Vulnerability (Pp. viii, 35); A Staff Report on Federal Aid to Airports (Pp. viii, 137); A Study Committee Report on Federal Aid to Agriculture (Pp. vii, 38); A Study Committee Report on Federal Aid to Highways (Pp. viii, 40); A Study Committee Report on Federal Aid to Public Health (Pp. viii, 53); A Study Committee Report on Federal Aid to Welfare (Pp. ix, 115); A Study Committee Report on Natural Resources and Conservation (Pp. vii, 35); A Study Committee Report on Payments in Lieu of Taxes and Shared Revenues (Pp. ix, 97); A Sub-Committee Report on Natural Disaster Relief (Pp. vii, 34); A Survey Report on The Impact of Federal Grants-in-Aid on the Structure and Functions of State and Local Governments (Pp. vii, 489); An Advisory Committee Report on Local Government (Pp. vii, 62); Summaries of Survey Reports on The Administrative and Fiscal Impact of Federal Grants-in-Aid (Pp. xi, 120). SUBMITTED TO THE COMMISSION ON INTERGOVERNMENTAL RELATIONS. (Washington, D.C.: Government Printing Office, 1955.)

To an outside observer it has always seemed surprising that Americans for so long have, apparently, taken their federal system for granted. The Australians, after a little more than 25 years' experience with their federal Commonwealth, set up a royal commission to inquire into its working;<sup>1</sup> the Canadians did the same, though after a much longer period of 70 years.<sup>2</sup> Many Australians and

<sup>1</sup> Appointed 1927; reported 1929.

<sup>2</sup> Appointed 1937; reported 1940. Known as the Report of the Commission on Dominion-Provincial Relations (Rowell-Sirois Report).

Canadians believe that their federal systems are out of date and ought to be abolished, that unitary government with some measure of provincial decentralization would work better. And, although Canadians—and Canadian politicians particularly—know that they cannot abolish federalism until Quebec acquiesces, in Australia a major political party which has held office—the Labor party—has the abolition of federalism as a plank in its platform. Yet can we conceive of such a plank in the platforms of the two great American parties, comprehensive and all-embracing as those documents usually are? American politicians would be as likely to advocate the abolition of monogamy as they would the abolition of the federal system. Indeed, their attitude—and that of most Americans—to both institutions is much the same. They know that a few cranks believe in their abolition; they admit that there are minor and even major infractions of the legal principles of both; but in the end they assert that they believe in these institutions and that they must be regarded as sacrosanct.

Nor, in my view, is there any necessary lack of political wisdom in this American attitude toward federalism. After all, a people which fought a war between the states about the meaning of federalism will appreciate the commonsense of leaving these things well alone. Yet the student may be pardoned for regretting that the country which invented federal government as we understand it today and which produced, in the Federalist papers, the most penetrating and the best written analysis of federalism, chose to remain silent on the subject thenceforward. Thus it was that the appointment of the Commission on Intergovernmental Relations in 1953 was received with great satisfaction by many people outside the United States who, while agreeing with the opening words of the Commission's Report that "the United States has made a major contribution to the art of government by its successful operation of a federal system," (p. 1), would feel also that, again in the Commission's words, "even in the country of its origin, our federal system may still be regarded as an experiment, although we have the oldest representative republic in the world" (p. 12).

And now that the Commission has completed its labors, students not only of federalism but also of political science everywhere have great cause for satisfaction. In the Commission's Report itself, but even more in the 15 accompanying volumes of special study reports, an enormous treasury of valuable material has been displayed which will occupy and enlighten those who really wish to know how American federalism works for many years to come. Senator Morse, a member of the Commission, in a dissenting note to the whole Report remarked: "it is my view that Part I of the Report will prove to be a very valuable reference work in political science and law courses given in colleges of the United States" (p. 277). Praise of this kind from a practical politician is, perhaps, faint praise and could not be expected to give great pleasure to his colleagues on the Commission. But as an academic student I am prepared to adopt his words and to extend them beyond Part I, which is a masterly survey of the leading elements in American federalism, to Part II, where intergovernmental functional responsibilities are considered, service by service, and I extend them still further by saying that this Report should be required reading for students of political science and law, and indeed of sociology, public finance, and economics in many countries other than the United States. We can be sure, in fact, that it will be studied with great care in universities as far apart as Canada and India, Nigeria and Australia, the British West Indies and the Gold Coast. Whatever its political fate may be, its academic interest and influence are assured.

It is impossible in a short review to deal with all the issues which so wide-ranging a Report must raise, and I must select. May I begin by recording two points which the Commission emphasized more than once and which struck me with startling force. The first might be called the decline or, if you like, eclipse of the Supreme Court as a major factor in preserving the federal system. "Under present judicial interpretations of the Constitution, especially of the spending power and the commerce clause," the Commission wrote, "the boundaries of possible National action are more and more subject to determination by legislative action. In brief, the policymaking authorities of the National Government are for most purposes the arbiters of the federal system" (p. 59). We have gone a long way from the observation of Alexander Hamilton that "it will always be far more easy for the State governments to encroach upon the national authorities, than for the national government to encroach upon the state authorities."<sup>3</sup> The survival of the states depends apparently upon the self-restraint of the national government.

But are the states fit to survive? Hamilton spoke of the greater degree of influence which the state governments will generally possess over the people "if they administer their affairs with uprightness and prudence."<sup>4</sup> And it is on this subject that the Commission makes the second point which impressed me. State government is in great need of reform. Too few have responded to the call to revise their constitutions, to modernize their legislative processes and procedures, to reorganize their executive branches, to make more extensive use of interstate compacts and other methods of interstate cooperation, to reorganize their tax systems, to maintain adequate planning and resource agencies, and to extend home rule to their political subdivisions. Nowhere in the democratic world has the decline of legislatures, of which James Bryce wrote 30 years ago in his Modern Democracies, been more marked than in the American states. "In the early history of our country," says the Commission in its Report, "State legislatures were the most powerful and influential instruments of government in the Nation. It was to them that the average citizen looked primarily for initiative and wisdom in the formulation of public policy on domestic issues. They overshadowed the other branches of State government. In power and influence they are no longer as dominant as they were, partly because of the ascendancy of the National Government, partly because of the increased influence of the State executive but primarily because they have not found effective solutions to problems that become more chronic and more difficult to cope with in a rapidly changing society" (p. 38).

<sup>3</sup> The Federalist, No. XVII.

<sup>4</sup> Ibid.

In the face of these two formidable facts of American federalism—the abandonment by the Supreme Court of its role of arbiter of the federal system<sup>5</sup> and the disorganization of state government—at least two lines of thought can be followed. The first is to accept the situation and to acquiesce in the decline of the states into administrative provinces of a national government and to see the future reorganization of American government along lines of functional regionalism such as T.V.A., or interstate organizations sponsored and coordinated by agencies and departments of the national government, improvising new institutions and techniques as new situations arise. Already, as many of the study group reports made for the Commission illustrate, there are examples of this way of proceeding, and the future might see them further developed. We need not envisage that the states will wither away, but in the planning of administration, they need be regarded as no more than one among a number of possible institutions through which the decentralization of administration may be organized.

To an academic outsider there is nothing necessarily defeatist or excessively centralizing in this line of thought. But it was not to be expected, I suppose, that it would appeal to the practiced and practicing politicians among the Commission's members. They chose the view that the states must be made fit to survive as units in a federal system. "Experience amply justifies the view," they said, "that our federal system, with the degree of flexibility that it permits, can be adapted to the crises of the present and future as successfully as it has been to those of the past." "The enduring values of our federal system fully warrant every effort to preserve and strengthen its essence" (p. 3). Not even Senator Morse in his strong dissenting note, where he asserts that the Report "goes too far in playing down the doctrine of federal sovereignty" (p. 278), is prepared to say that the federal principle is obsolete. Yet reading between the lines of that note one sees that he is prepared for considerable modification so that "the several states and the federal government should approach issues involving national interests on a co-ordinated and co-operative basis." "We cannot escape the fact," he writes, "that the general welfare of our people as a whole cannot be dissected according to state lines" (p. 279).

One can see the difficulties which confronted the majority of the Commission and discouraged them from making recommendations with the emphasis which Senator Morse desired. After all the states are not merely legal facts, they are political facts, they are strongly organized units of party politics. Yet it must be admitted that when the Commission comes to make specific recommendations to ensure that the federal principle may work as a reality, they are obliged all too often to fall back upon vague generalizations and aspirations. States and national governments are urged to behave better. "A fundamental objective of our system of government should be to keep centralization to a minimum and

<sup>5</sup> See statement by Governor Driscoll and other members of the Commission on this point, p. 60, note 2.

State-local responsibility to a maximum" (p. 116). "The Commission believes that each State should undertake a searching reappraisal of its fiscal policies" (p. 117). "... particular care should be taken that Federal requirements extending to matters of State administrative structure and organization do not impede responsible and efficient State administration" (p. 139). And so on. A fine collection of hortatory maxims and earnest hopes could be amassed by the connoisseur of such language.

And yet what else could be said, once it was decided that the traditional structure must be accepted and somehow made to survive and to work? And, of course, there are specific recommendations in great numbers in Part II of the Report as the various services where state and federal authorities encounter each other are examined. But the general impression of the whole Report is that the Commission was forced to recognize that the clock could not be put back. The national government has been delivering the goods—goods which, left to themselves, state governments could not or would not deliver alone. Alexander Hamilton wrote: "Upon the same principle that a man is more attached to his family than to his neighbourhood, to his neighbourhood than to the community at large, the people of each State would be apt to feel a stronger bias towards their local governments than towards the government of the Union; unless the force of that principle should be destroyed by a much better administration of the latter."<sup>6</sup> The wisdom of this last proviso is strikingly illustrated by the trends in American federalism in this century. One valuable effect which the Report may have is to send its academic readers, at least, back to the Federalist. What wisdom and prescience its authors exhibited; what clarity and perception and profundity, what common sense! And how superbly they wrote English in those days!

K. C. WHEARE.

All Souls College, Oxford.

Essays in the Public Philosophy. BY WALTER LIPPMANN. (Boston and Toronto: Little, Brown and Company. 1955. Pp. ii, 139. $3.50.)

Walter Lippmann's latest book will be read by everyone who is concerned with the current state of American political philosophy. The author's views have not changed greatly with the passing of years, and there is little here that is not already to be found, by statement or by implication, in The Good Society and other earlier works. But the economic preoccupations which loomed so large in the writings of the depression period no longer occupy the center of the stage, and the focus of the present work is clearly political. At the present juncture of history the capacity of the free world to withstand the pressure of totalitarian competition would seem, for the time being at least, to be more severely challenged on the political than on the economic front. This has led Lippmann to formulate, more clearly and succinctly than ever before, the basic elements of his political creed. Although the present book is short, it is compactly written in the clear and graceful style for which the author is so justly famous, and it manages, in a short compass, to cover a great deal of ground. It will therefore serve as an admirable summary of, or for those who come to it afresh, as an equally admirable introduction to the political philosophy of one of the more influential and honorable guardians of the contemporary American conscience.

<sup>6</sup> The Federalist, No. XVII. My italics.

This political philosophy is essentially a conservative one. This is said in all deference, and in full knowledge of the fact that Lippmann himself disowns this designation. At a time when all sorts of demagogic nonsense are being passed as true conservative coin, it is understandable that a man of good will should want no part in the game. But the word conservative, though sadly depreciated, is not intrinsically unrespectable. There have always been people, including many people of intelligence, who valued quality above quantity, and who believed that traditionally organized elites are indispensable to the maintenance of qualitative values in a society threatened by the weight of mere numbers. Such people have normally been known as conservatives. Walter Lippmann is one of them.

In The Public Philosophy, as in most of his other works, the author's basic problem is to reconcile his continuing commitment to the procedures of constitutional democracy with his profound disbelief in the political capacity of ordinary men. Some 30 years ago, in Public Opinion and The Phantom Public, this disbelief was already clearly present, and if anything it has grown stronger with the passing years. The general run of men, when left to their own devices, are intellectually incapable of seeing what needs to be done, and morally incapable of subordinating private to public interests. But the trend of modern constitutionalism has been to place decisive powers in the hands of mass electorates. Lippmann recognizes the impossibility of reversing this trend, and explicitly disclaims the wish to see anyone deprived of the right to vote. How then can constitutional democracies be kept from succumbing to the selfishness and incompetence of voters?

Enlightened leadership, and more particularly enlightened executive leadership, is Lippmann's solution to the problem. From the standpoint of actual decision-making, electorates are hopeless, and their legislative representatives, whose functions are largely those of agents or advocates, are little better. In any given time and place, however, there may be men of outstanding knowledge and character who, by reason of their superior intellectual gifts and training, are able to perceive and satisfy the needs of society in a spirit of disinterested public service. Such people are characteristically to be found in the executive and judicial branches of government. The courts, the civil and military services, the scientific and technical services, and other like organizations are traditional bodies guided and inspired by standards of professional competence and objectivity. Even when the chief executive, as under the conditions of modern constitutional democracy, is an elective officer, he is not or ought not to be reduced to the plight of a mere legislator. "Though it is not too well recognized, there is a radical difference between the election of an executive and the election of a representative" (p. 53). The reason is that "the executive is in honor bound not to consider himself as the agent of his electors," but to devote himself to the best of his abilities to the interests of the country as a whole. The ideal constitutional democracy would be one in which the electorate, recognizing its own incompetence in these matters, abandoned all attempt to dictate specific political decisions, and limited its activity to the election of a trusted executive who, with the advice and aid of the professional public servants, would enjoy full responsibility for the conduct of government. According to Lippmann, nothing short of this can suffice to inoculate constitutional government against "the malady of democratic states."

This is the main theme of the first part of the book, and it provides the author with the occasion for a thorough castigation of the contemporary democratic world. When constitutional government first saw the light, the franchise was narrowly limited. Power and responsibility rested in the hands of an educated elite which respected the claims of the intellect. The moral viewpoint of this elite was still dominated, moreover, by "the public philosophy," a modern version of the great natural law tradition, which emphasizes the capacity of human reason to discover objectively valid rules of justice, and thus provides a rational ground for determining what is or is not in the public interest. As long as the Western world remained true to this heritage, it was unassailable. From the time of the Jacobins onward, however, the public philosophy has been increasingly discredited by the attacks of moral relativists, who deny that there is any such thing as an all-embracing public interest, and rely on will rather than reason for the determination of public policy. The result, when combined with the 19th-century shift of power from restricted to mass electorates, was catastrophic. Unrestrained by any decent respect for reason and the public welfare, voters insisted on subordinating executives to legislatures, and used their power over elected agents to dictate selfish and short-sighted policies to the rulers of states. Wickedness and folly thus compounded cannot long endure. Ever since 1914 the democratic world has been going from bad to worse. Where once it was unassailable, it is now fighting for its life against the great and growing strength of new rivals for world mastery. Thus painfully and inexorably does history pass judgment on those who neglect to follow the true principles of government.

The only way out of these difficulties, and this is the final message of Lippmann's book, is to return to the public philosophy. In a society where all values are thought to be relative, it is hard for leaders to find the moral courage to cleave to the public interest, and equally hard for them to gain the confidence and respect of the masses. By encouraging philosophic relativism, the intellectual leaders of the West have gone a long way during the past 150 years to destroy the foundations of constitutional government. But the damage they have done, though great, is not necessarily irreparable. If the "men of light and leading" abandon their philosophic errors, and return to their proper task of teaching the public philosophy, all may yet be well. Inspired by a true respect for human reason, rulers may once again be restored to a state of intellectual and moral soundness which will enable them to deserve, and to receive, the willing confidence of mass electorates. Only thus can the waning "mandate of heaven" be restored to constitutional democracy.

Despite the eloquence and skill with which the argument is presented, the present reviewer is bound to confess that he finds it unconvincing. The difficulty, in his opinion, is not so much that Lippmann's position is untrue as that it is a half-truth exaggerated to the point of hopeless distortion. Few sensible men would deny that the problem of securing effective long-range leadership is one of the basic issues of constitutional government, and that the success of many modern democracies has been gravely compromised by failure in this direction. It is also reasonably obvious that free government depends on the existence of a certain general consensus with regard to the permissible methods and purposes of political action, on the existence, if you like, of a common public philosophy, and that the inability of some democratic states to establish or maintain an adequate consensus of this sort has impaired or destroyed their efficacy. But to go beyond this point, and to say that a restoration of earlier natural law principles is the only way to save the free world from disaster, is to exaggerate both the extent of the existing evils and the efficacy of the proposed cure.

Consider, first, Lippmann's distressingly eloquent picture of the plight of modern democracy. From his account one would gather that selfish and short-sighted electorates were everywhere on the rampage, contemptuously disregarding the advice of all qualified experts, and ruthlessly using their agents, the legislatures, to extort special privileges from cowardly or impotent executives. One would think that modern nations were little more than bear-gardens of warring special interests, each undeterred by any essential sense of or respect for the general interest. If this were so, the free world would indeed be in a bad way. It must be admitted that this Hobbesian picture of the war of all against all has in some measure been approximated in certain special cases, in pre-Hitler Germany, for example and, to a lesser extent, in prewar and postwar France. Where such conditions have prevailed, constitutional government has been able to operate with difficulty, or not at all. But to take this as a description, however approximate, of the political life of Great Britain, or even of the United States, is quite impossible. In these and many other constitutional states, democracy is still a going concern. Their governments have made mistakes, like other governments of the past, of the present and, if one may venture a prediction, of the future. But in these states it still remains true that conscientious and intelligent leadership, both executive and legislative, does in fact arise with reasonable frequency, and that when it arises it proves capable of gaining acceptance from an electorate by no means wholly deaf to considerations of the public interest. There is some reason to believe, indeed, that the public power and prestige of professional experts may tend to rise rather than to fall under the conditions of democratic government, and that the gravest threat to its continuation may lie not in the tendency to usurp but in the tendency to lose effective control over the performance of expert functions. Be that as it may, the fact remains that the free world as a whole is by no means bereft of moral and intellectual resources, and there is no reason to believe that these resources are declining. If the relative strength of the West in the world at large has declined in the present century, this is due far more to the increase in the strength of its totalitarian enemies, a strength based on the development of new techniques of political coercion and control, than to any decline in the potentialities of constitutional government itself. The rise of democratic electorates has certainly given rise to many new problems. But to follow Lippmann in saying that it has made constitutional government unworkable in its present forms is to go well beyond the evidence.

And if Lippmann's "malady of democratic states" is largely chimerical, so likewise is his proposed remedy. The natural-law tradition has undoubtedly played a significant part in the development and formulation of the Western ethical tradition. In the current re-examination and reaffirmation of the values of a free society, this is well worth reconsidering. But natural law, in the simple and nondogmatic form in which it has been commonly accepted, has never been sufficiently specific in content to provide a noncontroversial answer to actual political issues. Insofar as it encourages people to approach value judgments in a spirit of rational and disinterested inquiry, it can still serve a useful purpose. The fact remains, however, that even when men were united by a conscious devotion to natural law principles, they were regularly divided by the widest disagreements as to the practical application of those principles. Thus the public philosophy is no panacea for the political ills of our own or indeed of any other day. If our "men of light and leading" are to deserve well of the Republic, they will do well to apply themselves to the invention of acceptable solutions to concrete problems, rather than to spend their time in the propagation of general truths which have long been early self-evident to ordinary men.

FREDERICK M. WATKINS.

Yale University.

The Study of International Relations. BY QUINCY WRIGHT. (New York: Appleton-Century-Crofts, Inc. 1955. Pp. ix, 66. $6.75.)

Setting off from the premises that international relations is still a discipline in process of formation and that its subject matter is in process of rapid change, Professor Wright has undertaken the brave and challenging task of imposing order on the chaos of this singularly ill-defined field. All those who are working in the international sphere must welcome the strides toward order which he has made, even though there may be legitimate doubts as to whether the elusive and far-flung materials with which he is dealing will stay disciplined within the categories and distinctions he has so amply provided.

There can be few, if any, fields whose boundaries, and hence whose content, are as inadequately established as those of international relations—even though it may be that political science itself runs in a close second and suffers from some of the same troubles. It is a field, as Professor Wright points out, to which concentrated and coherent attention has been devoted only in fairly recent decades, and it has unquestionably grown and matured in Topsy fashion. Perhaps peculiarly in the United States with its frequent moralistic bent and its tendency to indulge in sweeping swings of academic fashion, international relations has shot up since World War I in a proliferation of courses, institutes, and king-size research projects.

The basic problem in connection with the field is very obviously not that there is any dearth of materials which would be generally acknowledged as germane to it, but rather that it sprawls amorphously over so large and varied a domain as to stagger the imagination and place it well beyond the grasp and comprehension of both student and teacher. Although a number of efforts have been made to give it intellectual coherence, it cannot be said that any has as yet been sufficiently persuasive to win general acceptance. While there is considerable agreement on a rule of thumb basis as to some of the central elements of the discipline, there is still a great range of disagreement as to how wide a sweep it must be assumed to cover and particularly as to a general hypothesis or conceptual scheme about which its disparate parts might be organized. In brief, there is a huge and shapeless accumulation of important materials, and there is the lack of a unifying principle which would give them meaning and more than episodic intelligibility.

It is to these problems that Professor Wright has turned in the present book. In seeking an answer to them he has adopted a catholic and encyclopedic approach which acknowledges diversity and multiplicity, arranged within what seemed, at least to this reviewer, a somewhat bewildering array of classifications, categories, divisions, and subdivisions. Certainly the end result is not to reduce the discipline within manageable proportions. Seeing international relations, in terms which recur throughout, as at once history, philosophy, science, and art, he suggests that an effort to synthesize the studies is important for it "appears to approach the ambitious task of synthesizing all the disciplines—humanistic, social, and natural . . . [and] resembles the effort to unify all knowledge." His own pages can be accused of no niggardliness in the matters with which they deal. He examines, for example, in two central sections of his book no less than 16 disciplines—10 classified as practical, and six as theoretical—which are embraced within the overall discipline of international relations, and to each he devotes from 10 to 20 pages in a set succession of Definition, Assumptions, Analysis, and Criticism. That the author has set no slight limits to his coverage is indicated by a disquisition on literary criticism, within the discipline of International Communications, which sets off from the Poetics of Aristotle and includes the mildly surprising judgment that "from the point of view of international relations, literary criticism is undoubtedly important."

To attempt to probe very deeply in brief chapters into such large matters as the art of war, international law, or the sociology or technology of international relations is an almost hopeless enterprise and inevitably involves covering much familiar ground. The more rewarding task, even though Professor Wright rightly sees it as a monumental one, is the creation of "some general hypothesis, conceptual system, or model" which would serve to give the discipline as a whole a logically consistent structure. Here the author takes as his framework five different conceptions of the world, each of which might be broadened and formalized, he suggests, so as to integrate the relevant disciplines. The five which he puts forward are the world as plan, as equilibrium, as organization, as spiritual community, and as field. Of these is the concept of a field, "constituted by the relations of the relevant entities, forces, sentiments, and processes" (italics his), which he develops as providing the best approach to the study of international relations. As a bloodless and scientific concept it is evident that such an approach lends itself to objective analysis of a sphere all too colored by both passion and partisan interests; but it is open to question that it can stand up against the competition of more dynamic approaches such as that of the concept of power.

One final issue which might be mentioned is the always thorny question of the role of value and value judgments in the espousing of a discipline. With some apparent hesitation, Professor Wright has included among the criteria to be applied in weighing the generalizations of international relations the proposition that they "should be so presented as not to discourage belief in, and observance of, the best values." It is, of course, a truism of all the social sciences that the values which men hold are themselves facts of the first order of importance and work very significantly to affect the bearing of other facts of a more identifiably material variety; but this is a very different proposition from the one here advanced by Professor Wright. There would be many, certainly, who would contend that it is not a proper function and responsibility of the worker in even so dubiously scientific a discipline as international relations to guide his footsteps in such a way as not to tread upon "the best values," even if it be assumed that such values are objectively determinable. If a single illustration of the dilemma may be given, Professor Wright in his discussion of the discipline of colonial government establishes it as one of the underlying assumptions that the governing authority should give primary consideration to the interests of the inhabitants of the area and the interests of the world community with only secondary consideration to its own interests. Eminently desirable as this proposition may be in its own right, can it be legitimately advanced as an underlying assumption? On the face of the historical record it would appear to be more frequently an extraneous consideration than one which has been central to colonial government, and surely it is a matter to be examined by the student or researcher rather than an assumption to be laid down for him before he starts.

RUPERT EMERSON.

Harvard University.

The United Nations and the Maintenance of International Peace and Security.

By LELAND M. GOODRICH AND ANNE P. SIMONS. (Washington, D. C.: The Brookings Institution. 1955. Pp. xiii, 70. $6.00.)

Under the leadership of the late Dr. Leontyevsky, the Brookings Institution in 1951 planned a series of seven volumes, each of them to constitute a separate study of a major feature of the United Nations system. This volume is the first of the group to be published. Students of the United Nations will find it to be a scholarly treatment of the subject which it covers and will look forward to the other six volumes.

Three principal aspects of United Nations activities in the maintenance of international peace and security are treated by the authors: (1) the peaceful settlement of disputes and situations; (2) the use of collective measures in threats to or breaches of the peace; and (3) the regulation of armaments. The discussion of these topics is preceded by three introductory chapters (brought together as Part I of the book) setting forth the framework of international politics within which the United Nations has been obliged to operate; they will not be illuminating to most readers, for only persons with a substantial background will be tempted to read the other 20 chapters, crammed as they are with technical information and analyses.

Except for the first three chapters, the book is well-documented; the authors have based their information almost entirely on the official publications of the United Nations. Frequently their discussions of the authority and procedures of the Security Council and the General Assembly are compared with those of League of Nations organs, and not always to the advantage of the former. Prevailing practices in such matters as the submission of questions to United Nations organs, the decision to consider or not to consider those questions, the clarification of issues, fact-finding agencies, negotiation between the parties, mediation, and conciliation are expounded cautiously and effectively. Controversial aspects of these practices are elucidated dispassionately, and usually proponents and opponents are identified. The authors present their own views on many matters, sometimes in brief statements at the end of chapters, and more particularly in the final chapter entitled "Summary and Evaluation." Generally their views are soundly based on the facts and information which have been presented, and will appeal to the reader as thoughtful, unbiased, and often constructive. Appendices to the book include such documents as the Charter of the United Nations, the Rules of Procedure of the General Assembly, the "Uniting for Peace" Resolution, and the Provisional Rules of Procedure of the Security Council.

Some of the generalizations drawn by Mr. Goodrich and Miss Simons are confirmatory of those often made by observers and scholars who have not had the wealth of information presented in this volume on which to base their thinking. For instance, it is generally understood that the experience of the League of Nations has been heavily drawn upon by the United Nations in the determination of useful methods of procedure. Well understood too are (1) the diminished role of the Security Council in the maintenance of peace and the increased importance of the General Assembly, (2) the limited utility of the organization in dealing with problems of the cold war, (3) the tendency to fall back on regional collective measures as those of the United Nations have failed to mature and prove themselves, and (4) the rather meager contributions of the International Court of Justice to a more stable order. These conclusions and others like them are nevertheless an asset to the book, for they are well-reasoned and solidly grounded on facts.

Other conclusions and opinions are less commonplace, and whether they elicit the agreement of the reader or not, they will help him to get an improved perspective on the United Nations. Among them are the following: (1) a need exists for "more consistency and less ambiguity" in inviting states not members to participate in discussions; (2) efforts of the Security Council by investigation to obtain facts in disputes and situations have met with "very limited success" for reasons discussed at some length; (3) the veto has not been an obstructive factor of significance in the treatment of disputes or in the regulation of armaments; and (4) the actual practices of the Council "bear little relation to most of the refinements and details of method and procedure prescribed in the Charter."

Even admitting the authors' overall opinion that "The record of the United Nations in maintaining international peace and security cannot of course be viewed with complete satisfaction or optimism," the reader will be impressed by the tenacity with which the organization works on the problem both in a general way and in concrete cases. He will be struck too by the resourcefulness of the Security Council and the General Assembly in devising procedures and adapting them to their purposes regardless of Charter provisions. That the record of the United Nations is not better is due primarily to the East-West split in present-day international relations, as the authors so often assert; it is not the result of indifference or indolence.

NORMAN HILL.

University of Nebraska.

The Political Economy of American Foreign Policy: Its Concepts, Strategy, and Limits. Report of a Study Group Sponsored by the Woodrow Wilson Foundation and the National Planning Association. (New York: Henry Holt and Co. 1955. Pp. xv, 414. $6.00.)

One of the most pressing needs facing the people of the United States today is that of seeing foreign policy in its totality. Segmental analyses which focus upon single countries, or groups of countries, specific issues, or periods of time often have the effect of beclouding major objectives, and they contribute easily to compartmental thinking that endangers the achievement of consistency and the promotion of broad aims. Equally dangerous to the development of a sense of overall direction in thinking about foreign policy, are analyses which lack historical perspective, or which suggest artificial distinctions between domestic and foreign aspects of national welfare and of required governmental policies.

For those who seek the broader understanding of foreign policy, the present volume will provide much satisfaction. It is, in brief, an effort to examine economic aspects of foreign policy in the full political setting of contemporary foreign relations, in the perspective of modern history since the industrial revolution, and in the framework of our relationship with both the more industrialized and the economically less developed countries of the world.

Some striking parallels in the development of Western countries and Japan and of the admittedly less developed countries offer insights and reminders of the common character of many of the problems faced by both groups of countries.

Prepared as a report of a study group, the breadth of discussion reflects the scope of experience and knowledge of the members of the group: Frank Altschul, Richard M. Bissell, Jr., Courtney C. Brown, H. Van B. Cleveland, William Y. Elliott, Chairman, Theodore Geiger, Harry D. Gideonse, Edward S. Mason, and Don K. Price. This is a group of men whose training and record of public service have assured the kind of perspective without which such a comprehensive analysis could easily have deteriorated into a superficial survey. They have, as a group, in fact managed to show "the inextricable relationship of all aspects of public policy including economic policy" which is suggested by the breadth of title "The Political Economy of American Foreign Policy" (not merely economic foreign policy).

The volume consists of two parts: Part I, a diagnosis of the origins of economic conditions and the needs of countries of the non-Soviet dominated world, and Part II, a prescription for United States foreign policy. In the first part is traced the evolution of the international economy of the mid-twentieth century out of the world economy of the nineteenth century. The analysis encompasses the changing characteristics of the principal industrial countries of the West and of Japan and the nature of the economies which emerge in the framework of an increasingly national orientation in the nation-state system. Included within a discussion of the impact of the industrial national economies upon the underdeveloped countries of the world is a highly perceptive analysis of the economic, social, and political characteristics of the less developed countries and of the dynamic forces which give direction to their domestic and foreign economic policies.

In Part II there is an examination of the serious contrasts between the theory and the practice of foreign economic policy as caused in large measure by the lag in comprehension of the nature of the world of today and tomorrow for which policies need to be developed quickly. Policy actually tends to be formulated with a backward rather than with a forward look. The forced departure from prewar-oriented foreign policy theory, compelled by stark realities in world politics since the late 1940's, poses clearly the issue between what may seem temporary deviations from "normal" and the probability of long-term re-orientation of economic foreign policy in a completely different world. The highly imaginative innovations in economic foreign policy that accompany various kinds of so-called "foreign" aid programs complementary to new regional security arrangements are examined as elements in longer term policy for a future unlikely to see an early achievement of a truly world economy. In this perspective the elements of an American policy are outlined in relation to regionalized trade prospects and in terms of the domestic and foreign aspects of private investing, public loans, and the flow of goods and services. Attention is also given to some of the exportable ideology which could contribute to a more ready acceptance of United States leadership that is both required and expected in most of the countries toward which our foreign policy is oriented.

Of special importance throughout the volume is the recognition of the political-psychological framework within which economic policy must be planned and executed and the Study Group emphasizes the serious character of the administrative and organizational obstacles to effective planning and execution of foreign policy inherent within our present governmental system.

Altogether, this is a thorough and a valuable contribution to an understanding of the political economy of American foreign policy in relation to the new world conditions since the end of the last war and to the peculiar needs for a policy that must encompass nations of widely differing levels of economic development.

WALTER H. C. LAVES.

Indiana University.

National Minorities: An International Problem. BY INIS L. CLAUDE, JR. (Cambridge: Harvard University Press. 1955. Pp. xii 213. $4.50.)

In May, 1851, Gladstone's complaint of political abuses in Naples was brought to the attention of Austria. Prince Schwarzenberg's reply, paraphrased by Philip Magnus in his recent biography of Gladstone, included the reminder that British treatment of political offenders in Ireland, the Ionian Islands, and Ceylon "had neither escaped his attention nor excited his disapproval." Gladstone's protest was implicitly based on the concept of a higher law by which all peoples are somehow entitled to "fair treatment." Schwarzenberg's counterthrust transforms the problem into the conventional one of the courtesies and respect due one sovereign state by another.

In quite the same way, the principle of state sovereignty clashes with the concept of minority rights. This is the problem of Professor Claude's study. If the separate states do not deal fairly and adequately with their own minorities, these groups must accept their plight, seek to change the laws under which they live, or look for relief to some outside agency. When they are unwilling to accept the first alternative and unable to effect the second, national minorities become an international problem. If, however, rights are defined and made actual only by an established system of law, then one must conclude that minority rights can be protected only as international organization takes on more of the qualities of government, with constant and effective control of the states that become its subsidiary units.

This is one explanation of the difficulty of defining and protecting minority rights. The author sees others as well. Under the League system, problems were not defined clearly or handled sympathetically, nor did statesmen appreciate their complexity; the parties involved did not cooperate in good faith to make the League machinery work; the discriminatory application of minority obligations and minority rights aroused resentment at the same time that it diminished the League's moral authority; members of the League who had no minority problems themselves showed an "excessive regard for the sensitivity of the states" who did have. The author discusses such difficulties clearly and with sensibility. He probes the conflicts between kin-states and minority states, between those who urge the preservation and protection of minorities and those who urge their assimilation or transfer, between those who advocate a bilateral approach and those who prefer an international solution. He shows us that there were many mistakes and many failings, and many conceptual difficulties as well; but he does not succeed in conveying the conviction that these mistakes and failings and conceptual difficulties really made any difference. Bad faith vitiated past efforts, but what kind of program, if any, could have been devised to operate satisfactorily with the amount of good faith available? Some states, such as Britain, took a less positive interest in minority matters than one might have hoped for, but what, if anything, could Britain have accomplished by displaying a more positive interest? If there were possibilities for successful affirmative action, the author does not make them clear.

What then is the explanation of the failure of international efforts to redress minority grievances: the difficulty of constructing a system of rights where no system of government exists, or the foibles of the statesmen involved? One would suppose that to the extent the first explanation is accepted, the second becomes trivial. Professor Claude himself seems to accept both, but he does so without attempting to estimate their relative significance. He points out, for example, that if the United Nations "had undertaken to establish a universal system of minority protection, it would have had to rely, most precariously, upon the prospect that states would subject themselves to it voluntarily . . ." (p. 176). Given a sovereign-state system, voluntary action is, in this matter, the only action possible. One might expect that, having accepted this as fact, the author would make an attempt to relate it to the ways in which diplomats have approached minority problems. Instead, he dismisses the difficulties that follow from the necessarily voluntary character of an international minority program. They are, he thinks, "essentially irrelevant . . . , since the United Nations has displayed a definite disinclination to attempt the formulation, in general terms, of an international solution to the problem of national minorities" (p. 176). It may be, however, that these difficulties are so relevant that it would be a waste of time to attempt the formulation of such a program.

Sometimes the author seems to support the latter conclusion; at other times he argues that we should have tried harder. In short, he does not make clear to his readers whether they should learn the many lessons taught by past errors in international minority programs or the one big lesson that placing hope in such programs was utopian from the outset.

KENNETH WALTZ.

Columbia University.

Communism, Conformity, and Civil Liberties: A Cross-Section of the Nation Speaks Its Mind. BY SAMUEL A. STOFFER. (Garden City, N. Y.: Doubleday & Co., Inc. 1955. Pp. 278. $4.00.)

Perhaps it would come as a discovery to Professor Stouffer to learn that he has written a book on political theory, and one has little doubt, although much regret, that it will be only the rare political theorist who will himself ever experience that discovery. There is much to be regretted in this because, even though Communism, Conformity, and Civil Liberties is a quantitative study of public attitudes with accompanying tables and paraphernalia, made easy, to be sure, for nontechnically qualified readers, the findings have the most intimate relation to the assumptions on which some of the great theories rest.

Consider, for example, the relationship of Stouffer to Jefferson. Jefferson, apostle of "the free right to the unbounded exercise of reason and freedom of opinion," held the American liberties to be better protected by an agrarian society because the "cultivators of the earth" make the best defenders of such liberties. Now Stouffer, from his data, has constructed a scale measuring support for the right of divergent economic and religious minorities to give expression to their views. He finds such support to be especially low in rural areas and small towns and concludes: "There is something about life in a small community that makes it less hospitable to divergent opinions than is the case in our urban centers" (p. 130).

The Marxian view is that opinions are a reflection of class interest, that the association of the working class together in factories will make of them a class-conscious instrument of communism. Consider this in the light of Stouffer's findings on the percentages of community leaders willing to let a socialist (not a communist) speak in their community (p. 31): newspaper publishers, 97; presidents of bar associations, 95; chairmen of Republican county central committees, 88; presidents of chambers of commerce, 85; presidents of labor unions, 80; and a cross-section of the same cities as the above leaders represent, 61.

Or consider T. H. Green: "... the idea of the individual's right to free life has been strongly laid hold of in Christendom ..." partly because it derives from the teachings of St. Paul. In what sense are Christendom and St. Paul related to the "free life" in the light of the following findings (p. 142)?

	Percentage Classified as "More Tolerant"
Attended church in last month	28%
Did not attend church in last month	36%

(Appropriate controls for education, class, sex, religion, etc. have been applied in the cases used.)

One cannot say that these findings refute those aspects cited of Jefferson's, Marx's, and Green's theories, but they are distinctly relevant and because of this relevance they belong in the discussion of political theory.

The book itself is a product of what is probably the most extensive (and expensive: $125,000) survey of the kind ever conducted. The survey was designed to discover "the reactions of Americans to two dangers. One, from Communist conspiracy outside and inside the country. Two from those who in thwarting the conspiracy would sacrifice some of the very liberties which the enemy would destroy" (p. 13). In order to do this some 537 interviewers questioned a national probability sample of 4,933 persons, plus—and this is a unique and useful feature of the study—1,500 selected community leaders in 123 cities between 10,000 and 150,000 population.

The data thus collected enabled the analysts to discover the relationships between "willingness to tolerate nonconformists" (socialists, atheists, communists, and persons alleged to be communists but who swear they are not) and a multitude of such sociological and psychological variables as age, sex, place of residence, perceptions of the menace of communism, and so forth. Furthermore, because they have identical data for community leaders (mayors, newspaper publishers, commanders of American Legion posts, regents of D.A.R., etc.) and the general public, they can discover in what particulars these two groups differ. They find that leaders, including D.A.R. and Legion officers, are considerably more tolerant than the rank and file of American citizens.

The book is a research report and goes beyond this only in the last chapter where the meaning of the findings for "people who can do something about them" is briefly suggested. The burden of mining the ore for additional meanings rests upon others.

ROBERT E. LANE.

Yale University.

Wanted: An Asian Policy. BY EDWIN O. REISCHAUER. (New York: Alfred A. Knopf. 1955. Pp. xi, 276. $3.75.)

An American Policy in Asia. BY W. W. ROSTOW IN COLLABORATION WITH RICHARD W. HATCH. (New York: John Wiley & Sons, Inc. 1955. Pp. 59. $1.00.)

In view of Director Max Millikan's ungracious and unauthenticated statement in the preface to An American Policy in Asia that "China scholars have tended to develop split personalities, painfully excluding policy insights from their scholarly work, and then permitting their pent-up convictions as to what the United States should do in the Far East to spill out in most unscholarly bursts of temper," it is of some interest that Professor Rostow and his collaborator should have reached, without benefit of Professor Reischauer's long study, conclusions so similar to the latter's. Rostow and Hatch center their treatment on China while drawing other Asian states into focus in several chapters. Reischauer attempts to give adequate attention to the major countries of all Asia. He divides his treatment into three parts: the problem, the situation, and principles of strategy; each part is subdivided topically. Rostow and Hatch write under nine topics: "United States Interest in Asia," "Broad Foundations for Alliance in Free Asia," "The Free Chinese," "Formosa," "The Vulnerability of Communist China to its Asian Environment," "The Military Problem," "An Economic Policy in Free Asia," "U. N. Membership for Communist China?," "U. S. Recognition?," and "The Free World Alliance."

Both of these books, though comparatively brief, are serious efforts by able scholars to apply their knowledge of Asia and of contending forces in the contemporary world toward aiding the United States to work out a policy that will combat the influence of Soviet communism, weaken or overthrow existing Asiatic systems of communism, and prevent the rise of communism in states not yet under the influence. They agree that postwar American policy has been grounded in ignorance and correspondingly unsuccessful. They state their views as to American interests in quite similar terms. Professor Reischauer holds that "the one over-riding objective . . . is inevitably the furtherance of our own peace and security," while Professor Rostow and his collaborator write that "the fundamental task of American foreign policy is to maintain a world environment for the United States within which our form of society can develop in conformity with the humanistic principles which are its foundation." Both arguments evince clear realization of the risks involved in an aggressive program designed to control Asiatic development to suit American interests. But both are unwilling to have the United States adopt a purely laissez faire attitude. Reischauer surveys at some length the evolution of Asiatic-Western relations during the nineteenth century, rightly stating that "the only way to ascertain even roughly the direction of motion in Asia is to take a long historical look at what has been happening there." He points to the earlier variance between Asiatic cultures and to the significance of this variance in contemporary East-West relations. He observes that "most native Asian political institutions appear to have been washed away." He somewhat hesitantly credits the "machine," which is incompatible with Asiatic caste and family systems, with the Westernization of the East and treats this process as an extension of effects experienced a century earlier in the West. The interesting analysis brings him to the possibilities of collaboration between the United States and Asia.

Rostow and Hatch see such possibilities in the American record of anti-colonialism, but they justifiably counsel a speed-up in our efforts to persuade other states to free their colonies. They also urge that we not only extend more adequate aid toward Asian economic growth but also exert ourselves to convince Asiatic peoples that our interest in them is not a gambit to improve our own military position vis-à-vis the U.S.S.R. They assert that "the widespread belief in Asia that we intend to launch aggressive war is already extremely costly to us." Most important: "If we wish to bring and hold the literate Asian within the Free World alliance, we must come to believe that American interests and objectives conform in important respects to his own." Reischauer also believes that possibilities for cooperation with Asia exist and he describes the "implements of policy" as military, economic and ideological. Of the three, he rates the military as least important. He regards the economic implement as likely to be effective over a considerable period provided that it is not used to buy military commitments. He puts most faith in ideological propaganda, while deprecating American efforts hitherto to use this implement as "give away" to the Soviets. Curiously enough, he avers that Americans play down their own ideas and argues that we must meet the Russians on their own ground of self-congratulation rather than by beating our breasts in self-condemnation. This criticism comes oddly from a citizen of "G-d's country." He is right, however, in his view that revolution in Asia is not the product of communism but of democracy, and that we have neither studied the meaning of democracy sufficiently nor explained democracy adequately in Asia. Whether or not our wholesale transformation of Japan's economy during the postwar occupation was "vastly more successful than our more defensive pose in Japan in recent years" is another matter. He does not appear to note the difficulty of reconciling the quoted statement with another which follows it within two pages: "There is one thing that no free society . . . can tolerate, and that is compulsion." He is much more effective in his treatment of the problem of communications, though he has no new answer to that crucial problem.

Neither of these pungently written and stimulating little volumes will give comfort to the China lobby. Their authors advise giving all possible aid toward the development of a free, prosperous society on Formosa but are firmly opposed to encouraging Chiang Kai-shek to attempt a military comeback on the mainland. They also favor our giving serious consideration to the recognition of the Peking government and to its admission to the United Nations.

In such free-swinging statements of personal opinion—for which the authors need make no apologies, and which are cordially welcomed by this reviewer—there are bound to be numerous challenges to readers, e.g., the frequent unqualified references to the "Free World." That is the great value of such books—they do challenge their readers to consider their country's position and what can be done to improve it. Surely, however, they might help their readers more than they do. While books written for the seriously-minded lay citizen should not be loaded with footnotes, neither should they omit citations of authorities, particularly for factual statements, thereby permitting the inference that great decisions upon national policy are comparatively simple products of individual cogitation.

HAROLD S. QUIGLEY.

University of Minnesota.

British Political Parties: The Distribution of Power within the Conservative and Labour Parties. BY R. T. MCKENZIE. (New York: St. Martin's Press. 1955. Pp. xv, 623. $7.50.)

All major institutions require, every 50 years or so, a fresh and comprehensive study. Mr. McKenzie has attempted in this book an analysis comparable to that done by Ostrogorski at the turn of the century. Five momentous decades provide his justification and material. When Ostrogorski wrote, the democratization of the British franchise—though carried a long way—was still incomplete. Party organization was grappling with its early problems and its future was still unsure. Two great parties confronted one another in Parliament and before the public, though the symmetry of their opposition was marred by the Irish Nationalists. Since that time, the party system has endured a global economic depression and two global wars. It has consummated and absorbed the ultimate extension of the electorate. It has witnessed the breakup of the Liberals and the emergence of a new major party with a distinct philosophy.

Mr. McKenzie's work now fills a major gap in our knowledge of an important aspect of the modern British parties: namely, their internal structure and functioning. His book bears the obvious imprints of indefatigable research, accurate reporting, and impartial assessment. He leaves the convincing impression that he has culled whatever data he could find and has presented them without grinding an axe. On points where he yields little illumination (party finance, for example) the fault is not so much his as that of the parties themselves.

Virtually the whole of this solidly packed book is factual description and analysis. There is, therefore, much grist in it for the behaviorists' mill. Those, however, who feel that evaluation and a philosophy are also a supreme obligation of the political scientist are going to be disappointed, for they will particularly note that 580 thick pages of data terminate in 11 thin pages of conclusions. A bulky foundation of evidence is used to support two essentially simple propositions. One is that the internal structure of each party is unlike what its opponents say of it. The other is that the two rivals—despite Labor's early attempt to be different—have come to be organized and to operate in much the same way. The similarities between Labor and Conservatives in structure and power distribution are the features that impress Mr. McKenzie most forcibly.

This second observation deserves discussion. It is demonstrated by the author with cogency and is substantiated by ample evidence. On the basis of his findings it may be accepted as proven. The most striking of these similarities consists in the role of the party leader and in the relation between the parliamentary representatives and their mass organization outside. In both British parties the leader has a significant authority—a fact which appears natural to the Conservatives, but does mark a departure from the original assumptions of the Labor movement. Likewise, in both parties the parliamentarians have refused to be the "servants" of the organization outside. The latter helps the former as a vote-getting machine; but it is the elected representatives who have maintained the upper hand. The reason for these results is explained by the author in terms of the influence of the constitutional structure on the parties. The parliamentarians are in the saddle because under the British system, Parliament is designed to be the final locus of authority. The leader is all-important, because he is either an actual or a potential prime minister.

This inference about causation is a tempting one. Yet it contains two difficulties, of which one is ignored by the author while the other is wrapped in ambiguities. If it is correct to hold that the formal institutions of government have served to mold the party structure, why has this not happened in the same way and to the same degree in other countries where virtually identical institutions exist? In Australia and New Zealand, for example, although it is true that the legislative representatives have, on the whole, succeeded by now in controlling the party organization outside Parliament they have nevertheless obtained more power vis-à-vis their leader than in Britain. Certainly this is the case "down under" in the Labor parties, which have adopted the practice of electing the members of the cabinet when their party takes office.

The chief ambiguity in Mr. McKenzie's treatment consists in his account of the source of the leader's authority. On page 384 he writes: "The Labour Leader's formal powers appear to be much more limited than those of the Conservative Leader, but like the latter, he becomes from the moment of his election as Leader a potential Prime Minister. It must be emphasized again that this above all else is the principle (sic) source of his influence and authority. Like his Conservative counterpart, the Labour Leader wields this influence on sufferance. If his followers in Parliament withdraw their consent to his continued leadership, his authority collapses immediately" (italics in original). But, one cannot have it both ways. If the leader's "leadership" collapses as soon as his "followers" withdraw their consent, how can the author assert that the "principal" source of his influence and authority is the fact that he is a potential prime minister? Should he not say that the principal source is the "consent" of those who follow? (Compare also pp. 145 and 298 for the same ambiguity.)

Finally, it may be suggested that the value of this richly informative work would have been enhanced if the author had seen fit to encompass the Liberals—who are relegated to a two-page appendix. After all, modern Britain did witness the disintegration of a once-great party. The analysis should have been extended to explain what happens when a formerly powerful structure breaks up. That story would have thrown a fresh, and possibly different, light on the relations between followers and leaders, and between parliamentarians and vote-winning machines.

LESLIE LIPSON.

University of California (Berkeley).

Higher Civil Servants in Britain: From 1870 to the Present Day. By R. K. KELSALL. (London: Routledge & Kegan Paul, Ltd. 1955. Pp. xvi, 233.)

This volume represents part of a research program, supported by a Nuffield Foundation grant to the London School of Economics, to study "social selection and differentiation in Great Britain." The first study, Social Mobility in Great Britain, ed. D. V. Glass (1954), concerned with general problems, is to be followed by a series of more specific inquiries into key professions, of which this volume is one, as is a forthcoming report on the elementary schoolteaching profession. Mr. Kelsall summarizes the particular questions with which he is concerned as being, among others, the following: "From which social strata is the Higher Administrative Class now being drawn, and what changes have taken place in this respect over the last eighty years or so? Are we witnessing a second revolution, in that the hold of the upper-middle class on the higher administrative posts is now seriously jeopardized? How far have the developments that have taken place been the result of policy changes either in the recruitment of direct entrants, or in the promotion of those originally entering the lower classes of the Service? To what extent have the fathers of senior officials themselves been members of this or closely allied occupations? What have been the relationships between the social origin, education, and upbringing of higher civil servants on the one hand, and their career-success on the other? Has there been any marked change in the status of their profession?"

In pursuit of answers to these questions, the author devotes his first chapter to an appraisal of available information, his second chapter to a painstaking account of his methodology in assembling the basic data. He then successively treats the following subjects: Routes of Entry to the Administrative Class (promotion from the ranks, open competition, and other routes); Social Origins based on Father's Occupation; Occupants of Six Key Posts at Four Dates; Women in the Administrative Class; the Nature of the Profession. The exposition is heavily statistical, preoccupied with methodological concerns, sparse and cautious in both interpretation and generalization. The usual expectations of American readers concerning the clarity, felicity, and pungency of British writing are persistently frustrated.

The findings are significant, if somewhat anticlimactical for so much methodological machinery. They refine, rather than upset, what previous studies have asserted: that the upper and middle social classes have been "over-represented" in the higher civil service; that Oxford and Cambridge have been the primary gateways; that these and associated characteristics have been the focus of anxiety and criticism. Perhaps his most distinctive finding is that the years 1949-52 brought sharp changes in these matters, seeming to announce a more rapid democratization of the higher ranks than had been expected by most observers.

Several questions of great interest are described as beyond the limits of the present study. First, because such information could be obtained only by interviewing the subjects, no data are presented on why they chose a civil service career, whether they now would make a different choice, whether they would advise their sons or daughters to make a different choice, and how they view their role in society. Second, no comparisons between the social origins and educational history of higher civil servants and of the members of other professions in Great Britain, and of the higher civil servants of other countries, are made because comparable data do not exist. Third, no comparison is made with ministers of the government because it "no longer seemed worth while," Labor ministers having demonstrated they can live without friction with the higher civil servants. Fourth, certain other broad questions, about which the available information is described as inadequate to resolve the issue, are excluded, for example, "whether the State can obtain the ablest servants whilst at the same time satisfying the demands of its citizens for equality of opportunity."

Among American readers, political scientists especially will regret these omissions and, in addition, will incline to the feeling that "sociological" studies of this type will continue to yield limited returns until the range of inquiry includes central attention to the political and governmental roles of the higher civil servants. It is what they do, and how they do it, that makes relevant who they are, where they come from, and how they got to where they are. If this volume is intended to prepare the way for such an inquiry in Great Britain, its value will be greatly increased.

WALLACE S. SAYRE.

Columbia University.

Social Credit and the Federal Power in Canada. BY J. R. MALLORY. (Toronto: University of Toronto Press. 1954. Pp. xi, 148. $5.00.)

Professor Mallory's volume is the fifth in the series on Social Credit in Alberta, which the Canadian Social Science Research Council has sponsored over the past 10 years. This seems a lot of time and books to devote to so obscure a political movement, but the various authors have avoided the danger of overworking their subject by writing as far as possible about something else. Professor Mallory is the first to use the name "Social Credit" in his title, but he too has sought the main theme of his work elsewhere. His concern is with the basic readjustment in the balance of Canadian federalism which occurred during and after World War II, and he deals with the Social Credit party as a contributing factor in the shift of power between the federal and provincial governments, but not as the underlying cause of that shift.

This approach gives the author wide scope. He breaks new ground in his attempt to explain Canadian constitutional conflicts and changes as the reflection of basic economic pressures rather than of competing theories of federalism. Pointing out that in no less than one-half of the Privy Council cases reported between 1867-1939, the plea of ultra vires was successful in defeating the intention of the legislature, he concludes that the resulting spheres of authority of the Dominion and the provinces are the incidental outcome of a clash between individualism and collectivism. His chapter on "Disallowance and the National Interest," in which he shows how the disallowance power at Ottawa (a power to which there is no parallel in American constitutional law) was primarily used to protect the dominant commercial and financial interests centered on the St. Lawrence system, harmonizes this part of Canadian political history with his main thesis and brings into one picture developments in constitutional law which have hitherto tended to be subjected to separate treatment by lawyers and political scientists. In consequence there is a breadth of outlook in this book which, despite a certain looseness of structure, makes it a valuable contribution to the subject of Canadian federalism.

In a short review, comment may be offered on only a few of the many ideas and reflections with which the book is replete. While it may be true, as Roscoe Pound has said and Professor Mallory agrees, that the fundamental difference between the law of the nineteenth century and that of the present period is due to changing ideas about society, and that the conflicts which arise are due to clashes of ideas rather than of men, nevertheless men, particularly the men who sit on courts of final appeal, play a rôle somewhat larger than Professor Mallory seems willing to admit. This is particularly true of the Canadian situation, where for 80 years the final court—the English Privy Council—was composed of judges who had only the most casual acquaintance, if any, with the nation for whom they were laying down fundamental law. While they could not stop the march of history, they could and did slow its pace and deflect its minor currents, and in so doing installed new concepts of federalism in the law itself. This has left Canada with a mass of case-made law, now bolstered by the doctrine of stare decisis, from which escape is difficult.

For this reason Professor Mallory does not appear to this reviewer to have demonstrated the "major readjustment of the whole balance of Canadian federalism" of which he speaks, at least insofar as the law of the constitution is concerned. The underlying conditions making for readjustment, particularly in economic policy, have changed, and individualism has no longer its former potency, yet in respect of many fields of jurisdiction the enlarged powers of provinces make the implementation of national policies extremely difficult. Until new interpretations or constitutional amendments occur, Canada will struggle with makeshift solutions. Given the present strength of Quebec's nationalism, there is unlikely to be a new approach for some time to come. These are problems we hope Professor Mallory will explore in a succeeding volume.

F. R. SCOTT.

McGill University.

Federalism, Finance and Social Legislation in Canada, Australia, and the United States. By A. H. BIRCH. (Oxford: Clarendon Press. 1955. Pp. xiv, 314. $5.60.)

This book is a Ph.D. dissertation submitted to the University of London in 1951, and revised and enlarged after the author, a lecturer in government in the University of Manchester, spent a year in the United States and Canada under a grant from the Commonwealth Fund.

Both in subject matter and in execution the book reflects dominant attitudes and emphases in the teaching of political science in the United Kingdom. The new emphasis on federalism in British universities is understandable in view of the British government's recent actions in committing itself to the federal form for the projected experiments in home rule in Nigeria, Central Africa, and the British West Indies; federalism has seemed to the Colonial Office the obvious expedient for effecting the handing over of self-government to those underdeveloped countries (still only Crown Colonies after World War II) which are multi-racial in composition.

Mr. Birch's work, unfortunately, is heavily legalistic in form and tone, concerning itself to a marked extent with constitutional texts and forms, decisions of the courts, and governmental memoranda. Though recognizing at the outset that in matters of government "there are economic, social, and geographic characteristics which shape political behaviour, and these cannot properly be ignored" (p. xiii), Mr. Birch proceeds to relegate them to the background throughout his study. This is a rather dangerous approach, in its very narrowness, for it tends to assume that the answers to problems of comparative study are to be found in legal texts and further that verbal similarity in phrasing and drafting of governmental documents is necessarily paralleled by similarity in actual working operation. Mr. Birch's quest for absolute purity in his research causes him to eliminate the Swiss federal system from the scope of his inquiry as having a "very different environment" from Canada, Australia, and the United States, and likely for that reason to produce a "long series of exceptions to the general argument" (p. xv). This may be so, of course, but surely on that account the inclusion of Switzerland might be very valuable in testing the validity of universal hypotheses otherwise derived too facilely from the experience of Canada, Australia, and the United States alone.

In the end result Mr. Birch's study, in its emphases on positive law, resembles that type of study that was apt to proceed from British and Commonwealth law schools in the days prior to World War II before the onset of sociological jurisprudence and the contemporary emphasis on an integrated, interdisciplinary approach to legal research. But even as such, it is not very satisfactory, quite understandably perhaps, for Mr. Birch is not a lawyer. He is curiously selective in his cases—he manages to exclude the bulk of the Canadian "New Deal" cases, and also the major constitutional cases arising from the Alberta Social Credit government's financial program; all the Australian cases on S. 92 of the Constitution (including even the Bank nationalization case, though the scheme of centralized banking that it involved was to have been the mainstay of the Labor party's social and economic program for the future), and the so-called "Financial Agreement" cases arising from the bitter struggle between the Labor administration in New South Wales and the national government over financial policy during the world economic depression of the early 1930's; all the American decisions on due process and the commerce power and even the latest decisions on immunity of instrumentalities, national or state, from taxation by the other. There are recurrent minor errors of citation or fact, e.g., the repeated use of "B.N.A.A." as a short form for the British North America Act, 1867 (the correct short form citation is B.N.A. Act), the presentation of Mr. Justice McTiernan of the High Court of Australia with a small "t," or the assertion that the issue of standing to sue in the form of a private taxpayer's suit has not been tested judicially outside the United States. More disturbing are some of his general interpretations: as his unsubstantiated charge (p. 163) that Dean W. P. M. Kennedy, the foremost living Canadian constitutional authority, "over-simplifies" in his well-known characterization of the Privy Council's approach to the Canadian Constitution as treating it as a statute and not a constitution; also his contention, by contrast, that the High Court of Australia has "consistently applied the letter of the Constitution" (p. 164), though the natural right barriers against social and economic planning legislation that the courts have been able to derive from S. 92 of the Australian Constitution involve a marked departure from both the words and also the limited historical purpose of that section.

In short, though Mr. Birch's work reveals considerable application and thought, I do not think he has broken much new ground. In the further development of his researches in this field it is to be hoped that he will get into some of the "extra-legal" factors that he has, for the present, largely excluded, but which, it is submitted, are vital to any meaningful study of federal government on a comparative basis at the present day. In particular, I would like to see some attempt at evaluation of the key influences on government in the various federal countries, involving for example inquiry into the ideas and organization of their major political parties—one cannot, for example, explain the marked centripetal action under the Australian Constitution over the 55 years of Australian federation without understanding the part played by increasing bureaucratic centralism in the Australian Labor party; or by contrast the pluralistic (more strictly dualistic) society that has emerged in Canada without studying the strong "Provincial Rights" attitudes in Quebec, and the curious Canadian voting patterns that allow a solid Quebec vote for the Liberal party in national elections but an equally solid vote for its arch-foes in provincial elections. Without a broader conceptual framework than positive law doctrines, the current Colonial Office experiments in federalism as a solution for assorted ills in Nigeria, Central Africa, and the British West Indies are not likely to yield constitutional governments that can survive the severe test of independence and go on to become effective law-in-action. Mr. Birch has perhaps hewed too closely to Professor Wheare's original venture into federal government, which, as a pioneer study in the field, was understandably somewhat restricted in the scope of the inquiry undertaken. The later editions of Professor Wheare's book, however, and also the more recently published views of Max Beloff, one of the most thoughtful of the postwar British political scientists, show a more broadly eclectic, integrative approach that is likely to produce more viable results.

EDWARD McWHINNEY.

University of Toronto.

The American Legal System: The Administration of Justice in the United States by Judicial, Administrative, Military and Arbitral Tribunals. BY LEWIS MAYERS. (New York: Harper & Brothers. 1955. Pp. ix, 557. $6.50.)

Professor Mayer's announced goal is to present a systematic account of American legal institutions—as distinguished from law—in all their varied aspects. Focusing on the role of American courts and quasi-judicial agencies in the administration of justice, he has skillfully produced a very clear and carefully integrated analysis of state and national institutions and processes.

This book will have wide appeal, for it covers the work of our courts, administrative agencies, military tribunals, and arbitral tribunals. Seventeen of its 22 chapters deal with the decisional processes and organizational structures of courts and administrative agencies.

The author has not been content to report only the present state of our legal institutions and their product. Throughout he modestly, but effectively, suggests the need for specific reforms in the administration of justice. In the long run perhaps the greatest service of this work will be the skillful way in which the author has pointed to existing inadequacies and the need for reform.

The book will be valuable to political scientists, laymen, legislators, judges, and lawyers. Civic groups, bar committees and legislators will find that it is full of carefully supported suggestions, each of which might easily be the basis for important civic and legislative activity. The scholar will observe that research ideas abound.

The author has been most perceptive in the selection of the issues, processes, statutes, and cases to be considered, and in pointing out a number of troublesome problems. Since the book was published, the courts have expressed themselves on some of these matters, for example, procedures in security matters (Peters v. Hobby, 75 Sup. Ct. 790, decided June 5, 1955), procedures in immigration matters (Shaughnessy v. Pedreiro, 75 Sup. Ct. 591, decided April 25, 1955), and procedures in securing passports (Dues v. Nathan, 225 F. 2d 29, decided June 23, 1955). This is not to suggest that the book is not up to date, for it is indeed remarkably current.

A highlight of the book is the historical and comparative background which the author provides for the subjects discussed. While such background cannot be large in such a concise work, enough is supplied to remind the reader of why certain institutions developed as they did and wherein they are different from British and Continental practices. It also reminds one of the fact that styles in the administration of justice change as do those in wearing apparel. Thus, one is constantly challenged to inquire if the systems with which he is familiar are as efficient and valid as they might be.

The book is adequately if not abundantly footnoted, from both legal and political science literature. A bibliography and a special list of titles provide the reader with a summary of leading sources in the field of American legal institutions.

In short, this is more than an outstanding book. As a result of its clarity, brevity, perceptive selection of key issues, historical and comparative analysis, skilful organization of an unwieldy subject matter, broad appeal, and well-supported suggestions for reform, it may very well be acclaimed as one of the more thoughtful and better studies of American legal institutions in our time.

CARL Q. CHRISTOL.

University of Southern California.

Automobile Workers and the American Dream. BY ELY CHINYOY. (Garden City: Doubleday and Co., Inc. 1955. Pp. xx, 139. $3.00.)

Traditionally, American culture has placed great value upon occupational success. Americans of all classes and conditions have been told again and again that "there is always room at the top" and that "you can't keep a good man down." While these onward and upward maxims may have lost some of their luster in recent decades, the idea that the able, hard working, and virtuous can and do start at the bottom and rise to the top still seems to be a widely cherished part of the American Dream.

But the opportunities of many Americans for self-advancement are slight. While those whose education and training enable them to begin work as technicians or white-collar workers may eventually work their way to the top levels of industry, the factory workers' ladder of advancement is short, with few rungs, and normally ends with foremanship. What does the persistence of the American Dream do to these workers? How do they adjust to the disparity between the ideal and reality? What do they think and feel about opportunity and advancement?

It is with these big questions that Professor Chinoy's slim volume is concerned. Chinoy spent more than a year living and working and talking with the automobile workers in the "A.B.C." plant in "Autotown" (a Middlewestern city of about 100,000). The principal fruits of this field work were a number of long and searching interviews with 62 white, male, native-born "A.B.C." workers.

He found that a "lack of interest, hope and desire" for advancement in the factory was normal for his respondents. This does not mean that they were satisfied. They did have ambitions in the plant, but most of these called for sideways mobility—away from dirty, closely-supervised jobs which involved excessive physical or psychological strain toward more pleasant but not necessarily higher paid jobs. And talk of leaving the factory was rife. Most of the workers (48 of the 62) told Chinoy that at one time or another they had thought of leaving, mostly in order to start a small business or go into small-scale farming. Thus, "paradoxically, the very process of alienation which Marx thought would transform industrial workers into class conscious proletarians" had stimulated their interest in small private enterprise. Such talk very seldom resulted in concrete plans or action, but it performed an important psychological function: the worker "by seeking to convince others of the reality and strength of his aspirations . . . fostered his belief in his own ambitions and perseverance—and he continued to believe in the reality of opportunity."

Faced with the stark fact of failure, as defined by traditional American values, the workers were able to maintain their self-esteem in still another way. In its original form the American Dream was of occupational mobility. But Chinoy found that the workers had redefined achievement. Stuck in the same unsatisfying job, they believed that they were "getting ahead" so long as they were able to buy a new car or washing machine, a bigger and better TV set, a small home of their own. And some said, "If you work during a layoff . . . that's my idea of working up," and that "if you've got security . . . you're getting ahead."

Chinoy's auto workers, like many other working-class Americans, were caught in a squeeze between the tradition of mobility and the facts of the real world. But there seems little likelihood that either the dream or the reality will be quickly changed. "To the extent that workers blame their failure to rise above the level of wage labor upon themselves rather than upon the institutions that govern the pursuit of wealth or upon the persons who control these institutions, American society escapes the consequences of its own contradictions." And to the extent that the workers redefine advancement in terms of consumption rather than production, of security rather than of successful risk-taking, they can continue to believe that there are still opportunities to "get ahead"—new style. If the hopes of the worker-as-consumer are ever frustrated, then the alienation of many workers from their jobs and the strain of reconciling their position with the American Dream may lead to a political radicalism and class consciousness largely absent among American workers to date. Chinoy's book, despite the inevitable limitations of a case study, goes far toward explaining why this development has not yet occurred.

DONALD R. MATTHEWS.

Smith College.

BOOK NOTES AND BIBLIOGRAPHY

AMERICAN GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS

Political Prairie Fire: The Nonpartisan League, 1915-1922. By ROBERT L. MORLAN. (Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press. 1955. Pp. 408. $5.75.)

This is the definitive history of the political movement which some have characterized as the last of the great farmers' crusades. Extending over a period of no more than eight years, the Nonpartisan League was nevertheless a major political force in eight states.

Yet the story of the NPL is largely an episode of North Dakota politics, for it began in that state, contributed directly to its present situation, and left a heritage of rather unusual legislation on its statute books. It is perhaps one of the curious turns of history that this state, which has been and still largely is a suzerainty of Minneapolis, and the East generally, should in this particular political drama have sought to reverse this pattern by revolutionizing and dominating the politics of its neighbors. And, surprisingly enough, it was almost successful.

Though akin to earlier protest and third party movements, the NPL had several distinctive characteristics. These, as described by Professor Morlan, include: its organizing techniques, based on paid personnel using Fords and high pressure salesmanship; its financing, coming entirely from membership fees; its own press and propaganda methods; its unanimity of action, especially evident in its legislative caucuses; its election tactics, ranging from primary raiding to third party attempts depending upon the advantages of the moment; and, of course, its program.

The story of this "political prairie fire" is competently told, and the author's mastery of facts and events gives a "you were there" quality to the book. Yet his presentation leaves unanswered many questions as to why the NPL developed as it did. Insofar as he explains the events of this movement, the author relies largely upon a theory of fortuitous coincidence, a kind of deus ex machina, which somehow brought together a depressed and exploited agriculture and the leadership and organizing ability of Arthur C. Townley.

Until we know more about social psychology, we must perhaps be content with this kind of description. If we are to understand political movements in a broader context, we must probe deeper and seek to formulate bolder hypotheses of social causation in our historical studies.

With respect to the NPL, such problems and questions as these need investigation: Why did the movement not take hold in the South and other exploited regions? Why did it collapse in 1922 when agriculture was in many ways more depressed and abused than in 1915? What light does the NPL experience shed upon patterns of anti-democratic action in America? (The liberal objectives of NPL should not obscure the significance of its autocratic methods, and here the analogies of the demagogic politics of Huey Long as well as those of the early Nazi party might well be explored.) To what extent do movements like the NPL take advantage of the frustrations of citizens who do not understand the forces at work in the economy and who have no apparent alternative but to thresh out blindly against them? What is the significance of the studied disdain and disparagement of the office seeker (as against the man who is sought by the office) on the part of NPL leadership? What relationship did the low educational level of the farm populace and their generally poor sources of news and information have to the rise and fall of NPL? To what extent is the inclination to seek pat solutions a condition precedent to movements of this sort? To what extent does the NPL experience mirror the dearth of leadership in rural areas (which, as much as discontent, may make a particular area ripe for the ambitious, unscrupulous leader)? These and many similar questions need investigation. The Morlan study makes them seem very pressing, although it does not seek to answer them.—NORMAN WENGERT, University of Maryland.

Constitutional Development in Alabama, 1798-1901: A Study in Politics, the Negro and Sectionalism. By MALCOLM COOK McMILLAN. (Chapel Hill, N.C.: The University of North Carolina Press. 1955. Pp. viii, 412. $2.50.)

In these days of growing interest in the states as partners in our federal system, students of state government welcome the data supplied by studies of individual states. The accumulation of data concerning the government of the states should be a major task for political scientists of today. Far too little work is being done in this field. Malcolm Cook McMillan has set a high standard for such studies. He has done such a thorough job that the constitutional history of Alabama will not need rewriting in the foreseeable future.

In the area of interpretation this study is especially valuable. The author emphasizes three points which he considers important in the constitutional history of Alabama. (1) It was an evolutionary process—"the result of past history, experience, and practice in government." (2) It was a process of cross-fertilization. Alabama profited by the experience of other states as well as by her own past. (3) It was an attempt on the part of each generation to solve its immediate problems. Alabama rewrote her constitution six times in less than a century. In every case, some specific problem presented itself which, in the thinking of Alabama's people, was serious enough to call for a redrafting of the fundamental law. Usually these problems grew out of the presence of the Negro.

The author considers the Negro, slave or free, the predominant factor in Alabama's constitutional development. From the struggle over apportionment in the constitutional convention of 1819, through the "white supremacy" fight in the convention of 1875, to the suffrage battle in the convention of 1901 which led to the adoption of "the most complicated and undemocratic suffrage article in the United States," the presence of the Negro controlled the action of the constitutional conventions.

The conservatism of Alabama government, the restricted Alabama electorate, the limitations on Alabama's legislature and local governments, in short, the distrust of democracy in Alabama was the product of the white majority's determination to keep the black minority "in its place." In a highly sensitive and controversial field, Mr. McMillan's presentation is objective and balanced. He marshals his evidence so well and interprets it so clearly that any unprejudiced reader is forced to accept his conclusions.

At the moment in Alabama there is increasing agitation for rewriting the constitution. This movement makes Mr. McMillan's book a very timely one.

The material is well organized and clearly presented. The bibliography is exhaustive. The index is excellent.—HALLIE FARMER, Alabama College

Problem and Policy in Public Assistance. By HILARY M. LEYENDECKER. (New York: Harp & Brothers. 1955. Pp. xiv, 400. $5.00.)

Mr. Leyendecker, who died before this book was published, successfully accomplished two objectives. In the first place he presented sound, well-documented material on the history, general philosophy, administrative organization, and practical problems of public assistance. In this he made use of nearly all the important writing in the field and his selected references are highly recommended. The result is an excellent textbook. The few inconsistencies in footnotes could easily be corrected.

Secondly, Mr. Leyendecker set out to discuss some of the more controversial problems of public assistance as they might concern someone fortified with the values of a "democratic society, imbued with the great tradition of Christian and Jewish thought concerning the essential worth and dignity of the individual." Where these not too well-defined values provide a sufficient guide, Mr. Leyendecker's analysis is most helpful. His defense of public assistance and his discussion of standards of assistance and client resources are humane, thoughtful, convincing, and probably the best that have appeared to date.

Since the book is addressed to the needs of the "beginner"—professional or layman—it can be considered entirely adequate and indeed distinctly valuable. In view of this, it would seem invidious to suggest here that for the political thinker the questions raised by public assistance are not answered in Mr. Leyendecker's book, were it not for the fact that the author gives these questions a little nod and judgment or two in passing.

The significance of public assistance for serious political inquiry is that it poses but does not answer two very far-reaching questions. One of these is the status, moral, social, and legal, of the increasing part of the population who cannot support themselves financially—a status that varies under different programs in different countries, and under different political and social presuppositions from complete entitlement to submission to more or less pervasive social control and guidance. The other is the degree to which government benefits can properly be individualized and by what criteria this individualization is to be determined. The tradition of clinical humanitarianism to which Mr. Leyendecker belonged can give at best partial answers, since its orientation is pragmatic and sentimental rather than philosophical or theological. It is therefore not surprising to find the writer resolving the first question largely by a recourse to "tact" on the part of the case worker or sympathizing somewhat uncritically with the poor little welfare worker who realized that she "did not know enough about the art and science of human relations to know what would be to the best interests of the children."

Whose children, one might ask, and what if she were vouchsafed this knowledge? What sort of society is implied here?

These unanswered questions should not, however, detract from the usefulness of the book for its stated purpose. It remains the best discussion of public assistance in book form today.—ALAN KEITH-LUCAS, University of North Carolina.

Crude Oil Pipe Lines and Competition in the Oil Industry. BY LESLIE COOKENBOO, JR. (Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press. 1955. Pp. vi, 177. $4.00.)

Is it true that the petroleum industry is controlled by major companies through ownership of crude oil pipe lines, as has often been charged? If so, what is the extent of such control? What remedies have been proposed, and how feasible are they? May the real problem be quite different from that traditionally discussed? These are the principal questions posed by the author, an economics professor at Rice Institute, in this compact monograph adapted from a doctoral dissertation and published as the second in a series of studies on competition and monopoly in American industry financed by a grant from the Merrill Foundation for the Advancement of Financial Knowledge.

Quantification of the ownership of crude oil pipe lines indicates that major companies (the 19 largest) owned lines carrying about 85 per cent of crude oil throughput even before the introduction of new large-diameter lines, which are almost wholly controlled by large companies. But what determines control, the author points out, is ownership of lines between given producing areas and given refining areas. His analysis of the location of independently owned refineries shows that most of them are located close to their crude supply. Less than half of the independent refining capacity, representing about 10 per cent of the United States total, has to rely on crude oil trunk lines for supply, even in part.

Crude oil pipe lines are required by the Hepburn Act to operate as common carriers. Rates are limited by the Interstate Commerce Commission and the terms of a 1941 Sherman Act consent decree to levels which yield about eight per cent on investment, with dividends limited to seven per cent. Two principal changes have been proposed, both of which the author analyzes and rejects. One would eliminate the consent decree and return control to the ICC, which then would be required to establish "cost" rates for the pipe lines. Professor Cookenboo objects that "cost" rates can never be established precisely (increased volume, for instance, would make a "fair" rate too high); if fair to the industry, they probably would be no lower than at present; and oil companies still would be denied private carrier privileges. The other proposal would divorce pipe lines from major companies by antitrust action and force them to operate as true common carriers. The author's analysis shows that most independents are either integrated companies themselves or else are located close to crude supply. He estimates that only 2.4 per cent of efficient refining capacity could be helped by drastic dis-integration.

The author is interested more in the economic goal of cheap gasoline than in the political goal of smaller companies. He presents cost curves which show that substantial economies are achieved by large-diameter lines operated at capacity. In the future he would have one great line built from a field to a refining center as a joint venture, with participation open to all. Independents could buy in or rely on common carriers who do. But he is interested in freedom from regulation for the industry even more than in economy. He would require a certificate for construction, but restrict governmental discretion to the combining of parallel lines from a given field to a given refinery terminal. Only in exceptional circumstances could a project, however uneconomic, be denied; the pressures of competition would be relied on instead.

This is a solid book, with a wealth of data, presented clearly in numerous charts and tables, on the economic aspects of the petroleum industry. Readers who do not altogether share the author's confidence in voluntarism nevertheless will appreciate the fairness with which arguments, including the author's own, are subjected to realistic analysis. The book makes, as its sponsors intended it should, a genuine contribution to an evaluation of monopoly policy in the United States. —RALPH K. HUITT, The University of Wisconsin.

American Constitutional Law. By BERNARD SCHWARTZ. (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press. 1955. Pp. xiv, 364. $5.00.)

"It is the purpose of this book to present the workings of the American system of constitutional law to a British audience, with emphasis upon the significant changes that have occurred therein in recent years" (p. xiii). The author succeeds in giving a clear, readable account which is comprehensive in scope, contains reference to the important cases, shows significant recent developments and trends, and makes comparisons with Britain and the Dominions. This and Ernest Griffith's recent The American System of Government (reviewed, this Review, March, 1955, pp. 242-43), also written for British readers, provide the English-reading foreign inquirer with adequate accounts of the formal and informal elements in our system of government. The two books are useful also for the American reader, and Schwartz's volume should be particularly helpful for American students looking for a handy summary of recent constitutional developments.

American Government: National, State, and Local. By CLAUDIUS O. JOHNSON. (New York: Thomas Y. Crowell Co. 2nd ed. 1955. Pp. xvii, 1004. $6.50.)

American National Government. By CLAUDIUS O. JOHNSON. (New York: Thomas Y. Crowell Company. 4th ed. 1955. Pp. xvii, 750. $5.75.)

New editions of two college textbooks which follow the general plan of previous editions but with numerous changes in internal structure and content and a generous use of charts and tables.

The American Legion and American Foreign Policy. By ROSCOE BAKER. (New York: Bookman Associates. 1954. Pp. 329. $4.75.)

A well-documented and objective dissertation on the organization, ideas, and activities of the American Legion as a pressure group seeking to influence the conduct of American foreign affairs.

Basing Point Pricing and Regional Development: A Case Study of the Iron and Steel Industry. By GEORGE W. STOCKING. (Chapel Hill, N. C.: The University of North Carolina Press. 1954. Pp. vii, 274. $6.50.)

This solid study began with the objective of determining "the significance to the South of basing point pricing in the iron and steel industry" (p. vi) but was broadened to include, in addition to its regional focus, an analysis of the industry' structure and pricing practices. The empirical analysis is largely confined to the period before 1939 but there are chapters also on developments since 1938, the law on basing point pricing, and the elements of a sound public policy. The author concludes that "The industry's relative stability has been bought in part at the expense of higher cost to producers and higher prices to consumers and at the cost of retarding the South's steel industry" (p. 190).

Booker T. Washington and the Negro's Place in American Life. By SAMUEL R. SPENCER, JR. (Boston and Toronto: Little, Brown and Co. 1955. Pp. ix, 212. $3.00.)

A well-written life and analysis of the contribution of an important Negro leader appropriately appearing on the eve of the centenary of his birth.

A Check List of Legislative Journals Issued Since 19-7 by the States of the United States of America. By WILLIAM R. FULLEN. (Chicago: American Library Association. 19-5. Pp. 59.)

The work continues Grace E. MacDonald's Check-List of Legislative Journals, published by the National Association of State Libraries in 1938. In the all too brief preface, the compiler who is the document librarian at the University of North Carolina Library, gives a characterization of this important but not too well edited or published group of state documents. He calls attention to the fact that the journals frequently contain important legislative and executive documents not issued separately, that Maine and Pennsylvania print debates in place of journals, and that Arkansas and New Mexico have ceased printing the journal record of legislative proceedings. Fullen's work represents a type that needs much attention and action to make the important sources of state documents more available for ready use.—J.B.C.

Groves of the Cities. By FRED K. VIGMAN. (Washington, D.C.: Public Affairs Press. 1955. Pp. viii 155. $3.25.)

An interesting survey of the American city stressing that the older cities are "now in the throes of decline and disintegration" and that although the newer cities and towns must yet face their ordeal of growth, there is "no one about to solve the riddle of urban contradiction."

Daniel Webster and the Rise of National Conservatism. BY RICHARD N. CURRENT. EDITED BY OSCAR HANDLIN. (Boston and Toronto: Little, Brown and Co. 1955. Pp. xi, 215. $3.00.)

An excellent analysis of the political ideas and public career of Webster emphasizing his contribution to the development of a conservative philosophy for American politics.

Emergency Disputes and National Policy. EDITED BY IRVING BERNSTEIN, HAROLD L. ENARSON, AND R. W. FLEMING. (New York: Harper & Brothers. 1955. Pp. xi, 271. $3.50.)

This is a major contribution on labor-management relations and government responsibilities relating to industrial disputes causing or threatening stoppage of work. The book seeks answers to three questions: (1) What is a national emergency dispute? (2) What is the Taft-Hartley experience? (3) What are the elements of an improved national policy?

Governing Urban America: Structure, Politics, and Administration. BY CHARLES R. ADRIAN. (New York, Toronto, and London: McGraw-Hill Book Co., Inc. 1955. Pp. vii, 452. $5.50.)

A college textbook designed for either a one- or a two-semester course and developed on the assumptions that municipal government is understandable only if viewed in relation to the whole urban culture and that urban government is not only form but also a political process. It is effectively organized and presented and makes good use of material from related disciplines.

Governor Tryon and his Palace. BY ALONZO THOMAS DILL. (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press. 1955. Pp. xiii, 304. $5.00.)

The account of the attempt to provide a permanent place of government for North Carolina at New Bern in the third quarter of the 18th century is typical of much work that needs to be done in other states on the reconstruction of problems surrounding early attempts at establishing a permanent seat of government with suitable quarters.—J.B.C.

Greensboro, North Carolina, the County Seat of Guilford. BY ETHEL STEPHENS ARNETT. (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1955. Pp. xviii, 492. $6.)

The history of the city of Greensboro in Piedmont, North Carolina contains a chapter on the government and special agencies of the city and another on the county government and the leading public servants of Guilford County, and shows a growing appreciation of the part that local government may play in the development of a community.—J.B.C.

The Holmes Reader. SELECTED AND EDITED BY JULIUS J. MARKE. (New York: Oceana Publications. 1955. 282 pages. $3.50.)

Reprinted here are three commentaries on the life and work of Justice Holmes, a number of his articles, speeches, and letters, Justice Frankfurter's article on "Mr. Justice Holmes and the Constitution," and two opposed evaluations of the eminent justice.

Land Uses in American Cities. BY HARLAND BARTHOLOMEW. ASSISTED BY JACK WOOD. (Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press. 1955. Pp. x, 196. $6.50.)

Here is a valuable comparative study for those concerned with urban development. The statistical and graphic information presented is derived from uniform land use surveys conducted during the past twenty years by the author and his assistants. The author believes "that the majority of conclusions valid for a diverse group of cities will apply, in appropriately modified form, to any city of approximately the same size."

The Meaning of America: Essays toward an Understanding of the American Spirit. BY LEBLAND DEWITT BALDWIN. (Pittsburgh, Pa.: University of Pittsburgh Press. 1955. Pp. 319. $4.00.)

A group of interpretive essays which seek "to explain the United States by examining some aspects of its history and its historical psychology." The range is wide and the comment perceptive.

The Populist Revolt: A History of the Farmers' Alliance and the People's Party. BY JOHN D. HICKS. (Minneapolis, Minn.: The University of Minnesota Press. 1955. Pp. xii, 473. $6.00.)

A reissue and second printing of "the best account of populism," originally published in 1931 and out of print for some years.

Presidential Ballots, 1836-1892. BY W. DEAN BURNHAM. (Baltimore, Md.: The Johns Hopkins Press. 1955. Pp. xix, 956. $10.00.)

A compilation of a series of elaborate tables of statistical information with respect to all presidential elections from 1836 to 1892, inclusive, "broken down to the smallest unit of analysis generally used—the county," introduced by an essay of 162 pages. It carries backward the work of Edgar Eugene Robinson which deals with the presidential vote after 1892.

Principles and Problems of American National Government. By JOHN M. SWARTHOUT AND ERNEST R. BARTLEY. (New York: Oxford University Press. 2nd ed. 1955. Pp. xii, 852. $6.25.)

This revised edition of a standard American government text has left unchanged the basic approach of its authors but has sought to strengthen the work in three areas. First, it has brought the story of American government up to date by covering the changes accomplished in the first half of the Eisenhower Administration. Second, additional material has been added on foreign relations and civil liberties. Last, a considerable number of new charts and tables have been included.

The Socialist Party of America: A History. By DAVID A. SHANNON. (New York: The Macmillan Co. 1955. Pp. xi, 320. $4.50.)

A careful analysis of the organization, leadership and activities of the American Socialist party from its formation in 1901 until its "last rites and post mortem" in 1954.

Thomas J. Walsh: A Senator from Montana. By JOSEPHINE O'KEANE. (Francostown? New Hampshire: Marshall Jones Co. 1955. Pp. 234. $4.00.)

A life of a famous United States senator written by a close relative who derived much of her information from family sources and from friends and political associates of the subject. A variety of published sources was also used.

William Lloyd Garrison and the Humanitarian Reformers. By EUSEB B. NYE. EDITED BY OLEF HANDLIN. (Boston and Toronto: Little, Brown and Co. 1955. Pp. vi, 215. $3.95.)

A scholarly and well-written account of the life of Garrison and the part he played in the abolitionist movement.

SELECTED ARTICLES AND DOCUMENTS ON AMERICAN GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS

FRANKLIN L. BUECHTE

University of Maryland

ARTICLES AND BOOKLETS

National Government

Barth, Ann. When Congress Investigates. Public Affairs Pamphlet No. 227. 1955.

Calkins, G. Nathan, Jr. The Role of the Civil Aeronautics Board in the Grant of Operating Rights in Foreign Air Carriage. Journal of Air Law and Commerce. Summer, 1955.

The Expatriation Act of 1954. Yale Law Journal. July, 1955.

Gifford, Gilbert L. The Evolution of Air Mail Rate Making. Journal of Air Law and Commerce. Summer, 1955.

Problems of American Democracy—III. Immigration and the American Ideal. [Symposium.] Current History. November, 1955.

Resources for Citizenship: A Guide to the Selection of Teaching Materials. Citizenship Education Project. 1955.

Seligman, Lester G. Developments in the Presidency and the Conception of Political Leadership. American Sociological Review. December, 1955.

State Government

Ekernan, Edward A. States Lagging Behind. National Municipal Review. November, 1955.

Fuer Manning J., and Robert G. Kelsay. Unrepresentative States. National Municipal Review. December, 1955.

Marked State Taxes. Tax Foundation. 1955.

The Forty-eight States: Their Tasks as Policy Makers and Administrators. The American Assembly, Graduate School of Business, Columbia University. 1955.

Local Government

Bain, Chester W. Annexation: Virginia's

Not-So-Judicial System. Public Administration Review. Autumn, 1955.

Baldwin, Rosalind G. Property Tax Updated. National Municipal Review. November, 1955.

Blakeman, T. Ledyard. Detroit's Regional Plan. National Municipal Review. October, 1955.

Floro, George K. Continuity in City-Manager Careers. American Journal of Sociology. November, 1955.

Freeman, Roger A. What Ails Property Tax? National Municipal Review. November, 1955.

Kerstetter, John R. 1955 State Legislation Affecting Cities. Public Management. September, 1955. Part II, ibid. October, 1955.

Richland, W. Bernard. Courts Nullify Home Rule [in New York]. National Municipal Review. December, 1955.

Robinson, Donald. Slum Clearance Pays Off. National Municipal Review. October, 1955.

Schiller, Ronald. The Los Angeles Smog. National Municipal Review. December, 1955.

Stone, Kathryn H. The American Council to Improve Our Neighborhoods. State Government. November, 1955.

Trafford, John E. The Town Highway Agent in New Hampshire. Department of Government, University of New Hampshire. 1955.

Intergovernmental Relations

Casella, William N. Cities as Partners in American Federalism. Public Management. November, 1955.

May, Samuel C., and James M. Fales, Jr. The State's Interest in Metropolitan Problems. Bureau of Public Administration, University of California, Berkeley. 1955.

Schaller, Howard G. Federal Grants-in-Aid and Differences in State Per Capita Incomes, 1929, 1939, and 1949. National Tax Journal. September, 1955.

Willis, William G. A New Look at Intergovernmental Relations. County Government. October, 1955.

Constitutional Law and Civil Liberties

Abraham, Henry J. John Marshall Harlan: A Justice Neglected. Virginia Law Review. November, 1955.

Barrett, Edward L., Jr. Exclusion of Evidence Obtained by Illegal Searches—A Comment on People vs. Cahan. California Law Review. October, 1955.

Bickel, Alexander M. The Original Understanding and the Segregation Decision. Harvard Law Review. November, 1955.

Blum, Virgil C., S. J. Religious Liberty and the Religious Garb. University of Chicago Law Review. Summer, 1955.

Bowers, Claude G. Jefferson and the Bill of Rights. Virginia Law Review. October, 1955.

Fraenkel, Osmord K. Search and Seizure Developments in Federal Law since 1948. Iowa Law Review. Fall, 1955.

Louisell, David W. Constitutional Limitations and Supports for Dealing with Religion in Public Higher Education. Religious Education. September–October, 1955.

Problems of American Democracy—II. Security in a Free Society. [Symposium.] Current History. October, 1955.

Rheinstein, Max. The Constitutional Bases of Jurisdiction. University of Chicago Law Review. Summer, 1955.

Sheffey, E. Summers. The First Amendment and Distribution of Religious Literature in the Public Schools. Virginia Law Review. October, 1955.

The Supreme Court, 1954 Term. Harvard Law Review. November, 1955.

Vestal, Allan D. Freedom of Movement. Iowa Law Review. Fall, 1955.

Willcox, Alanson W. Invasions of the First Amendment through Conditioned Public Spending. Cornell Law Quarterly. Fall, 1955.

Judicial Administration and Law Enforcement

Conference of Chief Justices, 1955. State Government. November, 1955.

Davis, Kenneth Culp. Judicial Notice. Columbia Law Review. November, 1955.

Harlan, John M. What Part Does the Oral Argument Play in the Conduct of an Appeal? Cornell Law Quarterly. Fall, 1955.

Hill, Alfred. State Procedural Law in Federal Nondiversity Litigation. Harvard Law Review. November, 1955.

Hoover Commission and Task Force Reports on Legal Services and Procedure. [Symposium.] New York University Law Review. November, 1955.

Levy, Sheldon S. Hypnosis and Legal Immutability. Journal of Criminal Law, Criminology and Police Science. September–October, 1955.

Mendelson, Wallace. Mr. Justice Frankfurter on the Construction of Statutes. California Law Review. October, 1955.

Municipal Law Enforcement in Oklahoma.

Oklahoma Crime Survey Commission, Oklahoma City. 1955.

Obscenity and the Arts. [Symposium.] Law and Contemporary Problems. Autumn, 1955.

Repeal by Implication. Columbia Law Review. November, 1955.

Rose, Arnold M., and Arthur E. Prell. Does the Punishment Fit the Crime? American Journal of Sociology. November, 1955.

Savitz, Leonard D. Capital Crimes as Defined in American Statutory Law. Journal of Criminal Law, Criminology and Police Science. September-October, 1955.

The Virginia Parole System: An Appraisal of Its First Twelve Years. Bureau of Public Administration, University of Virginia. 1955.

Public Administration and Administrative Law

Byers, Kenneth M. Robert Montilla, and Elmer V. Williams. Elements of Position Classification in Local Government. Civil Service Assembly. 1955.

Communication in Administration: Public Management. October, 1955.

Crouch, Winslow W., and Judith Norvell Jamison. The Work of Civil Service Commissions. Civil Service Assembly. 1955.

Digests and Analyses of the Nineteen Hoover Commission Reports. Citizens Committee for the Hoover Report. [1955].

Divine, William R. The Second Hoover Commission Reports: An Analysis. Public Administration Review. Autumn, 1955.

Henry, Laurin L. Louis Brownlow and the Governmental Arts. Western Political Quarterly. September, 1955.

Schwartz, Bernard. Grays vs. Powell and the Scope of Review. Michigan Law Review. November, 1955.

White, Leonard D. The Senior Civil Service. Public Administration Review. Autumn, 1955.

Political Parties, Elections, and Public Opinion

Acheson, Dean. The Parties and Foreign Policy. Harper's Magazine. November, 1955.

Brown, W. R. State Regulation of Union Political Action. Labor Law Journal. November, 1955.

Coulson, Robert E. Let's Not Get Out the Vote. Harper's Magazine. November, 1955.

David, Paul T., and Ralph M. Goldman. Presidential Nominating Patterns. Western Political Quarterly. September, 1955.

De Santis, Vincent P. Benjamin Harrison and the Republican Party in the South, 1889-

1893. Indiana Magazine of History. December, 1955.

Euler, Heinz. Class Identification and Projection in Voting Behavior. Western Political Quarterly. September, 1955.

Gok, David. The Statistical Lie Detector: An Application to Possibly Evasive Responses in a Voting Behavior Study. American Sociological Review. October, 1955.

Harris, Joseph F. California Politics. Stanford University Press. 1955.

Laessle, Harold D. Current Studies of the Decision Process: Automation versus Creativity. Western Political Quarterly. September, 1955.

Martin, Miller Lee. Political Activity Restrictions in Louisiana. Public Personnel Review. October, 1955.

McCandless, Perry. The Rise of Thomas H. Benton in Missouri Politics. Missouri Historical Review. October, 1955.

Norton-Taylor, Duncan. What's Wrong with [the Republican Party in] Michigan? Fortune. December 1955.

Parsons, Arthur H., Jr. Button, Button or, How We Elected Eisenhower. Harper's Magazine. October 1955.

Shadgett Olive H. Voter Registration in Georgia: A Study of Its Administration. Bureau of Public Administration, University of Georgia. 1955.

Smith, C. Wayne. Nathan Goff, Jr., and the Solid South. West Virginia History. October, 1955.

Tannenbaum, Percy H. What Effect When TV Covers a Congressional Hearing? Journalism Quarterly. Fall, 1955.

Turner, Lynn W. The Electoral Vote against Monroe in 1820—An American Legend. Mississippi Valley Historical Review. September, 1955.

Van Bolt, Roger H. The Rise of the Republican Party in Indiana, 1855-1856. Indiana Magazine of History. September, 1955.

Economic and Social Functions

National Economy

Brown, E. Carr. The Static Theory of Automatic Fiscal Stabilization. Journal of Political Economy. October, 1955.

Tax Policy in 1956. Committee for Economic Development. 1955.

Business and Labor

Benzwitz, Maurice C. Recent Right-to-Work Decisions: A Challenge. Labor Law Journal. November, 1955.

Card, David E. Information Requests in Collective Bargaining. Labor Law Journal. November, 1955.

Daykin, Walter L. NLRB Jurisdictional Standards: II. Labor Law Journal. October, 1955.

Dewey, Donald. The Common-Law Background of Antitrust Policy. Virginia Law Review. October, 1955.

Emerzian, A. D. Joseph. Standards in Labor Arbitration Awards. Labor Law Journal. November, 1955.

Herman, Edward S. A Note on Fair Trade. Yale Law Journal. November, 1955.

Langdon, Jervis, Jr. The Regulation of Competitive Business Forces: the Obstacle Race in Transportation. Cornell Law Quarterly. Fall, 1955.

Loescher, Samuel M. Inert Antitrust Administration: Formula Pricing and the Cement Industry. Yale Law Journal. November, 1955.

Mason, Lowell B. Bureaucracy Psychoanalyzed: Antitrust vs. National Standards. Harvard Business Review. November-December, 1955.

Mitchell, James P. Federal-State Cooperation for Labor Standards and Security. State Government. October, 1955. Part II, ibid. November, 1955.

Mittenthal, Richard. Partial Strikes and National Labor Policy. Michigan Law Review. November, 1955.

The "New" Federal Trade Commission and the Enforcement of the Antitrust Laws. Yale Law Journal. November, 1955.

Ritchie, J. T. Cumulative Voting for Corporate Directors. Chicago-Kent Law Review. September, 1955.

Sobernheim, Rudolf, and William J. Brown. Collective Bargaining on Stock Purchase Plans: What Price Employee Stock Ownership? Columbia Law Review. November, 1955.

Stocking, George W. The Rule of Reason, Workable Competition, and Monopoly. Yale Law Journal. July, 1955.

Symposium on Antitrust Law. George Washington Law Review. October, 1955.

Toner, Jerome L., O.S.B. The Taft-Hartley Union Shop Does Not Force Anyone to Join a Union. Labor Law Journal. October, 1955.

Weisenfeld, Allan. An Alternative to the Guaranteed Annual Wage. Labor Law Journal. October, 1955.

Wilson, Richard G. Products Liability. Part I: The Protection of the Injured Person. California Law Review. October, 1955.

Wollett, Donald H., and Harry H. Wellington. Federalism and Breach of the Labor Agreement. Stanford Law Review. July, 1955.

Agriculture

Full Prosperity for Agriculture. Conference on Economic Progress, Washington 6. 1955.

Hardin, Charles M. Farm Price Policy and the Farm Vote. Journal of Farm Economics. November, 1955.

Kriesberg, Martin. Trade Group Relations and the Conduct of Agricultural Marketing Research. Public Administration Review. Autumn, 1955.

Health, Education, and Welfare

Brown, Francis J., and Thorsten Sellin, eds. Higher Education under Stress. [Symposium.] The Annals. September, 1955.

Mandelker, Daniel R. The Need Test in General Assistance. Virginia Law Review. November, 1955.

Pfister, Harriet S. Kansas State Board of Health. Governmental Research Center, University of Kansas. 1955.

Problems of American Democracy—I. Education in Crisis. [Symposium.] Current History. September, 1955.

Reller, Theodore L. The Public School and Other Community Services. [Symposium.] The Annals. November, 1955.

Ruml, Beardsley, and Sidney G. Tickton. Teaching Salaries Then and Now. Fund for the Advancement of Education. 1955.

Teachers for Tomorrow. Fund for the Advancement of Education. 1955.

Government Documents

Congress

House. Committee on Agriculture. Amendments to Sugar Act of 1948. Hearings. 84th Cong., 1st Sess. 1955.

———. Committee on Banking and Currency. Investigation of Housing, 1955. Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 1st Sess. 1955.

———. Committee on Government Operations. Creation of a Department of Urban Culture. Hearing before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 1st Sess. 1955.

———. Practices and Procedures of the Immigration and Naturalization Service in Deportation Proceedings. Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 1st Sess. 1955.

———. Reorganization of the Immigration and Naturalization Service. Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 1st Sess. 1955.

———. Committee on the Judiciary. Civil Rights. Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 1st Sess. 1955.

———. Conflict of Interest [Peter A. Strckel]. Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 1st Sess. 1955.

———. Current Antitrust Problems. Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 1st Sess. 1955.

———. Establishing Rules of Interpretation Governing Questions of the Effect of Acts of Congress on State Laws. Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 1st Sess. 1955.

———. WOC's and Government Advisory Groups. Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 1st Sess. 1955.

———. Committee on Post Office and Civil Service To Readjust Postal Classifications on Educational and Cultural Materials. Hearing. 84th Cong., 1st Sess. 1955.

———. Committee on Ways and Means. Excise Tax Technical and Administrative Problems. Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 1st Sess. 1955.

———. Select Committee on Small Business. Distribution Problems. Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 1st Sess. 1955.

House and Senate. Joint Committee on the Economic Report. Automation and Technological Change. Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 1st Sess. 1955.

———. Federal Tax Policy for Economic Growth and Stability. Joint Committee Print. 84th Cong., 1st Sess. 1955.

———. Reports of Federal Reserve Consultant Committees on Economic Statistics. Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 1st Sess. 1955.

Senate. Committee on Armed Services. Civil Defense Program. Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 1st Sess. 1955.

———. Committee on Banking and Currency. Repeal of Silver Purchase Laws. Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 1st Sess. 1955.

———. Committee on Government Operations. Earoll E. Talbott—Secretary of the Air Force. Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 1st Sess. 1955.

———. Textile Procurement in the Military Services. Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 1st Sess. 1955.

———. Committee on the Judiciary. Creation of Certain United States Judgeships. Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 1st Sess. 1955.

———. Illicit Narcotics Traffic. Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 1st Sess. 1955.

———. Juvenile Delinquency (Education). Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 1st Sess. 1955.

———. A Study of the Antitrust Laws. Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 1st Sess. 1955.

———. Committee on Labor and Public Welfare. Causes of Unemployment in the Coal and Other Domestic Industries. Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 1st Sess. 1955.

———. Committee on Public Works. Tennessee Valley Authority Financing. Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 1st Sess. 1955.

Other Federal

Atomic Energy Commission. Legislative History of the Atomic Energy Act of 1954. Compiled by Madeleine W. Losee. 3 vols. 1955.

Department of Commerce. Housing and Home Finance Agency. The Cost of Municipal Services in Residential Areas. By William L.C. Wheaton and Morton J. Schussheim. 1955.

[Department of Defense.] Militant Liberty: A Program of Evaluation and Assessment of Freedom. 1955.

FOREIGN AND COMPARATIVE GOVERNMENT

The Politics of the Prussian Army, 1640-1945.

By GORDON A. CRAIG. (New York: Oxford University Press. 1955. Pp. xx, 536. $11.50.)

The documentary windfalls resulting from the transfer of German archives to Allied control have enabled historians to correct numerous errors of judgment and of omission. One of the most serious errors in that respect concerned the role and influence of the German army in domestic and international politics. Not that the Seeckt, Groener, and Stresemann papers, to mention only the most significant of the newly acquired sources, provide a better insight into the phenomenal political prowess and influence of the army leadership, the conclusion is strengthened that historical research without the benefit of access to secret files is partial at best.

Professor Craig's excellent study is a long step toward elimination of a serious gap. It is regrettable that an element of confusion is introduced by the designation of the book as an analysis of the Prussian army. Actually, this is not only a study of the Prussian army but also of "the German army which grew out of it and which inherited its traditions." The author's contribution lies primarily in a re-evaluation of German history in the light of new insights, particularly concerning the scope and intensity of the army's interference in the affairs of several Prussian and all-German regimes. Skillfully applying new perspectives to long familiar and presumed exhausted accounts, Craig uncovers many hitherto concealed emphases and camouflaged relationships. In the sphere of conflict between civilian (absolute, constitutional-monarchic, or democratic) authority and the military, the study tends to reverse the roles of some heroes and of some villains.

The gradual but steady arrogation of political power by the leaders of Prussia's army set the stage for the anomaly of all subsequent German constitutional systems, namely the existence of a virtually sovereign military state within the constitutional framework. The power and prestige enjoyed by the military in all Prussian-German states from 1640 to 1933 stemmed from two related factors. First, there appears to have developed, as a direct result of the military origins of the economically, politically, and ideologically weak Prussian state, an identification of the military establishment as "the true embodiment of the national interest." This identification was widespread and gradually accepted by all social and economic classes. Where there was evidence of scepticism, social and educational policies were designed to cope with the lack of enthusiasm. Second, the army succeeded in finding powerful allies in its campaign to translate this identification with the national interest into significant constitutional and political privileges. At times, it seems that the state existed for the benefit of the army instead of the other way around.

In addition to the illuminating discussion of the army's march to political power, the study throws new light on the formulation, conduct, and control of Prussian, subsequently German, foreign policy. The book is indispensable reading for the student of past and of contemporary German affairs. Having read this book, the reader will follow the current discussions concerning the new German army with bated breath.—HENRY L. BRETTON, University of Michigan.

Communism and the Russian Peasant, and Moscow in Crisis. BY HERBERT S. DINERSTEIN, AND LEON GOURÉ AND HERBERT S. DINERSTEIN, RESPECTIVELY. (Glencoe: The Free Press. 1955. Pp. xviii, 254, $4.50.)

It is gratifying to be able to endorse the appraisal of Professor Mosley given in the Foreword to this volume: "These two investigations make valuable contributions, in both substance and methodology, to the study of the Soviet system of control." Beyond that the first renders unmistakable support to the thesis brilliantly stated shortly before World War II by Walter Lippmann in The Good Society that it is impossible to serve the general welfare through total planning and the abandonment of the market. Planning cannot supplant the market either in providing incentives or in organizing the countless transactions in terms of which a modern society operates.

The first investigation deals with the impact of Communist organization of agriculture upon the Russian peasant. It also seeks to evaluate the success of that organization in accomplishing the targets consciously set by the leaders. Attempting to get behind the official façade, Dinerstein concludes that Soviet agriculture is a failure in accomplishing the needs of the people. Bureaucracy proliferates, becomes an end in itself, and devises methods for showing on paper what it cannot show in fact. Using a conception of the possible, data provided by informants, and materials from the Soviet press, the author produces a picture of the failure of the system and of the methods it implies. In this context the tragic fact appears that the regime will persist in the employment of methods that have been destined to failure from the beginning. The author shows a commendable willingness to set down generalizations and evaluations as ambitious as the data appear to warrant. This reviewer is convinced that the conclusions of this study are valid. It would have been an invaluable contribution if the author had described in detail the methods he has employed in using informants, how he has balanced the particular perspective of one against that of others, how he selected them in terms of background. This is not to suggest, of course, that informants must be evaluated statistically or multiplied to reach some magic figure or cross-section.

The second investigation employs similar methods in describing what happened in Moscow in the government, in the relations of government to the people, and among the people as the Germans approached the city in October, 1941. The result is a capsule study of a dictatorship in a moment of travail. All the special problems of control and communication emerge. A kind of tragic vignette presents itself in the details of which can be seen the potential in the people for spontaneous action and reaction. How special and fragile is the rapport between the government and the people! Lessons of vital importance for present and future attempts to deal with the Soviet Union emerge. But in this case also, the authors would have increased the confidence of their readers had they revealed more fully their method of using informants. The reviewer is not suggesting that they should have done what they did not mean to do, but only that he would have profited greatly from such information.—GEORGE A. LIPSKY, American University.

The Failure of the Roman Republic. By R. E. SMITH. (New York and London: Cambridge University Press. 1955. Pp. viii, 201. $4.75.)

Professor Smith and Cicero would have had much in common. Both regret the failure of the Roman republic and they would have agreed that its collapse was due not to the failure of governmental institutions but to the decay of the Roman spirit and traditional morality. The cause of this decline is seen by Professor Smith in the tactics adopted by the Gracchi who, on the basis of political expediency, turned the people against the Senate and thus ushered in a succession of increasingly bitter civil strifes with disastrous consequences for the tone of Roman culture as a whole. In a sense Professor Smith's analysis is Aristotelian for it poses the question: if a people lose the spirit of their polity how can the constitution survive? The spirit of the republic was destroyed and the Augustinian revival, although it revitalized Rome, did so on the basis of another "polity," for the republic once destroyed could, despite Cicero's longings, never be recreated again.

Japan's Modern Century. By HUGH BORTON. (New York: The Ronald Press Co. 1955. Pp. xii, 524. $7.00.)

A useful and well-written history of Japan since 1850. About 100 pages are devoted to the war and post-war years, and the conclusion stresses the persistence of Japan's "undemocratic" traditions and of economic dilemmas. An appendix includes the Potsdam Proclamation, the 1945 surrender document and Imperial Decree, and the 1889 and 1946 constitutions.

Modern Japan: A Brief History. By ARTHUR E. LIEDEMANN. (Princeton, N. J., New York, Toronto, and London: D. Van Nostrand Company, Inc. 1955. Pp. 192. $1.25.)

From Shogunate to 1954 in 90 pages, plus another 50 pages of documents, including the 1636 edict closing Japan, the Meiji Constitution, the Twenty-One Demands, the Tanaka Memorial, the new Constitution, and the 1951 peace treaty. History admirably compressed and documents well-selected.

Indonesian Trade and Society: Essays in Asian Social and Economic History. By J. C. VAN LEUR. (The Hague, Bandung: W. Van Hoeve Ltd. Distributed in the United States by the Institute of Pacific Relations. 1955. Pp. xix, 465. $4.00.)

A translation of the collected papers of a young Netherlands civil servant who was killed in 1942 in the battle of the Java Sea, and whose facts and theories have only recently gained considerable acceptance among Indonesian scholars; his approach is a break with the Dutch "colonial historians" and is an attempt to apply Max Weber's methodology to the study of the social and economic history of Southeast Asia.

Indonesian Sociological Studies. Part I. Selected Writings of B. SCHRIEKE. (The Hague, Bandung: W. Van Hoeve Ltd. Distributed in the United States by the Institute of Pacific Relations. 1955. Pp. vii, 213. $3.00.)

Translations from some pioneering work by the late Dutch sociologist, including a general article on acculturation, three studies on specific aspects of acculturation in Indonesia, and a paper on communism in prewar Indonesia. Except for the last paper, the researches are concerned with the nineteenth century and earlier.

Integrated Europe! By MICHAEL T. FLORINSKY. (New York: The Macmillan Co. 1955. Pp. x, 182. $3.50.)

Professor Florinsky has no quarrel with the arguments in favor of a unified Europe, is impressed with the progress in the field of military defense, but is skeptical that any real advance toward economic or political unification can overcome the traditions and the realities which bar the way.

North American Supply. By H. DUNCAN HALL. (London: Her Majesty's Stationery Office and Longmans, Green and Co. 1955. Pp. xvi, 559. $6.30.)

A volume in the British official history of the Second World War, this study will be of general interest to anyone concerned with the problems of procurement and supply for modern war, and should be of special value to American political scientists for its attention to (a) the prewar role of the United States, including neutrality laws, the destroyer-bases trade, and events leading up to lend-lease; (b) the mechanics and the administration of wartime economic collaboration; and (c) the indications of trouble to come in the exchange difficulties arising from the end of lend-lease.

Victorian People: A Reassessment of Persons and Themes, 1851-67. By ASA BRIGGS. (Chicago, Ill.: The University of Chicago Press. 1955. Pp. ix, 312. $5.00.)

Curious, entertaining, and very British collection of essays about ten Englishmen and the years from the Great Exhibition of 1851 to the Second Reform Bill of 1867. Through an examination of the thought, writing, and activities of these men—many not familiar to the present generation (e.g., Sir Joseph Paxton, John Arthur Roebuck, Samuel Smiles, John Bright, Robert Lowe)—the author seeks to demonstrate the "unity" of the "golden age" of Victorian England.

Between Liberation and Liberty: Austria in the Post-War World. By KARL GRUBER. TRANSLATED BY LIONEL KOCHAN. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger. 1955. Pp. 240. $4.50.)

An English translation of a book first published in German in Vienna in 1953. Using his first-hand knowledge gained as Foreign Minister of Austria from 1945 to 1953, the author, at present his country's ambassador in Washington, gives a vivid personal account of the negotiations conducted in the quest for an Austrian Peace Treaty.

The Colossus Again: Western Germany from Defeat to Rearmament. By ALFRED GROSSER. TRANSLATED BY RICHARD REES. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger. 1955. Pp. 249. $4.75.)

Having examined the causes and the manner in which Germany was split into two states, the author, a French student of German affairs, considers the major developments in Western Germany up to 1954. He deals successively with the economic problems; the social structure, concentrating mainly on youth, workers, and expellees from the East; moral and intellectual forces and influences, such as church, school, and press; and the political "superstructure." He concludes with a brief discussion of French opinion on Germany.

The Failure of the Prussian Reform Movement, 1807-1819. By WALTER M. SIMON. (Ithaca, N. Y.: Cornell University Press, 1955. Pp. xii, 272. $4.00.)

The purpose of this book is to analyze the obstacles which foiled the Prussian reform movement in 1807-1819 and thus, as the author puts it, "made it certain that when Germany was finally unified, German cultural values were submerged by unreconstructed Prussian militarism and authoritarianism." Among the major causes of the failure he lists the inability of German liberals and nationalists to reach a working alliance, the collapse of the European balance of power which made Prussia vulnerable to pressures from abroad, and the impact of certain actions of Napoleon.

The Russian Marxists and the Origins of Bolshevism. By LEOPOLD H. HAIMSON. (Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press. 1955. Pp. viii, 246. $5.50.)

In this book an attempt is made to evaluate the conditioning character of the environment in which the nineteenth-century Russian intellectuals developed and to indicate how this environment unshackled and yet limited the potentialities of the leaders of Russian Marxism: Plekhanov, Axelrod, Matkov, and Lenin. Although these four men were inheritors of the same intellectual tradition, they were nevertheless distinguished by certain personality differences which eventually resulted in the formation of two divergent views as to the method of applying Marxism in Russia: Bolshevism and Menshevism. The author sees these differences as coming to the fore when the autocracy, opposition to which had been the unifying force among the four men, commenced to totter and the possibilities of successful revolution began to emerge. By 1905, the point of terminus of the authors' study, these differences had become apparent and became permanently embodied in the Leninist theory of party dictatorship and the Menshevik's policy of democratization of the party structure.

The book is a stimulating essay in intellectual history and of considerable value in explaining the relationship of Russian Marxism to the environment in which it grew and developed.

Electoral Practices in the U.S.S.R. By GEORGE BARR CARSON, JR. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, 1955. Pp. viii, 151. $3.50.)

A matter-of-fact description of the system of elections to local soviets in the USSR and of its operation in practice. An introduction summarizes briefly the main features of the electoral system of Tsarist days.

Government Publications: Official Indexes, Lists, Guides, Catalogues. (London: H. M. Stationery Office, 1955. Pp. 14.)

This useful statement about the various types of indexes, etc., to British government publications was first issued in 1939, is intended "for the convenience of librarians, officials and other specialist users," contains many informative notes, and indicates those indexes, etc., that are no longer available in print. At the end, a statement is given about the catalog service of H. M. Stationery Office. Since this is not a priced publication, it may easily escape attention despite its importance.—J.B.C.

House of Commons, 1955, with Full Results of the Polling, Biographies of Members and Unsuccessful Candidates, Photographs of all Members, and a Complete Analysis, Statistical Tables, and a Map of the General Election, May, 1955. (London, The Times, 1955. Pp. 284. Map. 12/6.)

This work, referred to as The Times Guide to the House of Commons, 1955, includes in addition to the analysis of the election of 1955 a statement of the electoral boundary revisions, and reproduces the principal party manifestoes. The main part of the work is a biographical directory with portraits, and the volume might be characterized as an unofficial directory of the House of Commons.—J.B.C.

Senato e Camera nei Loro Rapporti e Costituzione (1848-1948). By SPARTACO CANNARSA. (Roma: Sciarano, 1955. Pp. 310.)

The analyses in chronological order of the two legislative chambers of Italy from the time of the Sub-Alpine Parliament to the end of the Kingdom of Italy is characterized as a "Piccola enciclopedia parlamentare," and presents material about one of the great foreign parliaments that should in some degree be more readily available in English.—J.B.C.

Handbuch der Sowjetzonen-Volkskammer. 2. Legislaturperiode (1954-1958). By INFORMATIONSBÜRO WEST. (Berlin-Schlachtensee, 1955. Pp. 386.)

Since the Volkskammer of the German Democratic Republic has never issued a Handbuch as has the Bundestag of the German Federal Republic, the Informationsbüro West has attempted to supply the deficiency as of June, 1955. About 240 pages are devoted to biographical sketches of the deputies. Thus anyone desiring information about these individuals may have access to it freely so far as it has been possible to collect it, without being open to the charge of spying. In addition to the deputies, sketches are given for only about half of the 66 representatives from Berlin. At the beginning of the volume, the text of the constitution of the German Democratic Republic, the election laws, and the rules of procedure of the Volkskammer are given. At the end of the volume are included the law and regulation concerning the Ministerrat, a brief directory of the government, and the laws and orders concerning the conferment of state orders and distinctions. For the first time, up to date basic information about the organization of the German Democratic Republic is readily accessible in one place.—J.B.C.

Verzeichnis der Behörden in Baden-Württemberg. Frühjahr, 1955. By THE INNEN-MINISTERIUM. (Stuttgart, 1955. Pp. 95.)

Amliches Gemeindeverzeichnis Baden-Württemberg, 1955, mit Behördenführer. By STATISTISCHES LANDESAMT. (Stuttgart, 1955. Pp. 54. Statistik von Baden-Württemberg. Bd. 18. I M 3.)

The official directory for the new state of Baden-Württemberg includes at the beginning a directory of the Federal agencies functioning in that state, and at the end "Kirchen und sonstige Religionsgemeinschaften" as well as "Spitzelverbände und Vereinigungen," and was issued as a "Beilage zum Gemeinsamen Amtsblatt." There is an index to agencies but not to persons. On pages 4-5 is a table of abbreviations to offices, titles, etc.

The official list of the cities, towns, and other governmental districts of Baden-Württemberg gives the area and population and contains by Kreis a statement of the various state agencies having jurisdiction or functioning there.—J.B.C.

The Ethiopian Empire—Federation and Laws.

By NATHAN MAREIN. (Rotterdam: Royal Netherlands Printing and Lithographing Co. 1954. Pp. 455.)

Marein, as advocate general and general adviser to the Imperial Ethiopian government, had unusual opportunity to become thoroughly familiar with the material treated, and published this work privately on his own initiative. The first chapter of about fifty pages deals with the constitution and government of Ethiopia. Chapter 16 is devoted to a short history of the administration and constitution of Eritrea, which was federated with Ethiopia in September, 1952.—J.B.C.

Lista del Cuerpo Diplomático y Directorio del Gobierno Nicaragüense. By DIRECCIÓN DEL CEREMONIAL DIPLOMÁTICO, MINISTERIO DE RELACIONES EXTERIORES. (Managua, Nicaragua: Talleres Nacionales de Imprenta y Encuadernación. 1955. Pp. 81.)

In view of the great difficulty in securing up-to-date information as to the principal officials of the government in many countries, it is particularly refreshing to note that the current edition of the Nicaraguan diplomatic list as of March, 1955, includes a government directory on pages 56-76.—J.B.C.

Código Electoral. Con sus Modificaciones y Resoluciones del Tribunal Superior Electoral. Para las Elecciones Generales del 1.º de Noviembre de 1954. EDITED BY LCDO. MICO URRUTIA. (Habana: Imp. Valcayo. 1954. Pp. 144.)

An unofficial edition of the Cuban Electoral Code, which was promulgated as decree-law no. 1215 of November 26, 1953, published in the Gaceta oficial, December 10, 1953, to govern the elections of November 1, 1954.—J.B.C.

Althingiskosningar, árið 1953. (Reykjavik. 1954. Pp. 36. Hagskýrslur Islands, II 8. Kr. 6.00.)

The official statistical report on the 1953 elections to the Althing, the Parliament of Iceland, although in Icelandic, has the captions to the tables also in English, thus making the tables available for the use of those not reading Icelandic. In 1953, the total number of registered voters was 87,601.—J.B.C.

SELECTED ARTICLES AND DOCUMENTS ON FOREIGN AND COMPARATIVE GOVERNMENT

WILLIAM H. ROBERTS
Catholic University of America

General

Brügel, J. W. Der Londoner Kongress der Sozialistischen Internationale. Europa Archiv. September 5, 1955.

Burdeau, G. Situación de la Democracia Pluralista. Revista de Estudios Políticos. July-August, 1955.

Corry, J. A. The Prospects for the Rule of Law. Canadian Journal of Economics and Political Science. November, 1955.

Darbelay, J. L'Action du Pouvoir sur l'Évolution du Droit. Zeitschrift für Schweizerisches Recht. Nos. 4/5, 1955.

Diesing, P. Noneconomic Decision-Making. Ethics. October, 1955.

Freund, L. The New American Conservatism and European Conservatism. Ethics. October, 1955.

Giacometti, Z. Die Freiheitsrechtskataloge als Kodifikation der Freiheit. Zeitschrift für Schweizerisches Recht. Nos. 4/5, 1955.

Kelsen, H. Foundations of Democracy. Ethics. October, 1955.

Specific Areas

United Kingdom

Beet, E. H. Parliament and Delegated Legislation. Public Administration. Autumn, 1955.

Borrie, G. J. The Advantages of the Declaratory Judgement in Administrative Law. Modern Law Review. March, 1955.

The British Program of Nuclear Power.

Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists. June, 1955.

British Progress in Nuclear Development. Labor and Industry in Britain. September, 1955.

The Budget, 1955. Notes on Current Politics. May 2, 1955.

The Budget Proposals. Economist. October 29, 1955.

Clegg, H. A. The Fleck Report. Public Administration. Autumn, 1955.

Collins, E. The British-Born Coloured. Sociological Review. July, 1955.

Conservative Party. Great Britain. Research Department. Local Elections, 1955. London, Conservative Research Department, 1955.

Duncan-Jones, A. Thoughts on the Government of Modern Universities. Universities Quarterly. May, 1955.

Evelly, R. The Monopolies Commission Decides to Ban These Practices. Cartel. July, 1955.

Fienburgh, W. The Politics of Welfare. Twentieth Century. July, 1955.

Galloway, G. B. Congress and Parliament. Washington, National Planning Association, 1955.

Gamser, H. G. Interunion Disputes in Great Britain and the United States. Industrial and Labor Relations Review. October, 1955.

Godfrey, J. L. Onward from Success: the Tory Victory. Virginia Quarterly Review. Autumn, 1955.

Great Britain. Scottish Education Department. Public Education in Scotland. Edinburgh, H.M.S.O., 1955.

Hanwell, F. The Hydrogen Bomb and British Politics. Contemporary Issues. August-September, 1955.

Keeton, G. W. Natural Justice in English Law. Current Legal Problems, 1955.

Lloyd, D. Law and Public Policy. Current Legal Problems, 1955.

Marsh, F. D. V. Legal Aspects of the National Coal Board as a State Trader in the Import and Export of Coal. International and Comparative Law Quarterly. October, 1955.

Mullins, C. Doubts about the Welfare State. Quarterly Review. July, 1955.

Murphy, M. E. Final Report of the British Royal Commission on Taxation. Tax Policy. July, 1955.

A Programme for Nuclear Power. London, H.M.S.O., 1955 (Cmd. 9389).

Retrospect of Crichton Down: Departments and Private Rights. Round Table. September, 1955.

Robson, W. A. Public Inquiries as an Instrument of Government. British Journal of Administrative Law. December, 1954.

Rogov, A. A. Labor Relations under the British Labor Government. American Journal of Economics and Sociology. July, 1955.

Sinker, P. The Recruitment and Training of the British Foreign Service. India Quarterly. July-September, 1955.

Summerskill, E. The Functions of Tribunals within the Modern State. British Journal of Administrative Law. December, 1954.

Taplin, V. Britain's New Economy. Toronto, Canadian Institute of International Affairs 1955.

Where, E. C. Are Our Parliamentary Institutions Best? Listener. November 3, 1955.

Colonial Areas

Anderson, J. D. N. Islamic Law in Africa. London, H.M.S.O., 1954.

Bate, M. L. Tanganyika: the Development of a Trust Territory. International Organisation. February, 1955.

Bauer, P. T. The Economic Development of Nigeria. Journal of Political Economy. October, 1955.

Carroll, F. G. The Malayan Elections. Pacific Affairs. December, 1955.

East Africa: the Royal Commission. Round Table. September, 1955.

Economic Man in East Africa. Round Table. September, 1955.

Francis, B. C. Kenya's Problems. African Affairs. July, 1955.

Goethörpe, J. E. An African Elite. British Journal of Sociology. March, 1955.

Great Britain. British Information Services. Reference Division. The Road to Self-Government: Constitutional Development in the British Colonial Territories. London, 1955.

———. Central Office of Information. Reference Division. Constitutional Progress in the Federation of Malaya and in Singapore. London, 1955.

———. Central Office of Information. Reference Division. Economic Development in the U.K. dependencies. London, 1955.

Holland, D. C. Equality before the Law. Current Legal Problems, 1955.

Liesny, H. J. Administration and Legal Development in Arabia: Aden Colony and Protectorate. Middle East Journal. Autumn, 1955.

- The Liverpool Conference. African Affairs. January, 1955.
- Niven, C. R. Recent Developments in Nigeria. African Affairs. April, 1955.
- Saloway, R. The New Gold Coast. International Affairs. October, 1955.
- Shannon, M. Rehabilitating the Kikuyu. African Affairs. April, 1955.
- Commonwealth of Nations*
- Balogh, T. India's Second Five-Year Plan. Banker. August, 1955.
- Barton, W. India, North and South. Quarterly Review, July, 1955.
- Bertrand, A. The Civil Service Academy of Lahore and the Training of Members of the Civil Service of Pakistan. International Social Science Bulletin. No. 2, 1955.
- Carr, R. Conflicts within the Indian CP. Problems of Communism. September-October, 1955.
- Commonwealth of Australia. Report of the Royal Commission on Espionage. Sydney, A. H. Pettifer, 1955.
- Copland, D. The Commonwealth of Nations as a Living Organism. South Atlantic Quarterly. October, 1955.
- Donaldson, A. G. The Constitution of Northern Ireland. University of Toronto Law Journal. No. 1, 1955.
- Franck, T. The Governor General and the Head of State Functions. Canadian Bar Review. December, 1954.
- Gledhill, A. The Judiciary in Pakistan. Indian Yearbook of International Affairs, 1954.
- Great Britain. Central Office of Information. Reference Division. Constitutional Development in the Commonwealth: pt. 1: Member Countries. London, 1955.
- Green, L. P. Municipal Coordination. Public Administration. Autumn, 1955.
- Gundappa, D. V. The Indian States and the Linguistic Problem. Indian Yearbook of International Affairs, 1954.
- Hall, H. D. The British Commonwealth. Proceedings of the American Philosophical Society. August 30, 1955.
- Indien. A Symposium. Universitas. November, 1955.
- Johnson, C. O. The State of Victoria Investigates Communism. Western Political Quarterly. September, 1955.
- Kelson, R. N. The New Zealand National Party. Political Science (Wellington). September, 1954.
- Kuller, G. I. S. A Militia versus a Standing Army. Military Review. November, 1955.
- Lingamurty, V. Elections in Andhra. Indian Journal of Political Science. April-June, 1955.
- Lothian, A. Sidelight on Indian Federation. Quarterly Review. July, 1955.
- Luthera, V. P. Freedom of Religion under the Indian Constitution and the Foreign Missionaries. Indian Journal of Political Science. April-June, 1955.
- Maas, W. Zur Entwicklung der KP in Indien. Osteuropa. October, 1955.
- Maron, S. A. New Phase in Pakistan Politics. Far Eastern Survey. November, 1955.
- Mukerji, R. Our Progress towards a Welfare State. Indian Journal of Political Science. April-June, 1955.
- Nuclear Energy in Peace: Progress in the Commonwealth. Round Table. September, 1955.
- Parthasarathi, V. V. India and the Commonwealth. Indian Yearbook of International Affairs. 1954.
- Perry, J. H. What Price Provincial Autonomy? Canadian Journal of Economics and Political Science. November, 1955.
- Porter, J. Elite Groups: a Scheme for the Study of Power in Canada. Canadian Journal of Economics and Political Science. November, 1955.
- Quresni, I. M. Relations between the Hindus and the Muslims in the Subcontinent of India and Pakistan. Civilisations. No. 1, 1955.
- Shepherd, R. H. W. The South African Bantu Education Act. African Affairs. April, 1955.
- Thomson, D. C. A Survey of the Australian Industrial Tribunals. Industrial Law Review Quarterly. July, 1955.
- Townsend, W. A. The Labour Party in a Changing Society. Australian Quarterly. March, 1955.
- Venkatachar, C. S. The Unity of India. A Study in Geopolitics. Indian Yearbook of International Affairs, 1954.
- Woods, H. D. Canadian Collective Bargaining and Dispute Settlement Policy. Canadian Journal of Economics and Political Science. November, 1955.
- Zinkin, T. Nehruism. Pacific Affairs. September, 1955.
- Western Europe*
- Analyses de Droit Administratif Français. Symposium. Revue du Droit Public et de la Science Politique. July-September, 1955.
- Besson, J. Les Élections Régionales Sici-liennes du 5 Juin 1955. Revue Française de Science Politique. July-September, 1955.

Boisdé, E. Travailisme, ou Gauche Libérale. Revue des Deux Mondes. October 1, 1955.

Braun, E. J. The Netherlands Internal Revenue Code. Taxes, October, 1955.

Drago, R. L'État d'Urgence et les Libertés Publiques. Revue du Droit Public et de la Science Politique. July-September, 1955.

Gascón Hernández, J. Problemas Actuales del Decreto-Ley. Revista de Administración Pública. September-December, 1954.

Girardet, R. Note sur l'Esprit d'un Fascisme Français, 1934-39. Revue Française de Science Politique. July-September, 1955.

Goguel, F. La Révision Constitutionnelle de 1954. Revue Française de Science Politique. July-September, 1955.

Gorissen, E. M. Italien. Aussenpolitik. October, 1955.

Higher Education in Denmark. Copenhagen, Danish Ministry of Education, 1954.

Hours, J. Les Catholiques Français et la Patrie. Artes Politiques et Économiques. January-March, 1955.

Imboden, M. Die Staatsrechtliche Problematik des Schweizerischen Föderalismus. Zeitschrift für Schweizerisches Recht. Nos. 4/5, 1955.

Ireland: Church and State. Round Table. September, 1955.

Marcus, F. Ausführungsgesetze zur Dänischen Verfassung. Zeitschrift für Ausländisches Öffentliches Recht und Völkerrecht. April, 1955.

Micaud, G. A. The Bases of Communist Strength in France. Western Political Quarterly. September, 1955.

Pedrazzini, M. La Regione nella Nuova Costituzione Italiana ed il Problema delle Nostre Minoranze Linguistiche. Zeitschrift für Schweizerisches Recht. Nos. 4/5, 1955.

Progress in the Task of Rural Development. Italian Affairs. September, 1955.

Rodó, L. L. Die Gemeindeverwaltung in Spanien. Zeitschrift für Ausländisches Öffentliches Recht und Völkerrecht. September, 1954.

Ryckmans, P. Belgian "Colonialism." Foreign Affairs. October, 1955.

Seigel, J. S. On the Sources of Political Divisions in France. Social Research. Autumn, 1955.

Sethur, F. Trade Unionism and Central Planning in Western Europe. Southern Economic Journal. October, 1955.

Sweder. A Symposium. Economist. October 29, 1955.

Thorelli, S. S. Political Science in Sweden. Stockholm, Swedish Institute, 1955.

Turini, T. Sulla Riforma della Burocrazia. Civiltà Italiana. December, 1954.

Central Europe

Back, E. Die Stellung und Aufgabe der Rechnungshöfe im Neuen Deutschen Staates. Zeitschrift für die Gesamte Staatswissenschaft No. 3, 1955.

—. Über Umfang und Grenzen der Finanzkontrolle der Rechnungshöfe. Archiv des Öffentlichen Rechts. October, 1955.

Bandisch, W. The New German Army. Foreign Affairs. October, 1955.

Ben, M. J. Whether Sovereign Germany? Contemporary Review. June, 1955.

L'Eglise Évangélique et les Problèmes Politiques et Sociaux. Chroniques Étrangères, Allemagne. April 20, 1955.

Fenel, D. La Nouvelle Bourgeoisie Allemande. Documents, Revue Mensuelle des Questions Allemandes. May, 1955.

Geb, E. Die Ausbildung des Nachwuchses für den Höheren Verwaltungsdienst. Archiv des Öffentlichen Rechts. October, 1955.

Giese, E. Parteien als Staatsorgane. Archiv des Öffentlichen Rechts. October, 1955.

Grosser, A. L'Allemagne Occidentale: État des Travaux. Revue Française de Science Politique. July-September, 1955.

Hegner, W. Die Grundlagen der Bayerischen Verfassung. Politische Studien. October, 1955.

Helbok, H. Achievements and Prospects of German Democracy. Political Science Quarterly. September, 1955.

Löffler, M. Das Geltende Deutsche Presserecht. Öffentliche Verwaltung. April, 1955.

Loewenstein, E. La Constitutionnalité des Traités Instituant la Communauté Européenne de Défense aux Termes de la Constitution de Bonn. Revue du Droit Public et de la Science Politique. July-September, 1955.

Mark, V. Sind wirklich sämtliche Deutsche Beamtenerhältnisse am 8. Mai 1945 erloschen? Zeitschrift für die Gesamte Staatswissenschaft. No. 1, 1955.

Morizes, J. Le Régime Parlementaire d'Allemagne Occidentale après Six Ans d'Application. Revue Française de Science Politique. July-September, 1955.

Mosler, H. Kulturabkommen des Bundesstaates. Zur Frage der Beschränkung der Bundesgewalt in Auswärtigen Angelegenheiten. Zeitschrift für Ausländisches Öffentliches Recht und Völkerrecht. January, 1955.

Seidel, H. Die Funktion der Opposition im Parlamentarischen System. Politische Studien. October, 1955.

Vocke, W. Sulla Politica Monetaria e Creditizia della Germania Occidentale. Bancaria. April, 1955.

Weber, W. Developments in Western German Agriculture. World Crops. September, 1955.

Zencke, H. H. La Réforme Fiscale. Documents, Revue Mensuelle des Questions Allemandes. May, 1955.

Soviet Union and Eastern Europe

Achminow, H. The Changes in Soviet Policy. Bulletin of the Institute for the Study of the History and Culture of the USSR. July, 1955.

Alexander, E. The Armenian Church in Soviet Policy. Russian Review. October, 1955.

Bailey, S. D. How Russia is Ruled. Parliamentary Affairs. Summer, 1955.

Baron, S. H. The First Decade of Russian Marxism. American Slavic and East European Review. October, 1955.

Birnbaum, I. Tageszeitungen und Rundfunk in Jugoslawien. Politische Studien. September, 1955.

Blokhintsev, D. I. The First Atomic Power Station in the Soviet Union. Engineering (London). August 19, 1955.

Collard, D. State Arbitration in the U.S.S.R. — Gosarbitrage. Modern Law Review. September, 1955.

Dallin, D. J. After Stalin. Yale Review. Winter, 1956.

Das, N. Industrial Organisation in Yugoslavia. Economic Digest. September, 1955.

The Economy of Hungary, 1950 to 1954. Economic Bulletin for Europe, UN. August, 1955.

Fischer, A. J. Die Jugoslawische Wirtschaftspolitik. Politische Studien. September, 1955.

From the July Plenary Session of the Central Committee to the Twentieth Party Congress. Bulletin of the Institute for the Study of the History and Culture of the USSR. September, 1955.

Garthoff, R. L. What's behind Soviet Disarmament? Army Combat Forces Journal, October, 1955.

Green, M. M. The Secret of Kremlin Warfare. Military Review. June, 1955.

Guins, G. C. Towards an Understanding of Soviet Law. Soviet Studies. July, 1955.

———. Labor Grievances in the Soviet Union. Bulletin of the Institute for the Study of the USSR. October, 1955.

———. Das Sowjetsystem als Neuer Typ einer Rechtsordnung. Osteuropa-Recht. No. 2, 1955.

Hazard, J. N. Understanding Soviet Law without the Cases. Soviet Studies. October, 1955.

Henderson, B. A. Communist Indoctrination Methods. Military Review. November, 1955.

Hoffmann, W. Die Jugoslawische Staatsverfassung. Politische Studien. September, 1955.

Hungary. Atlantic Monthly. October, 1955.

Johnson, E. L. Aspects of the Soviet Legal System. Soviet Studies. April, 1955.

Justice Enslaved. Hague, International Commission of Jurists, 1955.

Klocke, H. Die politische Ökonomie als Element der Willensbildung in der Sowjetunion. Zeitschrift für Geopolitik. October, 1955.

Kolarz, W. J. Government and People in the Soviet Union Today. International Affairs. October, 1955.

Mikulak, M. Soviet Cosmology and Communist Ideology. Scientific Monthly. October, 1955.

Möbus, G. Die Familie in der Sowjetpädagogik. Stimmen der Zeit. October, 1955.

Party Political Training in the Soviet Union. Bulletin of the Institute for the Study of the History and Culture of the USSR. August, 1955.

Poland—Ten Years of Communist Rule. British Survey. October, 1955.

Pozdnyakov, V. Atomic Defense in the Soviet Army. Bulletin of the Institute for the Study of the History and Culture of the USSR. August, 1955.

Radovanovic, L. Die Jugoslawische Politik der Koexistenz. Aussenpolitik. August, 1955.

Rosenthal, C. S. The Functions of the Polish Trade Unions. British Journal of Sociology. September, 1955.

Schlesinger, R. Soviet Lawyers on the Problems of their Legal System (I.) Soviet Studies. October, 1955.

Schultz, L. Die Entwicklung der Rechtswissenschaft in der UdSSR seit Stalin's Tod. Osteuropa-Recht. No. 2, 1955.

Skilling, G. The Soviet Impact on the Czechoslovak Legal Revolution. Soviet Studies. April, 1955.

———. Czechoslovakia: Government in Communist Hands. Journal of Politics. August 1955.

———. The Formation of a Communist Party in Czechoslovakia. American Slavic and East European Review. October, 1955.

Skorodumov, V. The Structure of Soviet School Administration. Munich, Institute for the Study of the History and Culture of the USSR, 1955.

Staar, R. E. The Secretariat of the United Polish Workers' Party (PZPR). Journal of Central European Affairs. October, 1955.

Strobel, G. W. Die Verstärkung der Sowjetunion. Osteuropa. October, 1955.

Ulam, A. B. The Historical Role of Marxism and the Soviet System. World Politics. October, 1955.

U. S. Department of State. Office of Intelligence Research. Contemporary Soviet Trends in Religion. Washington, 1955.

Valters, N. Das Vergehende und das Bleibende im Sowjetrecht. Stimmen der Zeit. September, 1955.

Von Kaull, E. Die Festung in den Bergen—Jugoslawiens Armee und ihre Bedeutung. Politische Studien. September, 1955.

Vvedensky, G. A. Soviet Industry on the Eve of the Sixth Five-Year Plan. Bulletin of the Institute for the Study of the History and Culture of the USSR. September, 1955.

Zellweger, E. Jugoslawien zwischen Totalitarismus und Rechtsstaat. Osteuropa-Recht. No. 2, 1955.

Middle East and Africa

Al-habib, M. The Iraqi Development Board. Southwestern Social Science Quarterly. September, 1955.

Baceau, J. S. A Role in Search of a Hero: a Brief Study of the Egyptian Revolution. Middle East Journal. Autumn, 1955.

Bartwich, N. Turkey after Thirty Years of Revolution. Quarterly Review. July, 1955.

Cardaire, M. L'Islam et la Cellule Sociale Africaine. Afrique et Asie. 1st trim., 1955.

Comhaire J. Das Wachstum der Afrikanischen Städte. Zeitschrift für Geopolitik. November, 1955.

Dejardin, A. Turquie 1955. Revue Nouvelle. May 15, 1955.

Didier, E. Problèmes de l'Afrique Noire. Revue des Deux Mondes. August 1, 1955.

Efimenko, N. M. An Experiment with Civilian Dictatorship in Iran. Journal of Politics. August, 1955.

Ghosh, K. P. Afghanistan in World Affairs. Contemporary Review. May 1955.

Haarer, A. E. Problems of Equatorial Africa. Contemporary Review. June, 1955.

Hamidullah, M. Sources of Islamic Law. A New Approach. Islamic Quarterly. December, 1954.

Hanson, A. H. Turkey Today. Political Quarterly. October-December, 1955.

Harrow, V. Tribalism in Africa. Journal of African Administration. January, 1955.

Hussey, E. R. J. Eritrea Self-Governing. African Affairs. October, 1954.

Karabencik, E. Growth and Development of Nationalism in Tunisia. World Affairs Interpreter. Summer, 1955.

Kes, K. K. The Origins of Turkish Political Parties. World Affairs Interpreter. April, 1955.

Messouc, C. The Future of Arab Politics. Interpreter. September 1, 1955.

Messing S. D. Changing Ethiopia. Middle East Journal. Autumn, 1955.

Peller, F. J. Foreign Investment in West Africa. International Affairs. October, 1955.

Permann, M. The Middle East in the Summer of 1955. Middle Eastern Affairs. August-September, 1955.

La République de Libéria. Notes et Etudes Documentaires. July 9, 1955.

Reetti, M. Israel's Parliament. Parliamentary Affairs. Autumn, 1955.

Samuel, E. State and Religion in Israel. Political Quarterly. October-December, 1955.

Sfar, G. N. Islam as the State Religion: a Secularist Point of View in Syria. Muslim World. July, 1955.

Smith, J. A. C. Human Rights in Eritrea. Modern Law Review. September, 1955.

U. S. Bureau of Foreign Commerce. Labor Law of Turkey. Washington, GPO, 1955.

Southeast Asia

Aardam, S. L'Indonésie, Candidat "Satellite." Revue de Défense Nationale. June, 1955.

Chakrapongse, Ch. The Political and Economic Background in Thailand. Royal Central Asia Journal. April, 1955.

Coughlin, R. J. The Chinese in Bangkok. American Sociological Review. June, 1955.

Die Erde des Kolonialismus und der Aufstieg neuer Nationen in Südostasien. Symposium. Europa Archiv. August 5, 1955.

Edmann, K. Südasiens als Wirtschaftsmacht. Zeitschrift für Geopolitik. October, 1955.

Fell, R. B. The Political-Religious Sects of Vietnam. Pacific Affairs. September, 1955.

Great Britain. Reference Division. Central Office of Information. Cambodia, Laos, and Viet Nam. London, 1955.

Marshall Pibul Hastens Slowly. Economist. October 22, 1955.

Michigan, University. Vietnam Team in Public Administration. First Report. Ann Arbor, 1955.

Nepal. Current Notes on International Affairs. December, 1954.

The Rice Situation in South East Asia. Current Notes on International Affairs. February, 1955.

Ross, I. C. Prerequisites for the Establishment of Democratic Institutions in South-East Asia. Melbourne, Australian Institute of International Affairs, 1954.

Srinivasamurthy, A. K. Constitutional Problems of the Colombo Powers. Indian Yearbook of International Affairs, 1954.

Pacific and Far East

Baerwald, H. H. Japanese Politics since the General Elections. Far Eastern Survey. September, 1955.

Bibliography of the Studies on Law and Politics. Tokyo, Ministry of Education, 1955.

Bonnichon, A. La Persecuzione in Cina e l'Enciclica "Ad Sinarum Gentem." Civiltà Cattolica. June, 1955.

Borton, H. Past Limitations and the Future of Democracy in Japan. Political Science Quarterly. September, 1955.

Bronfenbrenner, M. Prospects of Japanese Democracy. Toronto, Canadian Institute of International Affairs, 1955.

Coloso, V. The Role of Government Corporations in Economic Development. Economic Research Journal. September, 1955.

Colton, A. K. The Working of the Japanese Diet. Pacific Affairs. December, 1955.

La Conférence Nationale du Parti Communiste Chinois. Notes et Études Documentaires. May 24, 1955.

E-Tuzen, S. The Pattern of Railway Development in China. Far Eastern Quarterly. February, 1955.

Froomkin, J. Developments in Public Finance in Communist China, 1950-1954. Public Finance. No. 1, 1955.

Hsia, Tao-Tai. The Constitution of Red China. American Journal of Comparative Law. Summer, 1955.

Hunt, C. L. Moslem and Christian in the Philippines. Pacific Affairs. December, 1955.

Ikematsu, F. The 27th General Election and the Second Hatoyama Cabinet. Contemporary Japan. Nos. 7-9, 1955.

Kase, T. Japan's New Role in East Asia. Foreign Affairs. October, 1955.

Katzenbach, E. L. The Revolutionary Strategy of Mao Tse-Tung. Political Science Quarterly. September, 1955.

Kohler, W. Protestantism in Japan. Swiss Review of World Affairs. October, 1955.

Kuo-Chun, Chao. How Communist Power is Organized in China. Foreign Affairs. October, 1955.

Lacy, C. The Missionary Exodus from China. Pacific Affairs. December, 1955.

La Mongolie Extérieure depuis 1945. Articles et Documents. May 31, 1955.

La Région Autonome de Mongolie Intérieure. Articles et Documents. May 31, 1955.

Scaff, A. H. Democracy vs. Communism in the Philippines. Problems of Communism. September-October, 1955.

Schultz, L. Die Neue Verfassung der Volksrepublik China. Osteuropa-Recht. No. 1, 1955.

Schwartz, B. On the "Originality" of Mao-Tse-Tung. Foreign Affairs. October, 1955.

Some Basic Conceptions and Rules of Conduct of Chinese Communism. Lackland Air Force Base, Air Force Personnel and Training Center, Research Memo No. 34, 1955.

Stene, O. Public Administration in the Philippines. Manila, University of the Philippines, Institute of Public Administration, 1955.

Whiting, A. S. Communist China and "Big Brother." Far Eastern Survey. October, 1955.

Wright, M. C. From Revolution to Reformation: The Transformation of Kuomintang Ideology. Far Eastern Quarterly. August, 1955.

Latin America

Alexander, R. J. Brazil's CP: a Case Study in Latin America Communism. Problems of Communism. September-October, 1955.

Anderson, S. A. Organization and Administration of Public Education in Peru. School and Society. October 29, 1955.

Argentine Republic. Objectives of the Second Five Year Plan: Foreign Investments in Argentina. Buenos Aires, International Service Argentine Publications, 1955.

Baratz, M. S. The Crisis in Brazil. Social Research. Autumn, 1955.

Crawford, H. P. The Central Banking System of Colombia. University of Cincinnati Law Review. Summer, 1955.

Olea, P. La Escuela Superior de Administración Pública de América Central. Revista de Administración Pública. May-August, 1955.

Patch, R. Two Years of Agrarian Reform in Bolivia. New York, Institute of Current World Affairs, 1955.

Winizky, I. A. Survey of Constitutional Developments in Argentina and Uruguay. Southwest Law Journal. Fall, 1954.

INTERNATIONAL LAW AND RELATIONS

International Conflict and Collective Security: The Principles of Concern in International Organization. By WILLARD N. HOGAN. (Lexington, Kentucky: University of Kentucky Press. 1955. Pp. vii, 202. $3.50.)

"Collective security" is a wonderfully intriguing issue to write about these days because there is so much disagreement about it—except for the general consensus that there is precious little of it in existence. Hans Morgenthau writes in the second edition of his Politics Among Nations, "... collective security cannot be made to work in the contemporary world ..." (p. 392); while his colleague, Quincy Wright, insists in his Problems of Stability and Progress in International Relations, "I believe that collective security can work ..." (p. 111). Into this lively contest now marches one more book on the subject by Professor Willard N. Hogan.

Since one of the basic difficulties in wrestling with the concept of collective security is to get some agreement on what we are wrestling with, one appreciates the author's dispatch in addressing himself in the first chapter to the clarification of terms. Unfortunately, he still leaves matters a bit clouded by defining collective security via the less familiar expression, "principle of concern" ("a recognition that conflict among the members of a group affects the entire group and that a unilateral resort to violence against any member constitutes an offense against all members"). Not until the last ten pages of the book does he present a more comprehensive definition, but there he gives scant attention to the "principle of concern." Even that definition, however, devotes more attention to a denial of Morgenthau's assumptions than to the development of a positive and full-blown set of criteria of his own comparable to those suggested by Wright in his discussion of the problem in the work quoted above. Upon such criteria, of course, rests the outcome of the entire argument.

Hogan's principal contribution is a careful and thorough review of the evolution of the collective security concept during the League of Nations era to which he devotes 180 of his total 188 pages. The general pattern of this story is suggested by the chapter headings: "Acceptance: The League of Nations," "Limitation," "Modified Application," and "Disintegration." This is a very useful piece of analysis since observers of the international scene so frequently forget that the United Nations is little more than an extension of the League that one cannot understand the son without knowing the father, and that whatever the League was able to accomplish required greater boldness and imagination than is necessary now with the trail pretty well blazed.

It is regrettable, however, especially at this time when the United Nations Charter is being scrutinized so carefully, that Hogan did not find it possible to allot more than one of his six chapters to the United Nations experience, which by this time has covered half the life-span of the League. In that brief space he could only sketch the barest profile of the development of the last ten years. He does, nonetheless point very effectively to the plain fact that, while there is still no airtight collective security system in existence, we have witnessed actions that have provided considerable support for the collective security goals of both the United Nations and complementary arrangements. Furthermore, in a world of imperfect choices, this study indicates that even very halting collective steps may prove more advantageous than any other alternative available—H. FIELD HAVILAND, JR., Harvard College.

Survey of International Affairs, 1939-1946: The Far East 1942-1946. By F. C. JONES, HUGH BORTON AND B. R. PEARN. (London, New York, and Toronto: Oxford University Press. 1955. Pp. xiv, 589. $14.00.)

Survey of International Affairs, 1939-1946: The Realignment of Europe. EDITED BY ARTHUR TOYNBEE AND VERONICA M. TOYNBEE. (London, New York, Toronto: Oxford University Press. 1955. Pp. xvi, 612.)

Two additional volumes in the Royal Institute's massive survey of the war years; five other volumes have already appeared and others are in preparation. In the Far East volume Mr. Jones contributes detailed summaries of general developments in the Far East during the war and of events leading to the resumption of the Chinese civil war late in 1945; Mr. Pearn provides a concise summary of the first 16 months of peace in Southeast Asia; and Professor Borton deals with Japan—occupation policies, internal problems, and domestic politics—and with the unhappy fate of divided and occupied Korea.

The second volume, edited by the Toynbees, is an encyclopedic survey of the first 18 months of peace in Europe. Twelve different authors have contributed to this survey, which includes an analysis of Europe's economic difficulties and the first efforts at economic rehabilitation, and then proceeds to a country-by-country examination of problems which at the time seemed without end and nearly insoluble.

1954 Annual Review of United Nations Affairs.

EDITED BY CLYDE EAGELTON, WALDO CHAMBERLIN, AND RICHARD N. SWIFT. (New York: New York University Press. 1955. Pp. xi, 253. $4.50.)

This 1954 annual review marks a departure from the five previous volumes in this series. The authors and other contributors present an analysis and evaluation of what has taken place during the United Nations' year, under six main headings: "International Peace and Security," "Economic Matters," "Social and Humanitarian Matters," "Trusteeship and Non-Self-Governing Territories," "Law and Courts," and "Administrative Matters." Chapter VII presents a special study by Professor Chamberlin on "The Public Relations of the United Nations."

Foreign Affairs Bibliography: A Selected and Annotated List of Books on International Relations, 1942-1952. BY ROBERTS L. HENRY ASSISTED BY JEAN GUNTHER AND JANIS A. KRESLINS. (New York: Harper & Brothers. 1955. Pp. xxii, 727. $10.00.)

An extremely useful compilation of the titles of over 9,000 books in 34 languages published during the decade; the volume was prepared by the Council on Foreign Relations and its entries are drawn in large part from the valuable quarterly bibliographies appearing in Foreign Affairs, although several thousand new titles have been added. The volume is divided into three major sections—general international relations, the world since 1914, and the world by regions. Each section is in turn broken down into more specific categories. There are also author and title indexes.

The United States in World Affairs, 1953. BY RICHARD P. STEBBINS WITH THE ASSISTANCE OF GRANT S. MCCLELLAN. (New York: Harper & Bros. 1955. Pp. xiv. 512).

As well-written and as comprehensive as in the past, the Council on Foreign Relations' annual summary covers the first year of the new Republican Administration, a year marked by the Berlin uprising and the shifts in Soviet leadership, protracted debate over the proposed E.D.C., the Korean armistice, the growing realization of the destructive nature of hydrogen weapons, deterioration in Indochina, and a thousand other events and developments whose unwinding will keep Mr. Stebbins and his collaborators at work indefinitely.

Foreign Relations of the United States: Diplomatic Papers, 1940. Volume IV, The Far East. (Washington, D. C.: Government Printing Office. 1955. Pp. iv, 1022.)

A volume concerned almost entirely with Japan: the threat of that nation's southward expansion, the war against China, internal political developments, and U.S.-Japanese negotiations.

Documents on American Foreign Relations, 1954. EDITED BY PETER V. CURL. (New York: Harper & Brothers. 1955. Pp. xxii, 506. $5.00.)

The sixteenth appearance of this annual collection of important communiques, policy statements, and diplomatic exchanges; the range of material once again demonstrates the complexity and the all-inclusiveness of U.S. foreign policy.

Nationalism: Its Meaning and History. BY HANS KOHN, (Princeton, N. J., New York, Toronto, and London: D. Van Nostrand Company, Inc., 1955. Pp. 192. $1.25.)

A brief re-statement by a man whose qualifications for the task are widely known, supplemented by 23 readings ranging from Machiavelli to Nehru and Sun Yat-Sen, and including Herder, Hegel, Mazzini, Napoleon, Danilevsky, Mussolini, and others.

An Introduction to American Foreign Policy. BY EDGAR S. FURNISS, JR. AND RICHARD C. SNYDER. (New York: Rinehart & Company, Inc. 1955. Pp. xii, 252. $3.00.)

An attempt to explain the essentials of foreign policy analysis, to review U.S. foreign relations from 1789 to 1939, and to examine the new problems of foreign policy for this nation in light of postwar conditions, the traditions and expectations of American society, and the restraints imposed upon policy making by the nature of the political system.

An Introduction to the Law of Nations. By OSCAR SVÆVLEN. (New York, Toronto, and London: McGraw-Hill Book Company, Inc. 1955. Pp. xv, 478. $5.00.)

This is a welcome addition to the textbooks on international law and will be especially useful for one-semester courses. It covers the most essential topics without including too many details. While it makes good use of judicial cases and diplomatic practices, it also gives a considerable amount of historical and philosophical background.

The International City of Tangier. By GRAHAM H. STUART. (Stanford, Cal.: Stanford University Press. 2nd. ed. 1955. Pp. xv, 270. $6.00.)

Brings up to date Professor Stuart's study, first published in 1931, of a unique experiment in international control of a strategically located city, and of the problems of governing in such a city.

North African Powder Keg. By EDMUND STEVENS. (New York: Coward-McCann, Inc. 1955. Pp. 273. $3.75.)

Timely, journalistic, full of facts and local color. The author of this survey of Morocco, Algeria, Tunisia, and Libya is the Rome correspondent for the Christian Science Monitor.

The Passing of American Neutrality, 1937-1941. By DONALD F. DRUMMOND. (Ann Arbor: The University of Michigan Press; London: Oxford University Press. 1955. Pp. vi, 409. $7.50)

The evolution of American foreign policy from the neutrality act of May 1, 1937 to the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor, with considerable attention to changes in public opinion, strategic calculations, and the personalities who helped shape the decisions of the period.

The UN Record: Ten Fateful Years for America. By THESLEY MANLY. (Chicago: Henry Regnery Co. 1955. Pp. xi, 256. $3.95.)

A former Chicago Tribune correspondent at the United Nations concludes that the organization is not only a failure, but that American security and the success of American foreign policies have been and are endangered by membership in the organization.

Ten Years of United Nations Publications, 1945 to 1955: A Complete Catalogue. (New York: Department of Public Information, United Nations. 1955. Pp. 271. $0.50.)

The annual sales catalog of United Nations publications is replaced for 1955 by a ten-year cumulation, doing away with the need to consult the previous annual catalogs of the printed publications. The period covered is from the 1945 San Francisco Conference to December, 1954. The specialized agencies of the United Nations which issue their own publications, are not included, only a list of the addresses of these agencies being given.—J.B.C.

Psychological Warfare: An Introduction to Ideological Propaganda and the Techniques of Psychological Warfare. By BELA SZUNYOGI. (New York: The William-Frederick Press. 1955. Pp. 117. $3.00.)

A brief study of the ideological strategy, techniques, methods of and organization for propaganda transmission and of justifications for psychological warfare, by a refugee Hungarian physician.

SELECTED ARTICLES AND DOCUMENTS ON INTERNATIONAL LAW AND RELATIONS

WILLIAM H. ROBERTS

Catholic University of America

ARTICLES

International Politics and National Policies

General

Born, M. Entwicklung und Wesen des Atomzeitalters. Merkur. August, 1955.

Christaller, W. Subkontinente. Zeitschrift für Geopolitik. October, 1955.

Ellis, W. Y. Governmental Organizations for Foreign Policy Decisions. Social Science. October, 1955.

Emery, B. Non-governmental Organizations in International Affairs. Social Science. October, 1955.

Hoffins, V. C. Nationalism Re-examined. Thought. Autumn, 1955.

Jacoby, H. Die Ideologische Täuschung in der Aussenpolitik. Aussenpolitik. June, 1955.

Krauss, W. Die Parlamentarische Kontrolle der Aussenpolitik. Aussenpolitik. August, 1955.

Maulnier, T. Les Diverses Hypothèses de la "Coexistence." Preuves. June, 1955.

Mende, D. Internationale Beziehungen als Forschungsgegenstand. Europa Archiv. November 20, 1955.

Menon, L. N. International Responsibility for Dependent Areas. India Quarterly. July-September, 1955.

Northedge, F. S. National Self-determination. International Relations, April, 1955.

The Relation of Advanced to Underdeveloped Countries. Symposium. Confluence. October, 1955.

Roberts, W. H. Colonial Issues and Policies. Washington, Catholic Association for International Peace, 1955.

Ruthnaswamy, M. Organization and the Making of Foreign Policy. Indian Yearbook of International Affairs, 1954.

Sonne, H. C. Crucial Issues in World Perspective. Washington, National Planning Association, 1955.

Speier, H. War and Peace. Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists. November, 1955.

Trelles, C. B. El Ayer, el Hoy y el Mañana Internacionales. Revista de Estudios Políticos. July-August, 1955.

Military and Functional Questions

Air Power and National Security. Symposium. Annals. May, 1955.

Aniel-Quiroga, J. M. Las Explosiones Atómicas y las Relaciones Internacionales. Cuadernos de Política Internacional. January-March, 1955.

Arpurt, R. J. Les Forces Aériennes devant la Menace Atomique. Revue de Défense Nationale. February, 1955.

Bernard, S. Some Political and Technical Implications of Disarmament. World Politics. October, 1955.

Brodie, B. Strategy Hits a Dead End. Harper's Magazine. October, 1955.

Cushen, W. E. War Games and Operations Research. Philosophy of Science. October, 1955.

Frye, W. R. Disarmament. New York, Foreign Policy Association, 1955.

Grosser, J. F. G. Weltluftfahrt—Heute und Morgen. Zeitschrift für Geopolitik. June, 1955.

Hahn, O. Cobalt 60. Universitas. March, 1955.

Halle, L. J. The Role of Force in Foreign Policy. Social Science. October, 1955.

Hammer, T. The Geopolitical Basis of Modern War. Military Review. October, 1955.

Lapp, R. E. Global Fall-Out. Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists. November, 1955.

Libby, W. F. Radioactive Fall-out. Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists. September, 1955.

Moch, J. Les Problèmes Actuels du Désarmement. Politique Étrangère. April-May, 1955.

Montgomery, B. L. Tradition versus Progress. Air Force. November, 1955.

Nordheim, L. W. Tests of Nuclear Weapons. Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists. September, 1955.

The Peaceful Uses of Atomic Energy. Current Notes on International Affairs. February, 1955.

Philips-Price, M. Disarmament Prospects. Contemporary Review. August, 1955.

Weyl, H. R., The World's Guided Weapons. Military Review. December, 1955.

Wolfers, A. Could War in Europe be Limited? Yale Review. Winter, 1956.

International Conferences

Appadorai, A. The Bandung Conference. India Quarterly. July-September, 1955.

La Conférence des États Européens pour la Sauvegarde de la Paix et de la Sécurité en Europe, Varsovie 11-14 Mai 1955. Temps Nouveaux. May 21, 1955.

Discussions on German Reunification and Disarmament at Geneva Foreign Ministers Conference. Department of State Bulletin. November 21, 1955.

Escalera, C. M. La Conferencia de Bangkok, el Neutralismo Asiático y los Países Amparados. Cuadernos de Política Internacional. January-March, 1955.

Gasteyger, C. Asien und Afrika in der Weltpolitik. Europa Archiv. October 20, 1955.

Jack, H. A. The Asian-African Conference. Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists. June, 1955.

Kaug, W. Bandung und die Koexistenz. Deutsche Rundschau. June, 1955.

Peaceful Use of Atomic Energy: the Geneva Conference in Retrospect. United Nations Review. October, 1955.

U.N. Conference on Atomic Energy. Symposium. Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists. October, 1955.

Warburg, J. P. The German Dilemma: Agenda for the Conference of Foreign Ministers. Western Political Quarterly. September, 1955.

Wirsing, G. Die Konferenz von Bandung. Osteuropa. October, 1955.

United States

The American and the World. Public Opinion in U.S. Foreign Policy. Round Table, March, 1955.

Argentinicus. Die Aussenpolitik der USA. Zeitschrift für Geopolitik. June, 1955.

Baxter, R. R. The Geneva Convention of 1949 before the United States Senate. American Journal of International Law. October, 1955.

Brandon, O. H. Amerika sucht eine China-politik. Aussenpolitik. June, 1955.

Chandler, G. American Opinion and Foreign Policy. International Affairs. October, 1955.

Clift, V. A. American Aid to Education in Foreign Lands: Some Observations. Journal of Educational Sociology. October, 1955.

Ferguson, C. M. Military Forces and National Objectives. Military Review. October, 1955.

Graebner, N. A. Consequences of the China Debate. World Affairs Quarterly. October, 1955.

Kennan, G. F. Diplomaten als das Spiegelbild der Demokratischen Gesellschaft? Gedanken zur Zukunft des Amerikanischen Auswaertiger Dienstes. Aussenpolitik. November, 1955.

Lindbeck, J. M. H. Communist China and American Far Eastern Policy. Department of State Bulletin. November 7, 1955.

Marx, W. J. The Consular Service of the United States. Department of State Bulletin. September 12, 1955.

Morton, T. B. Congress and Foreign Affairs. Social Sciences. October, 1955.

Mosely, P. E. Hopes and Failures: American Policy toward East Central Europe. Review of Politics. October, 1955.

Murphy, R. The Principle of Self-determination in International Relations. Department of State Bulletin. November 28, 1955.

The Outlook after the Two Geneva Conferences. Washington, National Planning Association, 1955.

Shuck, L. E., Jr. Our Asian Policy: Time for Reappraisal. Pacific Spectator. Autumn, 1955.

Trelles, C. B. La Política Internacional Norte Americana, según la Versión de George F. Kennan. Cuadernos de Política Internacional. April-June, 1955.

Varg, P. Alternatives in the Far East. World Affairs Quarterly. October, 1955.

Von Globig, F. Wie Politik gemacht wird.

Der Führungsstab im Weissen Haus und die Ratgeber des Präsidenten. Aussenpolitik. June, 1955.

Wagstaff, J. J. Your Place in Politico-Military Policy. Military Review. November, 1955.

Young, K. T. The United States and Southeast Asia. Department of State Bulletin. November 21, 1955.

Canada

Barber, C. L. Canadian Tariff Policy. Canadian Journal of Economics and Political Science. November, 1955.

Canada and the United Nations. External Affairs. October, 1955.

Körner, R. Kanadische Aussenpolitik. Vierteljahrshefte für Zeitgeschichte. October, 1955.

United Kingdom

DeWard, H. A. Britain's Changing Military Policy. Foreign Affairs. October, 1955.

Durant, H. Public Opinion, Polls and Foreign Policy. British Journal of Sociology. June, 1955.

Hovay, A., Jr. Britain and the Unification of Europe. International Organization. August, 1955.

Wagner, W. Eden und die Oder-Neisse Linie. Aussenpolitik. November, 1955.

Younger, K. Public Opinion and Foreign Policy. British Journal of Sociology. June, 1955.

Western Europe

Ben-Ezer, N. Der Quai d'Orsay und Seine Tradition. Aussenpolitik. July, 1955.

Dukerle, D. La France et les Armements Nucléaires. Vie Intellectuelle. June, 1955.

Laufer, R. L'Afrique et la Défense Nationale. Revue de Défense Nationale. June, 1955.

Lincemann, H. Schwedische Baumeister der Eindmialigkeit. Aussenpolitik. July, 1955.

Marino, G. Orientamenti e Sviluppi della Politica Estera Italiana. Rassegna Italiana di Politica e Cultura. March, 1955.

———. L'Organizzazione Internazionale e l'Italia. La Comunità Internazionale. April, 1955.

Central Europe

Birnbaum, I. German Eastern Policy. International Affairs. October, 1955.

Brecht, A. Gangbare und Ungangbare Wege. Zur Frage der Wiedervereinigung. Aussenpolitik. November, 1955.

Défense Nationale Allemande. Articles et Documents. May 21, 1955.

Dehio, L. Um den deutschen Militarismus. Historische Zeitschrift. August, 1955.

Frisch, A. Zwischenbilanz der Deutsch-Französischen Beziehungen. Deutsche Rundschau. August, 1955.

Goussot, C. M. Une Autriche Neutre est-elle Possible? Revue de Défense Nationale. July, 1955.

Heissenberg, W. Die Atomforschung in Deutschland. Deutsche Universitätszeitung. April 18, 1955.

Kreisky, B. Österreich im Zeichen der Koexistenz. Zeitschrift für Geopolitik. November, 1955.

Maier, H. Die Ablösung des Besetzungstatuts in der Bundesrepublik Deutschland. Europa Archiv. August 20, 1955.

Scheuner, U. Voraussetzungen und Verfahren der Wiedervereinigung Deutschlands. Europa Archiv. August 20, 1955.

Wolff, G. Die sittliche Legitimation der deutschen Aussenpolitik. Aussenpolitik. October, 1955.

Soviet Union and Eastern Europe

Daniel, W. Die Ostsee als Magnet. Deutsche Rundschau. June, 1955.

The Development of Soviet Military Doctrine. British Survey. November, 1955.

Lowenthal, R. New Phase in Moscow-Belgrade Relations. Problems of Communism. November-December, 1955.

Martens, M. Soviet Expansion in the Antarctic. Bulletin of the Institute for the Study of the History and Culture of the USSR. September, 1955.

Mehnert, K. Sowjetunion: Aussenpolitik. Osteuropa. October, 1955.

Potts, R. D., Jr. The Foundations of Soviet Air Power. Annals. May, 1955.

Rubinstein, A. Z. Soviet Plans for the South Pole. Economist. October 20, 1955.

Middle East and Africa

L'Accord Anglo-Égyptien sur la Zone de Suez du 27 Juillet 1954. Chronique de Politique Étrangère. May, 1955.

Barnea, J. Natural Resources in the Middle East. Middle Eastern Affairs. October, 1955.

Benumeys, R. G. Actualidad del Irak, como Centro Político del Próximo Oriente, en 1955. Cuadernos de Política Internacional. April-June, 1955.

Jooste, G. P. South Africa's Position in the West. African Affairs. April, 1955.

Kaster, H. L. Die Paktsysteme im Mittleren Osten. Aussenpolitik. May 1, 1955.

Krug, W. G. Afrikas Verkehrsprobleme. Zeitschrift für Geopolitik. June, 1955.

McDaniel, B. W. American Technical Assistance and Economic Aid in Israel. Middle Eastern Affairs. October, 1955.

McGhee, G. C. Die Türkei in der Westlichen Welt. Aussenpolitik. June 1955.

Middle Eastern Defense. Round Table. March, 1955.

Steubel, H. The Strategic Significance of South and Central Africa. Military Review. November, 1955.

South and Southeast Asia

Alonso, N. M. Final del Colonialismo en Asia. Cuadernos de Política Internacional. April-June, 1955.

Bajpai, G. S. Nepal and Indo-Nepalese Relations. Indian Yearbook of International Affairs. 1954.

Green, M. Kashmir: Valley of Indecision. United States Naval Institute Proceedings. December, 1955.

Karunakaran, K. P. Die Stellung Indiens in der Weltpolitik. Europa Archiv. August 5, 1955.

Mehnert, K. Asien zwischen Weiss und Rot. Osteuropa. October, 1955.

Mukerji, A. B. Kashmir—A Study in Political Geography. Geographical Review of India. March, 1955.

Thomas, M. L. The Sources of Indonesian Foreign Policy. South Atlantic Quarterly. October, 1955.

Far East and Pacific

L'Émigration Chinoise dans le Sud-Est Asiatique, son Importance Politique et Économique. Notes et Études Documentaires. June 21/23, 1955.

L. M. The Problem of Korea. Indian Yearbook of International Affairs, 1954.

Lindsay, M. Chinese Foreign Policy. International Journal. Spring, 1955.

Solich, E. J. China und Südostasien. Zeitschrift für Geopolitik. November, 1955.

The Soviet-Japanese Negotiations in London. Japan Quarterly. October-December, 1955.

International Economic Policy and Relations

Bräker, H. Die Wirtschaftsbeziehungen der Sowjetunion zu Süd- und Südostasien. Osteuropa. October, 1955.

Current Economic Developments in Europe. Economic Bulletin for Europe, UN. August, 1955.

DeLany, W. S. East-West Trade Controls. Department of State Bulletin. December 5, 1955.

de Looper, J. H. C. Current Usage of Payments Agreements and Trade Agreements. International Monetary Fund Staff Papers. August, 1955.

Gress, H. Weltwirtschaft in Neuer Konzeption. Aussenpolitik. June, 1955.

Kostner, N. Gedanken über Konvertibilität. Aussenwirtschaft. March, 1955.

McClellan, H. C. Foreign Trade and International Understanding. Foreign Commerce Weekly. November 28, 1955.

Michaelis, A. American Investments in Asia. India Quarterly. July-September, 1955.

Mosher, A. T. Technical Cooperation in Latin America: The Agricultural Program of ACAR in Brazil. Washington, National Planning Association, 1955.

Peretz, D. Development of the Jordan Valley Waters. Middle East Journal. Autumn, 1955.

Pfuhl, E. Die Wirtschaftsabkommen des Ostpakt-Systema. Osteuropa-Recht. No. 2, 1955.

Recent Developments in Trade between Eastern and Western Europe, Economic Bulletin for Europe UN. August, 1955.

Schiffler, G. Die Revision des Allgemeinen Zoll- und Handelsabkommens (GATT). Europa Archiv. November 5, 1955.

Vernon, R. Organising for World Trade. International Conciliation. November, 1955.

International Law

Bilfinger, C. Über die Änderung territorialer Grenzen als Kriegsfolge. Zeitschrift für Ausländisches Öffentliches Recht und Völkerrecht. April, 1955.

Brügel, J. W. Der Konflikt zwischen Menschenrecht und Souveränität. Aussenpolitik. October, 1955.

Dolan, E. The Member-Republics of the U.S.S.R. as Subjects of the Law of Nations. International and Comparative Law Quarterly. October, 1955.

Drucker, A. Compensation for Nationalized Property: British Practice. American Journal of International Law. October, 1955.

Eustathiades, C. T. La Convention Européenne des Droits de l'Homme et le Statut du Conseil de l'Europe (II). Friedens-Warte. No. 1, 1955.

Friedman, G. H. L. Enemy Status. International and Comparative Law Quarterly. October, 1955.

International and Comparative Law Quarterly. October, 1955.

Goddard, G. The Narrowing Sea. Indian Yearbook of International Affairs. 1954.

Golsong, H. Die Verfahrensordnung der Europäischen Kommission für Menschenrechte. Europa Archiv. November 5, 1955.

Gulberg, T. International Concessions, a Problem of International Economic Law. Acta Scandinavica Juris Gentium. Nos. 1-2, 1955.

Hees, F. W. A Post-Korea Look at the Geneva Convention. Military Review. December, 1955.

International Law—Claims to Sovereignty—Antarctica. Southern California Law Review. July, 1955.

Kruse, E. The Islamic Doctrine of International Treaties. Islamic Quarterly. October, 1954.

Kuśki, V. W. The Soviet Interpretation of International Law. American Journal of International Law. October, 1955.

Kurz, J. L. Pluralism of Legal and Value Systems in International Law. American Journal of International Law. July, 1955.

Kwang Lem Koh. The Continental Shelf and the International Law Commission. Boston University Law Review. November, 1955.

Messner, B. Die Sowjetische Bewertung der Völkerrechtsquellen. Osteuropa-Recht. No. 1, 1955.

Nadelmann, K. H. American Consular Jurisdiction in Morocco and the Tangier International Jurisdiction. American Journal of International Law. October, 1955.

Pal D. The Definition of Aggression. Indian Yearbook of International Affairs. 1954.

Pfuhl, E. Rechtsformen der Aussenwirtschaftsbeziehungen der UdSSR zu den Volksdemokratien. Osteuropa-Recht. No. 1, 1955.

Pinto, R. Le Droit International et la Coexistence. Journal du Droit International. April-June, 1955.

Pionrowski, G. Les Résolutions de l'Assemblée Générale des Nations Unies et la Portée du Droit Conventionnel. Revue de Droit International (Fottile-Genève). July-September, 1955.

Re, E. D. The NATO Status of Forces Agreement and International Law. Northwestern University Law Review. July-August, 1955.

Rousseau, C. Scientific Progress and the Evolution of International Law. Impact of Science on Society. June, 1954.

Schlocherer, H. J. Rechtsformen der Europäischen Ordnung. Archiv des Völkerrechts. March 1955.

Selak, C. B., Jr. The Suez Canal Base Agreement of 1954. American Journal of International Law. October, 1955.

Stein, E. The European Steel and Coal Community: the Beginning of its Judicial Process. Columbia Law Review. November, 1955.

Wilks, I. A Note on Sovereignty. Philosophical Quarterly. October, 1955.

International Organization

United Nations and Specialized Agencies

Charting a Peaceful Future for the Atom. United Nations Review. December, 1955.

Cohen, M. The United Nations Secretariat. American Journal of International Law. July, 1955.

Copland, D. The Economic and Social Council's Work in a New Perspective. United Nations Review. October, 1955.

Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations. Activities of FAO under the Expanded Technical Assistance Program 1954-55. Rome, 1955.

———. The International Effects of National Grain Policies. Rome, 1955.

Gasteyger, C. Die 19te und 20te Tagung des Wirtschafts- und Sozialrates der Vereinten Nationen. Europa Archiv. October 5, 1955.

Hättich, M. Die deutsche Mitarbeit in der UNESCO. Europa Archiv. November 20, 1955.

Harper, N. D. Revision of the United Nations Charter—An Australian View. India Quarterly. July-September, 1955.

Honig, F. The Independence of the International Civil Service. Acta Scandinavica Juris Gentium. Nos. 3-4, 1954.

Kumleben, G. Die Vereinten Nationen nach zehn Jahren. Aussenpolitik. June, 1955.

Logue, J. The Great Debate on Charter Reform. Thought. Autumn, 1955.

Rao, K. K. The General Conference for the Review of the Charter of the United Nations. Fordham Law Review. Autumn, 1955.

Reiff, H. The Quest for International Order and Security. Social Studies, November, 1955.

Review of the Ninth Year of the United Nations. Department of State Bulletin. September 5, 1955.

Rudzinski, A. W. Majority Rule vs. Great Power Agreement in the United Nations. International Organization. August, 1955.

Singh, N. China and the United Nations. Indian Yearbook of International Affairs, 1954.

Svennevig, T. P. The Scandinavian Bloc in the United Nations. Social Research. Spring, 1955.

Ward, C. United Nations' Work in Africa. African Affairs. July, 1955.

U.N. Disarmament Commission Subcommittee: Summary of Most Recent Proposals. Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists. September, 1955.

Regional and Collective Security Organizations

Asmussen, G. Western Europe's Politico-Military Development. Military Review. December, 1955.

Carnegie Endowment for International Peace. Reference and Information Service. Arab League Bibliography. New York, 1955.

Dennison, S. R. The European Coal and Steel Community. Lloyds Bank Review. July, 1955.

Heiser, H. J. Die Errichtung des Ständigen Rüstungsausschusses der Westeuropäischen Union. Europa Archiv. September 5, 1955.

Jenks, C. W. World Organization and European Integration. European Yearbook (I), 1955.

Kowarski, L. The Making of CERN—an Experiment in Cooperation. Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists. December, 1955.

Merry, H. J. The European Coal and Steel Community—Operations of the High Authority. Western Political Quarterly. June, 1955.

Mullenbach, Ph. A European Agency for Nuclear Energy. Looking Ahead. November, 1955.

Mulley, F. ECSC at Work. Cartel. October, 1955.

New Look for NATO's Divisions. Economist. October 29, 1955.

Ockrent, R. Les Aspects Politiques de l'Activité de l'O.E.C.E. Chronique de Politique Étrangère. July, 1955.

Padelford, N. J. Political Cooperation in the North Atlantic Community. International Organization. August, 1955.

Pearson, L. B. After Geneva: a Greater Task for NATO. Foreign Affairs. October, 1955.

Pella, G. Itineraries of European Economic Integration. Banco di Roma Review of Economic Conditions in Italy. September, 1955.

Recent Developments in Regional Organization. Symposium. Proceedings of the American Society of International Law. Washington, 1955.

Slessor, J. European Security and Disarmament after Geneva. Air Power. Autumn, 1955.

DOCUMENTS

General and Miscellaneous

Albania, Bulgaria, Czechoslovakia, German Democratic Republic, Hungary, Poland, Rumania, U.S.S.R. Treaty of Friendship, Cooperation, and Mutual Assistance. Warsaw, May 14, 1955. American Journal of International Law. October, 1955.

Council of Europe. Research Directorate of the Secretariat General. The Present State of Economic Integration in Western Europe. Report. Strasbourg, 1955.

Economic Development Institute. Prospectus. Washington, 1955.

FAO. The State of Food and Agriculture, 1955. Review of a Decade and Outlook. Rome, 1955. (Doc. C/55/4).

———. The Work of FAO, 1954-55. Report of the Director General. Rome, 1955 (Doc. C/55/8).

Germany. Agreements Relating to Germany, 1952 and 1954. American Journal of International Law. July, 1955.

———. Dokumente der Verhandlungen der Regierungsdelegation der Bundesrepublik Deutschland mit der Sowjetunion in Moskau vom 9. bis zum 13. September 1955. Europa Archiv. September 20/October 5, 1955.

———. Dokumente zu den Beziehungen der Sowjetunion und der Deutschen Demokratischen Republik. Europa Archiv. October 20, 1955.

International Bank for Reconstruction and Development. The Economic Development of Syria. Report of a Mission Organized by . . . at the Request of the Government of Syria. Baltimore, Johns Hopkins Press, 1955.

———. Tenth Annual Report, 1954-55. Washington, 1955.

ILO. International Labour Conference, 38th Session. Geneva, 1955.

O.E.E.C. European Monetary Agreement. Paris, 1955.

United Nations

All entries under this heading bear the imprint of the United Nations (New York), 1955, unless a different place or date is shown.

ECOSOC. ECAFE. Official Records. Eleventh Session, 28 March-7 April 1955. (Doc. E/CN.11/408; May 24, 1955).

———. ECE. Industry Division. The European Housing Developments and Policies in 1954. (Doc. E/ECE/209; August, 1955).

———. ECLA. Secretariat of the Technical Assistance Board. Countries and Territories of the Latin American Region during 1954. Report. (D-c. E/CN.12/AC.26/3; March 30, 1955).

———. Seventh Annual Report of . . . (Doc. E/CN.12/AC.26/8; May 10, 1955).

———. Technical Assistance Activities in the ECLA Regions as of 30 June 1955. Bogota. (Doc. E/CN.12/372/Add. 1; August 17, 1955).

Secretariat. Repertory of Practice of United Nations Organs, Vol. III. Art. 55-72 of the Charter. (Sales No : 1955.V.2. Vol. III).

———. Draft International Covenants on Human Rights. Annotations Prepared by the Secretary-General. (Doc. A/2929; July 1, 1955).

———. Recommendations Concerning International Respect for the Right of Peoples and Nations to Self-determination. Note by the Secretary-General. (Doc. A/2951; September 8, 1955).

———. The International Conference on the Peaceful Uses of Atomic Energy. Report of the Secretary General. (Doc. A/2697; September 14, 1955).

Trusteeship Council. Draft Report of . . . to the General Assembly Covering the Period from 17 July 1954 to . . . July 1955. (Doc. T/L.600; July 15, 1955).

United States

Unless otherwise indicated, all entries under this heading bear the imprint: "Washington: Government Printing Office, 1955"; and the Congressional materials are those of the 84th Congress, 1st session.

Congress

House. Intelligence Activities. Letter from Chairman, Commission on Organization of the Executive Branch of the Government, Transmitting its Report on Intelligence Activities. H.Doc. 201; June 29, 1955.

———. Report of Activities of the National Advisory Council on International Monetary and Financial Problems. H. Doc. 194; June 22, 1955.

———. Committee on Banking and Currency. International Finance Corporation. Hearings. July 11/14, 1955.

———. Committee on Foreign Affairs. To Improve the Relations of the United States with Western Germany and Japan. Hearings before Subcommittee. July 1/11, 1955.

———. Mutual Security Act of 1955. Report . . . June 24, 1955.

Senate. Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. Disposal of Agricultural Surpluses. Hearings before Subcommittee. Hearings. Pts. 1 and 2. February 25 . . . June 2, 1955.

———. Committee on Banking and Currency. International Finance Corporation. Hearings before Subcommittee. June 6/7, 1955.

———. Committee on Foreign Relations. Mutual Security Act of 1955. Report. S. Report No. 383; May 27, 1955.

———. The Panama Treaty. Hearings. July 15 . . . 20, 1955.

———. Subcommittee on the United Nations Charter. Human Rights, Domestic Jurisdiction, and the United Nations Charter. Staff Study No. 11.

———. Committee on the Judiciary. Treaties and Executive Agreements. Hearings before Subcommittee. April 27 . . . May 12, 1955.

———. Subcommittee to Investigate the Administration of the Internal Security Act. Strategy and Tactics of World Communism: The Communist Battle Plan. Hearings. . . Pt. 13, April 28, 1955.

Executive Departments

Department of State. The Bangkok Conference of the Manila Pact Powers, February 23-25, 1955. (Pub. No. 5909).

———. The Geneva Conference of Heads of Government, July 18-23, 1955. (Pub. No. 6046).

———. The Department of State, 1930-1955; Expanding Functions and Responsibilities. (Department and Foreign Service Series No. 44.)

———. The United States and Germany, 1945-55. (European and British Commonwealth Series No. 47.)

———. United States Policy in the Near East, South Asia and Africa, 1954. (Near and Middle Eastern Series No. 18).

POLITICAL THEORY, RESEARCH, AND METHODOLOGY

Rebels and Democrats: The Struggle for Equal Political Rights and Majority Rule during the American Revolution. By ELISHA P. DOUGLASS. (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press. 1955. Pp. xiv, 368. $5.00.)

During the past thirty years the domestic significance of the American Revolution as a social movement within the revolting colonies has been emphasized by many historians. Until recently one of the generally neglected phases of this social revolution within a political revolution, however, was the struggle within the "Whig party" between the politically unprivileged lower ranks and the leaders over the basic questions of equal political rights for all adult free males and majority rule. This cleavage appeared in most of the colonies in the late colonial period. It became more pronounced as American democratic ideas crystallized during the dispute with England, and in a few states it led to an interesting struggle over the framing and content of the first state constitutions. The principal battlegrounds were the individual states. Although the "democrats," often unorganized and leaderless, won very few important victories at this time over the politically entrenched "conservatives," the conflicts between the two groups served to identify most of the political issues that were to be debated for many decades in post-Revolutionary state constitutional conventions.

Professor Douglass' book is an interesting, readable account of this struggle. Following two introductory chapters that lay the proper groundwork, the author describes the radical-conservative conflict in South Carolina, Maryland, New York, North Carolina, Massachusetts, and Pennsylvania, and in two brief notes as appendices he summarizes what is now known about the Revolutionary movement in New Hampshire and Georgia. In a chapter entitled "Thomas Jefferson and Revolutionary Democracy," he compares and contrasts the philosophical and institutional ideas of Jefferson with those of the dissident democratic groups of the Revolutionary era. In a concluding chapter, the author pays tribute to both contending groups in this manner: "The programs of the Revolutionary Whigs and democrats are therefore complementary to each other. Neither eighteenth-century liberalism nor eighteenth-century democracy was capable by itself of providing political freedom" (pp. 325-26). This conclusion is sound.

Rebels and Democrats is an important addition to the literature concerned with the growth of American political ideas and institutions in this formative period. Each chapter is fully documented, and a concise "Bibliographical Note" gives a brief evaluation of the most pertinent books, pamphlets, documents and newspapers relating to the democratic movement of this period. Finally, it should be stated that the author has carried out well the task set forth in the Preface: "... to write a useful book which might illuminate to some degree the origins of our democratic ideas and political institutions and stimulate further interest in the subject."—J. ALTON BURDINE, The University of Texas.

The Little Community: Viewpoints for the Study of a Human Whole. BY ROBERT REDFIELD. (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1955. Pp. 182. $4.00.)

Redfield has told us that there are many ways of looking at and describing communities. By looking at and describing small communities in his terms we get societal and cultural overviews that help us to understand the human whole. He does not tell us precisely how one goes about the process of observation, but he cites study values drawn from his own experiences, scholarly research, and observations that should be helpful in providing a broad and broadening approach to community field observations. He gives us a series of viewpoints from which to make our observations.

Drawing heavily on his own study of three Mexican villages, Folk Culture of Yucatan, and less heavily on Evans-Prichard's work on the Nuer tribesmen of the Sudan, Redfield reasserts the thesis that since the small community can be seen and mentally grasped as a whole, and since world social organization is predominantly made up of small communities, one can make a good beginning at explaining and describing the whole of society and culture by comparing such individual, whole communities. Four qualities of the small community which identify it and make it amenable to comparison are these: distinctiveness, smallness, homogeneity, and all-providing self-sufficiency.

If the researcher accepts the small community as a base for observation, he must then take into account the problem of seeing the community from the viewpoint of its members and at the same time "maintain a detachment sufficient to make the description meaningful to scientists." In part this requires ability to adopt a "world view," a philosopher's approach to the whole, and ability to "wait and listen to hear if one or many of the natives have themselves conceived an order in the whole." At the same time the researcher needs to take into account the various facets of community description: ecology, social structure, and history—all back-of-the-mind elements in the research process. So far so good! And that is about as far as Redfield goes with the exception of passing reference to the problems posed by "national state societies."

In the opinion of this reviewer a community approach to a description of world order is quite valid. However, since the metropolitan centers are anchor points of power, commerce, cultural reference, communication, and the like, to use only the small community in such a description leaves out the major element of modern world order. The great cities are the stars of societal and cultural constellations. The small communities are merely their satellites. The large centers would seem to provide a base for more accurate description than their peripheral social groups.

If I have done an injustice to Mr. Redfield, the fault lies mostly in my inability to follow him at those points where he comes upon a point, almost makes it, and goes on to another topic. The book is based, of course, on Redfield's Göttingen lectures at Sweden's Uppsala University, and points are sometimes made in the lecture hall by tonal emphasis and gesture rather than by words in logical sequences.—FLOYD HUNTER, University of North Carolina.

The Communist Theory of Law. BY HANS KELSEN. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, Inc. 1955. Pp. viii 193. $5.00.)

Marx, Engels, and, later, Lenin were not concerned much with legal theory. The rise of the Soviet state created the practical need for a theory of law derived from, or at least compatible with, the general theory of Marxism-Leninism and the reality of political life in the Soviet Union. Kelsen's The Communist Theory of Law summarizes his studies of communist legal theories which he has carried on in the last 30 years and some of the results of which were first published in German. The book in no way duplicates the recent studies by Hazard and Berman in this country and Schlesinger's work in Great Britain, but rather supplements them. The author has been the world's leading legal theorist for over a generation, and it is therefore understandable that his approach to the communist theory of law is largely based on his own conception of the law, as defined in his numerous treatises on law and the state. The first two chapters deal with the political and legal theories of Marx, Engels and Lenin, and are probably the best brief summary analysis of the subject, incorporating and further developing some of the ideas Kelsen expressed in his recently published short book on The Political Theory of Bolshevism (1949). In Chapters III–VIII Kelsen takes up the major Soviet legal theoreticians, such as Stuchka, Pashukanis, Reiser, and Vyshinsky, and confronts their formulations both with the theory of communism as well as with the postulates of a general theory of law. Finally, in the last chapter Kelsen examines the implications of Soviet legal theory for the field of international law. Because of their more general subject-matter, the first two and the last chapters of The Communist Theory of Law will probably have the greatest appeal to the general political scientist. Kelsen writes with his usual verve and incisiveness, and even the more technical chapters of the book are enlivened by his breadth of interest and depth of analysis.—WILLIAM EBENSTEIN, Princeton University.

Philosophen in Spiegel und Zerrspiegel: Deutschlands Weg in den Nationalismus und Nationalsozialismus. By FRIEDRICH GLUM. (München: Isar Verlag. 1954. Pp. 287.)

Professor Glum of the University of Munich spent some time after the war as a guest professor in England and the United States. Prior to this he had become acquainted with American and British educators who had entered Germany under the Occupation authority. Inevitably his contacts with them led to discussions of the reasons for the appearance of National Socialism in Germany and especially to the relationship of Nazi ideology to historic political philosophy. The present book is the author's attempt to deal with these problems. He first deals with the sociological and ideological foundations of German nationalism and National Socialism. Here are analyzed the youth movements, the conservative political revolution, and the experiences of World War I as roots out of which the Nazi movement grew. The second portion deals with ideological factors and here Fichte, Hegel, and Nietzsche and their Western counterparts—Locke, Rousseau, and de Tocqueville—are discussed. The author concludes that the traditional German philosophers can be made into supporters of the Nazi ideology only by a considerable distortion of their meaning and intent. Hence the significance of the title of the book: Philosophen in Spiegel und Zerrspiegel. In the concluding section Professor Glum attempts to put his political philosophers in their correct perspective and to deduce from them the foundations for a workable democratic theory. The work is of considerable interest both because it is refreshing and provocative and because it expresses the thought of a contemporary German political theorist and thus gives us some insight into the climate of opinion existing in certain sections of the German academic community.—H. M. M.

International Bibliography of Political Science.

Volumes II. PREPARED BY THE INTERNATIONAL POLITICAL SCIENCE ASSOCIATION IN CO-OPERATION WITH THE INTERNATIONAL COMMITTEE FOR SOCIAL SCIENCES DOCUMENTATION. JEAN MEYNAUD (ED.) AND JEAN MEYRIAT (ASSOCIATE ED.). (Paris: UNESCO. 1955. Pp. 279. $3.50.)

Whereas Volume I of this bibliography listed works published in 1952, Volume II lists "works published in 1953, including some publications of the previous year." The reasons for and basis of selection of books from the "previous year" is not explained. Volume II as compared with Volume I lists "a greater number of titles drawn from more varied sources." In view of the many omissions from the first volume, this broader coverage will be welcomed by those who use the bibliography. The bibliography is indeed comprehensive in plan and execution. Its use will be facilitated by the careful classification system and by author and subject indexes. In the case of books there are frequently one-sentence annotations and references to reviews.

The Heresy of Democracy: A Study in the History of Government. By LORD PERCY OF NEWCASTLE. (Chicago: Henry Regnery Co. 1955. Pp. 246. $4.00.)

The growing literature critical of the totalitarian implications of democracy is reinforced by this American edition of Lord Percy's Heresy of Democracy. The author considers democracy to be a heresy since in its modern form it has departed from its traditional bases in a Christian social order and moved in the direction of a totalitarianism either of the right or of the left. The historic breaking point is the French Revolution, although earlier distortions of the Christian concept are to be found in phases of the medieval struggle between church and state. The author calls for a revival of the Christian belief in transcendent values and a recognition of the subordinate, although essential, role which the state plays in human society. Only by the recovery of belief can the world again become free, and Western civilization saved from a statism enmeshed in the consideration of means rather than of ends. The West has the choice of either accepting the moral state in a dualistic society or following the welfare state down the road to tyranny.

The Study of Political Theory. By THOMAS P. JENKIN. (Garden City, N. Y.: Doubleday & Company 1955. Pp. x, 99. $0.95.)

Students will welcome this latest addition to the Doubleday Short Studies in Political Science. Here in the compass of some 95 pages Professor Jenkin has presented a blueprint of the scope and method of political theory. The work covers the following: "Nature and Objects of Political Theory," "Concepts of Political Theory," "Systems of Political Doctrine," and "Contemporary Foci in Political Theory." The necessity of condensation has made the book one which will be "tough going" for the beginning student, but once he has mastered it he will be well equipped to analyze the nature of his subject in a scholarly and responsible manner.

Marx and the Marxists: The Ambiguous Legacy. By SIDNEY HOOK. (Princeton, N. J., New York, Toronto, and London: D. Van Nostrand Co., Inc., 1955. Pp. 254. $1.25.)

A useful collection of readings covering selections from the writings of socialist leaders from Marx to Stalin. The inclusion of selections by Kautsky, Bernstein, Trotsky, and Luxemburg is commendable since these authors are frequently neglected with the result that students are often given a distorted picture of socialist development based on the writings of Marx, Lenin, and Stalin alone. Sidney Hook has contributed an excellent introductory essay which succinctly covers and evaluates the history of the Marxist movement.

The Communist Manifesto with Selections from The Eighteenth Brumaire of Louis Bonaparte and Capital by Karl Marx. By KARL MARX AND FRIEDRICH ENGELS. EDITED BY SAMUEL H. BERN. (New York: Appleton-Century-Crofts, Inc. 1955. Pp. xxix, 96. $0.45.)

The Crofts Classics Series makes available in this edition the text of the Communist Manifesto, together with Engel's Preface to the English Edition of 1888 and selections from Marx's Capital and the Eighteenth Brumaire of Louis Bonaparte. A brief introductory essay by the editor deals with the major facets of Marx's economic and social analysis.

Mutual Aid: A Factor of Evolution. By PETER

KROPOTKIN. (Boston, Mass.: Extending Horizons Books. 1955. Pp. 362. $3.00.)

This edition is the first in a series of volumes, both ~~prints~~ <sup>prints</sup> and new works, to be published by Extending Horizons. It includes a Foreword by Ashley Montagu and, as an appendix, Thomas H. Huxley's The Struggle for Existence, to which Mutual Aid was a reply.

Politics and Science BY WILLIAM ESSLINGER. FOREWORD BY ALBERT EINSTEIN. (New York: Philosophical Library. 1955. Pp. xi, 167. $3.00.)

The author's contention is that political science as a discipline has failed to keep abreast of the technical advances of the physical sciences. The author therefore appeals for the application of the methods of pure science to the study of politics in order that political leaders may have a firm factual basis on which to construct their solutions to current problems. If such a science of politics can be developed, and the author thinks it can, the possibilities of dealing rationally with current international tensions leading to the achievement of a lasting peace will be greatly increased.

Patterns of a New Philosophy. By FREDERICK MATER AND FRANK E. BROWER. (Washington, D. C.: Public Affairs Press. 1955. Pp. vi, 112. $2.25.)

This is a criticism of contemporary philosophy for being too concerned with the theory of knowledge and with metaphysics whereas, according to the authors, it should turn its attention to the establishment of a rationalistic basis for the orientation of man to the complexities of the twentieth century. There would be general agreement with the authors' criticisms and with their attack upon the "professionalization" of philosophy. However, when the work attempts to lay down a constructive program under the slogan of a "Creed for Our Times" the results are unsatisfying. This is due in part to the shortness of the work and also to a lack of hard thinking upon the authors' part. The book emerges as a series of loosely connected chapters which fail to inspire conviction in the reader.—H.M.M.

Fredonia's Holy Light. By MERRIMON CUNNINGHAM. (New York: Harper & Bros. 1955. Pp. xi, 112. $2.75.)

Based on a series of lectures delivered by the author at various American universities, the thesis is advanced that freedom in America is rooted in religious freedom. Hence all freedom is ultimately based on moral responsibility which tempers the exercise of rights by reminding us of our duties to society as a whole. To preserve our religious freedom we must seek a "middle way" between a rigid separation of church and state and their intermingling in such a way as to result in the domination of one by the other. We must likewise safeguard the right to freedom of worship and recognize the "supremacy of conscience."

Essays in Political and Intellectual History. By SAMUEL BERNSTEIN. (New York: Paine-Whitman Publishers. 1955. Pp. 224. $4.00.)

A collection of previously published essays, here revised, and augmented by two new ones, all dealing either with aspects of French revolutionary movements or related phenomena such as British Jacobinism and the First International. Several of the essays deal with American reaction to events in France and the interrelation of French and American thought. The period covered is roughly from the French Revolution to the Paris Commune. The bibliographical notes are of value.

Social Science: An Introduction to the Study of Society. By ELGIN F. HUNT WITH CHAPTERS BY NORMAN HILL AND THOMAS S. FARR. (New York: The Macmillan Company. 1955. Pp. xv, 741. $6.90.)

A textbook with sections on social, economic, and political organization and problems, and ending with one on international relations.

Gateway to the Social Sciences. By ARTHUR W. THOMPSON. (New York: Henry Holt Company. 1955. Pp. viii, 371. $2.90.)

A book of readings for the introductory general education course in social sciences built around the concept of institutions, and seeking to illustrate their nature, evolution, interrelationships, and problems.

The Political Writings of James Harrington: Representative Selections. EDITED WITH AN INTRODUCTION BY CHARLES BLITZER. (New York: The Liberal Arts Press. 1955. Pp. xli, 165. $2.25.)

This compilation contains the complete text of Harrington's System of Politics, extensive and well-chosen selections from his Commonwealth of Oceana, and the major portion of The Rota, together with a chronology, introductory essay and selected bibliography.

The Levellers: A History of the Writings of Three Seventeenth-Century Social Democrats: John Lilburne, Richard Overton, William Walwyn. By JOSEPH FRANK. (Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press. 1955. Pp. 345. $5.00.)

A thorough analysis of the writings of the principal Levellers together with chapters on "The Ancestry of the Levellers" and "The Contribution of the Leveller Party." An exhaustive array of sources was examined.

SELECTED ARTICLES AND DOCUMENTS ON POLITICAL THEORY

FRANCIS G. WILSON
University of Illinois

History and Criticism

Ahlstrom, Sydney E. The Scottish Philosophy and American Theology. Church History. September, 1955.

Altheim, Franz. Asiatischer Feudalismus: Zur Geschichte des Sassanidenreiches. Merkur. October, 1955.

Artola, Miguel. La Disusión de la Ideología Revolucionaria en los Orígenes del Liberalismo Español. Arbor. July-August, 1955.

Barker, Felix. The Life and Strange Death of Eleanor Marx. Cornhill. Autumn, 1955.

Blanes, Francisco Guil. La Filosofía en el Perú del XVII. Estudios Americanos. August, 1955.

Blet, Pierre. L'Article du Tiers aux États Généraux de 1614. Revue d'Histoire Moderne et Contemporaine. April-June, 1955.

Blumenskrantz, B. Deux Compilations Canoniques de Florus de Lyon et l'Action Antijuive d'Agobard. Revue Historique de Droit Français et Étranger. 33/2. 1955.

Bobbio, N. Benedetto Croce e il Liberalismo. Rivista di Filosofia. July, 1955.

Bobbio, N. Libertà e Potere. Nuovi Argomenti. May-June, 1955.

Boer, W. den. Religion and Literature in Hadrian's Policy. Mnem. osyne. VIII/2. 1955.

Boer, Wolfgang de. Cusanus und Das Gesetz der Existenz. Merkur. October, 1955.

Boyance, P. Sur la Théologie de Varron. Revue des Études Anciennes. LVII/1-2. 1955.

Brant, Irving. John W. Eppes, John Randolph, and Henry Adams. Virginia Magazine. July, 1955.

Chacho, C. J. The "Arthasastra" of Kautilya. Indo-Asian Culture. October, 1954.

Cherpak, Clifton. Warburton and the Encyclopédie. Comparative Literature. Summer, 1955.

Cicero. [Various Articles.] Gymnasium. 62/4. 1955.

Cohen, Gustave. Le Caractère Européen de la Civilisation Occidentale au Moyen-Age. Les Cahiers de Bruges. June, 1955.

Cohen, Victor. Lamennais. Quarterly Review. October, 1955.

Composto, Renato. Le Teorie Sociali dell' Abate Mably. Bejagor. July, 1955.

Coppola, Nunzio. Un' Ignorata Difesa della Costituzione Napoletana del 1820-21. Nuova Antologia. October, 1955.

Costanzo, Joseph F. I. Principio Agostiniano di Equilibrio. Humanitas. November, 1954.

Costanzo, Joseph F. La Dottrina Agostiniana sull'Integrità della Natura Umana. Giornale di Metafisica. October, 1954.

Crehan, J. H. The Return to Obedience: New Judgment on Cardinal Pole. Month. October, 1955.

Davies, Godfrey. Milton in 1660. Huntington Library Quarterly. August, 1955.

Day, Hem. Quelques Remarques Bibliographiques sur l'Influence de William Godwin en France. Bulletin of the International Institute of Social History (Amsterdam). No. 1, 1955.

Dehio, L. Um den Deutschen Militarismus. Historische Zeitschrift. August, 1955.

Delgado, Honario. Spranger y el Genio Alemán. Philosophia. No. 19, 1954.

Dorpelen, Andreas. Wilhelmian Germany—A House Divided Against Itself. Journal of Central European Affairs. October, 1955.

Dover, K. J. Anapsothisis in Fifth-Century Athens. Journal of Hellenic Studies. LXXV/1955.

Dudden, A. P. and von Lane, T. H. The RSDLP and Joseph Fels: A Study in Inter-Cultural Contact. American Historical Review. October, 1955.

Figueras, Léo. Quelques Aspects et Quelques Enseignements de l'Activité de Jules Guesde et du Guesdisme. Cahiers du Communisme. October 1955.

Fodor, Heinrich. Der Jakobinismus in Ungarn. Archiv für Kulturgeschichte. 37/2. 1955.

Foreville, Raymonde. La Vocation de La Mennais. Annales de Bretagne. LXI/2. 1954.

Foucher, A. Cicéron et la Nature. Bulletin de l'Association Guillaume Budé. October, 1955.

Furtak, P. N. Godwin's Novels. Essays in Criticism. July, 1955.

Garrigue, François. Goethe et Valéry: Liberté de l'Esprit dans la Personne. La Revue des Lettres Modernes. April-May, 1955.

Gasikowski, Zygmunt J. The Conquest Theory of the Genesis of the Polish State. Speculum. October, 1955.

Gerlich, Alois. Die Reichspolitik des Erzbischofs Oskar von Mainz. Rheinische Vierteljahrsblätter. 39/3-4. 1954.

Geyl, P. Michelet en zijn Franse Revolutie. De Gids. October, 1955.

Girard, Marcel. Positions Politiques d'Emile Zola Jusqu'à l'Affaire Dreyfus. Revue Française de Science Politique. July-September 1955.

Giussio, Lorenzo. El Sentido de la Ciencia Nueva y el Derecho Romano en J. B. Vico. Revista de Estudios Políticos. May-June, 1955.

Godshot, J. Une Première Critique des "Réflexions sur la Révolution Française" de Burke. Annales Historiques de la Révolution Française. July-September, 1955.

Gouhier, H. La Philosophie de l'Histoire d'Auguste Comte. Journal of World History. 11/3. 1955.

Groene, A. J. Two Implications of the Trojan Legend. Greece and Rome. February-June, 1955.

Guillemin, Henri. Les Origines de la Commune: Paris, Août 1870. Les Temps Modernes. September, 1955.

Guilén, José. Cicerón y el Genuino Aticismo. Arbor. July-August, 1955.

Hamilton, J. G. de R. The Pacifism of Thomas Jefferson. Virginia Quarterly Review. Autumn, 1955.

Hart, E. Mably et Ses Contemporains. Revue des Sciences Humaines. July-September, 1955.

Harrison, A. R. W. Law-Making at Athens at the End of the Fifth Century. Journal of Hellenic Studies. LXXV/1955.

Hartung, F. Der Aufgeklärte Absolutismus. Historische Zeitschrift. August, 1955.

Haskins, George L. Executive Justice and the Rule of Law: Some Reflections on Thirteenth-Century England. Speculum. October, 1955.

Heberle, Rudolf. Ferdinand Tönnies' Contribution to the Sociology of Political Parties. American Journal of Sociology. November, 1955.

Hermanns, Will. Josef Görres. Rheinische Vierteljahrsblätter. 19/3-4. 1954.

Hess, Whitcomb M. The Death of Sören Kierkegaard. Catholic World. November, 1955.

Holmer, Paul L. Kierkegaard and Religious Propositions. Journal of Religion. July, 1955.

Hooykaas, R. Thomas Digges' Puritanism. Archives Internationales d'Histoire des Sciences. April-June, 1955.

Hughes, H. Stuart. The Aftermath of the Risorgimento in Four Successive Interpretations. American Historical Review. October, 1955.

Irazusta, Julio. Pedro de Angelis, Vocero de Rosas. Estudios Americanos. May, 1955.

Jackson, Gabriel. The Origins of Spanish Anarchism. Southwestern Social Science Quarterly. September, 1955.

Jacoby, E. G. Ferdinand Tönnies, Sociologist. Kyklos. VIII/2. 1955.

Jobet, Julio César. José Victorino Lastarria y la Democracia en Chile. Atenea. May, 1955.

Joly, R. Saint Augustin et l'Intolérance Religieuse. Revue Belge de Philologie et d'Histoire. XXXIII/2. 1955.

Jones, A. H. M. Imperial and Senatorial Jurisdiction in the Early Principate. Historia. III/4. 1954-55.

Kierkegaard. [Various Articles.] La Table Ronde. November, 1955.

Kierkegaard. [Various Articles.] Orbis Litterarum. X/1-2. 1955.

Kliger, Samuel. Emerson and the Usable Anglo-Saxon Past. Journal of the History of Ideas. October, 1955.

Kluxen, K. Politik und Heilsgeschehen bei Bossuet. Historische Zeitschrift. June, 1955.

Kusch, Horst. Friede als Ausgangspunkt der Staatstheorie des Marsilius Von Padua. Das Altertum. 1/2. 1955.

Lana, Italo. La Libertà nel Mondo Antico. Revista di Filologia. XXXIII/1. 1955.

Lener, S., Ignazio di Loyola Legislatore Santo e Geniale. La Civiltà Cattolica. October 1, 1955.

Lenoir, Raymond. Emile Littré y la Revista de Filosofía Positiva. Revista Mexicana de Sociología. January-April, 1955.

Leroy, Maxime. El Bicentenario de la

Muerte de Montesquieu. Cuadernos Americanos. September-October, 1955.

Loftis, John. The London Theaters in Early Eighteenth-Century. Huntington Library Quarterly. August, 1955.

Lomas, Charles W. Dennis Kearney: Case Study in Demagoguery. Quarterly Journal of Speech. October, 1955.

Luthera, V. P. Ancient Indian Polity. Modern Review. July, 1955.

Malraux, André. On Saint-Just. Partisan Review. Fall, 1955.

Maffach, Jorge. Santayana y D'Ors. Cuadernos Americanos. September-October, 1955.

Maravall, Jose Antonio. El Pensamiento Político en España a Comienzos del Siglo XIX: Martínez Marina. Revista de Estudios Políticos. May-June, 1955.

Marias, Julian. La Métaphysique d'Ortega y Gasset. Cahiers du Sud. No. 330, 1955.

Massignon, Louis. Un Vœu et un Destin: Marie Antoinette, Reine de France. Les Lettres Nouvelles. September, 1955.

McLaughlin, Mary M. Paris Masters of the Thirteenth and Fourteenth Centuries and Ideas of Intellectual Freedom. Church History. September, 1955.

McRae, Robert. The Two Moralities of Spinoza. University of Toronto Quarterly. October, 1955.

Menczer, Béla. Germany, Austria and Central Europe. Quarterly Review. October, 1955.

Messina, G. Il Monarca-dio e l'Autocrazia. La Civiltà Cattolica. October 15, 1955.

Messineo, Antonio. Libertà e Socialità nel Pensiero di Rosmini. Idea. December, 1954.

Milhau, René. Salut Historique ou Salut Noétique. [Spinoza]. Revue de Métaphysique et de Morale. January-June, 1955.

Moore, Carlisle. Sartor Resartus and the Problem of Carlyle's "Conversion." PMLA. September, 1955.

Muñoz Pérez, Jose. Los Proyectos sobre España e Indias en el Siglo XVIII: El Proyecto Como Género. Revista de Estudios Políticos. May-June, 1955.

Murdock, Kenneth B. Clio in the Wilderness: History and Biography in Puritan New England. Church History. September, 1955.

Naniwada, Haruo. Smith-Hegel-Marx. Zeitschrift für die Gesamte Staatswissenschaft. III/3. 1955.

Nohn, Ernst August. Clausewitz in America. Neues Abendland. October, 1955.

Norling, Bernard. Contemporary English

Catholics and the Policies of James II. Mid-America. October, 1955.

Oliver, James H. Freeman and Dediticii. American Journal of Philology. July, 1955.

Origo, Iris. The Domestic Enemy: The Eastern Slaves in Tuscany in the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Centuries. Speculum. July, 1955.

Ottaway, A. K. C. The Educational Sociology of Emile Durkheim. British Journal of Sociology. September, 1955.

Padover, Saul K. George Washington—Portrait of a True Conservative. Social Research. Summer, 1955.

Parra-Peréz, C. La Monarquía en la Gran Colombia. Revista Nacional de Cultura. May-June, 1955.

Perkins, Merle L. Documentation of Saint-Pierre's Projet de Paix Perpetuelle. Modern Language Quarterly. September, 1955.

Pettazoni, Raffaele. The Spirit of Paganism. Diogenes. No. 9, 1955.

Pflug, Gunther. Die Kritik Hippolyte Taines an der Spiritualistischen Philosophie. Deutsche Vierteljahrsschrift für Literaturwissenschaft und Geistesgeschichte. 29/3. 1955.

Popkin, Richard H. The Skeptical Precursors of David Hume. Philosophy and Phenomenological Research. September, 1955.

Prakash, Buddha. The Hindu Philosophy of History. Journal of the History of Ideas. October, 1955.

Raman, K. V. Edmund Burke and India. Modern Review. August, 1955.

Rath, R. John. The Viennese Liberals of 1848 and the Nationality Problem. Journal of Central European Affairs. October, 1955.

Reichard, Hugo M. The Independence of Pope as a Political Satirist. Journal of English and German Philology. July, 1955.

Rossi, Giuseppe Carlo. Jovellanos nella Storia del "Despotismo Illustrato" in Spagna. Filologia Romanza. April-June, 1955.

Rostand, Jean. Montesquieu et la Biologie. Revue d'Histoire des Sciences. April-June, 1955.

Roth, Cecil. Were the Sephardim Hidalgos? Commentary. August, 1955.

Roux, René. Puritanism and Democracy. Diogenes. No. 9, 1955.

Ruy, Chaix. Sociología y Psicología de la Vida Social en la Obra de Ibn Jaldun. Revista Mexicana de Sociología. January-April, 1955.

Schottlaender, Rudolf. Epikureisches bei Seneca. Philologus. 99/1-2. 1955.

Sciaccia, Michele Federico. Il Criterio di Verità e lo Storicismo di Vico. Philosophia (Argentina). No. 18, 1953.

Sealey, Raphael. Athens After the Social War. Journal of Hellenic Studies. LXXV/1955.

Smeyers, S. E. Politics and Morality in Cicero. Phoenix. Autumn, 1955.

Smith, Wilson. Lieber's Moral Philosophy. Huntington Library Quarterly. August, 1955.

Sorci, M. A. Proposito di uno Scritto Politico del 401-400 a.C.: Il repl. nolurelas. Revista di Filologia. XXXIII/2. 1955.

Sorenson, Lloyd R. Charles A. Beard and German Historiographical Thought. Mississippi Valley Historical Review. September, 1955.

Spike, Lewis W. Natural Law and the Theory of History in Herder. Journal of the History of Ideas. October, 1955.

Storall, Floyd. Walt Whitman and the American Tradition. Virginia Quarterly Review. Autumn, 1955.

Sullivan, Francis A. Roman Anti-Militarism. Classical Journal. October, 1955.

Tenck, Allan. The Dark Age of Medieval Jewry. Commentary. September, 1955.

Thompson, Kenneth W. Toynbee's Approach to History Reviewed. Ethics. July, 1955.

Valensi, Leo. Lectures de Antonio Labriola aux Socialistes Allemands et Français (1890-1900). Bulletin of the International Institute of Social History (Amsterdam). No. 2, 1954.

Vreska, Karl. Patons Demokratenkapitel. Gymnasium. 62/5. 1955.

Whitfield, J. H. On Machiavelli's use of Order. Italian Studies. X/1955.

Wierda, R. Het Tragische Element in Het Leven van Charles Péguy. De Gids. July, 1955.

Wissner, Bruno. Il Centenario di Antonio Rosmini. B Uagor. September, 1955.

Williams, Frank B. Public Reaction to the Poll Tax as a Suffrage Requirement in Mississippi, 1894-1905. Journal of Mississippi History. October, 1955.

Yotcen, John W. Locke and the Seventeenth-Century Logic of Ideas. Journal of the History of Ideas. October, 1955.

Legal Theory and Public Law Issues

Ass, Augustin de. La Filosofía del Derecho en Hispanoamérica. Estudios Americanos. May, 1955.

Beam, S. J. The Uses of Sovereignty. Political Studies. June, 1955.

Berman, Harold J. Soviet Justice and Soviet Tyranny. Columbia Law Review. June, 1955.

Brown, Stuart Gerry. Politics and Mr. Crockett's Constitution I. Syracuse Law Review. Spring, 1955.

Brownell, Herbert, Jr. John Marshall, "The Chief Justice." Cornell Law Quarterly. Fall, 1955.

Brownell, Herbert, Jr. Separation of Powers: Executive and Legislative Branches. Dickinson Law Review. October, 1955.

Burke, Edward M. Marriage, the Chancery Court, and the Catholic Church. De Paul Law Review. Summer, 1955.

Casiello, Juan. La Justicia Social Como Instrumento del Estado. Cuadernos Periodicos. (Buenos Aires). No. 6, 1955.

Chroust, Anton-Herman. The Legal Profession in Ancient Imperial Rome. Notre Dame Lawyer. August, 1955.

Crane, Judson A. Constitutionality of Testamentary Racial or Religious Restraints on Marriage. Hastings Law Journal. April, 1955.

Fifth Amendment. [Various Articles.] Nebraska Law Review. May, 1955.

García Gallo, Alfonso. El Derecho Común Ante el Nuevo Mundo. Revista de Estudios Políticos. March-April, 1955.

Guins, George C. Towards an Understanding of Soviet Law. Soviet Studies. July, 1955.

Hays, Paul R. Congress' Right to Investigate. Commentary. November, 1955.

Hazard, John N. Soviet Commentators Re-Evaluate the Policies of Criminal Law. Columbia Law Review. June, 1955.

Levy, Beryl H. The Common Law and Individual Freedom. Social Research. Summer, 1955.

L'Huillier, Jean. Défense du Positivisme Juridique. Revue de Droit Public et de la Science Politique. October-December, 1954.

Maslow, Will. The Uses of Law in the Struggle for Equality. Social Research. Autumn, 1955.

Natural Law: Symposium: The Natural Law and the Family. Fordham Law Review. Spring, 1955.

Pfeffer, Leo. Religion in the Upbringing of Children. Boston University Law Review. June, 1955.

Seiter, Francis J. Revision of the United Nations Charter: A Natural Law Approach. De Paul Law Review. Summer, 1955.

Silving, Helen. The Twilight Zone of Positive and Natural Law. California Law Review. July, 1955.

Vestal, Allan D. Freedom of Movement. Iowa Law Review. Fall, 1955.

Weihofen, Henry. Crime, Law, and Psychiatry. New Mexico Quarterly. Summer-Autumn, 1955.

Williams, C. Dickerman. Problems of the Fifth Amendment. Fordham Law Review. Spring, 1955.

Special Studies and Analysis

Amoun, Alfred. Röpkes Internationale Ordnung. Kyklos. VIII/2. 1955.

Anderle, Othmar. The Revolution in the World-View of History. Diogenes. No. 9, 1955.

Andersch, Alfred. Thomas Mann et la Politique. Documents. September, 1955.

Arnold, G. L. Collectivism Reconsidered. Dissent. Autumn, 1955.

Arnold, G. L. Communism and the Intelligentsia in Backward Areas. Problems of Communism. September-October, 1955.

Asirvatham, E. Study of Political Science in India. Indian Journal of Political Science. January-March, 1955.

Ayer, A. J. Philosophy at Absolute Zero. Encounter. October, 1955.

Barr, Stringfellow. Liberal Education: A Common Adventure. Antioch Review. Fall, 1955.

Bernard, L. Leon. Molière and the Historian of French Society. Review of Politics. October, 1955.

Birch, Cyril. Chao Shu-Li: Creative Writing in a Communist State. New Mexico Quarterly. Summer-Autumn, 1955.

Birnbaum, N. Monarchs and Sociologists. Sociological Review. July, 1955.

Blanshard, Brand. The Impasse in Ethics and a Way Out. University of California Publications in Philosophy. Vol. 28, No. 2. 1955.

Bortolaso, G. La Filosofia di Gabriel Marcel. La Civiltà Cattolica. July 2, 1955.

Boulouis, Jean. Humanisme et Démocratie. Revue de la Méditerranée. July-August, 1955.

Braybrooke, David. Farewell to the New Welfare Economics. Review of Economic Studies. XXII/3. 1954-55.

Brown, Stuart G. Democracy, the New Conservatism, and The Liberal Tradition in America. Ethics. October, 1955.

Brugmans, H. Morte de la Culture Latine? Les Cahiers de Bruges. June, 1955.

Brüning, Walther. Das Menschenbild in der Heutigen Philosophie. Universitas. August, 1955.

Brunschwig, Henri. Colonial Imperialism. Confluence. July, 1955.

Calhoun, R. L. Moral Obligation and Religious Conviction. Confluence. July, 1955.

Champigny, Robert. Sens de la Nausée. PMLA. March, 1955.

Clark, Colin. The Soviet Crisis. Encounter. August, 1955.

Coolidge, Mary L. The Experimental Temper in Contemporary European Philosophy. Journal of Philosophy. September 1, 1955.

Crick, Bernard. The Strange Quest for an American Conservatism. Review of Politics. July, 1955.

Demos, Raphael. Jung's Thought and Influence. Review of Metaphysics. September, 1955.

Derisi, Octavio Nicolas. Lo Absoluto y lo Relativo en el Conocimiento Humano. Philosophia (Argentina). No. 19, 1954.

Dubarle, D. Les Chrétiens et l'Opium des Intellectuels. La Vie Intellectuelle. August-September, 1955.

DuBridge, Lee A. The American Scientist: 1955. Yale Review. Autumn, 1955.

Earle, William and Others. Freedom and Existence: A Symposium. Review of Metaphysics. September, 1955.

Eastman, Max. L'Itinéraire New York-Moscou et Retour. Preuves. November, 1955.

Eby, Kermit. Political Morality and the Business Man. Religion in Life. Summer, 1955.

Eck, Marcel. Psychoanalyse der Gewaltlosigkeit. Dokumente. June, 1955.

Ellis, John Tracy. American Catholics and the Intellectual Life. Thought. Autumn, 1955.

Fall, Bernard B. The Political-Religious Sects of Viet-Nam. Pacific Affairs. September, 1955.

Fichter, P. J. H. La Religión Como Institución en los Estados Unidos. Revista de Estudios Políticos. March-April, 1955.

Freund, Ludwig. The New Conservatism and European Conservatism. Ethics. October, 1955.

Frisch, Alfred. Nach dem Kapitalismus—die Technokratie. Dokumente. June, 1955.

Fromm, Erich. The Human Implications of Instinctive "Radicalism." Dissent. Autumn, 1955.

Gahringer, Robert E. Liberalism and Humanism. Ethics. October, 1955.

Gideonse, Harry D. Academic Freedom: A Decade of Challenge and Clarification. Annals. September, 1955.

Giracét, Raoul. Note Sur l'Esprit d'un Fascisme Français. Revue Française de Science Politique. July-September, 1955.

Glaser, William A. The Types and Uses of Political Theory. Social Research. Autumn, 1955.

Gordon, Paul J. Aspectos Estructurales del Orden Social Cristiano. Cuadernos de Política Social. No. 25, 1955.

Grass, Robert. Greek Myth and Pseudo Myths. Hudson Review. Summer, 1955.

Grundmann, Herbert. Neue Beiträge zur Geschichte der Religiösen Bewegung in Mittelalter. Archiv für Kulturgeschichte. 37/2. 1955.

Hall, Walter F. The Socialist Party of Austria: Retreat from Marx. Journal of Central European Affairs. July, 1955.

Hampshire, Stuart. In Defence of Radicalism. Frieze. August, 1955.

Harzer, Arnold. Der Begriff der Zeit in der Neuen Kunst und Wissenschaft. Merkur. September, 1955.

Harrington, Michael. Die Dritte Revolutionierung der Arbeit. Frankfurter Hefte. July, 1955.

Harsanyi, John C. Cardinal Welfare, Individualistic Ethics, and Interpersonal Comparisons of Utility. Journal of Political Economy. August, 1955.

Hertt, Julian N. The Philosopher, the Prophet, and the Church. Journal of Religion. July 1955.

Hirstader, Richard. The Pseudo-Conservative Revolt. Perspectives. No. 12, 1955.

Hughes Merritt Y. A Meditation on Literary Blasphemy. Journal of Aesthetics and Art Criticism. September, 1955.

Johnson, Eldon L. The Capacity to Govern. Western Political Quarterly. September, 1955.

Jourdain, Bertrand de. The Mover and the Adjuster. Diogenes. No. 9, 1955.

Jourdain, Bertrand de. Reflections on Colonialism. Confluence. October, 1955.

Joynt, J. B. and Hayden, S. S. Morals and Politics: The Current Debate. Canadian Journal of Economics and Political Science. August, 1955.

Kariel Henry S. The New Order of Mary Parker Follett. Western Political Quarterly. September, 1955.

Katzenbach, E. L. and Hanrahan, G. Z. The Revolutionary Strategy of Mao Tse-tung. Political Science Quarterly. September, 1955.

Kaufmann, Walter. Toynbee and Super-History. Partisan Review. Fall, 1955.

Kelsen, Hans. Foundations of Democracy. Ethics. October, 1955, Part II.

Kennan, George F. Commencement, 1955. Social Research. Summer, 1955.

Kirk, Russell. The Death of Art: Ehrenberg's Shaw. Dublin Review. Third Quarter, 1955.

Kirk, Russell. John Locke Reconsidered. Month. November, 1955.

Kline, George L. A Philosophical Critique of Soviet Marxism. Review of Metaphysics. September, 1955.

Knoll, Ernst. Dei Sozialethischen und Rechtlichen Wandlungen in der Beurteilung des Armenwesens. Zeitschrift für die Gesamte Staatswissenschaft. III/3. 1955.

Land, Philip S. Practical Wisdom and Social Order. Social Order. November, 1955.

Le Blond, Jean-Marie. Der Soziale Aspekt des Zeitgenössischen Atheismus. Dokumente. June, 1955.

Le Blond, J-M. Le Sens de l'Histoire et l'Action Politique. Études. November, 1955.

Lefort, Claude. L'Aliénation Comme Concept Sociologique. Cahiers Internationaux de Sociologie. January-June, 1955.

Lekachman, Robert. Our "Revolution" in Income Distribution. Commentary. August, 1955.

Lener, S. Stato, Regime, Partiti Politici. La Civiltà Cattolica. September 3, 1955; October 15, 1955.

Lentin, Paul. Pseudo-Revolution, Pseudo-Christentum und Romantische Restauration. Frankfurter Hefte. August, 1955.

LeRoy, Gaylord C. The New Conservatism. Bulletin, A.A.U.P. Summer, 1955.

Lévy-Bruhl, Henri. Le Mythe de l'Égalité Juridique. Cahiers Internationaux de Sociologie. January-June, 1955.

Loveday, Arthur F. Spain: The Loss of a Friend. Quarterly Review. October, 1955.

Luthy, Herbert. The Intellectuals: France. Encounter. August, 1955.

Lytle, Scott H. Croce e il Metodo Storico. Nuova Antologia. September, 1955.

Mackenzie, W. J. M. Political Theory and Political Education. Universities Quarterly. August, 1955.

Mandelbaum, Maurice. History and Social Theory. Journal of the History of Ideas. October, 1955.

Marco, A. de. Proprietà Capitalistica, Imprenditrice e Lavoratrice. La Civiltà Cattolica. August 20, 1955.

Marcus, John T. Neutralism in France. Review of Politics. July, 1955.

Marien, Francis J. Social and Political Wisdom of Maritain. Social Order. November, 1955.

Markov, Walter. Die Utopie des Citoyen. Aufbau. July, 1955.

Martínez, Fedel G. Autenticidad Filosofía dentro del Pensamiento Cristiano. Arbor. July-August, 1955.

Massenet, M. La Prudence Politique a L'Oeuvre dans la Vie des Cités. Revue Thomiste. LXIII/1. 1955.

Masur, Gerhard. Miguel de Unamuno. Americas. October, 1955.

Medawar, P. B. The Imperfections of Man. Twentieth Century. September, 1955.

Metzger, Walter P. The German Contribution to the American Theory of Academic Freedom. Bulletin, A.A.U.P. Summer, 1955.

Mitford, Nancy. The English Aristocracy. Encounter. September, 1955.

Moore, Barrington. Notes on the Process of Acquiring Power. World Politics. October, 1955.

Moore, Barrington. Sociological Theory and Contemporary Politics. American Journal of Sociology. September, 1955.

Moravia, Alberto. Man as an End in Himself. Confluences. July, 1955.

Morgenthau, Hans J. Reflections on the State of Political Science. Review of Politics. October, 1955.

Mukerji, Krishna P. Some Problems of Methodology in Political Science Research. Indian Journal of Political Science. January-March, 1955.

Mukhopadhyaya, R. Harold Laski and Property. Modern Review. August, 1955.

Murray, John. Church and State in Argentina. Month. September, 1955.

Paniker, Raimundo. Die Sünde der Intellektuellen. Neues Abendland. November, 1955.

Peffer, Nathaniel. Lenin and the Course of Colonial Communism. Yale Review. Autumn, 1955.

Pierrard, André. À Propos de la Gauche des "Temps Modernes." Cahiers du Communisme. September, 1955.

Porre, J.-R. Laïcité et Liberté: Une Entente Possible sur la Question Scolaire. Revue Politique et Parlementaire. October, 1955.

Public Opinion, Pressure Groups, and Voting Behavior. [Various Articles.] British Journal of Sociology. June, 1955.

Reid, Ira deA. Social Protest: Cue and Catharsis. Phylon. Second Quarter, 1955.

Religion and Science. [Various Articles.] Hibbert Journal. October, 1955.

Reynold, Gonzague de. Is Democracy Possible? Dublin Review. Third Quarter, 1955.

Riber, Lorenzo. Humanistas y Cristianos. Boletín de la Real Academia Española. January-April, 1955.

Röpke, Wilhelm. Der Wohlfahrtsstaat im Kreuzfeuer der Kritik. Universitas. September, 1955.

Rosenberg, Harold. Couch Liberalism and the Guilty Past. Dissent. Autumn, 1955.

Rougemont, Denis de. L'Aventure Technique. Preuves. October, 1955.

Samuel, Edwin. State and Religion in Israel. Political Quarterly. October-December, 1955.

Schmitt, Carl. La Tensión Planetaria entre Oriente y Occidente y la Opposición entre Tierra y Mar. Revista de Estudios Políticos. May-June, 1955.

Schnitzer, Ewald W. German Geopolitics Revisited. Journal of Politics. August, 1955.

Schultze, B. Il Senso della Storia nel Pensiero Russo. La Civiltà Cattolica. August 20, 1955.

Schulz, Klaus-Peter. Der Demokratische Sozialismus in Europa. Dokumente. June, 1955.

Schwartz, Benjamin. On the "Originality" of Mao Tse-tung. Foreign Affairs. October, 1955.

Scoppola, Pietro. Le Parti Catholique. Esprit. September-October, 1955.

Segre, Umberto. Le Parti Socialiste Italien. Esprit. September-October, 1955.

Seton-Watson, Hugh. The Intellectuals: Russia. Encounter. September, 1955.

Smith, T. V. Is there a Gresham's Law in Politics? Western Political Quarterly. September, 1955.

Solo, Robert. Prediction, Projection, and Social Prognosis. Journal of Philosophy. August 18, 1955.

Spiegel, Henry W. Theories of Economic Development. Journal of the History of Ideas. October, 1955.

Srivastava, G. P. Communism: Its Programme and Prospects in India. Indian Journal of Political Science. January-March, 1955.

Stearns, Raymond P. A Plea for Political History. Review of Politics. October, 1955.

Steibel, Gerald L. John Dewey and the Belief in Communication. Antioch Review. Fall, 1955.

Struve, C. Chekhov in Communist Censorship. Slovenian and East European Review. June, 1955.

Taborsky, Edward. The Struggle for Stalin's Heritage. Southwestern Social Science Quarterly. September, 1955.

Toulmin S. E. Is There a Fundamental Problem in Ethics? Australasian Journal of Philosophy. May, 1955.

Ullrich, A. R. Towards Tektopia. Twentieth Century. September, 1955.

Ullrich, Adam B. The Historical Role of Marxism and the Soviet System. World Politics. October, 1955.

Veturini, Riccardo. Le Opere di Antonio Gramsci. Rassegna di Filosofia. January-March, 1955.

Viereck, Peter. The Conservative Case against McCarthyism. Pacific Spectator. Summer, 1955.

Viereck, Peter. Symbolism of the New Xenophobia. Southwest Review. Autumn, 1955.

Wagnard Reyna, Alberto. Mito y Misterio. Philosophía (Argentina). No. 19, 1954.

Weil, Ernest. Simone Weil and Metapolitics. Religion in Life. Summer, 1955.

Weird, Leo R. The American Rural Value Pattern. Review of Politics. July, 1955.

Welter, Eugen. Garrison State or Concentration Camp? University of Toronto Quarterly. October, 1955.

Weizel, Gustave. Protestantism as a Catholic Conception. Theological Studies. June, 1955.

Weil, I. Pensée Dialectique et Politique. Revue de Métaphysique et de Morale. January-June, 1955.

Weil, I. E. Religion and Politics. Confluence. July, 1955.

Wiese, Leopold V. Soziale Determinismen und Menschliches Freihert. Kyklos. VMI/2. 1955.

Wilks, Ivor. A Note on Sovereignty. Philosophical Quarterly. October, 1955.

Wilson, Francis G. Public Opinion and the Michel Cass. Review of Politics. October, 1955.

Wright, David McCord. Adventure or Routine. Harvard Business Review. September-October, 1955.

Wu, J. C. H. Christ in Common Law. Catholic World. November, 1955.

Zakín, Taya. Nehruism: India's Revolution Without Fear. Pacific Affairs. September, 1955.

Zoberi, Z. A. Lenin and the Freedom Movement in Viet-Nam. Contemporary Review. October, 1955.

SELECTED ARTICLES AND DOCUMENTS ON METHODOLOGY AND RESEARCH IN THE SOCIAL SCIENCES

HERBERT A. SIMON

Carnegie Institute of Technology

Philosophy of Social Science

Cantril, Hadley. Ethical Relativity from the Transactional Point of View. Journal of Philosophy. November 10, 1955.

Glaser, William A. The Types and Uses of Political Theory. Social Research. Autumn, 1955.

Kluckhohn, Clyde. Ethical Relativity: Sic et Non. Journal of Philosophy. November 10, 1955.

Northrop, F. S. C. Ethical Relativism in the Light of Recent Legal Science. Journal of Philosophy. November 10, 1955.

Oppenheim, Felix E. In Defense of Relativism. Western Political Quarterly. September, 1955.

Research Methods and Organization

Alpert, Harry. The Social Sciences and the National Science Foundation. American Sociological Review. December, 1955.

Lee, Alfred McClung. The Clinical Study of Society. American Sociological Review. December, 1955.

Lundberg, George A. The Natural Science Trend in Sociology. American Journal of Sociology. November, 1955.

Stigler, George J. The Nature and Role of Originality in Scientific Progress. Economica. November, 1955.

Motivation and Personality

Diesing, Paul. Noneconomic Decision-Making. Ethics. October, 1955.

Floro, George K. Continuity in City-Manager Careers. American Journal of Sociology. November, 1955.

Kerckhoff, Alan C. and McCormick, Thomas C. Marginal Status and Marginal Personality. Social Forces. October, 1955.

Lasswell, Harold D. Current Studies of the Decision Process: Automation versus Creativity. Western Political Quarterly. September, 1955.

Leavitt, Harold J.; Hax, Herbert; and Roche, James H. "Authoritarianism" and Agreement with Things Authoritative. Journal of Psychology. October, 1955.

Miner, J. B. and Culver, J. E. Some Aspects of the Executive Personality. Journal of Applied Psychology. October, 1955.

Sarbin, Theodore and Jones, Donal S. The Assessment of Role-Expectations in the Selection of Supervisory Personnel. Educational and Psychological Measurement. Autumn, 1955.

Siegel, Bernard J. High Anxiety Levels and Cultural Integration. Social Forces. October, 1955.

Opinions and Attitudes

Brayfield, Arthur H. and Crockett, Walter H. Employee Attitudes and Employee Performance. Psychological Bulletin. September, 1955.

Gold, David. The Statistical Lie Detector: an Application to Possibly Evasive Responses in a Voting Behavior Study. American Sociological Review. October, 1955.

Kelly, Harold H. Salience of Membership and Resistance to Change of Group-Anchored Attitudes. Human Relations. August, 1955.

Wagman, Morton. Attitude Change and Authoritarian Personality. Journal of Psychology. July, 1955.

Weiss, Walter and Fine, Bernard J. Opinion Change as a Function of Some Intrapersonal Attributes of the Communicatees. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology. September, 1955.

Group Behavior, General

Bennett, Edith Becker. Discussion, Decision, Commitment and Consensus in "Group Decision." Human Relations. August, 1955.

Block, Jack and Bennett, Lillian. The Assessment of Communication. Human Relations. August, 1955.

Gibb, Cecil A. Classroom Behavior of the College Teacher. Educational and Psychological Measurement. Autumn, 1955.

Holmberg, Allan R. Participant Intervention in the Field. Human Organization. Spring, 1955.

Kriesberg, Louis. Occupational Controls among Steel Distributors. American Journal of Sociology. November, 1955.

Landsberger, Henry A. Interaction Process Analysis of Professional Behavior: A Study of Labor Mediators in Twelve Labor-Management Disputes. American Sociological Review. October, 1955.

Medalia, Nahum Z. Authoritarianism, Leader Acceptance and Group Cohesion. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology. September, 1955.

Pepitone, Albert and Reichling, George. Group Cohesiveness and the Expression of Hostility. Human Relations. August, 1955.

Rosenberg, Seymour; Erlick, Dwight E.; and Barkowitz, Leonard. Some Effects of Varying Combinations of Group Members on Group Performance Measures and Leadership Behaviors. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology. September, 1955.

Sagi, Philip C.; Olmsted, Donald W.; and Atelsek, Frank. Predicting Maintenance of Membership in Small Groups. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology. September, 1955.

Organizational Behavior

Comrey, Andrew L.; High, Wallace S.; and Goldberg, Lisbeth L. Factored Dimensions of Organizational Behavior I. Field Service Workers. Educational and Psychological Measurement. Autumn, 1955.

Fiedler, Fred E. The Influence of Leader-Keyman Relations on Combat Crew Effectiveness. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology. September, 1955.

Hetzler, Stanley A. Variations in Role-Playing Patterns among Different Echelons of Bureaucratic Leaders. American Sociological Review. December, 1955.

Lawrence, L. C. and Smith, P. C. Group Decision and Employee Participation. Journal of Applied Psychology. October, 1955.

Seligman, Lester J. Developments in the Presidency and the Conception of Presidential Leadership. American Sociological Review. December, 1955.

Sofer, Cyril. Reactions to Administrative Change. Human Relations. August, 1955.

Suojanen, Waino W. The Span of Control—Fact or Fable? Advanced Management. November, 1955.

Turner, Arthur N. Interaction and Sentiment in the Foreman-Worker Relationship. Human Organisation. Spring, 1955.

Weiss, R. S. and Jacobson, E. The Structure of Complex Organizations. American Sociological Review. December, 1955.

Voting Behavior

Eulitz, Feins. Class Identification and Projection in Voting Behavior. Western Political Quarterly. September, 1955.

Ma Rae, Duncan Jr. Some Underlying Variables in Legislative Roll Call Votes. Public Opinion Quarterly. Summer, 1954.

Culture and Institutions

Bernard, Jessie. Dimensions and Axes of Supreme Court Decisions. Social Forces. October, 1955.

Dykes, Russell R. Church-Sect Typology and Socio-Economic Status. American Sociological Review. October, 1955.

Essey, Marten S. The Strategic Alliance as a Factor in Union Growth. Industrial and Labor Relations Review. October, 1955.

Griffith, Joseph R. Social Structure and Moral Reform: A Study of the WCTU. American Journal of Sociology. November, 1955.

Haer, John L. The Classification Technique of Warner and Centers. American Sociological Review. December, 1955.

Haer, John L. A Test of the Unidimensionality of the Index of Status Characteristics. Social Forces. October, 1955.

Kimball, Solon T. and Pearsall, Marion. Event Analysis as an Approach to Community Study. Social Forces. October, 1955.

Moore, Barrington Jr. Notes on the Process of Acquiring Power. World Politics. October, 1955.

Schlesinger, Lawrence E. Prediction of Newspaper Bias. Journal of Social Psychology. August, 1955.

Stetkin, J. S. Culture and Psychopathology. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology. September, 1955.

Value Theory and Social Policy

Eggin, Benjamin. Economic Development of Underdeveloped Areas: Past and Present. Land Economics. August, 1955.

Err, Clark; Harbison, Frederick H.; Dunlop, John T.; and Myers, Charles A. The Labor Problem in Economic Development. International Labour Review. March, 1955.

Latson, Floyd W. Social Welfare and Personal Liberty: The Problem of Casework. Social Research. Autumn, 1955.

OTHER BOOKS RECEIVED

- ABBOTT, LAWRENCE. Quality and Competition: An Essay in Economic Theory. New York: Columbia University Press. 1955. Pp. ix, 229. $3.75.
- ABRAMS, CHARLES. Forbidden Neighbors: A Study of Prejudice in Housing. New York: Harper & Brothers. 1955. Pp. xi, 403. $5.00.
- ALTON, THAD PAUL. Polish Postwar Economy. New York: Columbia University Press. 1955. Pp. xv, 330. $5.75.
- L'Année Politique, 1954*. Paris: Presses Universitaires de France. 1955. Pp. xv, 706.
- ARZE, WALTER GUEVARA. Plan Inmediato de Política Económica del Gobierno de la Revolución Nacional. La Paz, Bolivia: Universidad Mayor de "San Andres." 1955. Pp. 135.
- ATAMIAN, SARKIS. The Armenian Community: The Historical Development of a Social and Ideological Conflict. New York: Philosophical Library. 1955. Pp. 479. $4.75.
- BABITSKY, PAUL AND RIMBERG, JOHN. The Soviet Film Industry. New York: Frederick A. Praeger. 1955. Pp. xi, 377. $5.50.
- BECKWITH, BURNHAM PUTNAM. Marginal-Cost Price-Output Control: A Critical History and Restatement of the Theory. New York: Columbia University Press. 1955. Pp. viii, 283. $5.75.
- BELOV, FEDOR. The History of a Soviet Collective Farm. New York: Frederick A. Praeger. 1955. Pp. xiii, 237. $5.50.
- BONIFACIĆ, ANTUN F. AND MIHANOVICH, CLEMENT S. (EDS.). The Croatian Nation in Its Struggle for Freedom and Independence. Chicago: "Croatia" Cultural Publishing Center. 1955. Pp. xvi, 441.
- BROWN, HARRY GUNNISON, BUTTENHEIM, HAROLD S., CORNICK, PHILIP H. AND HOOVER, GLENN E. (EDS.). Land-Value Taxation around the World. New York: Robert Schalkenbach Foundation. 1955. Pp. vii, 216. $3.00.
- BUTLER, EWAN. City Divided: Berlin, 1955. New York: Frederick A. Praeger. 1955. Pp. 187. $3.95.
- The 1960 Censuses—How They Were Taken*. Washington, D. C.: U. S. Department of Commerce, The Bureau of the Census. 1955. Pp. vii, 222.
- CHAMBERLAIN, NEIL W. A General Theory of Economic Process. New York: Harper & Brothers. 1955. Pp. viii, 370. $5.00.
- CLAY, HENRY (ED.). The Inter-War Years and Other Papers: A Selection from the Writings of Hubert Douglass Henderson. Oxford: Clarendon Press. 1955. Pp. xxviii, 434. 42s.
- CORTI, EGON CAESAR CONTE. TRANSLATED BY HODGSON, E. M. Alexander Von Battenberg. London: Cassell & Co., Ltd. 1954. Pp. x, 319. $4.80.
- CURTIN, PHILIP D. Two Jamaicas: The Role of Ideas in a Tropical Colony, 1830-1865. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press. 1955. Pp. xii, 270. $4.75.
- DAVIDSON, HENRY A. Handbook of Parliamentary Procedure. New York: The Ronald Press Co. 1955. Pp. xviii, 292. $3.75.
- DICKINSON, JOCELYNE GLEDHILL. The Congress of Arras, 1435: A Study in Medieval Diplomacy. Oxford: Clarendon Press. 1955. Pp. xxii, 266. $6.75.
- DORNEUSCH, SANFORD M. AND SCHMID, CALVIN F. A Primer of Social Statistics. New York, Toronto, and London: McGraw-Hill Book Co., Inc. 1955. Pp. vii, 251.
- DE GAULLE, CHARLES. War Memoirs: The Call to Honour, 1940-1942. New York: The Viking Press. 1955. Pp. viii, 319. $5.00.
- EBERSOLE, LUKE. American Society: An Introductory Analysis. New York, Toronto, and London: McGraw-Hill Book Co., Inc. 1955. Pp. x, 510. $5.50.
- EDMEL, ABRAHAM. Ethical Judgment: The Use of Science in Ethics. Glencoe, Illinois: The Free Press. 1955. Pp. 339. $5.00.
- FARIS, ROBERT E. L. Social Disorganization. New York: The Ronald Press Co. 2nd ed. 1955. Pp. viii, 652. $5.50.
- FIGORE, MICHELE. Welfare of Nations. New York: Philosophical Library. 1955. Pp. 708. $6.00.
- FISHWICK, MARSHALL W. American Heroes: Myth and Reality. Washington, D. C.: Public Affairs Press. 1954. Pp. viii, 242. $3.75.
- FOSTER, WILLIAM Z. History of the Three Internationals: The World Socialist and Communist Movements from 1848 to the Present. New York: International Publishers. 1955. Pp. 580. $6.00.
- GASCON, ANTONIO. La Cooperación y las Cooperativas (Iniciación a su Estudio). Madrid: Cosana. 1954. Pp. 333.
- GAVIN, CATHERINE. Liberated France. New York: St. Martin's Press. 1955. Pp. 292. $5.00.
- GLASER, ABRAM. This World of Ours. New York: Philosophical Library. 1955. Pp. xiii, 492. $5.00.
- GRABNER, NORMAN A. Empire on the Pacific: A Study in American Continental Expansion.

- New York: The Ronald Press Company. 1955. Pp ix, 278. $4.50.
- GREEN, V. H. H. The Later Plantagenets: A Survey of English History between 1307 and 1485. London: Edward Arnold, Ltd. 1955. Pp. 438. $4.00.
- HAGMAN, HARLAN L. AND SCHWARTZ, ALFRED. Administration in Profile for School Executives. New York: Harper & Brothers. 1955. Pp. xiv, $15. $3.50.
- HALL, D. C. E. A History of South-East Asia. New York: St. Martin's Press, Inc. 1955. Pp. 507. $10.00.
- A Handbook on State and Local Taxes*. Washington, D. C.: Congress of Industrial Organizations. Pp. 143. $3.00.
- HANES, STEADMAN SHUMWAY WITH COMMENTS BY HANES, HELEN CHAPPELL. Frontiers Are Not Borders. New York: Coward-McCane, Inc. 1955. Pp. 61. $2.00.
- HAUSDORFF, KARL (ED.). Unser Schlesien. Stuttgart: Karl Mayer. 1954. Pp. 432.
- HOCKETT, HOMER CARY. The Critical Method in Historical Research and Writing. New York: The Macmillan Co. 1955. Pp. xv, 330. $5.00.
- HUMLUM, JOHANNES. Atlas of Economic Geography. London: Meiklejohn & Son., Ltd. 1955. Pp. xii, 126. $2.50.
- HUMPHREY, DON D. American Imports. New York: The Twentieth Century Fund. 1955. Pp. xviii, 546. $6.00.
- INGRAM, KENNETH. History of the Cold War. New York: Philosophical Library. 1955. Pp. 239. $5.00.
- JORDAN, WEYMOUTH T. George Washington Campbell of Tennessee: Western Statesman. Tallahassee: Florida State University. 1955. Pp. x, 214. $3.50.
- KEEN, BENJAMIN (ED.). Readings in Latin-American Civilization, 1492 to the Present. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Co.; Cambridge, Mass.: The Riverside Press. 1955. Pp. ix, 477. $3.60.
- KIRK, GEORGE E. A Short History of the Middle East: From the Rise of Islam to Modern Times. New York: Frederick A. Praeger. 1955. Pp. 292. $4.50.
- KIRK, GRAYSON (INTRO. BY), KETCHUM, RICHARD M. (ED.), ANDERSON, WILL (ART DIR.), AND TRAUERIG, RUTH (PIC. ED.). What Is Communism? New York: E. P. Dutton & Co., Inc. 1955. Pp. 191. $2.95.
- KIRK, GRAYSON (INTRO. BY), KETCHUM, RICHARD M. (ED.), ANDERSON, WILL (ART DIR.), AND TRAUERIG, RUTH (PIC. ED.). What Is Democracy? New York: E. P. Dutton & Co., Inc. 1955. Pp. 161. $2.95.
- KOESLER, ARTHUR. The Trail of the Dinosaur and Other Essays. New York: The Macmillan Co. 1955. Pp. viii, 253. $3.50.
- KUHL, WALTER. Siedlungsgeschichte Oberschlesiens. Würzburg, Germany: Oberschlesischer Heimatverlag GMBH. 1954. Pp. 395.
- KURIEL, M. Czartoryski and European Unity, 1771-1861. Princeton: Princeton University Press. 1955. Pp. xvii, 322. $6.00.
- KUZNETS, SIMON, MOORE, WILBERT E., AND SPENGLE, JOSEPH J. (EDS.). Economic Growth: Brazil, India, Japan. Durham, N. C.: Duke University Press. 1955. Pp. xi, 612. $12.50.
- LABOR RESEARCH ASSOCIATION (PREPARED BY). Labor Fact Book 12. New York: International Publishers. 1955. Pp. 160. $2.50.
- LAMONT, CORLISS. Soviet Civilization. New York: Philosophical Library. 2nd ed. 1955. Pp. xxx, 147. $5.00.
- LARROWE, CHARLES P. Shape-Up and Hiring Hall: A Comparison of Hiring Methods and Labor Relations in the New York and Seattle Workforces. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press. 1955. Pp. ix, 250. $4.50.
- LARSON, ARTHUR. Know Your Social Security. New York: Harper & Brothers. 1955. Pp. xvi, 220. $2.95.
- LENT, THEO. F. Towards a Science of Peace: Turning Point in Human Destiny. New York: Bookman Associates, Inc. 1955. Pp. xiii, 194. $3.00.
- LINDOLM, RICHARD W. Introduction to Fiscal Policy. New York, Toronto, and London: Pitman Publishing Corporation. 2nd ed. 1955. Pp. xiv, 242. $4.00.
- LOCKE, WILLIAM H. AND BOOTH, A. DONALD (EDS.). Machine Translation of Languages: Fourteen Essays. Cambridge, Mass.: The Technology Press of The Massachusetts Institute of Technology; New York: John Wiley & Sons, Inc. 1955. Pp. xii, 243. $6.00.
- LOPE, ROBERT S. AND RAYMOND, IRVING W. Melissa. Trade in the Mediterranean World: Illustrative Documents Translated with Introductions and Notes. New York: Columbia University Press. 1955. Pp. xi, 426. $6.75.
- MALORY, WALTER H. (ED.) Political Handbook of the World: Parliaments, Parties and Press as of January 1, 1955. New York: Harper & Brothers. 1955. Pp. 229. $3.75.
- MANDEL, BERNAED. Labor: Free and Slave. Workmen and the Anti-Slavery Movement in the United States. New York: Associated

- Authors. 1955. Pp. 255. $3.00.
- MARSHALL, WYTHE. Blackstone: Commemoration Ceremonies. Williamsburg, Va.: College of William and Mary. 1954. Pp. 119.
- MAYRER, HERRYMOM. Great Enterprise: Growth and Behavior of the Big Corporation. New York: The Macmillan Co. 1955. Pp. viii, 303. $5.00.
- MENDERSHAUSEN, HORST. Two Postwar Recoveries of the German Economy. Amsterdam: North-Holland Publishing Co. 1955. Pp. 128. $3.25.
- MILLER, HERMAN P. Income of the American People. New York: John Wiley & Sons, Inc.; London: Chapman & Hall, Ltd. 1955. Pp. xvi, 206. $5.50.
- MUMFORD, LEWIS; NIEBUHR, REINHOLD; BOWLES, CHESTER; THOMAS, NORMAN; KOHN, HANS; DE MADARIAGO, SALVADOR; RIEFF, PHILIP; KARPOVICH, MICHAEL; RABINOWITZ, EUGENE; HARRIMAN, W. AVERELL; AND SHUB, ANATOLE (ED.). Alternatives to the H-Bomb. Boston: The Beacon Press. 1955. Pp. 124. $1.00.
- NEVIN, EDWARD. The Mechanism of Cheap Money: A Study of British Monetary Policy, 1931-1939. Cardiff: University of Wales Press. 1955. Pp. xiii, 350. 25s.
- NEWMAN, EDWIN S. (SELECTED AND EDITED BY). The Freedom Reader. New York: Oceana Publications. Docket Series, Vol. 2. 1955. Pp. 256. $1.00.
- PALMER, CHARLES F. Adventures of a Slum Fighter. Atlanta, Ga.: Tupper and Love, Inc. 1955. Pp. xi, 272. $4.00.
- PERKINS, BRADFORD. The First Rapprochement: England and the United States, 1795-1805. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press. 1955. Pp. xii, 257. $5.00.
- PHELPS, ORME W. Introduction to Labor Economics. New York, Toronto, and London: McGraw-Hill Book Co. 2nd ed. 1955. Pp. xiv, 547. $6.50.
- RECKLESS, WALTER C. The Crime Problem. New York: Appleton-Century-Crofts, Inc. 2nd ed. 1955. Pp. x, 728. $6.50.
- RICH, NORMAN AND FISHER, M. H. (EDS.). The Holstein Papers. Volume I: Memoirs and Political Observations. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press. 1955. Pp. xxvii, 216. $5.00.)
- ROWSE, A. L. The Expansion of Elizabethan England. New York: St. Martin's Press. 1955. Pp. xiii, 450. $5.75.
- RYAN, ALVAN S. (ED.). The Brownson Reader. New York: P. J. Kenedy & Sons. 1955. Pp. xii, 370. $4.50.
- SCHUYLER, JACK (ED.). International Labor Directory and Handbook, 1955. New York: Frederick A. Praeger. 1955. Pp. xix, 1043. $25.00.
- Selected Studies of Negro Employment in the South*. Washington, D. C.: National Planning Association. 1955. Pp. x, 483. $5.50.
- SMITH, HOWARD R. Economic History of the United States. New York: The Ronald Press Co. 1955. Pp. x, 763. $6.00.
- SMITH, LOIS ELWYN. Mexico and the Spanish Republicans. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press. 1955. Pp. i-vi, 165-316. $1.75.
- SPRADING, CHARLES T. Real Freedom. Los Angeles: Sadie L. Cook. 1955. Pp. 102. $2.00.
- SPRADING, CHARLES T. The World State Craze. Los Angeles: Sadie L. Cook. 1955. Pp. 109. $2.00.
- Statistical Abstract of the United States, 1955*. Washington, D. C.: U. S. Government Printing Office. 1955. Pp. xvi, 1048.
- STEELE, IRWIN M. Selected Antitrust Cases: Landmark Decisions in Federal Antitrust. Homewood, Ill.: Richard D. Irwin, Inc. 1955. Pp. x, 210. $3.50.
- STRODE, HUDSON. Jefferson Davis: American Patriot, 1808-1861. New York: Harcourt, Brace and Co. 1955. Pp. xx, 460. $6.75.
- SWANSON, ERNST W. AND GRIFFIN, JOHN A. (EDS.); MACLACHLAN, JOHN M., PIERCE, TRUMAN M. AND ASSOCIATES, AND SWANSON, ERNST W. (BASED ON STUDIES BY). Public Education in the South Today and Tomorrow: A Statistical Survey. Chapel Hill, N. C.: The University of North Carolina Press. 1955. Pp. xiv, 137. $5.00.
- TARSHIS, LORIE. Introduction to International Trade and Finance. New York: John Wiley & Sons, Inc. 1955. Pp. x, 536. $6.00.
- THISTLETHWAITE, FRANK. The Great Experiment: An Introduction to the History of the American People. New York: Cambridge University Press. 1955. Pp. xiv, 335. $5.00.
- TOTAH, KHALIL. Dynamite in the Middle East. New York: Philosophical Library. 1955. Pp. ix, 240. $3.75.
- WALLICH, HENRY C. Mainsprings of the German Revival. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press. 1955. Pp. xi, 401. $4.50.
- WHEELER, SIR MORTIMER. Rome beyond the Imperial Frontiers. New York: Philosophical Library. 1955. Pp. xii, 192. $7.50.
- WILBER, DONALD N. Iran: Past and Present. Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press. 1955. Pp. xi, 276. $4.00.

NEWS AND NOTES

PROFESSIONAL CONFERENCES

1956 ANNUAL MEETING OF THE ASSOCIATION

The 1956 Annual Meeting of The American Political Science Association will be held September 6-8, 1956 in Washington, D.C. The Chairman of the Program Committee is Professor Earl Latham, of Amherst College; the Chairman of the Committee on Local Arrangements is The Reverend James E. Horgan, S.J., of Georgetown University.

The twenty-seventh annual meeting of the Southern Political Science Association was held at the Atlanta Biltmore Hotel in Atlanta, Georgia, November 3-5, 1955. Approximately 104 persons were registered as attending the meeting. Panel discussions were devoted to the following topics: "The Second Hoover Commission," "The Conservative Renaissance," "The Role of the Political Scientist in the Classroom," "Emerging Political Entities in Non-European Areas and Their Impact on World Politics," "The Contemporary Currents in Electoral Reform," "Atomic Energy: Public Policy and Political Science," "Trends in Federal-State Relations," "The Development of American Foreign Policy," "Government in Metropolitan Areas." The presidential address was delivered by Manning J. Dauer, and Evron Kirkpatrick addressed the meeting as the representative of the American Political Science Association. John J. Bebout, Assistant Director of the National Municipal League, addressed a luncheon meeting on "Agenda for American Federalism." The following officers were elected for the ensuing year: Carl B. Swisher, Johns Hopkins University, president; Alexander Heard, University of North Carolina, vice-president; Arthur B. Dugan, University of the South, recording secretary; Wallace Mendelsohn, University of Tennessee, Vincent Thursby, Florida State University, and Amry Vandenbosch, University of Kentucky, members of the executive council. Lee S. Greene, of the University of Tennessee, was elected editor of the Journal of Politics for a three-year term.

The second annual conference of the District of Columbia Political Science Association (DCPSA) was held on December 3, 1955, in the Hall of Government of George Washington University. The theme of the conference was "Policy Problems—1956." The general session was addressed by Francis O. Wilcox, Assistant Secretary of State and a past president of DCPSA; he spoke on "The Future of the United Nations." Six round tables dealt with the following topics: "The Kestnbaum Commission Report"; "Conflict of Interest—Is a Fresh Approach Needed?"; "Planning Ahead for National Party Conventions"; "The Hoover Commission Report"; "Agricultural Policy Problems—1956"; "Judicial Policy Problems—1956." Among the round table participants were Earl Butz, Assistant Secretary of Agriculture; Adrian S. Fisher, former legal adviser of AEC and of the State Department; Warren J. Madden, Judge, United States Court of Claims; Edwin G. Nourse, former Chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers; Robert Ramspeck, former Chairman of the U. S. Civil Service Commission; Tracy S. Voorhees, former Under Secretary of the Army; and Roger H. Wells, Chairman, Political Science Department of Bryn Mawr College.

Officers elected for the following year are: president, William H. Roberts, Catholic University of America; first vice-president, G. Lyle Belsley, Federal Civil Defense Administration; second vice-president, Howard E. Penniman, United States Information Agency. Additional executive committee members are: Don L. Bowen, University of Maryland; Harold A. Kieffer, Executive Office of the President; S. McKee Rosen, International Cooperation Administration. Secretary-Treasurer: William B. Welsh, Legislative Assistant to Senator Herbert H. Lehman.

On January 31, 1956, DCPSA held its first meeting of the current year in the Lounge of the Brookings Institution. The topic of the evening was "Legislative Programming"; the panel consisted of Lloyd W. Jones, Staff Director, Republican Policy Committee—United States Senate; William Pincus, Associate General Counsel, House Committee on Government Operations; George E. Reedy, Staff Adviser, Democratic Policy Committee—United States Senate.

The Midwest Conference of Political Scientists will hold its annual meeting on the campus of Marquette University, May 3-5, 1956. Inquiries concerning the schedule, program, housing, or other arrangements may be addressed to the office of the secretary-treasurer at Drake University, Des Moines, Iowa.

On December 29, 1955 in Atlanta the American Association for the Advancement of Science in co-sponsorship with the Southern Political Science Association devoted a program to "Political Trends in the South." Lynwood M. Holland, Emory University, presided. Lee S. Greene, University of Tennessee, discussed "The Decision-Making Structure in Southern Politics" and Jasper B. Shannon, of the University of Kentucky, dealt with "Southern Sectionalism and National Politics."

A two-day Conference on Political Theory was held at the University of Minnesota under the auspices of the department of political science and the Center for International Relations and Area Studies. The topic of the Conference was "The Role of Theory in the Study of Politics." Benjamin E. Lippincott acted as chairman. The speakers and their topics were as follows: William Anderson: "Scope and Methods of Political Science"; G. E. C. Catlin: "What Is Political Theory and Its Practical Significance?"; David Cooperman: "Meaning in Political Theory"; B. E. Lippincott: "Future Prospects for Political Theory";

Ralph G. Ross: "Fact, Law and Theory in Political Science"; and Mulford Sibley: "The Classics in the Study of Politics."

The Midwest Institute of International Affairs of Grinnell College and the Iowa Association for the United Nations conducted a conference on Latin American-United States problems November 10-12, 1955. Included among the speakers were: Victor Andrade, Ambassador of Bolivia; John C. Drier, United States Ambassador to the O.A.S.; Joseph Dunner, chairman of the department of political science, Grinnell College; Fernando Fournier, Ambassador of Costa Rica; Bourke Hickenlooper, United States Senate; Eberaldo Machado, Cultural Attaché of Brazil; and Rafael Aveleyra, Minister Plenipotentiary of Mexico. The Midwest Institute plans a similar conference on the specialized agencies of the United Nations April 26-28, 1956 on the campus of Grinnell College.

The Tenth Congress of the International Institute of Administrative Sciences will be held in Madrid, Spain from September 3-8, 1956. The three major subjects on the agenda of the Congress are as follows: "Contracts of Public Authorities for the Carrying-Out of Works"; "Present Tendencies in the Post-Entry Training of Higher Grade Civil Servants"; "A Study of Procedures for the Preparation and Implementation of Administrative Reforms." Further information can be obtained from Mr. Herbert Emmerich, chairman, United States Section, International Institute of Administrative Sciences, 1313 East 60th Street, Chicago 37, Illinois.

The American Association for Public Opinion Research will hold its annual conference on May 24 to 27, 1956 at Buck Hill Falls, Pennsylvania. The conference will include sessions on "Studies in Popular Culture," "Communications Theory and Opinion Research," "Determinants of Political Behavior," "Research in Medicine and Public Health," "Research on Academic Freedom and other Civil Liberties," and "American and Soviet Propaganda."

OTHER ACTIVITIES

The Southern California Political Science Association sent special greetings to William Bennett Munro, senior surviving president of the American Political Science Association, on the occasion of his 81st birthday. Professor Munro, now residing at Pasadena, California, joined the national association in its first year.

The Social Science Research Council is sponsoring a seven-week summer research training institute in current international affairs for scholars of postdoctoral or equivalent standing. Directed by John Gange, director of the Woodrow Wilson Department of Foreign Affairs of the University of Virginia, the institute will be held at the University of Denver for the period June 11-July 27, 1956. Staff members will be drawn from the Center of International Studies, Princeton University; Center for International Studies, Massachusetts Institute of Technology; Institute of War and Peace Studies, Columbia University; and the Rand Corporation.

Duke University's department of political science will sponsor the Third Annual Program in Japanese Civilization during the 1956 summer session. The program is financed by grants from the Japan Society and the Asia Foundation. Ten scholarships of $200 each will be awarded to teachers, professors, or journalists who have had no previous training in Asian affairs. Applications should be sent to the Summer Session, Duke University.

The Survey Research Center of the University of Michigan will hold its Annual Summer Institute in Survey Research Techniques for the ninth consecutive year. The regular session of the Institute will be held from July 23 to August 18, with an introductory session from June 25 to July 20, 1956. The Institute is designed to meet some of the educational and training needs of men and women engaged in business and governmental research or other statistical work, and graduate students and university instructors interested in quantitative research in the social sciences. Further information may be obtained by writing to the Survey Research Center, University of Michigan, Ann Arbor, Michigan.

San Diego State College has been authorized to grant the degree of Master of Science in Public Administration. The master's program will require the completion of 36 units, including a period of internship in a selected governmental agency in Southern California.

The National Council on Asian Affairs was organized last summer by a group of Philadelphia citizens interested in education about Asia. The first two programs of the Council are (1) the placement as teachers in elementary and secondary schools of Asian students now completing their work in this country who will be used to teach in their own fields of specialization and to be available for general school and community work concerning Asia, and (2) the encouragement of preparation of printed materials about Asia suitable for inclusion in existing school curricula. The officers of the Council are Norman D. Palmer, professor of political science, University of Pennsylvania, president; John F. Melby, executive-vice-president; and Elmer K. Wolf, secretary-treasurer.

The National Municipal League has announced that applications will be accepted for its fifth annual staff fellowship to be awarded to an established political scientist in the field of state and local government. The recipient will spend approximately one year in the League's office participating in all aspects of League activities. Applications for the 1956-57 fellowship must be received by March 1, 1956. Detailed information may be obtained from Alfred Willoughby, 47 East 68th Street, New York 21, N. Y.

Harvard University will begin a limited program for the advancement of Armenian studies and research at its Center for Middle Eastern Studies in the Fall of 1956.

The Institute of Government Committee on Publications, University of Utah, has assumed responsibility for editing and publishing the Western Political Quarterly following the resignation of Francis B. Schick as editor. The committee consists of Roy V. Peel, director of the Institute, Francis D. Wormuth, and Ellsworth E. Weaver.

On October 28, 1955 the department of government and politics and the Bureau of Governmental Research at the University of Maryland presented the first in a biannual seminar series of "Lectures on Public Affairs," concerned with problems of long-range significance. Delivering the inaugural paper was Dr. George B. Galloway, Senior Specialist in American Government at the Library of Congress. Dr. Galloway's paper was entitled "Congressional Reform Revisited." It is being published by the Bureau of Governmental Research.

A conference of the Central Region (Michigan, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Kentucky) of Pi Gamma Mu will be held April 14-15, 1956, at the Terre Haute State Teachers College. The theme will be "The Future of the Social Scientist." Robert V. Seltzer, department of political science, Terre Haute State Teachers College, and vice-chancellor of the Central Region, is in charge of the conference. Other political scientists in attendance will be W. Leon Godshall, Lehigh University, national president of Pi Gamma Mu, and Nacy W. McGee, North Central College, chancellor of the Central Region.

The Massachusetts Institute of Technology has recently established a Political Science Section to plan and coordinate teaching and research in this field at the Institute. Norman J. Padelford has been named chairman of the Section. Other senior members of the faculty joining in forming the Section include: Max Millikan, Karl Deutsch, and Ithiel Pool. The Section is organizing both an undergraduate and a graduate program of studies.

The Maurice and Laura Falk Foundation has granted an additional $45,000 to continue the Falk Fellowship Program at Yale University to the end of the academic year 1959-60.

The department of government at Indiana University has received a grant of $1,500 from the Woodrow Wilson Foundation for the purpose of organizing a centennial celebration honoring Wilson's birth. Outstanding Wilson scholars have been invited to the campus for the series of lectures and discussions during the Fall semester of 1956. The lectures will be published by the Indiana University Press.

The program of technical assistance in public administration by the Graduate School of Public Administration and Social Service of New York University with the University of Ankara and the Turkish government has completed the first half of its scheduled three-year contract under the International Cooperation Administration. Gisbert Flanz is head of the NYU group in Ankara, which includes Ernest Kurnow, Kenneth Redden, John Huston, Albert Gorvine, Russell Davy, Arthur Rucker, Anthony Lanza, and Edward Tutak. As part of the program, nine members of the University of Ankara faculties of law and political science are spending the academic year at New York University in study, observation, and research. The project is under the general direction of Dean William J. Ronan for New York University and Dean Bedri Gürsoy of the Faculty of Political Science and Dean Hikmet Belbez of the Faculty of Law of the University of Ankara.

Work is now progressing on the handbook of American election statistics which the Governmental Affairs Institute plans to bring out this spring. Financed by a grant from the Stern Family Fund, individual state sections of the handbook will present county-by-county vote totals and percentages for recent elections for president, governor, and senator. Ward-by-ward data will appear for the largest cities and a special tabulation of figures for each congressional district will be included. In addition to the material for the 48 states, the handbook will include figures for Alaska and Hawaii, summary tables, and ward and county outline maps. The project is under the supervision of Richard M. Scammon, Director of Elections Research for the Institute. Next year it is planned to bring out an international handbook of election figures as a companion volume to the American study.

Charles R. Adrian, assistant professor of political science at Michigan State University, was granted a leave of absence from January 1 to September 1, 1956, to serve as administrative assistant to the Governor of Michigan.

Charles S. Ascher, chairman of the political science department of Brooklyn College, has been appointed an associate director of the Institute of Public Administration to direct the extension of its international activities. Mr. Ascher has served for the past four years as associate director of the Public Administration Clearing House.

Thomas S. Barclay, Stanford University, was re-elected to the Senate of Phi Beta Kappa.

George S. Blair, educational associate of the Institute of Local and State Government and assistant professor, University of Pennsylvania, is serving as an instructor for a 28-week course in State Government and Public Administration for deputy department heads and bureau chiefs of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania. The course was devised by James C. Charlesworth, Secretary of Administration of the Commonwealth, and the five sectional meetings conducted each week are attended by about 100 state officials.

John C. Bollens, University of California (Los Angeles), is spending the spring semester on leave in Chicago as research director of the Metropolitan Area Project of the Council of State Governments, a project undertaken at the request of the Governors' Conference.

Howard Boorman, on leave from the State Department, will be executive director of Columbia University's project of Studies of Men and Politics in Modern China.

Ralph Braibanti, associate professor of political science at Duke University, lectured at the Army War College February 5-10, 1956, on Japan's role in Asia and served as consultant to the Study Group on Free East Asia.

Phillip W. Buck, Stanford University, is spending the academic year 1955-56 in England doing research on a Ford Foundation grant.

Arday W. Burks, Rutgers University, spent last summer as a research associate in the Center for Japanese Studies, University of Michigan.

Werner J. Cahnman, Executive Director of the Conference on Jewish Social Studies, spent the summer months in London, Vienna, and Jerusalem, on a research grant from the Conference on Material Claims against Germany. He lectured on European Nationalities and American Minorities at the Hochschule für Politische Wissenschaften in Munich, Germany, and at the School of Law and Economics in Haifa, Israel.

Robert W. Carnes, of the Wis. Department of Public Welfare, has joined the staff of the Bureau of Government of the University Extension Division of the University of Wisconsin to conduct an experimental course for police officers in handling juvenile offenders.

Brook Chisolm, formerly Director General of the World Health Organization, delivered the Patten Lectures at Indiana University during the Fall semester, 1955. His lecture series was entitled, "Can the Nations Learn to Learn?"

Cullen B. Gosnell, Emory University, is a member of the Essay Committee of Pi Sigma Alpha which will select the best essay submitted in 1955-56.

Heinz Guradze is giving courses in International Organization and American and English Government at the University of Cologne.

Jerry Kieffer, Special Assistant to the director of Defense Mobilization, is now also serving as Assistant to Meyer Kestnbaum, Special Assistant to President Eisenhower. The Kestnbaum office is coordinating executive branch review of the reports of the Commission on Organization of the Executive Branch and the Commission on Intergovernmental Relations.

Werner Levi, of the University of Minnesota, has returned from Australia, Malaya, Siam, and India where he did research on international relations and gave lectures at various universities.

Gerard J. Mangone, Swarthmore College, directed a research program of the Graduate Program of the Woodrow Wilson School of Public and International Affairs, Princeton University, first term 1955-56. The project was a study of the relationship of domestic interest groups to the United Nations and was specifically designed to fit into the larger study of attitudes toward the United Nations, presently being conducted by the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace.

Eubank Marshall is serving as Assistant director of the Stanford University Study of Undergraduate Education.

Thomas Patrick Melady, of the International Cooperation Administration, is serving with the United States advisory group to the Imperial Ethiopian government on questions of foreign trade and investments. He is also giving a series of lectures at the University College of Addis Ababa on "Fundamentals of Economic Development."

Eane J. Morgenthau, of the University of Chicago, spent the Fall quarter in Japan, Hong Kong, Vietnam, Cambodia, Thailand, and Pakistan. He lectured in Tokyo at the University of Tokyo, Waseda University, and at the Training Institute of the Japanese Foreign Office.

Norman D. Palmer, professor of political science at the University of Pennsylvania, has been appointed a member of the Committee on Institutional Projects Abroad of the American Council of Education. He participated in a conference on University Contracts Abroad held at Michigan State University on November 7-18, 1955 under the Committee's auspices.

Robert S. Rankin, chairman of the department of political science at Duke University, will be on sabbatical leave during the Spring semester, 1956.

Georg Romoser, Ph.D. candidate in the department of political science, University of Chicago, is spending the autumn and winter in Germany for dissertation research and as an assistant in the Seminar für Wissenschaftliche Politik, Freiburg University.

William J. Ronan, Dean of the Graduate School of Public Administration and Social Service of New York University, has been elected President of the Municipal Personnel Society of the City of New York. This is the first time that a person not employed by the City has been elected to the head of this organization, which is composed of personnel officers of the various City departments, City employees interested or active in personnel management, and members of faculties engaged in the teaching of municipal affairs or public administration.

Joseph S. Roucek, chairman of the department of sociology and political science at the University of Bridgeport, joined the editorial boards of the Journal of Human Relations, and The Encyclopedia Picturama (Harper Brothers Encyclopedia). He will spend the Spring on sabbatical leave in Europe, studying the comparative aspects of education in Yugoslavia. He has been invited to give lectures at several universities in Yugoslavia, Austria, Germany, and Holland.

Walter R. Sharp returned in September from a year's assignment with the United Nations Technical Assistance Administration as co-director of the Egyptian Institute of Public Administration in Cairo, and has resumed his duties as director of graduate studies in international relations at Yale University. He was recently appointed a representative of the International Political Science Association to the United Nations.

Richard C. Spencer, on sabbatical leave from Coe College during the second semester of 1955-56, is visiting the parliaments and parliamentary offices of several Northern and Western European governments.

Murray S. Stedman, Jr., department of political science, Swarthmore College, lectured during the month of January before the Seminar on American Studies at Salzburg.

H. Arthur Steiner, of the University of California at Los Angeles, will be on sabbatical leave in Asia during the Spring semester, 1956. He will be in Ceylon, Pakistan, and Burma from February to April, 1956, under the auspices of the Specialists Division of the International Educational Exchange Program of the Department of State. He will resume his teaching duties at Los Angeles in September, 1956.

John O. Stitely, associate professor of history and political science at the University of Rhode Island, will be on sabbatical leave during the second semester for research and writing on state government.

K. T. W. Swanson, assistant professor of public administration at the State College of Washington, was consultant to the Spokane County Planning Commission during the past summer.

John E. Stoner, of the University of Indiana, is chairman of the Indiana Highway for Survival Committee, a group of lay citizens interested in better highways in the State of Indiana.

Paul Studenski, of New York University, is serving as Resident Director of the Albany Graduate Program in Public Administration. The program, now in its ninth year, is co-operatively offered by the Graduate School of Public Administration and Social Service of New York University and the Maxwell Graduate School of Citizenship and Public Affairs of Syracuse University, with the co-operation of the State University of New York.

Carl Brent Swisher, Johns Hopkins University, gave the John Marshall Bicentennial Lecture at Fordham University. His address was entitled "Liberty and Authority under the Constitution."

John Vanderzell, Franklin and Marshall College, is absent on leave for the year 1955-56 to serve as Director of Research in the Bureau of Municipal Affairs of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania. He will return for the 1956-57 term.

Robert A. Walker has returned to his teaching duties at Stanford University after spending the greater part of the previous academic year as visiting professor at the College of Europe in Bruges, Belgium.

James T. Watkins IV, Stanford University, was Director of the 32nd Institute of World Affairs at Riverside, California, in December, 1955. He is also serving as Chairman of the 12th Regional Committee for the Woodrow Wilson Fellowship Program.

Edward W. Weidner returned in January from seven months in Saigon to resume his duties in the political science department of Michigan State University. He served as Chief Adviser of the Michigan State University Mission to the Vietnamese government.

APPOINTMENTS AND STAFF CHANGES

Rene N. Ballard has been promoted to associate professor in political science at Knox College.

Edward C. Banfield has been appointed associate professor of political science at the University of Chicago. Mr. Banfield was formerly with the Committee on Planning at the University of Chicago.

Francis P. Brassor has been appointed to the faculty of the department of government and public administration at the American University as a professorial lecturer. He will teach in the field of government reorganization.

Dr. Adam C. Brackenridge, former chairman of the Department of political science and administrative assistant to the chancellor, was elevated to the position of dean of faculties at the University of Nebraska.

Gordon K. Bryan, professor of government at Mississippi State College, was visiting professor of political science at Vanderbilt University during the summer of 1955.

Ardath W. Burke, Rutgers University, has been appointed visiting assistant professor of government at Columbia University for the Spring session, to give a course in the East Asian Institute.

Robert O. Byrd, who received his Ph.D. from the University of Chicago, September, 1955, has been named chairman of the department of political science and assistant professor of the history and science of government at Illinois Wesleyan University.

Professor Robert K. Carr has been appointed director of the Great Issues Course at Dartmouth College for the year commencing in February, 1956.

Professor Francis Coker, Yale University, will serve as visiting professor of political science at Duke University during the Spring semester, 1956.

Professor Robert Connery, Duke University, has been appointed associate director of the Metropolitan Area Study which is being financed by a grant from the Edgar B. Stern Family Fund.

Robert A. Dahl has been promoted to the Eugene Meyer professorship of political science at Yale University.

Harbert S. Dinerstein has been appointed to the faculty of the department of government and public administration of the American University as a lecturer on the Soviet system.

John C. Donovan, associate professor of government, Bates College, has been appointed chairman of the Maine Board of Arbitration and Conciliation by Governor Edmund S. Muskie.

David Easton has been promoted to professor of political science at the University of Chicago.

Mr. Albert C. Ettinger has been appointed instructor of political science at the University of Vermont.

John Gillespie has been appointed director of the Bureau of Government Research, University of Massachusetts. He was formerly training officer, Institute of Public Affairs, The University of Texas.

Kurt Glaser, formerly associated with the Governmental Affairs Institute and Records Engineering, Inc., will join the staff of the department of government and politics at the University of Maryland in the Spring semester.

Robert E. Goostree has been promoted to the rank of associate professor in government and public administration at the American University.

John Hallowell is on a sabbatical leave from Duke University this year. He is teaching at the University of Munich in Germany on a Fulbright appointment and is making a study of the political philosophy of the German Christian Democratic Union on a Guggenheim Fellowship.

Royce Hanson has been appointed to the faculty of the department of government and public administration of the American University as a lecturer in American Government.

John G. Harkins was appointed a part-time instructor in political science at the University of Pennsylvania in September. Mr. Harkins is currently pursuing studies toward the law degree in the Law School of the University of Pennsylvania.

Robert Hattery joined the staff of the Bureau of Government at the University of Wisconsin, Extension Division in December, 1955. Mr. Hattery will be in charge of the Bureau's program of Citizen Education in World Affairs. A graduate of the University of Chicago, Mr. Hattery served on the staff of the Center for the Study of American Foreign Policy. He has also served as a discussion leader for the American Foundation for Political Education.

Richard H. Heindel, dean of the College of Arts and Sciences of the University of Buffalo, has been appointed Chairman of the University's Committee on University Planning and Development during the leave-of-absence of the Chancellor.

Morton A. Kaplan, Fellow at the Center for Advanced Study in the Behavioral Sciences, has accepted an appointment as assistant professor of political science at the University of Chicago, effective October, 1956.

Thomas Karis has been appointed to the faculty of the department of government and public administration of the American University as a lecturer in political theory.

James B. Kessler, assistant in the department of political science at Stanford University, has joined the faculty of the department of government at Indiana University for the second semester, 1955-56.

Alan G. Kirk was appointed a part-time instructor in political science at the University of Pennsylvania in September. Mr. Kirk is currently pursuing studies toward the law degree in the Law School of the University of Pennsylvania.

Henry A. Kissinger has been appointed a Research Associate of the Foreign Policy Research Institute of the University of Pennsylvania.

David W. Knepper, of the University of Houston, recently served on a special Citizen's City Charter Committee which proposed a successful revision of the city's charter. He has just been appointed to the statutory Harris County Home Rule Commission, which will sponsor a long-range study of the governmental structure of metropolitan Houston.

Samuel Krislov, formerly of the University of Vermont, has been appointed assistant professor at Hunter College.

Arthur P. Kruse has been advanced to the rank of associate professor, Far Eastern International Relations, Institutions, and History, at the Air University, Maxwell Field, Ala.

James L. Kunen has been appointed to the faculty of the department of government and public administration of the American University as a lecturer in administrative law.

William F. Larsen, formerly of the faculty of the University of Florida, has been appointed associate professor of public administration at the New York University Graduate School of Public Administration and Social Service. He will also serve as project director for a graduate student field research team, working in close cooperation with the Mayor's Committee on a Quiet City.

Richard G. Lindblad, formerly of the University of Minnesota, has joined the department of political science at Illinois Wesleyan University.

Joseph D. Lubin, Ph.D. candidate in political science at the University of California and instructor of public administration for the University of California Extension, has been appointed Budget Director of Benicia Arsenal.

C. C. Ludwig, director of the Municipal Reference Bureau at the University of Minnesota and executive secretary of the League of Minnesota Municipalities, is serving during the winter quarter as a consultant in local government on the staff of the Institute of Public Administration of the University of the Philippines.

Arthur W. Macmahon has been named executive director of Columbia University's new Committee on the Educational Future of the University.

David R. Matthis, formerly of Centenary College, has become assistant professor of government at West Texas State College.

Edward N. Megay has accepted an appointment as assistant professor of political science at the College of St. Thomas.

Irene M. Meister has been appointed Research Fellow of the Foreign Policy Research Institute of the University of Pennsylvania.

John F. Melby has become a lecturer on political science at the University of Pennsylvania. His availability in the Philadelphia area is a result of his assignment as executive vice-president of the National Council on Asian Affairs.

Eugene H. Miller, Ursinus College, will teach two courses in international law at Lehigh University during the spring semester, 1956.

Robert L. Morlan, University of Redlands, was recently elected president of the Citrus Belt division of the California League of Cities. At present he is also president of the Southern California Political Science Association.

Herbert J. Muller, Purdue University, has accepted a joint appointment in the departments of Government and English at Indiana University beginning September, 1956.

Sigmund Neumann, professor of government at Wesleyan, served as visiting professor at the Free University and the Deutsche Hochschule für Politik, Berlin during the summer term, 1955. For his sabbatical leave during 1955-56 he has joined the Institute for Advanced Study, Princeton.

Gerard Niemeyer has been appointed professor of political science at the University of Notre Dame. During the summer of 1955, he was visiting professor on the Graduate Faculty of the New School for Social Research. He has also been appointed consultant to the Foreign Policy Research Institute at the University of Pennsylvania.

S. J. Pomrense has been appointed to the faculty of the department of government and public administration of the American University as a lecturer in records and archives administration.

Vladimir Reisky-Dubnic has been appointed instructor in political science at Washington College, Chestertown, Maryland, for the second semester of this academic year.

John S. Reshetar, Jr. has been appointed a Research Fellow of the Foreign Policy Research Institute of the University of Pennsylvania.

Berrett M. Rich served during the summer of 1955 as a consultant to the Institute of Public Administration, University of the Philippines. He returned to his duties with the Bureau of Government Research and the department of political science, Rutgers University, in September, 1955.

Edward E. Robinson has been promoted to the rank of associate professor in government and public administration at the American University.

Richard F. Schier was appointed chairman of the department of government at Franklin and Marshall College for the year 1955-56.

Daw Mya Sein, University of Rangoon, Burma has been designated as the first lecturer from that country to the United States on the UN Lectureship sponsored by the Asia Foundation. She will be in residence under the auspices of the department of government and the Burma Research Project of New York University for six weeks beginning in April, 1956.

Constance E. Smith, assistant professor of government at Wheaton College, will be the acting academic dean during the spring semester of 1956.

Daniel E. Smith was appointed instructor in political science at the University of Pennsylvania in September, 1955.

Donald P. Sparks has been appointed to the faculty of the department of government and public administration at the American University as lecturer in governments of the Middle East.

Marie C. Stark has been appointed to the faculty of the department of government and public administration of the American University as a lecturer in record and archives administration.

E. W. Steele has returned to the University of Vermont as instructor in political science after two years of graduate work at Princeton University.

Kurt Steiner is acting assistant professor of political science at Stanford University for the academic year, 1955-56. He replaces Philip W. Buok, who is in England on sabbatical leave.

John G. Stoessinger, formerly an instructor at Wellesley College, has joined the department of government and law at Babson Institute of Business Administration.

Octavio J. Tocchio has been appointed to the faculty of the department of government and public administration of the American University as a lecturer in American Government.

Vernon Van Dyke, of the State University of Iowa, has been appointed Research Professor for the second semester, 1955-56 and will devote himself exclusively to research and writing.

Karl Von Vorys, who recently received his Ph.D. from Georgetown University, has been appointed assistant professor of government at the University of South Dakota.

E. V. Walter has been promoted to the rank of associate professor of political science at Ohio Wesleyan University and has been reappointed chairman of the department of political science for a two-year period ending June, 1958.

Harold W. Ward, formerly of Cornell College, has recently accepted an appointment as associate professor of government at Southern Illinois University.

Norman Wengert has resigned as chairman of the social science department at North Dakota Agricultural College. He joined the staff of Resources for the Future, Inc., on January 1, 1956 to work on a natural resources policy history project and will resume academic duties as professor of public administration at the University of Maryland in September, 1956.

K. C. Wheare, of Oxford University, will serve as visiting professor of political science at Duke University during the spring semester of 1956.

J. Roffe Wike has been appointed an instructor in political science at the University of Pennsylvania. He is also serving as a member of the Editorial Advisory Board of Current History magazine.

Daniel Wit, visiting professor of political science at the University of Michigan, has been appointed director of a Michigan Memorial-Phoenix Fund Research project dealing with the international implications of atomic power for American foreign policy.

W. Ross Yates is now assistant professor of political science at Lehigh University.

Raphael Zariski has become a member of the department of political science at Bennington College.

POLITICAL SCIENCE AWARDS PROGRAM

The American Political Science Association has announced a program of "Political Science Awards" to young reporters and their newspapers for outstanding stories on local and state government and politics. This program is made possible by a grant of $37,500 from The Ford Foundation.

Initially, competition for the awards will be limited to daily newspapers in 12 Midwestern states (North and South Dakota, Nebraska, Kansas, Missouri, Iowa, Minnesota, Wisconsin, Illinois, Indiana, Michigan and Ohio). After a three-year trial period, it may be extended to newspapers in other areas.

The "Political Science Awards" program is an outgrowth of a study financed by the Poynter Fund, which was established by Mr. and Mrs. Nelson Poynter of the St. Petersburg (Fla.) Times and Congressional Quarterly. The Poynter Fund made a grant to The American Political Science Association to recommend ways to improve the selection and training of young journalists at the state and local level. The study was carried on with the assistance of a working group, including Ernest K. Lindley, Director of the Washington Bureau of Newsweek Magazine; Roscoe Drummond, Chief of the Washington Bureau of the New York Herald-Tribune; Edward Lindsay, Publisher of Lindsay-Schaub Newspapers in Decatur, Illinois; and several other prominent journalists and political scientists.

The purpose of the "Political Science Awards" program, is to encourage and help to hold promising political reporters at the state and local level and to establish a closer bond between political scientists and local newspapers. Winners will be chosen on the basis of a competition for the best articles or series of articles on any phase of state or local government or politics. For the first year's awards, articles to be judged must have been printed between January 1, 1955, and June 1, 1956. The criteria will be: (1) ability to clarify a complex issue; (2) persistence and imaginativeness of research; (3) originality of presentation; and (4) writing skill.

Articles will be judged by a committee consisting of the following journalists and political scientists: Charles S. Hyneman, Departmen-of Political Science, Northwestern University, Chairman; Arthur Naftalin, Commissioner of Administration, State of Minnesota; Ralph Nahriger, Director, School of Journalism, University of Wisconsin; James E. Pollard, Director School of Journalism, The Ohio State University; Wallace Carroll, Washington Bureau, The New York Times; Lyle Wilson, Chief of Washington Bureau, United Press; Barnett Neer, Chief of Washington Bureau, Denver Post; Alfred Friendly, Managing Editor, Washington Post and Times-Herald; Nelson Poynter, Editor and Publisher, St Petersburg (Fla.) Times and Congressional Quarterly.

Candidates will be limited to men and women between the ages of 25 and 35 who are employed full time on the staffs of daily newspapers. Articles for consideration may be submitted to The American Political Science Association, 1726 Massachusetts Avenue, N.W., Washington 6, D. C., postmarked no later than July 1, 1956.

Award-winning reporters will attend a two-weeks "Conference on Public Affairs Reporting" with all expenses paid at Allerton Park, University of Illinois from December 1 to 15, 1955.

The conference will be directed by Dr. Ralph D. Casey, Director of the University of Minnesota School of Journalism, who is also trained in political science. Discussions on all phases of state house, city hall, and local and state political reporting will be led by some of the nation's leading journalists and political scientists.

Special plaques will be presented both to the winning reporter and to the newspaper for which he works.

The Association's Congressional Fellowship Program was recently paid a very high tribute on the Senate floor by Senators Barkley, Goldwater, Humphrey, Ives, Lehman, and Sparkman. The nature of the program was described, the work of the Fellows was highly praised, and the entire program was heartily endorsed by all the senators who spoke. The discussion appeared in the Congressional Record, January 12, 1956.

OFFICERS OF THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE ASSOCIATION

President

HAROLD D. LASSWELL
Yale University

President Elect

E. E. SCHATTSCHEIDER
Wesleyan University

Vice Presidents

JOSEPH P. HARRIS
University of California
(Berkeley)

HAROLD S. QUIGLEY
University of Minnesota

EMMETTE S. REDFORD
University of Texas

Secretary

HARVEY C. MANSFIELD
The Ohio State University

Treasurer

MAX M. KAMPELMAN
Washington, D. C.

Executive Director

EYRON M. KIRKPATRICK
1726 Massachusetts Ave., N. W.
Washington 6, D. C.

Managing Editor

The American Political Science Review
HUGH I. ELSBREE
Library of Congress

Associate Director
KEN HECHLER

COUNCIL

Above-named Officers ex officio

GABRIEL A. ALMOND
Princeton University

STEPHEN K. BAILEY
Princeton University

JAMES M. BURNS
Williams College

GWENDOLEN M. CARTER
Smith College

SAMUEL J. ELDERSVELD
University of Michigan

AVERY LEISERSON
Vanderbilt University

LESLIE M. LIPSON
University of California (Berkeley)

NORMAN PALMER
University of Pennsylvania

WELDON COOPER
University of Virginia

PAUL T. DAVID
The Brookings Institution

HERBERT EMMERICH
Public Administration Clearing House

CLAUDE E. HAWLEY
United States Information Agency

NORMAN L. HILL
University of Nebraska

THOMAS P. JENKIN
University of California (Los Angeles)

LOUISE OVERACKER
Wellesley College

CHARLES B. ROBSON
University of North Carolina

FORMER PRESIDENTS

FRANK J. GOODNOW

ALBERT SHAW

FREDERIC N. JUDSON

JAMES BRYCE

A. LAWRENCE LOWELL

WOODROW WILSON

SIMEON E. BALDWIN

ALBERT BUSHNELL HART

W. W. WILLOUGHBY

JOHN BASSETT MOORE

ERNST FREUND

JESSE MACY

MUNROE SMITH

HENRY JONES FORD

PAUL S. REINSCH

LEO S. ROWE

WILLIAM A. DUNNING

HARRY A. GARFIELD

JAMES W. GARNER

CHARLES E. MERRIAM

CHARLES A. BEARD

WILLIAM B. MUNRO

JESSE S. REEVES

JOHN A. FAIRLIE

BENJAMIN F. SHAMBAUGH

EDWARD S. CORWIN

WILLIAM F. WILLOUGHBY

ISIDOR LOBB

WALTER J. SHEPARD

FRANCIS W. COKER

ARTHUR N. HOLCOMBE

THOMAS REED POWELL

CLARENCE A. DYKSTRA

CHARLES GROVE HAINES

ROBERT C. BROOKS

FREDERIC A. OGG

WILLIAM ANDERSON

ROBERT E. CUSHMAN

LEONARD D. WHITE

JOHN M. GAUS

WALTER F. DODD

ARTHUR W. MACMAHON

HENRY R. SPENCER

QUINCY WRIGHT

JAMES E. POLLOCK

PETER H. ODEGARD

LUTHER H. GULICK

PENDLETON HERRING

RALPH J. BUNCHE

CHARLES MCKINLEY

AMERICAN CONSTITUTIONAL LAW

by Bernard Schwartz

*Professor of Law and Director of the Institute of Comparative Law
New York University*

An explanation of American constitutional law written for students interested in political science and law, and for citizens interested in the meaning of citizenship.

Professor Schwartz first considers what a written constitution means as the foundation of American government. He shows the effects of the federal system and describes the authority and function of Congress, the President, and the Courts. Modern developments—cases and events bearing out current tendencies in the law—are then considered. There are chapters on: The New Federalism; Presidential Prerogative and the Steel Seizure Case; The Changing Role of the Supreme Court; The Negro and the Law; Civil Liberties and the "Cold War"; Administrative Law; and The United States and the United Nations.

Readers will find new understanding in an approach which shows the American-ness of American institutions by comparing them with other countries.

$4.00, through your bookseller

CAMBRIDGE University Press

32 East 57th Street

New York 22, New York

Current Research on the Middle East

1955

Pertinent information and comment on research now going forward in the United States and Canada, Great Britain, Western Europe, and the Middle East. Over 1,000 entries dealing with the countries from Morocco to Afghanistan, Turkey to Ethiopia. An invaluable reference work for students, researchers, teachers, libraries, institutions, publishers.

PARTIAL TABLE OF CONTENTS

Geography, Regional Surveys
History, Archaeology, Epigraphy, Numismatics
Political Science Economics Behavioral Sciences (Demography, Anthropology, Sociology, Psychology, Education)

Law
Thought, Philosophy, Religion
Literature
Art History of Science
Linguistics
Library Science, Manuscripts, Catalogues, etc.

169 pages

$2.50

REPORT ON CURRENT RESEARCH, SPRING 1956

Reports from researchers in the field describing problems encountered, techniques utilized, accessibility of source materials, etc. To be published in April. $1.00

Special price for combined order of Current Research and Report (20% discount to libraries and foreign countries) $3.00

THE MIDDLE EAST INSTITUTE

1761 F Street, N.W.

Washington 6, D.C., U.S.A.

The American Political Science Review

---

VOL. L

JUNE, 1956

NO. 2

---

THE COMMUNIST PRESENCE IN FRANCE

E. DREXEL GODFREY, JR.

Williams College

Apparent revival of Communist power in the recent French elections raises once again the thorny problem of appraising the strength of this huge and partially submerged political force.<sup>1</sup> Some Western observers, forgetting that the drop in popular support for the party in 1951 was largely a consequence of the bizarre workings of the election law, were distressed by the gains scored in January of this year.<sup>2</sup> In fact, the Communists were competing on an equal footing with the other parties (in contrast with 1951) and could rely on supporters who, in that year, had deserted on election day. Divisions among French center parties in 1956 meant that a vote for the PCF was no longer regarded as just a "throw-away protest." From the standpoint of political statistics, it is important to recognize that under optimum conditions the party was able to do no more than make up for the setback suffered in 1951. Indeed the Communist vote declined slightly as a percentage of total popular vote, stabilizing at about 4,500,000 in a year when some 2,250,000 more voters went to the polls.<sup>3</sup> The true picture, then, is one of impressive, but not steadily advancing, strength.

This paper proposes to leave further scrutiny of election returns to others more competent in that field of political analysis. The popular following which the party boasts is an important index of its power and vigor, but emphasis here will be largely on the party as an effective instrument of political persuasion and manipulation. It is proposed first to evaluate the PCF as a structural entity with a complex of specific functions in French society. Secondly, some suggestions as to the changing shape of that society will be advanced. Finally, tentative hypotheses will be offered on the future of France in terms of the relationship between the party's political posture and the social imperatives of the nation.

<sup>1</sup> One commentator with the courage to make his observations before the 1956 elections produced a sober and instructive article on this general topic, offering somewhat different conclusions than the present writer's. See Charles A. Micaud, "The Bases of Communist Strength in France," Western Political Quarterly, Vol. 8, pp. 354-63 (Sept., 1955).

<sup>2</sup> In the 1951 election, the center parties profited by the bonus accorded to common lists, or apparentements, by which any alliance of parties, or any single party winning more than 50 per cent of the votes in a district, thereby won all the parliamentary seats in that district. In many constituencies where the Communists were by far the strongest single party, they were completely shut out by alliances of several smaller center parties. In 1956, with the center parties badly divided and rarely able to form wide alliances, the seats of most districts were distributed according to the proportion of popular votes cast for each party. The best discussion of the complicated electoral law is contained in Dorothy Pickles, French Politics (London, 1953), appendix 1, pp. 288-92.

<sup>3</sup> The percentages of the total popular vote won by the Communist party have been—1946: 28.6; 1951: 25.9; 1956: 25.6.

I

To assess current capacity of the PCF to represent the "revolutionary element" of France, we must first examine its behavior as the largest French party. One thing is clear: the party has not spared its corps of officialdom in filling arduous posts of leadership. Communist presence on every possible commission, committee, and public and semi-public body has given the party its reputation as a public servant—irrespective of ultimate goals. There is, even in the most cynically anti-Communist quarters, a begrudging respect for this integrity of tirelessness. By a curious paradox, however, it is exactly this furious activity which is in part responsible for a perceptible waning of Communist prestige. As party representation is perpetuated, bureaucratization is invited at every level of the hierarchy. The Communist presence is considered by the party a useful short-run goal of end for itself. Militants who specialize in making themselves indispensable members of a local parent-teachers council, for example, are expected to be tenacious about their positions. Tenacity often leads to a routinized performance of unnecessary functions.

There are three spheres where Communists are represented: those organizations launched and maintained almost exclusively by the party and its fellow travellers; organizations in which the party shares responsibility with representatives of different political opinions; and bodies where the party retains a toe-hold, but where its emissaries sit scorned, isolated, and outvoted on every issue. In all of these there are opportunities for tens of thousands of the energetic faithful to prove their indispensability to PCF superiors to devise new functions, to propose the creation of new committees of coordination or liaison, and above all to preserve their own special uniqueness as party functionaries.<sup>4</sup>

<sup>4</sup> One indication of the scope of Communist presence is the fact that, by recent count, there were at least 26 semi-public bodies dealing with educational affairs at the national level in which party members play a major role. The number of regional and local units is not known.

Within the official structure of the party itself, there has been a similar tendency toward bureaucratization. At the national level the turnover of leadership positions has been low. Except for a handful of celebrated cases that have had, more often than not, a purely political symbolism—as in the exclusion and subsequent defamation of André Marty—Communist officials have come to be accepted as permanent fixtures. The French public is becoming used to the same dreary parade of familiar faces in the newspapers, the Assembly, and on public platforms commemorating the days of the Liberation.

The classic dilemma of an opposition party languishing in its own torpor has been described by Schumpeter in his essay on the pre-1914 German Social Democrats.<sup>5</sup> Not dissimilar conditions exist today in France, and the PCF's response to them follows the same degenerative lines. Exiled to opposition, the party seeks to sustain the fidelity of its elite by promising security of jobs within the hierarchy. Once an official or a back bench deputy masters the rules of Communist conduct, his path is relatively smooth. Opposition is the most tranquil role for any party équipe. It provides few definitive tests of personal capacity; there are no troublesome resolutions of responsibility versus ideology, no embarrassing inquiries into the conduct of a ministry, no criticisms of committee reports. Although Maurice Thorez' adaptation of Stalin's maxim that "the Communist party is not a party like the others" may still be technically valid, it is becoming less and less meaningful.

Despite symptoms of advancing senility, which most Frenchmen—and indeed some party members—admit is stifling the dynamic of the PCF, few observers anticipate a dramatic decline in the party's nationwide support. There has been only a small reduction in the number of Communist fiefdoms which have characterized most industrialized areas since the war.<sup>6</sup> Even more important, the hold of the party on the working class as exercised by the CGT union has not been successfully challenged by either the Socialist-oriented CGTFO or the Catholic CFTC. Union shop committee and social security board elections are still won with impressive majorities by the CGT candidates. There was a slight rollback of CGT predominance in 1952 in most sectors, but even then the majority union was backed by an average of 67 per cent of the voters in industry and basic services.<sup>7</sup> Election results in the mine basins gave CGT 71.8 per cent, on the ~~re-~~trucks 66.8 per cent, and at the Citroën automobile plant 73.6 per cent.

<sup>5</sup> Joseph A. Schumpeter, Capitalism, Socialism and Democracy, 3rd ed. (New York 1942), pp. 341–48.

<sup>6</sup> Some decline has, however, been registered in the number of Communist-controlled cantons in Le Nord and Pas-de-Calais.

<sup>7</sup> Good comparative figures for the election results of 1952 can be found in L'Observateur, June 19, 1952. Scattered reports of individual plant elections are available in Le Monde, June 12, 1952.

Since the recoil in 1952, the CGT seems to have regained the ground lost, and in a few places virtually monopolizes the whole union field.<sup>8</sup> It would be unwarranted to infer, however, that CGT candidates survived the mild reversals of 1952 because of outstanding past performance. The incapacity of the weaker unions to capitalize on the modest gains won in 1952 confirmed the feeling of many workers that it was better to go along with a powerful union machine—no matter what its politics or personnel. Once again, as it has so many times since 1947, the CGT benefited by the sheer weight of preponderant numbers.

Other signs of declining Communist influence via the CGT, although not susceptible of precise measurement, are significant. Political manifestations have proved so unpopular that they are rarely undertaken by union leaders even under heavy pressure from the party. Admissions of strike failures are made openly by high-ranking CGT officials.<sup>9</sup> Relations between local federations and the national union are, according to published complaints of responsible officers, even worse than usual.<sup>10</sup> One shoddy piece of union fecklessness ticked non-Communists in the spring of 1953. The CGT officers of the Paris Subway Workers union decided on a surprise protest strike of limited duration. Service was halted during the early morning hours when the workers were streaming into Paris from the suburbs, but all was normal again by 9 A.M. when "the bosses" rode to work.<sup>11</sup>

Even when the party speaks officially, the CGT is under fire. Marcel Servin's organizational report at the 1954 Congress revealed that, of total party membership, only 25 per cent belonged to plant cells—an obligation for all wage-earning card carriers.<sup>12</sup> Of these, 38 per cent were industrial (mostly metallurgical) and arsenal workers, an indication that party representation in other trades is scattered at best.<sup>13</sup> The party Secretary also disclosed that a sampling of membership cards showed that 26 per cent of bearers entitled to belong to the CGT were not members of any union.<sup>14</sup> The gap between CGT sympathy (and <sup>8</sup> A sampling of 1955 CGT successes can be found in Le Monde, May 21, May 29, and June 4, 1955.

<sup>9</sup> See especially the contrite resolution adopted by the June, 1954 meeting of the CGT National Committee, after the poor showing of the April demonstration for a minimum wage of 25,000 francs, as reported in L'Humanité June 21, 1954.

<sup>10</sup> See for example the thunderous warning of Frachon addressing the leaders of the Paris area metal workers. Le Peuple, supplement, Sept. 15, 1952.

<sup>11</sup> See the caustic report in Le Monde, April 1, 1953.

<sup>12</sup> Report of M. Servin, L'Humanité, June 5, 1954.

<sup>13</sup> Ibid.

<sup>14</sup> Ibid.

it is more often sympathy than affiliation) and Communist sympathy is symbolized by the present situation at the mining center of Fives Lille. Twenty-seven of the 29 delegates to the Plant Committee were elected from the CGT list. The majority union received 5,300 votes, virtually sweeping the field, but of those casting ballots only 300 were party members. While the plant is under the control of the CGT, the workers' living quarters at Hellemmes has had a Socialist mayor since 1947.<sup>15</sup> As one observer notes, the CGT depends "... on a solid general staff which occupies the key post [in the plants] enabling it to bring along an immense crowd of hesitants and indifferents."<sup>16</sup>

Control of these key CGT positions has always been the prime strategy of the party. It is a realistic policy which recognizes the hard facts of French union life—loose organization, no closed shops, and a virulently individualistic, or perhaps anarchistic, mistrust of leaders by the rank and file.<sup>17</sup> From one point of view, the Communists' adaptation to these conditions must be regarded as a skillful "making do" with very little. The key to continued success, however, is always the suppleness with which the leadership adjusts to the volatile demands of its following. When there is no identity of Communist and trade union goals, the rapport between leaders and rank and file is strained or vanishes altogether. The same leadership may well reassert itself, but there will always be long periods when the leadership function of the party in its union is virtually non-existent. No Communist lexicon prepares the union officer for this; in fact, a reading of Marxist materials invites him to believe that the most fertile field for the exercise of organizational techniques is the "mass man," the army of industrial workers tied to the same factory, to the same squalid working-class suburb—in a word, the industrial "prole." Subject to the rigid requirements of the party's line as devised to serve political ends, the militant risks losing all influence with the CGT rank and file in attempting to square a transitory political line with the everyday interests of his troops. At the same time, the party holds him responsible for the activities of his union, and for the success or failure of both strikes and political manifestations. Thus the Communist union boss is squeezed between irreconcilable forces; internal crises are precipitated and autocritiques demanded.

This dilemma has reached the highest levels of the CGT hierarchy. The union's crusty General Secretary (and ex officio member of the party's politburo), Benoit Frachon, in preparation for the general strike of April, 1954, sought to generalize the movement by vigorously denying that the CGT's initiative was politically motivated: "Those who try to invent some sort of political manoeuvres on the part of the CGT are themselves fully aware that they are lying."<sup>18</sup> Two months later the unhappy union boss was listening to a searing criticism of the strike, delivered by none other than acting party Secretary Jacques Duclos, from the tribune of the party Congress.<sup>19</sup> The following day Frachon made his own autocritique, admitting (one supposes with fingers crossed) that he had erred in emphasizing the purely material aspect of the strike demands: "... workers are not merely specialists in union affairs, they should apply themselves to the whole line of a class."<sup>20</sup> The veteran party and union militant had attempted to broaden the scope of the strike by appealing to all labor elements, but had been forced to recognize that the party's doctrinaire purposes could not be relegated to a minor theme. As in most such affairs, however, the tempest signalled a new change in party line which recognized too late, perhaps, the difficulties that had produced a damaging admission of internal disharmony. The old saw of union unity was dusted off in the 1954 Congress and pushed with more vigor than at any time since the Liberation.<sup>21</sup> Implicit in this new turning was an undertaking to de-emphasize purely philosophic or doctrinaire differences separating the various elements of the left. (The aim was to reduce Socialist and left-wing Catholic opposition to a few specific short-range goals of Communist policy, i.e., the defeat of EDC and the establishment of an East-West détente.) In arriving at this benevolent position, however, the party had crudely exposed itself not only to its own following, but to the whole French public.

<sup>15</sup> See "La Classe Ouvrière se détache-t-elle du Parti Communiste?," part III of a series by M. P. Hamelet in Le Figaro, Dec. 9, 1954. <sup>16</sup> Ibid.

<sup>17</sup> The best description of this attitude can be found in Val R. Lorwin, The French Labor Movement (Cambridge, 1954), Ch. 9.

Part of the new pose of the CGT is relaxation of controls on discussion of basic issues within the organization. The artificially-created liberal atmosphere reached a somewhat unpromising climax in the annual convention of the union in June of 1955. Two nominally non-Communist union officials were permitted to plead against the general report on economic conditions prepared by the party leadership.<sup>22</sup> That

<sup>18</sup> Le Peuple, April 15, 1954, supplement.

<sup>19</sup> Duclos' speech appears in L'Humanité, June 4, 1954.

<sup>20</sup> Frachon's autocritique appears in L'Humanité, June 5, 1954. Interesting commentary on Frachon's dilemma is contained in the Catholic journal Syndicalisme, June 24, 1954, under the title, "Autour des Déclarations de E. Frachon."

<sup>21</sup> Actually the CGT had initiated this renewed call for unity in its 29th Congress of June 7-12, 1953. For interesting commentary on the party's redoubled enthusiasm for unity of all members of the working class, see L. Rioux, "Une Nouvelle Orientation de la CGT," France Observateur, July 1, 1954.

<sup>22</sup> The opposition, led by Le Brun and Ribard, was spirited, if not widely followed.

their opposition was effectively restricted by the regular Communist leadership suggests that they were given the platform only to dramatize a superficial change in attitudes on internal democracy.<sup>23</sup>

In summary, then, one must conclude that all is not well within the most formidable bastion of the party. The CGT is not weak in numbers nor even in supporters, but as an instrument of party policy it has been dissipating a reputation carefully nurtured during and since the Résistance. It cannot depend on widespread support for party-inspired strikes; its leaders are often compromised by their party attachment. Conversely, what vigor the CGT does possess is probably due to the furious activity of Communist officials and the sheer numerical following which the label CGT commands. The posturing which Communist allegiance imposes on the organization no longer fools anyone. It does not drive the non-Communists or the apathetic into rival unions, but it does reduce the inclination of the rank and file to respond to the bidding of their leaders. Certainly they cannot be counted on for any comprehensive implementation of Communist party aims.

The same general developments can be noted if recent behavior of the PCF as a whole is examined. We have suggested that the Communist presence is now an accepted part of French life. The turbulent excitement of the post-Liberation period, when the PCF was riding a crest of popularity, has long since passed. There are no longer dramatic conversions of prominent intellectuals, announced with flamboyant flourishes in the Press—but there are countless unannounced desertions. The opinion of the party is no longer sought on every issue—it can be accurately foretold by anyone. In a word, the party is becoming “old hat.”

Evidence of declining interest comes not only from professional critics of communism, but also from official reports of the party's own leadership. The last announcement of membership figures (which in themselves are probably inflated) showed 506,250 cards delivered in 1954, as contrasted with 786,855 in 1949 and 907,785 in 1947.<sup>24</sup> Official complaints of the “disappearance of dozens and dozens of cells” indicate

---

Le Brun's Congress speech was reported in full by almost all newspapers June 15, 1955. For a detailed if over-optimistic description of the minority, see “Tendances à la PCF,” France Observateur, June 3, 1954.

<sup>23</sup> The CGT Congress was not allowed to vote on the minority economic report presented by Le Brun and his small following of dissidents, and extraordinary efforts were made to persuade him to accept compromise formulas.

<sup>24</sup> From the report on party organization delivered by Marcel Servin at the 1954 Congress, L'Humanité, June 5, 1954. A rightist paper claimed that only 230,000 cards were distributed in 1955. See Le Figaro, April 27, 1955.

weakness of internal organization.<sup>25</sup> Even the organ L'Humanité is reported as staggering under the double problem of losing the subscriptions of militants and of competition from "bourgeois journals." Editor Étienne Fajon made a full and frank autocritique before the party's Central Committee in late 1954,<sup>26</sup> confessing to a sharp drop of circulation and geographic coverage. Before the war there were two PCF dailies although there are now 15, the total number of readers is not significantly higher. The sales of L'Humanité reached 336,000 in 1937; today the combined sales of all 15 papers is 517,000 (by Communist estimates). In the three departments of the Seine which comprise the Paris region there are only 77,000 subscribers to L'Humanité. Fajon also announced that three-quarters of the Communist electors in the Paris area read other than party dailies. Thirty-two departments have no distribution of Communist provincial newspapers, and in these departments the circulation of L'Humanité is lower than before the war.

Nothing suggests that Fajon's autocritique has produced a more promising upturn in the capacity of the party to beam its message. According to one observer, L'Humanité now exists thanks only to the charity received from its Sunday edition, L'Humanité Dimanche, which is hawked by volunteer militants at high rates.<sup>27</sup> Even the more sophisticated theoretical review, Cahiers du Communisme, has been forced to print its own autocritique—confessing too arid and pretentious an approach, of little direct concern to the average militant.<sup>28</sup> The party's propaganda difficulties were climaxed at the turn of the year by the announcement, not in the official paper, but in France Nouvelle, a semi-popular magazine, that Jeanette Vermeersch, sometime mistress and now wife of aging party boss Maurice Thorez, had assumed direction of the "agitprop" activities of the party.<sup>29</sup> To date "la belle Jeanette," as she is called by more obsequious comrades, has produced no new shakeups, and there are no signs that the informational and educative services of the PCF have improved. In fact, Mme. Vermeersch's elevation is prob-

<sup>25</sup> See L'Humanité, Nov. 22, 1954.

<sup>26</sup> The speech of Fajon before the Committee is contained in his own journal, L'Humanité, Nov. 13, 1954.

<sup>27</sup> See A. Griotteray-Brayance, "Le Parti Communiste en 1955," Monde Nouveau, Jan., 1955, pp. 28-33. Even the eminently successful journal edited specifically for peasants, La Terre, is losing ground. See L. P. Hamelet, "Le Parti Communiste et les Agriculteurs," Le Figaro, April 7, 1955.

<sup>28</sup> The autocritique of the Cahiers is contained in the article by two editors, V. Michaut and M. Limbourg: "À Propos du xxx<sup>e</sup> Anniversaire des Cahiers," Cahiers du Communisme, Vol. 31, preface (Feb., 1955).

<sup>29</sup> A discussion of this curious and somewhat clandestine replastering of party functions can be found in Le Figaro, Jan. 14, 1955.

ably better explained as a tightening of centralized control by organization veterans than as a sincere effort to recoup on the propaganda front.<sup>30</sup>

That the monolithism of the party's structure and its exile in opposition have produced a dry rot eating away at its élan vital is denied by few, even among the most faithful. Even fewer, however, will openly discuss the antics of the highest ranking officers to maintain their privileged positions. The failing Thorez, who unquestionably uses Jeanette Vermeersch as the champion of his own personal power, symbolizes in many ways the present condition of the party. Illness has aged him well beyond his years. (The party's organizational secretary complained at the last Congress that of 100,000 new members in 1954, only 11 per cent were under 25, while 29 per cent were over 50.)<sup>31</sup> He shows increasing fear of inability to maintain his position. The party now finds it necessary for security reasons to house the delegates to its Congress in the homes of faithful Parisian militants, to insist on communal eating arrangements during the three or four days a provincial delegate is in the Paris region, and to grant the platform to only one centrally chosen speaker per delegation.<sup>32</sup> At least one report declares that at the central committee meetings of the party only 15 (out of 75) ever speak, and that they are always the same fifteen.<sup>33</sup>

Only the most obvious symptoms of hardening of the arteries within the PCF have been recorded here. Much remains that is not reducible to documentation. For example, it is still extremely difficult to assess the degree of Communist success with the peasantry. The peasants' cooperative organization, the CGA, has succeeded in ridding itself of most of its Communist officials, but this was a hollow victory since it can no longer boast of widespread support in the countryside.<sup>34</sup> In contrast, while party strength may have waned in many rural areas, it continues to mount slowly south of the Loire, especially in the districts experiencing a decline in population.<sup>35</sup> This development will be considered more fully in a later section of this paper.

Attempts to create a new band of irreconcilable durs out of harried

<sup>30</sup> See below.

<sup>31</sup> See the report of Marcel Servin as reported in L'Humanité, June 4, 1954.

<sup>32</sup> See the interesting commentary on these tight-rein methods in Le Figaro, July 7, 1954. Further rumblings over Servin's inner party police and espionage methods after the Baranes affair are reported in the same paper, Oct. 28, 1954.

<sup>33</sup> This is a report from Unité, the organ of the Le Brun opposition within the CGT, as relayed by Le Populaire, June 28, 1955. The writer was unable to obtain back issues of Unité and cannot, therefore, confirm the authenticity of the source.

<sup>34</sup> See M. P. Hamelet, "Le Parti Communiste et les Agriculteurs," Le Figaro, April 7, 1955. In English the best study is Henry W. Ehrmann, "The French Peasant and Communism," this REVIEW, Vol. 46, pp. 19-43 (March, 1952).

<sup>35</sup> Hamelet, Le Figaro, April 8, 1955.

North Africans, who are, everywhere in France, the least favored of the working class, are meeting with small success.<sup>30</sup> The reasons for failure of the party's appeal to the North Africans are not yet clear. Certainly the PCF has operatives, clandestine and otherwise, in all the nationalist movements, and it can even count on a few battalions of colored marchers to demonstrate on May Day. The religious question may be a serious deterrent to Moslem sympathy, but many Algerian and Moroccan spokesmen will suggest privately that the most telling reservations concern the party's tendency to dominate the leadership cadres of the North Africans by imposing its own functionaries.

The party is in trouble. It is losing its dramatic quality. Rigidity and tight-listed control have produced too many mistakes. A sterile opposition role adds no new lustre to its colors. The powerful assault batteries of the CGT are no longer the fearful organisms they were in 1947 and 1948. Because of the party's ubiquitous presence everywhere in French society, it has become for many a bore. But there are deeper and more threatening fissures opening between the party and the French public. These reflect the incapacity of the Communists—because of the doctrines with which they are encumbered—to adjust themselves to new forces that are beginning to fracture the centuries-old crust of France's social and economic structure. Some observations on these changes will be presented in the section that follows.

II

So far this discussion has been concerned with the description of a decaying colossus—a colossus so mighty that even serious difficulties weaken it relatively little in relation to competing forces. The substantial residue of power which the Communists still dispose risks further compromise from a peril even more grave than bureaucratization, nepotism, and the shrivelling effects of long years of political isolation. That danger is contained in the present ideological posture of the party. This section has as its theme the relationship between the doctrinal position of the PCF and the current social context of France. It is too early as yet to be certain that the two are badly out of joint, but the sclerosis induced by organizational malaise would seem to make adjustment to societal changes more difficult.

First of all, why pursue the question of ideology? Are not the creeds of parties (especially French parties) less important than the historical locus they establish for themselves? Do the rank and file really follow the twists and turns of doctrinal development—especially those springing from Marxian dialectics? The same questions can be phrased more simply: is not the PCF better known as a symbol of the Résistance than as a faithful conveyor of the Moscow line? Is not the thorough and painstaking organization of Communist communes and municipalities more telling on election day than the brilliance of a rhetorical defense of Marxist art by Aragon before the Central Committee? Perhaps so, but if in the long run inconsistencies between the imposed ideological line and concrete, observable social fact become too marked, the party risks losing its position in the mainstream of history. One suspects that the Soviet leaders are beginning to recognize this danger, but can they unwind the ideological rack on which they have bound their subordinate national units?

<sup>30</sup> The best English treatment of this question is David S. McLellan, "The North African in France," Yale Review, Vol. 44, pp. 421-38 (Spring, 1955). See also A. Vielle-Michel, "L'Évolution des Travailleurs Musulmans en France," Esprit, Vol. 23, pp. 864-84 (May, 1955).

It is from this perspective that the present ideological posture of the party is important as an index of its overall health. We shall explore only one point in the current theoretical offering of French communism. This precept is, conveniently, the most vulnerable, but it is also the most difficult to abridge, to "correct" later, and even if next week it is suppressed it cannot easily be evaporated in a "memory hole." Should it be erased, there would be little left of Marxian economic theory. This postulate is the much discussed "absolute and relative impoverishment of the masses"—the axis of current Communist philosophy in France.

The pauperization theme, as it is known, was revitalized by Maurice Thorez when he took up the cudgels to answer a speech by Douglas Dillon, the United States Ambassador to France, delivered in New York in January, 1955.<sup>37</sup> The Ambassador had remarked on "a new economic turning" for France, commenting favorably on the rise in productivity, the general steadiness of employment, and visible evidences of increased purchasing power of the working class. The bitter response of the Communist leader unleashed a host of other criticisms elaborating on the basic pauperization theme.<sup>38</sup> Thorez' argument revolved around the classic Marxist maxim of the existence of two polar forces—the one, the capitalist bourgeoisie in full process of concentration; the other, the working class undergoing rapid and absolute impoverishment. The rising productivity rate he admitted, but ascribed it to mechanized production; increase in hours worked, and the "speed up." Thus, rising productivity and even availability of more goods to the working class are achieved by a more intense process of exploitation. Finally, Thorez insisted that the much vaunted new productive capacity pales into insignificance when compared with gains in Germany, Britain, the United States, and the Soviet Union.

<sup>37</sup> Dillon's speech is reported in The New York Times, Jan. 15, 1955.

<sup>38</sup> Thorez' original statement on pauperization appeared in Cahiers du Communisme, Vol. 31, pp. 259-79 (March, 1955), under the title, "La Situation Économique de la France." The line is further developed by Thorez under the title "Nouvelles Données sur la Pauperisation," Cahiers du Communisme, Vol. 31, pp. 803-26 (July, 1955). Official technical elaborations of the doctrine are offered by several writers in various issues of Économie et Politique, Vol. 2, 1955. For an interesting Socialist (and neo-Marxist) criticism of the new line, see P. Rimbert, "Pauperisation et Niveau de Vie des Travailleurs, I," La Revue Socialiste, Vol. 88, pp. 179-84 (July, 1955).

The Thorez blast was in part an answer to Dillon. It was also indicative of the party's concern over the seemingly enthusiastic response by all French classes to the Mendès-France program.<sup>39</sup> If the popular premier symbolized anything, it was the capacity to abandon artificial and limiting strictures on political and economic policy. The Communist boss was in effect warning the faithful against the seductions of Mendésisme—reminding them that a clear understanding of classical Marxist economic theory would forestall disillusionment in the future.<sup>40</sup> In a way, it was an appealing tocsin because it played on the eternal sentiment of the downtrodden that things are really as bad as they fear—if not worse. On the other hand, it was certainly a message of hopelessness if the visible omens of better times were illusory and no call to revolution was practicable.

It was, in fact, around the question of "abandonment to despair" that opposition within the CGT was roused in 1955.<sup>41</sup> Pierre Le Brun (even though he may have been playing the role of "straw man" for "new party democracy") voiced misgivings about following the Thorez line to this final logical absurdity. The minority spokesman presented his case in advance of the June CGT Congress in a written interview pleading for a constructive attitude. He asked how the French people could be marshalled against the orthodox program of increased productivity and free convertibility and at the same time be expected to oppose the Mendès-France program of technical progress, planned investment, and full employment. By opposing everything, he charged, "Do we not risk appearing to be protectionists conservatives, opponents of all progress?"<sup>42</sup> Failure to meet the challenge of the Mendès-France experience would, he added, "be to play the game of our adversaries . . .

<sup>39</sup> The relationship of Mendès-France to the Left in general is the subject of a number of articles in the special issue of the Sartre-edited Les Temps Modernes, Vol. 10 (Nos. 112-13), 1955, entitled "La Gauche." See especially the articles by Lavau, Neville, and Martinet.

<sup>40</sup> There is an interesting critique of the pauperization doctrine from this point of view in the pro-Mendès-France weekly France Observateur, March 3, 1955, under the title "Durcissement au Parti Communiste."

<sup>41</sup> See above, part I.

<sup>42</sup> Le Brun's position before the Congress is given full treatment by J. Armel, "CGT," France Observateur, April 7, 1955. See also M. P. Hamelot, "Conflict du Doctrine à la CGT," Le Figaro, April 22, 1955.

those who wish to relegate us to isolation, sectarianism, weakness." He suggested that militant action by the working class itself might hold in check the law of pauperization of the masses.

In rejoinder, the party leadership coldly reminded him to reread his Marx, and especially his "little Lenin library."<sup>43</sup> Almost all of the top CGT officials condemned the Le Brun position on the floor of the Congress, but the most interesting and revealing criticisms were made by a member of the party politburo, Francois Billoux:

The good apostles of class collaboration pretend that the communists condemn the workers to despair. It is precisely the Socialist chiefs who, by their sermons on the acceptance, submission to, and resignation before the possibility of definitive and successive ameliorations [in the standard of living], try to dissuade the workers from renouncing forever the capitalist regime.<sup>44</sup>

A few days later Louis Saillant, General Secretary of the Communist-dominated Fédération Syndicale Mondiale, was quoted: "The modernization of the economy can only accentuate the enrichment of the rich and the impoverishment of the poor."<sup>45</sup>

Floods of propaganda elaborating on the new emphasis have poured out of party offices. Because Dillon and others made a special point of the ability of French workers to buy scooters, motorcycles, and even automobiles, Communist spokesmen have been particularly anxious to dispel the notion that this is an indication of relative well-being. The official explanation seems to be that workers buy these things not because they can afford them, or because they have "bourgeois desires" to enjoy the freedom and mobility gained by owning a Renault or a Vespa, but because they find them in the long run a cheaper means of transportation to and from work than the metro or the bus. (Fares have been priced out of normal range by "reckless, anti-social policies of bourgeois government."<sup>46</sup>) This neat trick of logic turns the purchase of a vehicle by the French worker into another measure of his impoverishment.<sup>47</sup>

<sup>43</sup> Before the Congress the party let go a couple of its biggest guns against the "Le Brun opposition" in editorials by Benoit Frachon, the CGT General Secretary, in L'Humanité, May 3, 1955, and by Jeanette Vermeersch, in L'Humanité, May 10, 1955.

<sup>44</sup> L'Humanité, July 2, 1955.

<sup>45</sup> L'Humanité, July 4, 1955.

<sup>46</sup> This was the explanation offered by Marcel Servin at the Central Committee meeting of the party in September, 1955.

<sup>47</sup> Estimates of automobile ownership in France are difficult to come by. However, 2,087,900 private cars were licensed in 1955—certainly a low ratio compared to the total population. A better picture of French "motorization" can be obtained by adding the 3,135,000 velomotors, scooters, motorcyclettes, and motorcycles. The combined figures suggest a rough ratio of one unit for every eight persons. Statistics on registration appear in the automobile trade journal, L'Argus, May 19, 1955, supplement.

While these prophecies of doom are being disseminated from every party rostrum, the French economy has continued to improve. Evidence of greater working-class security and comfort is fairly widespread. Nevertheless, real social and economic inequities persist. The advances which have been made are spotty and largely confined to urban areas. In addition, external difficulties might undermine economic recovery at any time. For the moment, however there is no denying that considerable improvements have been recorded in a number of fields, and that the worker's lot has been ameliorated in most industrial centers.<sup>48</sup>

In fact, French society as a whole (and especially that sector of it hitherto most susceptible to Communist pressure) is going through an evolution for which party ideologies are unprepared. The process of change is difficult to follow with real precision, but some indications suggest themselves as markers of the future. The most striking social trend in modern France, that is, the steady increase in urbanization, is of long standing.<sup>49</sup>

More recent trends include rapid growth of service industries and the overall rising skill level of the working force. These developments suggest new opportunities for social mobility, and, in consequence, the importance of re-evaluating worker psychology. Roughly 20 per cent of the active population, or one-third of all salaried workers, now fall into the occupational category which the French call employé, that is, those employed in clerical, commercial, and distributive activities.<sup>50</sup> Of this group, nearly a quarter are sons and daughters of working-class fathers.<sup>51</sup> Here the Communist appeal has never been warmly received, and the organizational task of the party is complicated by the absence of large, closely assembled groups of militants in a single plant.

<sup>48</sup> Although wages as such are still at dismally low levels, and in some cases barely equal to those of prewar France, two other factors are important in assessing the condition of industrial workers. First is the increase in total take-home pay due to allocations familiales or social benefit payments, amounting in some cases to a sum equivalent to wages. Second, except for scattered areas, employment has been high since the war, with no disastrous lean periods to dissipate small savings. Furthermore, since 1952 there has been considerable success in halting inflation. For details, see J. Dumontier, "La Conjoncture Économique à la Fin 1954," Économie et Équité Mondiales, Jan., 1955, pp. 21-23; J. Romeuf, "Les Salaires en France en 1955," Les Cahiers Économiques, Jan., 1955, p. 23; and the anonymous analysis, "L'Évolution Écarter des Revenus Salariaux Modestes en France," Études et Conjonctures, Aug. 8, 1955.

<sup>49</sup> There are interesting comparative figures of all principal French cities and their suburban towns for the years 1936, 1946, 1954 in Annuaire Statistique de la France 1953 (1954 ed.), Vol. 60, N.S. #2, Paris, Institut National de la Statistique, Table I, pp. X-XIII.

<sup>50</sup> M. Collinet, Essai sur la Condition Ouvrière (Paris, 1951), p. 55. Explicit details of occupational divisions in 1954 are available in Bulletin Hebdomadaire de Statistique, Institut National de la Statistique, Paris, #369, Mar. 28, 1955.

<sup>51</sup> M. Fresard, "La Mobilité Sociale en France," Cahiers Français d'Information, Jan.-Feb., 1952, p. 18.

As the commercial and service sector of the economy continues to expand, manufacturing is also expanding, but at a slower rate. The distribution of skill groups within this sector is significant in itself for social change. Unskilled workers are no longer an important proportion of the total, and semi-skilled or specialized workers, although still predominant, are not increasing in numbers as fast as are professional workers and technicians.<sup>52</sup> The modest beginnings of automation and other progressive industrial techniques promise an acceleration of this process.

The general rise of the skill median in industry might well lead to a new social role for the industrial worker. More technical training is becoming available; in some quarters union leaders will admit privately that as factory conditions become less onerous, workers are willing to work overtime for a higher take-home pay. Greater security from unemployment and somewhat higher earnings by the industrial working class explain in large part heavy purchases of consumer goods in the last year.<sup>53</sup> Apparently one strong impulse is to "motorize" by buying, usually on credit, a motor bike or scooter. This in turn enables the worker to escape, occasionally, the most repressive features of urban industrial living—and, incidentally, to dodge the Communist party militant who would occupy his evenings and weekends with party entertainment and party propaganda.

Something like the process of "privatization" of interest, which Otto Kirchheimer has described as taking place in postwar Germany, may also be unfolding in France.<sup>54</sup> For the nation as a whole, this would not be surprising, but for the French worker, whose public life has been marked traditionally by violent strikes, demonstrations, and class solidarity, it represents something of a revolution. Working-class consciousness is by no means dead, but as a rallying cry some of its pungency has disappeared. Almost despite its revolutionary heritage, the working class seems to be adapting to basic changes in occupational character. Whatever new patterns of economic or social behavior finally do take root in French society (and the long-run significance of the trends discussed above are not yet clear), they make mockery of the Communists' pauperization theme.

<sup>52</sup> Of every 1,000 workers in 1901, 440 were engaged in raw material production, 373 in manufacturing, and 187 in service industries. In 1951 the figures were, respectively, 330, 415, 255. See the chart of these changes in M. Collinet, "Structure des Classes Salariées en France depuis Cinquante Ans," Revue Internationale du Travail, March, 1953, pp. 229-52. Other useful statistics may be found in P. Bleton, "Mouvement Économique et Évolution Social," Économie et Humanisme, July-Aug., 1955.

<sup>53</sup> See "Economic Conditions in France," published by the Organization for European Economic Cooperation, Paris (Nov., 1955). This report indicates (p. 8) that nearly two-thirds of the 1955 increase in production was absorbed by private consumption.

<sup>54</sup> Otto Kirchheimer, "Notes on the Political Scene in West Germany," World Politics, Vol. 6, pp. 306-21 (April, 1954).

III

Continued alienation of Frenchmen from Communist discipline depends only in part on the degree to which the party makes unrealistic demands on its followers' credibility. Another important factor is whether a period of relative domestic tranquillity will afford business and government opportunity to "lift the face" of the economy.<sup>55</sup> Whether an economic recession would enable the Communist party to regain its position as a central institution in French life, capable of competing successfully with traditional symbols to which Frenchmen owe their loyalty, such as the Republic, the democratic ideal, or devotion to intellectual independence, is doubtful. Too much has been lost by the party in terms of broad national appeal. Certainly it will remain strong in the industrial areas where its organization is most effective.

There might even be an opportunity for the party to gain real strength in the backwater rural districts, where the decline in the number of Communist cells has been less marked than in urban areas.<sup>56</sup> More than a million French peasants have holdings within the five-to-twenty hectare range, and many of them are engaged in bare subsistence farming. In départements where such farms are characteristic, especially in southeast France, the percentage of Communist votes runs as high as anywhere in the country.<sup>57</sup> Although soil productivity is unquestionably low, poverty is more often the consequence of apparent inability to take advantage of new techniques and markets. Should the youth of these backward areas be drawn away to decentralized industries and services now establishing in provincial cities, the "abandoned" districts may grow even further apart from the dynamic areas of the French economy.<sup>58</sup> Increasing isolation could make large sectors of rural France a fruitful hunting ground for the party.

If the drift away from the party is to continue, the path to those

<sup>55</sup> At least the O.E.E.C. is not altogether optimistic about the continuance of an untroubled prosperity in the context of present fiscal practices. See note 53, above.

<sup>56</sup> See the report of the 1953 Party Congress statistics in "Le Communisme en France," Bulletin de l'Association d'Études et d'Informations Politiques Internationales (March 1-15, 1955), p. 25.

<sup>57</sup> See the interesting statistics compiled by M. P. Hamelet, "Le Parti Communiste et les Agriculteurs," Le Figaro, April 9-10, 1955. A general survey of the poorer peasants' disposition to follow the party may be found in Ehrmann, "The French Peasant and Communism" (cited in note 34). See also François Goguel, "Pourquoi les Français Votent comme Ils le Font," The French Review, Vol. 30, pp. 318-33 (Feb., 1955).

<sup>58</sup> Interesting commentary on the new form of industrialization coming to the provinces is contained in the case study by J. Goulet, Naissance d'une Grande Cité: Le Mans au Milieu du XX<sup>e</sup> Siècle (Paris, 1953). For a warning that the western half of France might become an agricultural backwater, see A. Philip, "France's Economic Situation," Yale French Studies, No. 15, pp. 87-98 (Winter, 1954-55).

occupational and economic activities which are commercial, or of a higher skill level, and, more importantly, "middle-class" in psychological orientation, must be kept open. Lack of social fluidity is still the key problem of French life. Evidence abounds, both statistical and of the type immediately apparent to the casual tourist, to demonstrate that movement between class levels and social strata, although growing, is still highly restricted. The most telling index is educational opportunity. Technical training is now more widely offered, but the formal educational process shows only slight change in recent years. In a sample poll taken in 1952 of 3,000 French industrial workers, none had entered the stage supérieur or higher education, although 13 out of every 100 had had some form of technical education.<sup>59</sup> Eight of every 100 had advanced past primary schooling.<sup>60</sup> A recent survey of university students revealed that 2.3 per cent of those enrolled in state universities were the sons and daughters of skilled workers, as compared to 18.7 per cent who were the children of the lowest ranking employés and petits fonctionnaires.<sup>61</sup> Sixty-five per cent of successful candidates for the National School of Administration, which provides France with its top bureaucrats and managers, were from the highest socio-economic group—industrialists and top-flight technical specialists. Only 3.3 per cent came from working-class homes, and none from unskilled or farm labor parentage.<sup>62</sup>

The figures cited above are somewhat more comprehensible when it is remembered that there are few opportunities for student employment or scholarship aid in France. In the Paris region, for example, out of 140,000 secondary and advanced students only 15,705 were receiving any sort of official scholarship aid in a typical postwar year.<sup>63</sup> The principal path to advancement is still through the traditional two-generation process. A modest post in some administrative office may be open to the worker's son with little education, but only his grandson may anticipate sufficient education for a significant advance up the social ladder. The steady movement toward tertiary occupations will doubtless exacerbate the urge for mobility. An infusion of new blood into the élite has long been a real need in professedly democratic France.

<sup>59</sup> Ibid. "La Mobilité Sociale en France" (cited in note 51).

<sup>60</sup> Ibid. The writer cites a more recent survey in the Seine (Paris) region, in which five per cent of the lycée students were of working-class origin. T. Bottomore, "La Mobilité Sociale dans la Haute Administration Française," Cahiers Internationaux de Sociologie, Vol. 12, pp. 157-71 (1952).

<sup>61</sup> P. L. Hauraud, "Le Rôle du Facteur Humain dans la 'Stagnation' de l'Économie Française," Économique Revue de l'Économie Contemporaine, Vol. 4 (July, 1954).

<sup>62</sup> See Miossi, "The Bases of Communist Strength in France" (cited in note 1), and Bottomore, op. cit.

<sup>63</sup> From Le Monde quoted by Bottomore, op. cit.

The pressures and counter-pressures beginning to operate in this area of social and economic activity should be crucial to the survival of the "middle-class urge" at the expense of the Communist emphasis on working-class consciousness.

One further word should be added in assessing the impact of Communist power and its adaptability to contemporary French moods. Perhaps the Communists are out of step; perhaps, to push the argument to its logical extreme, their influence will evaporate in the face of powerful social drives for the status and semi-security of petit bourgeois living. If so, there remains the unpleasant possibility that the PCF has already accomplished too much. There may be nothing to take the party's place for those who abandon it. Years of bombast fired at the "criminal Republic" and all its works have added imperceptibly to the Frenchman's normal disdain for government in any form, and particularly for the government in power. The crisis of civic conscience cannot but sharpen for those who, consciously or not, have drunk deeply of Communist propaganda.<sup>64</sup> The Communist peace theme has deeply affected attitudes on foreign issues. The fact that France's foreign policy dilemma has centered on the emotionally unpopular issues of German rearmament, the Indo-Chinese conflict, and maintenance of the colonial presence in North Africa plays into Communist hands.<sup>65</sup> This is not to say that neutralism has entirely triumphed in the battle for Frenchmen's opinions on international matters, but rather that Communist persistence has strengthened it.<sup>66</sup> The real winner in the struggle that has been going on since Liberation may be the grey hosts of complete political irresponsibility and disaffection from public life. Powerful drives for new status may spell the collapse of Communist power. These urges, overemphasizing the ignoble French middle-class preoccupation with material security and private interests, may, however, also prove a danger, not only for France, but for all Western Democracy.

<sup>64</sup> That this problem seriously preoccupies French leaders is demonstrated by the tone and content of the papers offered at the annual lay Catholic national meeting held in 1954. See Crise du Pouvoir et Crise du Crisme, Chronique Sociale de France, Collection Semaines Sociales de France (à Rennes) (Paris, 1954), especially the articles by Aubry, Savatier, Delouvrier, Thézé, Boudel, and Simon.

<sup>65</sup> For interesting commentary on the party's ability to capitalize on these issues see Griotteray-Brayance, "Le Parti Communiste en 1955," (cited in note 27). For a lengthy, and in places brilliant statement of the fellow-travelling camp see J-P. Sartre's report, "Les Communistes et le Paix" in various issues of Les Temps Modernes, Vols. 8 and 9 (1953 and 1954).

<sup>66</sup> Some recent views on this subject may be found in John T. Marcus, "Neutralism in France," Review of Politics, Vol. 17, pp. 295-328 (Summer, 1955).

AN INTRODUCTION TO THE SENATE POLICY COMMITTEES

HUGH A. BONE

University of Washington

The subject of party responsibility for public policy in Congress has commanded much attention among political scientists. Creation of the Senate party policy committees in 1947 with legal sanction and public appropriations was heralded by some political scientists as a major step in the direction of centralizing and evolving a so-called party program. These committees have now been in operation for nine years, during which the Republican and Democratic bodies have each served about the same amount of time in the majority and minority. The committees may be said to have passed the experimental stage. Notwithstanding this, there is a paucity of material, both descriptive and analytical, concerning their operations.

In 1951 extensive hearings were held to evaluate the operation of the Legislative Reorganization Act.<sup>1</sup> Yet none of the three Democratic Policy Committee chairmen—Senators Barkley, Lucas, and McFarland, nor any member of their staffs appeared to testify. Senator Robert A. Taft, Republican Policy Committee Chairman, made no reference to his committee when discussing the Act. His staff director, George H. E. Smith, made relatively brief comments about the policy committee, and these were directed primarily to the need for additional help for his overburdened staff. Robert Heller and political scientist George B. Galloway had only a few comments to make on the subject. Indeed, it is remarkable that in over 650 pages of testimony the policy committees received so little attention. In answer to a questionnaire on congressional reorganization only seven out of 80 senators and representatives who replied indicated that priority should be given to the question of majority-minority policy committees.<sup>2</sup>

I. PROBLEMS OF STUDY AND METHODOLOGY

The policy committees themselves have preferred to operate unobtrusively and to hide their light under a bushel. Even within the Senate, they more or less consciously remain in the background. One freshman senator noted that during his first session he had little awareness of the committee and was never approached by a member of the committee on any matter of policy. All meetings are in secret, and only members and the staff director are present. It is almost impossible for the outsider to obtain information on the real workings of either committee, since no staff member or senator has prepared data on the subject for publication. The Republican Policy Committee has made available for public distribution the party conference rules and a brief mimeographed statement outlining the functions of the committee.<sup>3</sup> Its Democratic counterpart has nothing available on either rules or functions. A major reason for preferring to operate in an unpublicized, sub-surface manner is to avoid giving the impression that the committee is "laying down a party line" or trying to bind its members in the Senate.

<sup>1</sup> Hearings on Evaluation of the Effects of Laws Enacted to Reorganize the Legislative Branch of the Government before the Senate Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, 82nd Cong., 1st sess.

<sup>2</sup> Ibid., p. 7. It may be observed that few textbooks more than mention these committees. George B. Galloway in The Legislative Process in Congress (New York, 1953) gives some attention to the subject (pp. 334-37, 602-5). Perhaps the aspirations for the policy committees are best expressed in the so-called Heller Report prepared for the National Planning Association under the title Strengthening the Congress (1944); pp. 14-17. For Mr. Heller's critical evaluation of the composition and operation of these committees in practice, see Hearings (cited in note 1), pp. 287-90.

While minutes of the policy committee meetings are kept, they are not made public and are unavailable to the scholar. In the 83rd Congress, a résumé of Republican Committee discussions was provided to all Republican senators but not to the general public. Such summaries of the Democratic meetings have never been prepared. Communication on what was discussed in the policy committee is largely through word of mouth. Each senator reports informally to other senators. Press correspondents usually wait outside the committee room for the chairman to emerge from the meeting. At this time the Democratic chairman sometimes gives out statements or reports certain items which were considered. Republican chairmen have customarily held press conferences after the meetings. Individual policy committee members sometimes render information on promise of having their names withheld.<sup>4</sup> These persons are the only ones who promote information.

Because of the absence of official records, public statements by spokesmen for the policy committees, and articles by staff members and journalists, the ordinary methods of the social scientist and social psychologist are unproductive for the study of policy committees. Quantification techniques, attitude and sociometric measurements, content analysis and the like, are usable for only a very few isolated aspects of the committees' activities. Moreover, these methods are capable of yielding but little data helpful to the political scientist desiring to understand and to conceptualize the role and procedures of the policy bodies. "Institutionalists" and "behaviorists" alike are bound to be frustrated in their studies of the committees. Because of the individualism of the Senate and the importance of interpersonal influence, uniformities and regularities are hard to find and generalizations difficult to make. There is scarcely enough

<sup>3</sup> See "Republican Conference Rules, January 11, 1955" and "Functions of the Senate Republican Policy Committee and Work of Its Staff," August, 1953.

<sup>4</sup> Typical of press reports is the story in the Washington Post and Times Herald, March 30, 1955, which reported on a three-hour Democratic Policy Committee meeting in such terms as these: "A Democratic spokesman, who asked not to be identified, said Democrats have no intention of handing Mr. Eisenhower an ultimatum . . . What disturbed the Senate Democrats, one of their number said, was the recurrent pattern of so-called 'leaks' about which the President knew nothing . . . Deeply irritated by the conflicting stories, the Democratic spokesman said . . ." The remarkable thing about this report is that Senator Lyndon Johnson, the committee chairman, gave out no statement and his name appeared nowhere in the column-long article.

knowledge and information upon which to formulate hypotheses capable of being tested by empirical research.<sup>5</sup>

Ralph K. Huitt has utilized the status and role theory successfully to study and to explain a congressional committee.<sup>6</sup> Such an approach, if it could be used, would be a productive one for studying policy committees. But the latter, unlike standing committees, hold no open hearings and afford no opportunity for examination of their records or actions. First-hand observation, moreover, is impossible.

When other methods are unavailable, unusable, or inappropriate, interviewing to elicit information, impressions, and expressions of opinion must be utilized. The interviewer soon finds that senators who are members of the policy committees are reluctant to discuss some of the most fundamental aspects of committee operations. Strategy to be effective often has to be secret, and confidentiality is an integral part of the rules of the game in the Senate. Senators are unlikely to reveal the basic secrets even to their own administrative assistants, let alone to the outside investigator. Hence those trying to obtain a picture of the policy committees must also gather and evaluate the more readily available information in the form of hearsay judgments, impressions, and even gossip from nonmembers.

Notwithstanding the handicaps, an interest in the policy committees tempted the writer to bring together here diverse fugitive materials and information on them. Except for the very few descriptive materials which can be "documented," this is largely an impressionistic product, an attempt to sift contradictions, and to weave together confirmations.<sup>7</sup> The writer has two purposes in mind in this presentation. First, an effort is made to record some of the most important details about this little known congressional institution in the hope additional studies may be encouraged. Second, an attempt is made to develop a few general theories about the action of the policy committees.

II. CREATION, COMPOSITION, AND DEVELOPMENT

The Joint Committee on the Organization of Congress reported that "strong <sup>5</sup> An interesting question confronting the "behaviorists" is the amount of information and impression required before an acceptable hypothesis capable of verification can be drafted. The writer resists any temptation to deal with this question except to observe that he has seen no hypothesizing about the policy committees. Whether this is due to lack of information about the committees, a lack of interest in them, or something else, is not known.

<sup>6</sup> See "The Congressional Committee: A Case Study," this Review, Vol. 48, pp. 340-65 (June, 1954).

<sup>7</sup> The writer gathered this material in 1954-55. Several senators who were on the policy committees and several ex-members were interviewed. Interviews with senators were necessarily brief and unstandardized, and unstructured questions were used in order to elicit information which, in the writer's judgment, the senator was best able to provide. In addition, the writer observed the staffs at work, talked at some length with many staff members of both committees, and sought the views of numerous administrative assistants and other people on the "Hill." By agreement, none of the senators or staff members are quoted. Evaluations, judgments, and errors of fact are entirely the author's.

recommendations" had been made to it concerning the need for the formal expression within the Congress of the main policies of the majority and minority parties. These representations called for some mechanism capable of bringing about more party accountability for policies and platform pledges. The committee recommended the creation of policy committees "to formulate over-all legislative policy of the two parties."<sup>8</sup> The Senate accepted this proposal as it was incorporated in the Legislative Reorganization Bill, but the House deleted it. The Senate, however, created such committees for itself by attaching an item in the Legislative Branch Appropriation Act.<sup>9</sup>

In preceding congresses the Republicans had made considerable use of a steering committee under the leadership of Senator Robert A. Taft. This body was simply converted, with few changes, into the Republican Policy Committee. Senator Taft became chairman of the new committee and retained the position until he became majority floor leader in 1953. Taft did not wish to hold both positions and Senator William Knowland took over the committee chairmanship. Upon the death of Senator Taft a few months later, Senator Knowland followed the precedent set by Taft and relinquished the chairmanship to Senator Homer Ferguson.

Democratic practice has been quite different. The Senate floor leadership, the chairmanship of the Democratic Policy Committee, and the chairmanship of the Democratic caucus have been held by the same person, while the Republicans fill the offices with three different persons. The first Democratic chairman, Senator Alben Barkley, made little use of the committee because he saw no need for it. He handled policy and leadership matters to his satisfaction. Senators Lucas, McFarland, and Johnson, who succeeded him, convened the committee fairly regularly. Both committees generally meet weekly while the Senate is in session.

The size and complexion of the Republican committee have undergone considerable change. From the beginning several officials have been ex officio members—the chairman and secretary of the Republican Conference, the floor leader, the whip, the president pro tempore of the Senate (if a Republican) and, of course, the policy committee chairman. The remainder are nominated by the chairman of the Conference and ratified by it. Senators have the privilege of sending suggestions for nomination to the chairman.<sup>10</sup> The fact that the party officials are on the committee has guaranteed that persons with seniority and a generally conservative orientation dominate its membership. In response to complaints of freshman senators, Senator Taft added two younger persons to the committee in 1949. There were nine senators on the first policy committee and the number was raised to 11 during the 81st and to 12 in the 82nd and 83rd Congresses.

<sup>8</sup> For discussion of recommendations concerning the establishment of the policy committees, see Report of the Joint Committee on the Organization of Congress Pursuant to H. Con. Res. 18, 79th Cong., 2d sess. Report No. 1011, March 4, 1946, pp. 12–13.

<sup>9</sup> 80 Stat. 911, 79th Cong., 2d sess. The committees are charged with "the formulation of over-all legislative policy of the respective parties" and are given a staff "to assist in study, analysis, and research on problems involved in policy determinations." Appropriations for the committees have been gradually increased and in 1954 each received an annual appropriation of $74,760.

<sup>10</sup> See "Republican Conference Rules" (cited in note 3). All of the Republican party officers are chosen by the Conference.

Senator Ferguson's defeat in 1954, plus the loss of majority control of the Senate, led to considerable reorganization at the beginning of the 84th Congress. Styles Bridges, who had been president pro tempore of the Senate during the 83rd Congress, was chosen as chairman of the Republican Policy Committee. In a surprise move it was decided to make every Republican senator up for re-election in 1956 a member of the committee. Two others were added,<sup>11</sup> making a total of 23 on the committee. A major purpose of this move was to give the prestige of being on the "policy body" to each person running for re-election. With this move, which virtually doubled the size of the committee and put on it about half the Republican membership in the Senate, the body obviously could no longer be regarded as a small one concerned with legislative planning and scheduling. The composition of the committee insured that it would be an agency strongly sensitive to the political realities of the forthcoming 1956 election.

The committee's composition in the 84th Congress appeared to have one additional virtue. It brought onto the committee (by coincidence) many ranking members of standing committees. Ten of the 15 committee chairmen during the 83rd Congress were included, thereby insuring that the policy body would be kept apprised of developments within many important committees.

Senators serve on the Republican Policy Committee for two years and are not eligible to succeed themselves, but may be reelected after two years have intervened. However, since all of the party officers are on the committee ex officio, several have served many years. Senator Millikin, by reason of being Conference chairman, has served on the committee since its creation. Senator Saltonstall, who became the whip in 1949, and Senators Young and Bridges have served several terms. During the 82nd and 83rd Congresses there was a fairly adequate sectional representation on the committee and a balance between the larger and smaller states.

In sharp contrast, membership on the Democratic Policy Committee has no terminal point and has tended to be self-perpetuating. Turnover has occurred when there were changes in the three ex officio members (the floor leader, the whip, and the caucus secretary) or when members dropped out of the Senate. The number on the committee has remained at nine. Three who were appointed in 1947—Green, Hill, and Russell—have served without interruption until the present. Senators Johnson, Clements, and Kerr were first put on the committee in the 82nd Congress and have continued to serve ever since. The remaining three members on the committee in 1956 were Senators Hennings, Murray, and Hayden.

The six members appointed to the committee were chosen presumably on the basis of seniority, points of view, and geography. But its membership in the 84th Congress lacked the broad sectional basis of its Republican counterpart. Although there were four Democratic senators from the West Coast (two each from Oregon and Washington), the area was not represented. There were also none from the Midwest, despite Democratic representation from such large states as Illinois, Michigan, and Minnesota (and from Iowa and Ohio in the preceding Congress). Senator Green of Rhode Island was the sole member from New England and the Middle Atlantic States, although there are Democratic senators from his own state, New York, Massachusetts, and Delaware. Conversely, the Southern and Border states had seven of the nine members. In terms of Democratic representation in the Senate, of course, the Southern and Border states can argue that they provide two-thirds of the membership and are entitled to a lion's share of the representation on the policy body. Nevertheless, the needs of certain important Northern interests have no impressive voice on the committee. One member of the Democratic Policy Committee, however, sees it as operating in the "country as a whole" and as simply a part of the process of reconciling sectional and factional differences within the party. It may be noted that extremists have been left off the committee and that moderates compose the membership. Except for this, diverse points of view are reasonably well represented on the committee.

<sup>11</sup> Senators Alexander Smith and Margaret Chase Smith.

The policy committees have been personal rather than institutional leadership devices. When Lyndon Johnson was absent for several weeks early in 1955 due to illness, the Democratic Policy Committee did not even meet. After his heart attack in July, the committee met long enough to prepare a statement that it would carry out "his policies." Most chairmen in both parties have used the policy committees at their own discretion. When Senator Scott Lucas of Illinois served as floor leader, he was confronted with the necessity of obtaining cooperation from Southern Senators and made considerable use of the committee as an agent for broadening the basis of his leadership.

In Democratic circles on the Hill the Democratic Policy Committee is often spoken of as the "personal staff of Senator Johnson."<sup>12</sup> Johnson is highly successful as a floor leader. He tries to foster a type of discussion among Democrats which will end in friendship rather than in splitting the party. He uses the policy body to work for a large Democratic vote and to keep the party together. In recent years Democratic leaders have feared that the caucus would lead to quarrelsome debates and create party disunity so a caucus has been held only at the beginning of a session. In the interim the policy committee is used to a considerable extent to eliminate the need for convening the caucus. The fact that the floor leadership and policy committee chairmanship are held by the same person has tended to make the committee an instrument of the leadership. The staff of the Democratic Policy Committee serves also as the staff for the duties of the chairman as floor leader.

<sup>12</sup> Senator Johnson generally directs the staff work. In the Republican committee, allocation of the staff work is usually handled by the staff director and secretary, Lloyd W. Jones.

Although both party committees are instruments of personal leadership, the Republican body has been considerably less personal. After Taft gave up the chairmanship, the Republican Policy Committee gave more thought to its own corporate nature and tried to institutionalize itself. By having its own chairman, and by maintaining separate identities for its floor leader and conference chairman, the policy group avoids becoming exclusively the tool or personal staff of the chairman. Leadership of the Senate Republicans is pro forma more highly dispersed. Institutionalization has also been fostered by prescribing rules for democratic election and concerning this committee's membership; by issuing a public statement on the functions of the committee and the staff; and by providing that none except the ex officio members are eligible to successive terms on the committee.

III. GENERAL OPERATION AND STAFF WORK

From the foregoing discussion, it is obvious that there is a substantial difference between the two policy committees. Nowhere have the Democrats set down the functions for their policy committee; hence a normative judgment is difficult if not impossible. The Republicans, on the other hand, have prepared an enumeration and brief description of their work operations and functions.

In the Republican Conference rules it is stated that "The Policy Committee shall consider the legislative program in the Senate and the question whether any Party Policy is involved, shall prepare and present recommendations for action by the Conference, and advise all Senators on legislative matters which they desire to present to the Policy Committee." In the memorandum prepared in August, 1953, the following 12 types of operations were assertedly being performed by the committee in pursuance of the authority given to it in the Conference rules: (1) consideration of legislative program to be scheduled for floor operations; (2) consideration of parliamentary procedure; (3) canvass of measures before standing committees; (4) cooperation with the President and White House staff; (5) preparation and issuance of statements on matters involving policy committee interests and actions; (6) advice on the undertaking of committee investigations; (7) consideration of questions arising out of presidential nominations; (8) discussion with individual senators of matters of interest to them; (9) attempts to reconcile divergent views among senators on legislation with the object of promoting party unity; (10) initiation of studies on legislative matters "to advance the national welfare, to implement the party platform, and to strengthen Republican leadership"; (11) recommendation of occasions for calling the whole Republican conference; and (12) cooperation with House Republican leadership.

There is no reliable evidence upon which to determine which of these functions is the most important. The last one, cooperation with House Republican leadership, is no longer of any significance. For a short while after the House Republican Policy Committee came into being in 1949,<sup>12</sup> it met in joint meetings with the Senate group. Poor attendance on the part of House members led to abandonment of these meetings. There is considerable informal relationship between House and Senate leaders, even though the formal policy body relationships no longer exist.

<sup>12</sup> In January, 1949 the House Republicans converted their steering committee into a policy committee of 22 members. Party leaders serve on the committee ex-officio as in the

When in the minority, the Republican Senate policy group considered certain of President Truman's nominations, but the screening of nominations was of little importance after Eisenhower's inauguration.

The staff of the Republican Policy Committee is composed of about 10 professionals and five secretaries. Virtually all of the former possess the baccalaureate or graduate degrees and are largely researchers. Although they are generalists, they tend to specialize in certain areas, such as agriculture, conservation, or public works. The staff serves the committee, the Republican Conference, and the Republican Calendar Committee.<sup>14</sup>

The Republican staff produces a large number of publications and has tried to provide materials which Republican senators will need on important legislation and policies. One of its best known publications is the weekly memorandum entitled, "Senate Republican Memo," intended for use in speeches, press releases, newsletters to constituents, and radio and television discussions.<sup>15</sup> It assists Republican senators in outlining and drafting speeches dealing with legislation and policy. It gives limited help on campaign speeches. At the end of each session of Congress, the staff prepares a detailed report on the Republican record and performance.

---

Senate policy committees, and 17 additional persons are chosen on a regional basis. The committee meets only occasionally for discussion of major legislative issues. It is largely an advisory body. For the text of the resolution creating it, see Galloway, op. cit., pp. 334-35. Sam Rayburn has been unenthusiastic about policy bodies; hence the Democrats have never elected to create one. It might be noted that the congressional campaign committees in the House perform several services for representatives which the policy committee members render to the senators.

<sup>14</sup> The Republican Policy Committee has a suite of offices in the Senate Office Building. The Democratic staff is located near the Senate floor in the Capitol, in less spacious quarters. There are only six professionals and four clerks on the Democratic staff. Turnover has been higher in the Democratic office and no person has been with the staff from its beginning. Only one person has been with the staff since 1949; several of the professionals joined the committee when Lyndon Johnson became its chairman. As a result, there is no staff member who possesses first-hand knowledge of the history of the committee's work. By contrast, two staff members have served the Republican committee since its inception. In taking note of the larger Republican staff, former staff director George H. E. Smith testified quite plausibly in 1951 that the Democrats "do not need a staff as large as ours because they have the executive departments handing down most of the messages that they wish to embody into legislative policy, along with a tremendous amount of data developed by economists, lawyers, statisticians, and so forth, in the executive departments which we ordinarily do not have access to as readily as does the majority." Hearings (cited in note 1), p. 477.

<sup>15</sup> Illustrative titles include, "The Dixon-Yates Contract," "The Political, Hypocritical $20 Tax Scheme," "More Evidence of Communist Influence in Democratic Administrations," and "Republicans Sell Rubber Plants for Top Prices." In March, 1955 the staff put out a 51-page analysis of the Yalta papers under the title, "Highlights of the Yalta Papers and Related Data." This analysis stirred up a considerable amount of Democratic ire.

Upon request from senators, the staff will conduct interviews with individuals and organizations having an interest in legislation and will report the findings to the senators. Other services include analyses of the legislative record of senators, legislative histories, and bill drafting upon request.

The rules and procedures governing the work of the Republican staff are extraordinarily interesting and merit attention.<sup>16</sup> Work is initiated at the request of: (1) the policy committee as a whole in session; (2) the chairman; (3) any member of the committee (usually upon consultation with the chairman); (4) any member of the Republican Conference (since the staff serves the entire Conference); and (5) the staff director. In the last-mentioned instance, the director generally consults with the chairman or submits the material to the chairman for his approval before issuance. Although the staff directors have broad initiative, the chairmen appear to have kept a firm grip on all of the work done, exercising final direction and command. There have been only two staff directors and each has served under more than one chairman. Nevertheless, there is undoubtedly a personal accountability to the chairman.

The floor leader as an ex officio member of the committee can and does ask the staff to do jobs for him. If he states that the work is for his exclusive private use, he does not clear the request with the chairman. If it is on a general problem, it is usually cleared with the committee in session or with the chairman. This is in accordance with a rule that permits the staff to serve any Republican senator on request and without clearance if the material required is stated by the senator to be for his exclusive private use. If the memorandum is likely to become public or to affect other senators, or if the material has application to Republican party interests, clearance is usually required. Clearance may be had by conferring with the chairman or appearing before the committee. If the request is granted, a copy of the finished product is also supplied to the chairman and the committee. Over the years the floor leaders have been served by the staff and requests have been fulfilled both with and without clearance. It is reasonable to conclude, however, that the policy staff serves as an auxiliary staff to the Republican floor leader much less than is the case with the Democrats. As is true with practically all standing committees, the staffs of both policy committees are to a considerable degree auxiliary staffs of the chairmen.

The association of the staff with other Republican Policy Committee members is not nearly so close as with the chairman. In general, staff work for Republican senators is contingent upon whether the material desired concerns party interests and principles. If help is requested outside this frame of reference, senators are likely to be advised that their own staff aids and other sources should be used.

On nearly all publications put out for general distribution, the following printed disclaimer appears: "NOTE: Neither the Members of the Republican Policy Committee nor other Republican Senators are responsible for the statements herein contained, except such as they are willing to endorse and make their owl." This protective statement is used to cover situations where the material was originated either by the staff director, or by one or a few senator members of the committee. It also absolves other senators whose views might be at variance with those expressed in the staff study.

<sup>16</sup> The rules were worked out by Senator Taft and the first staff director, George H. E. Smith; most of them remain in force today. The writer and many political scientists are indebted to Mr. Smith for his reports on staff operations.

The number and variety of publications by the Democratic policy staff are much less impressive than in the case of its Republican parallel. Very little work is done for individual senators. The staff does a good deal of spot research for the chairman and prepares legislative status reports. It compiles quorum records, noting presence and absence from roll calls and votes, and prepares a vote card that goes to every Democratic senator very soon after a vote is taken on a bill. It also prepares a list of expiring legislation, which goes to committee chairmen and senators. Presidential recommendations and speeches are analyzed for partisan overtones.

As might be expected, the research of the policy committee staffs is politically-oriented and partisan. The research is designed to document the party's record and find holes in the opposition's armor. Both staffs gather materials from congressional committees, the executive agencies, and private interest groups. Since the policy committees are a part of Congress, they may and do use the services of the Legislative Reference Service. The committees, therefore, have access to about the same sources of information as the standing committees of Congress. It has been a function of the Republican policy staff in particular to take the raw materials it receives and to try to apply the party's position to them and point up the policy problems involved. The work of the Republican staff is clearer, and more apparent and tangible than that of the Democratic staff. One wishes that the work of the Republican Policy Committee could be made as clear as that of its staff.

IV. SOME ACCOMPLISHMENTS

The usefulness and accomplishments of the policy committees in three fields are fairly well recognized on Capitol Hill. These areas are: (1) service and research, (2) education, (3) legislative scheduling. The services provided by the staff have been described. In addition, the Republican committee has helped senators to secure administrative assistants and secretaries, and high-level personnel. Certain personnel procedures were systematized in 1947 and the new committee chairmen were supplied with names of qualified personnel for committee staffs.

The Republican staff prepares a considerable number of individual memoranda at the request of senators, sometimes as many as 100 per year. These memoranda may be used to accompany legislation or for answering letters. The Republican staff has also met with administrative assistants and other employees in the senators' offices. During campaigns the staff sends research materials to the Republican National Committee and has done a limited amount of speech writing. Some research is also done for the Republican Senatorial Committee. The Republican Congressional, National, Policy, and Senatorial committees exchange and make some use of each others' materials. In a general sense, all of the materials put out are designed to be helpful to the party in defending its record and pointing to weaknesses in the Democratic record. Some Republican senators believe that from 1947 to 1950 Senator Taft saw the policy committee as an instrument for electing Republicans.

The educational function of the Republican Policy Committee is rather significant. Committee chairmen have appeared before it to report on major problems and measures before their committees. This has helped the policy members to get a broader view of policies, program, and legislation, and committee leaders in turn have been helped by the policy members. During the first few months of the Eisenhower Administration, many cabinet secretaries appeared before the committee. This resulted in giving "political" education to the secretaries and in providing the senators with a greater understanding of departmental programs and wishes. The committee has helped the newer senators to learn their way around and has added to their knowledge of how the Senate really operates.

The Democratic Policy Committee has likewise served educational purposes, but its activities have been less obvious and less broad in scope. Its meetings are luncheon affairs and other senators and executive officials are seldom present.<sup>17</sup> Yet its operation, as will be seen shortly, undoubtedly results in educating a number of Democratic senators.

The policy committees perform useful functions in preparing for the call of the calendar, a procedure for the disposition of minor bills and resolutions.<sup>18</sup> This has had an interesting history. Beginning in 1938, Senator John Danaher of Connecticut began to monitor the calendar as a possible way of checking certain minor bills of the Roosevelt Administration. Senator Guy Cordon of Oregon took over after Danaher's defeat. Both served without staff. In 1949 Cordon prevailed upon the Republican Policy Committee to set aside funds to hire a lawyer to service what became known as the calendar committee.<sup>19</sup> The committee determines the bills to be acted on the calendar call, and prepares an analysis of the bills. When Lyndon Johnson became the Democratic chairman, he appointed a Legislative Review Committee to serve in the same capacity.<sup>20</sup> When the calendar is called the counsels sit with the committee members on the Senate floor.

The policy committee of the party in power is of considerable importance at times in determining the general legislative schedule. In reality, the determination of what shall be brought up on the floor is a function of the leadership, but the policy committees may be an aid to it. There is sometimes a discus-

<sup>17</sup> Senator George is sometimes present when foreign policy matters are to be discussed.

<sup>18</sup> The Senate had 22 different calendar calls in 1954, during which it passed 1,381 "un-objected to" bills and resolutions, of which 965 were private bills. See Floyd M. Riddick, "The Eighty-Third Congress: Second Session," The Western Political Quarterly, Vol. 7, p. 643 (Dec., 1954).

<sup>19</sup> The committee has usually been composed of three or four persons appointed by the Republican Policy Committee and broadly representative of all sections. In the 84th Congress its membership included Senators Purtell, Barrett, Hruska, and Schoepfel.

<sup>20</sup> Senators Erwin and Bible composed the committee in the 84th Congress.

sion over whether to bring up a bill at all. Quite often the floor leader simply brings in a legislative agenda for the ensuing week and asks the policy group if it has any questions. Members may then ask to have certain items included.

Some have compared the policy committees with the House Rules Committee. In terms of legislative scheduling, this is not an apt comparison. The latter enjoys the status of a standing committee with authority to issue specific rules, impose limitations, and bottle up measures; none of these powers are possessed by the policy bodies. Scheduling in the real sense of the word involves discussion of strategy, decision as to sequence, consideration of timing. Neither policy committee as a committee appears to have gone into these matters with any degree of regularity. One gets the impression that the Republican Policy Committee has devoted more time to legislative scheduling than has the Democratic group, but there is neither documentary nor empirical evidence to prove it.

V. THE POLICY COMMITTEES AND THE EXECUTIVE

The Heller Report advocated policy committees as a device which would, for the majority party, "institutionalize within Congress a group with which the President or executive department heads would have regular communication without exposure to partisan politics . . . [and] serve the purpose better than informal conferences between the President and one or two Congressional leaders because the latter are not necessarily able to effect full transmission of opinion between the President and the key men in Congress."<sup>21</sup> Many political scientists also hoped that the policy committee would serve as an instrument for an effective liaison between the President and Congress. The LaFollette-Monroney Committee recommended that the majority policy committees of the two houses "serve as a formal council to meet regularly with the Executive, to facilitate the formulation and carrying out of national policy. . . ." <sup>22</sup> It foresaw that this would result in "improved understanding of each other's problems . . .," through consultation before the introduction of legislation to carry out pledged party promises, and also that it would give congressional leaders a chance to formulate policy instead of simply acting on programs prepared by the Executive.

When the Eisenhower Administration first took office, its legislative program was formulated in a three-day meeting between administrative and legislative leaders. The Republican Policy Committee took over the residuum of the meetings and more or less accepted it as Republican policy. Under Chairman Homer Ferguson (1953-1954), there was a reasonably close relationship between the President and the Republican Policy Committee. The contact was due largely to Senator Ferguson. There is no record, however, of a single instance where either President Truman<sup>23</sup> or President Eisenhower ever met with all of the members of his party's policy committee.

<sup>21</sup> Op. cit., p. 14.

<sup>22</sup> Report of the Joint Committee on the Organization of Congress (cited in note 8), p. 13.

<sup>23</sup> Senator Elbert D. Thomas, in his evaluation of policy committees, felt that President Truman should have taken the initiative to convene the Democratic committee with his Policy committee members have usually learned of presidential or cabinet officer wishes in a second-hand way from their policy chairman. Senator Taft, and often Senator Vandenberg, for example, met with individual members of the Truman cabinet instead of bringing the latter before the Republican Policy Committee in the 80th Congress. Mr. Taft then simply reported to the committee what the officials had told him. As mentioned earlier, Senator Ferguson had numerous Eisenhower cabinet officers appear before the committee—a practice well received. Several senators admitted that the sessions were helpful in getting a detailed view on some forthcoming departmental legislative proposals. These meetings between administrators and policy members, however, have been highly exceptional.

There has been some informal relationship between the policy staffs and those of the Budget Bureau, but not as much as might be expected. In fact, most of the staff of the Budget Bureau seem to be comparatively unaware of the policy committees.

In the main, any hope that the device would serve to effectuate a higher degree of cooperation between the Senate and the President has gone unrealized. Some Democrats believe that the Democratic Policy Committee was used on a few occasions to strengthen Democratic opposition to certain of President Truman's legislative recommendations.

The Republican Policy Committee issued a 32-page memorandum giving data on guided missiles, various weapons, and the numerical strength of the armed forces.<sup>24</sup> The Democrats and some of the press raised the cry that this made public classified information. Defense Secretary Wilson and other officials issued a statement asserting that "no security violation" was involved but found themselves, according to the press, "in the embarrassing position of defending publication of a summary of new American weapons by the Senate Republican Policy Committee while criticizing publication of such military information elsewhere."<sup>25</sup> President Eisenhower said he regarded publication as a "blunder" and that he would not have given out such information.<sup>26</sup> The chairman of the committee, Senator Bridges, took to the Senate floor to retort that "The President's reference to the national-defense study by the staff of the Republican Policy Committee as a blunder is most unfortunate."<sup>27</sup> The cabinet and himself. "Had he done so," writes Thomas, "there would have been no need for various clashes between him and several members of Congress which have occurred." See "How Congress Functions under Its Reorganization Act," this REVIEW, Vol. 43, pp. 1179-89 at p. 1183 (Dec., 1949). Thomas remained a staunch believer in the potentiality of the policy committee as an agent of party responsibility.

---

<sup>24</sup> "National Defense under the Republican Administration—Today and Tomorrow," Supplement to Vol. 1, No. 9 of Senate Republican Memo. March 10, 1955.

<sup>25</sup> Washington Post and Times Herald, April 27, 1955.

<sup>26</sup> Ibid., April 28, 1955.

<sup>27</sup> Congressional Record, April 28, 1955, p. 4434. Debate on the issue is found in this edition, pp. 4434-36, 4463-64, A 2879-80. When President Eisenhower expressed willingness to attend a Big Four "summit" conference a short time later, Senator Bridges again took to the Senate floor to express his skepticism if not disapproval of such a conference. See Congressional Record, May 11, 1955, pp. 5160 ff. See also The New York Times, May 12, 1955.

incident shows that there was no consultation with the executive prior to publication and is but one of several which might be cited to demonstrate that policy committee leadership may be publicly at odds with the President.

On the other side of the ledger, it should be pointed out that nearly all of the Republican Policy Committee's publications have attempted to equate Eisenhower's program with that of the Republican party. This is especially interesting in light of the fact that of the three policy committee chairmen since 1953 (Knowland, Ferguson, and Bridges) only Ferguson had the public reputation of being an "Eisenhower Republican."

VI. POLICY AND THE POLICY COMMITTEES

At the outset, the conclusion is inescapable that the policy committees are misnamed. They have never been "policy" bodies, in the sense of considering and investigating alternatives of public policy, and they have never put forth an overall congressional party program. The committees do not assume leadership in drawing up a general legislative program but consider certain proposals on an ad hoc basis as they arise or are due for floor consideration. Some important policies receive little or no discussion in the committees, and only rarely have the committees labelled their decisions as "party policies." There have been disagreements within the committees and issues are rarely put to a vote.<sup>28</sup> Much legislation is worked out by casual groups of senators who may or may not be members of the policy committees. Party policy is made by a large number of people. "As devices for coordinating legislative policy and strengthening party leadership," says George Galloway, "the Senate policy committees have thus far failed to fulfill their potential."<sup>29</sup>

Chairman Lyndon Johnson, more than his predecessors, has perceived the policy committee as a strategic device and weapon. The committee is used to set up issues in a way that will permit a maximum number of Democrats to go along with the position of the leadership. Johnson's philosophy is to meet senators half way, talk with them personally, and seek to understand their problems in terms of their own constituencies.<sup>30</sup> This method influences the other members of the committee and they tend to operate informally the same way.

The Democratic Policy Committee is also used to shape up issues in a way to embarrass the opposition. On the censure of Senator McCarthy, for example, the committee stated that it was not a party matter but concerned the morals of the Senate and that each Democratic senator should vote according to his own conscience. This avoided giving Senator McCarthy an opportunity to build up strength among Republicans by arguing that censure had been formally made a partisan issue.

<sup>28</sup> The Republicans, however, appear to have taken more votes in their policy meetings than have the Democrats.

<sup>29</sup> The Legislative Process in Congress, p. 336.

<sup>30</sup> Johnson seldom makes a speech on the Senate floor and seems to follow the framed motto on his office wall—"You ain't learnin' nothin' when you're talkin'." In practice Johnson has often taken a position privately and if no one appears to disagree, it then passes as the Democratic policy.

When President Eisenhower sent Congress the resolution on the Yalta agreements, it was quickly endorsed by the Democratic Policy Committee.<sup>31</sup> The Republicans were divided on the issue with many feeling it did not go far enough. The action of the Democrats in endorsing the Eisenhower resolution left the Republicans arguing among themselves and the resolution was finally buried in committee. Republican senators were clearly put on the defensive in the matter.

In talking with senators and their assistants, one finds widely varying views about the accomplishments and utility of the committees in the field of policy. This is undoubtedly due to the absence of criteria and standards for judging what the committees are supposed to do and what they can do.<sup>32</sup> Some believe that the committees, particularly the Democratic committee, do very little, while others purport to see a few real achievements. A few senators would like to see the committees turned into real policy bodies with all that that connotes, but there is no great sentiment for strengthening them in terms of tightening party discipline. The desirability of developing more party cohesion is sometimes admitted in the abstract but not in the concrete. While there is little evidence that a majority of Congress was enthusiastic about policy committees prior to their adoption, a number of representatives and senators publicly testified in 1945 in favor of their establishment and only one member of the LaFollette-Monroney Committee, Representative Cox of Georgia, registered dissent to the recommendation for their creation. All in all, however, it is probably correct to conclude that the majority of senators today are not disappointed that the policy committees failed to become effective instruments of party responsibility and discipline.

The decentralization and fragmentation of power, the prerogatives of individual power and seniority, the habits of individualism and independence are so well-entrenched in the Senate that few senators are interested in placing power in the hands of a policy body. Many senators wish to obtain support if not sponsorship of important legislation from senators of the opposite party. This would be difficult to do if either party declared a measure to be party policy. Further, the environment of Congress is not conducive to delegating to a party committee the authority to lay down a party line which could serve as a public yardstick to judge a lawmaker's vote on an issue and to embarrass him at election time. If the party line is unknown or obscure, a senator has more latitude.

As noted earlier, the composition of the committees leaves much to be desired if "policy" is to be a major preoccupation of their efforts. Senator Walter George, the generally recognized spokesman for the Democrats in foreign policy, has never been on the Democratic Policy Committee and Senator

<sup>31</sup> House Doc. No. 93, 83rd Cong., 1st sess.

<sup>32</sup> A role-perception study among nonmembers of the policy committee, if it could be facilitated, would be highly interesting. In the writer's judgment, such a study would show that in general the role is not clearly perceived and that there is comparatively little insight into the committees.

Arthur Vandenberg served only two years on the Republican Policy Committee. Some of the most influential committee chairmen and ranking members are not on the policy bodies. Should the Republicans continue to place half of their membership on the policy committee, including those up for reelection, they would thereby virtually disavow any attempt to make their committee an effective policy instrument.

Heller, Galloway, and others express disappointment that all committee chairmen were not placed on the policy committees. They believe that failure to take this action, plus the absence of analogous House bodies, are the major reasons for their weaknesses in the realm of legislative policy. Without minimizing the importance of this point, it is the writer's belief that changes in the committees' composition would not now make a material difference. Too many senators remain unenthusiastic about a more centralized legislative policy arm, no matter how that body might be constituted.

Nevertheless, in the realm of policy there are some modest achievements which can be claimed for the policy committees. In the 83rd Congress, the Democratic Policy Committee forged what might accurately be termed a party position on the proposal to tie together Alaskan and Hawaiian statehood, on the recommitment of the Atomic Energy bill to conferees, and on certain tax proposals. It actually formulated a compromise on the $20 deduction per dependent on the income tax in 1955 and was able to obtain the votes from all but five Democrats on the measure.<sup>22</sup> The Republicans were able to get an almost unanimous vote (one dissent) on the same tax question.

The Republican Policy Committee tried, with some success, to reach an acceptable party compromise or substitute for the Bricker Amendment. In the spring of 1954, the Republican Policy Committees undertook to exercise leadership concerning rules of conduct for committee investigations. Committee chairmen met with the policy committee to discuss the matter at length. Although nothing officially came out of this meeting it was a significant recognition of an important policy matter and of public criticism of the way some investigations were being conducted. The discussions put the various Republican committee chairmen on notice that the leadership was concerned with the problem.

In many cases both party committees have looked at proposals before the Senate and decided that no party policy was involved. At other times they have reaffirmed a policy because it appeared in the party platform. On occasions committee chairmen have obtained help from policy committee members on legislation.

These examples of dealing with policies are not likely to impress advocates of party government and discipline either in number or in scope. But neither are they negligible. To an undetermined degree policy discussions in the committee have helped to accommodate factionalism and to etch, for the party leadership, the areas of agreement and disagreement.

<sup>22</sup> Senator Johnson received unanimous support from the Democratic Policy Committee to bring out this bill as a substitute for Speaker Rayburn's bill, which had passed the House. See The New York Times, March 10, 1955. Toward the end of this same session, Johnson issued a statement that the policy committee members were prodding legislative committee chairmen to complete their work on major bills looking toward a July 30 adjournment. See The New York Times June 29, 1955.

To be sure, the committees can bind no one. They can only consider, recommend, and attempt to persuade.<sup>34</sup> Yet some cohesiveness, especially in the Republican party, has been obtained through the preparation of staff memoranda and statements of the record of performance, and through the shaping up of issues. In a few instances a definite stand on a policy has been taken which has commanded nearly unanimous support. Both committees have issued a number of broad statements of party policy.

Policy committee members try to make a distinction between program and policy—possibly a distinction without a difference. The committee members maintain that they do not make policy but take a program submitted by the executive or someone else and decide if it will be adopted as party policy. Democratic members in particular emphasize that they attempt to interpret programs and policies in line with historic Democratic policy. To the extent that this is the role of the policy committees, it is a function of sifting, evaluating, and ratifying rather than of originating and creating. In terms of Senate tradition, however, the role of reviewer is more acceptable than that of drafter and formulator of party policy.

There is a certain intangible psychological influence which is not easy to measure. The label "policy" gives the appearance of leadership. When a pronouncement is made and presumably has the support of all or nearly all of the members of the policy committee, it creates a psychology of a party position. There are some pressures for conformity in the Senate notwithstanding the extreme individualism of its members. Policy committee members include many of the most respected and most powerful men in the Senate. The views of a Millikin, a Taft, a Russell, or a Hill are not lightly regarded by his colleagues. When such men speak as members of the "policy committee," one will not oppose them without important reasons. Emulation as well as individualism is a vital part of the totality of the Senate. To the extent that policy committees can be worked into this fabric of personal interaction, prestige, and interpersonal relationships in the Senate, they can achieve successes.

VII. CONCLUSION

Experience with the Senate policy committees has led to very little public understanding of their role and indeed of their existence. Their immediate ancestors were the steering committees, and in a genetic sense the policy committees are steering committees, which probably connotes but little. They have been useful in monitoring the consent calendar, in considering certain matters of legislative scheduling and strategy, and in performing routine and other services needed by the floor leadership. Policy committee sessions are meetings of some of the men of power in the Senate at which political strategy, policy, program and diverse other matters are discussed. Taking the views of senators both on and off the committees, evaluations of the committees' influence on party discipline and unity range from "negligible" to "perceptible," with no one claiming impressive accomplishment. Unfortunately, there is no way to measure whether there would have been even less party cohesion had the committees not existed.

<sup>34</sup> William S. White in a pictorial article writes: "The functions of the Senate Democratic Policy Committee . . . are roughly those of the board of directors of a powerful corporation." The New York Times Magazine, July 10, 1955, p. 10. This analogy suggests powers which neither of the committees possesses.

Perhaps the most intriguing aspect of the role of the policy committees is the apparent difference between the Republican and Democratic committees. The former appears to be much more highly developed and somewhat more institutionalized, and to perform many more functions than the Democratic Policy Committee. It has a larger staff, which turns out a large volume of memoranda and publications for use by Republican senator. Although neither policy group gets much play in the press, the Republican committee has given the newspapers far more to write about.

It is interesting to speculate on the reasons for this difference. Simultaneously with the creation of the first policy committees, the Republicans came into control of the Senate after a long period of being in the minority. Senator Taft and other leaders recognized the practical necessity for organization and were spurred on by ideological considerations to arrest the spread of the Fair Deal. There had been a growing recognition in the Senate, as there had been in the Republican National Committee, that the party unable to command the great staff resources of the executive branch needed a strong staff of its own and a broader basis of organizational leadership strength. The Republican Policy Committee possessed utilitarian value, at least in these terms. By contrast, Senator Barkley found the Democrats in very little need of this type of organization. It should be noted that Republican representation in the Senate was so marginal in 1953 that there was no disposition to curtail the staff or diminish activities.<sup>35</sup> Party splits over foreign policy and certain other Eisenhower proposals, moreover, made it desirable to keep intact any instrument which might help to accommodate and compromise the internecine differences. At the same time the Republicans, to a greater extent than the Democrats, appear to be more concerned with attacking the opposition and providing their officeholders with appropriate ammunition.<sup>36</sup> This spirit was inculcated in part by Senator Taft and is characteristic of a party of opposition.

Democrats, by contrast, have had control or near control of the Senate for a quarter of a century. Due in a large measure to the long tenure of Southerners, the Democrats have possessed a highly experienced group of skilled parliament-

<sup>35</sup> Republican representation in successive Congresses, beginning with the 80th, was 51, 42, 42, 48, and 47.

<sup>36</sup> The Democratic Policy Committee has been more restrained in attacking President Eisenhower than has been the Democratic National Committee.

tary and political operators. The Republicans have seldom had more than a handful of such competent politicians at any one time.<sup>37</sup> The "old pros" in the Democratic party have had their own methods of doing things in the Senate and are reasonably well satisfied with both methods and accomplishments.

Notwithstanding this apparent larger role of the Republican Policy Committee, there are reasons for regarding the Democratic Committee as potentially a more important device than its Republican counterpart. This is because it somehow fits better into the "field" or into the totality of co-existing facts about the Senate. The Southerners who dominate the Senate do so by reason of experience and political sagacity, and not by seniority alone. They use personal negotiation and agreement to cut through the maze of obstacles to get things done, or to set up barriers to keep things from being done, as the case may be. Personal operation is used to supply the correctives and mutations when needed. The Democratic Policy Committee under all its chairmen, but especially under Lyndon Johnson, has used the modus operandi of personal contact with a view to keeping the party together, doing those things helpful to it, and trying to prevent activities and public statements harmful to the party record. The committee is useful in this connection for appraising political realities and rendering political judgments.

To a considerable extent also the device of a policy committee is compatible with customs and traditions associated with Democratic control of the Senate. The Republican Policy Committee has met well some of the needs of a party accustomed to being in the minority. To some Republican senators, however, the committee seems a bit superimposed and synthetic in terms of the overall needs in the management of the Senate. Senate rules of the game and traditions are so encrusted that they soon swallow up and absorb attempts at innovation. The political scientists and senators who hoped that the policy committees would work some changes in the Senate found that the Senate was unprepared for party policy leadership by a group so designated. But with statutory sanction and appropriations, the policy committees were forced to find a justification for themselves and have done so. There seems to be no sentiment or disposition to eliminate them.

The policy committees cannot be accurately evaluated until the real operation and management of the Senate are understood. This is a challenge to the researcher that will never be fully met, for it involves an analysis of hundreds of interpersonal relationships as well as the more apparent power structure. Explanations of the legislative process in Congress are often too mechanistic. Even the political interest group approach may have unintentionally resulted in some over-simplification. Personal friendships in the Senate are more important than is generally realized and are too often left out of the frame of reference by those attempting to conceptualize congressional behavior. As more is learned of how the Senate really functions, the true role and potentiality of the policy committees may be appreciated. Probably more than any other institutions and agencies of the Senate, the policy committees cannot be studied as an isolated abstraction but only in terms of the unit of which they are a part—the Senate.

<sup>37</sup> Those serving on the Republican Policy Committee in 1954 had served an average of 9½ years in the Senate, while Democratic members averaged over 14 years.

Several impressions, propositions, and assumptions concerning the Senate policy committees may now be summarized. Each of these provides a challenge for further research and speculation.

First, the Democratic and Republican policy committees are substantially different in outlook, operation, and activity. The reasons for this remain a matter for additional investigation but a major cause appears to be the minority party status of the Republicans, difference in committee composition, and the greater experience of Democratic senators in managing the Senate. A minority party probably has greater need for a policy committee, and especially staff work, than has the majority party.

Second, the Republican Policy Committee receives more publicity, is more institutionalized, and much more is known of its staff and work. Probably as a result of this, it is widely believed on the Hill that the Republican Policy Committee is a more useful and effective body than its counterpart. But this assumption is open to question. In terms of influence and effectiveness with its own membership in the Senate, the Democratic committee may be the superior. This is perhaps the most intriguing paradox—it is a paradox—of party control in the Senate.

Third, the policy committees serve to broaden the base of personal leadership. In the Democratic party the floor leader uses the policy committee and its staff to aid him in his duties. In the Republican party the policy committee chairmanship provides an additional leadership post for some prominent party member and the committee itself assists both the chairman and the floor leader in certain policy matters. One of the untested hypotheses of party control is that when the leader is strong and influential, he needs a policy committee less; a weaker leader or one lacking power needs a committee more than does a stronger one. Senators Taft and Johnson exemplify strong leaders in their own right, while Senators Ferguson and Lucas were less influential and the latter two appear to have made more of the policy committees per se. Likewise Senator McFarland appeared to need and consequently used the Democratic Policy Committee more than did Senator Barkley.

Fourth, the policy committees have not even provided overall legislative clearance for the parties, let alone for the Senate as a whole. Decentralization of the consideration of policy appears about as great as it was before the committees were established. Joint policy committees offer a potential agency for party clearance of legislation but, tradition being what it is, there is little prospect of their creation.

Stated another way, the policy committees have left unsolved the problem of integration of party policy in Congress. Both parties and the Congress try to assert an institutional identity and unity at times, but the centrifugalism brought about by seniority and the intensely personal character of the operation of the Senate make this difficult of accomplishment. There is little prospect that either policy committee will become a centripetal force or an institutional leadership device such as the House Rules Committee. Policy bodies in the Senate must function in a different way than their name implies and must find their niche and level of performance. Since 1947 the margin of party control in the Senate has been relatively small and such may be the case for several years. With this prospect, the need for some group which can influence even a few votes on crucial legislation is apparent. Perhaps this is the role which the policy committees, maybe unconsciously, are finding for themselves.

COHESION OF BRITISH PARLIAMENTARY PARTIES

LEON D. EPSTEIN

University of Wisconsin

In the perspective of those political scientists who would reform American parties so as to make them more "responsible," British parties are familiar prototypes. Prominent among the admired qualities is the cohesion displayed in parliamentary voting by the members of each major British party. That this cohesion is greater than that of American legislative parties has been generally observed at least since the work of A. Lawrence Lowell.<sup>1</sup> And it is common enough, though not universal, to regard British parliamentary solidarity as a virtue particularly because it permits a victorious party, after an election, to enact the program behind which a majority of voters have presumably been rallied.<sup>2</sup> Correspondingly, the relatively low cohesion among Republican and among Democratic congressmen is taken as a defect of American politics.<sup>3</sup>

The purpose of this article, however, is not primarily to discuss value judgments concerning parliamentary cohesion. Rather it is to examine the nature of that cohesion and the ways in which it is maintained. But regardless of the disputed merits of British practice, it is still reasonable to ask after such an examination whether the cohesion of party members in the House of Commons is the product of devices which the United States could adopt, or whether it is the result of underlying factors alien to the American environment. In other words, even if desirable, would parliamentary cohesion of the British type provide a useful parallel for the United States?

Attention is to be focussed on recent developments within the two major parties—that is, within the parliamentary parties. For the most part, the mass organizations outside of Parliament are not discussed. Their role, as has been amply demonstrated by recent British scholarship, is not crucial in establishing or enforcing national party policy.<sup>4</sup> Some of the implications for comparative analysis of this limited role of mass memberships are presented elsewhere.<sup>5</sup> Here it is sufficient to say that the cohesion of British parliamentary parties cannot be explained in terms of the pressure of an outside membership.

<sup>1</sup> Government of England, 2 vols. (New York, 1903), Vol. 2, Ch. 35.

<sup>2</sup> A less favorable view of British parliamentary parties has been expressed by J. Roland Pennock, "Responsiveness, Responsibility, and Majority Rule," this Review, Vol. 46, pp. 790-807, at p. 801 (Sept., 1952).

<sup>3</sup> However, it has been contended by Julius Turner that the critics of American parties underestimate the degree to which those parties are now "responsible" in the sense of presenting clear alternatives to the voters. "Responsible Parties: A Dissent from the Floor," this Review, Vol. 45, pp. 143-52 (March, 1951).

<sup>4</sup> This is the theme of the careful and systematic work by R. T. McKenzie, British Political Parties (London, 1955). My own debt to his scholarship is very great.

<sup>5</sup> In the author's "British Mass Parties in Comparison with American Parties," Political Science Quarterly, Vol. 71, pp. 97-125 (March, 1956).

I. THE M.P. AND HIS PARLIAMENTARY PARTY

Since cohesion is unlikely to be spontaneous or automatic in a parliamentary party numbering between 200 and 400, leadership is bound to be of great import. The position particularly of the leader is strong because he is either prime minister or a potential prime minister. As such, he bestows the ministerial offices without which an ambitious M.P.'s career is a failure, financially and politically. This is an enviable means for rewarding the faithful and punishing the rebel because the M.P. has no other route, like that of congressional seniority, by which he can achieve power. Yet, in spite of the well-understood potency of the leadership, it must be noted that in the final analysis it is the parliamentary party as a whole which possesses authority. Even if the leadership, especially of a cabinet, ordinarily counts on the parliamentary party's consent, nevertheless the consent of that party (or at least of a majority of it) is essential to the continuity of leadership.<sup>6</sup> Consequently, it is fair to regard the M.P.'s relationship to the majority of his parliamentary party as much the same thing as his relationship to the party's leadership.

The individual representative. In submitting generally to the will of the parliamentary party, the M.P. sacrifices much less of political substance than would an American congressman who similarly subjected himself. The British representative is not expected to trim his legislative votes to the wishes of local interests, whether in the form of local party organizations or economic pressure groups. Therefore, he can afford much more readily than his American counterpart to support his party even if it means overriding the particular desires of his constituents. British custom is such that he need hardly fear strictly local reprisals against his subsequent candidacy.<sup>7</sup>

Although the M.P.'s subordination to national leadership is thus politically feasible, he does make an important sacrifice of his own freedom of action. Since this is contrary to the independence often characteristic of M.P.'s until late in the nineteenth century and contrary to the still lively traditions of British liberalism and non-conformism, it is understandable that back-benchers are not always happy about their present status. Few, however, have been so bitter about their lot as Christopher Hollis, an intellectually restive Conservative M.P., who has said flatly: "The member is the obedient servant of the party machine." In Hollis' view, most members, far from making decisions

<sup>6</sup> Pressure from M.P.s of the majority party has certainly been known to influence government decisions. A recent instance was provided in 1953 by Conservative back-bench pressure on the Churchill Government to raise the level of pensions provided to retired officers of World War I. For a discussion of the policy-making role of Labor M.P.s, see James M. Burns, "The Parliamentary Labour Party in Great Britain," this REVIEW, Vol. 44, pp. 855-71, at pp. 870-71 (Dec., 1950).

<sup>7</sup> This holds for party re-adoption as well as for the election itself. In a rare instance where a constituency association actually sought to reject its sitting M.P. for at least partly local reasons, it is significant that the national party intervened in such a way as to prevent the result. The case was that of Mrs. E. M. Braddock, Labor M.P., whose difficulties with her Liverpool Exchange constituency party were described in The Times (London), April 29, 1955, p. 12.

themselves, "must live a life in which it is peculiarly apparent to them that the decisions are taken by other people. The man in the street may think that the ordinary member of Parliament is an important person and has power. The member of Parliament himself cannot possibly think so."<sup>8</sup> At least he cannot think himself important, according to Hollis, as he regularly joins his fellows in trooping in and out of the division lobbies in response to party orders as transmitted by the whips.

The M.P. does, it is true, receive psychological compensation from the question period in the House of Commons. Then the back-bencher has the privilege of trying to embarrass ministers (but not often if they are of his own party) by raising troublesome political and administrative questions. Also the M.P. may be flattered by the attention accorded his occasional debating speech by his audience of fellow-members and, to a lessening extent, by the quality newspapers. Both the debates and the question periods afford opportunities for M.P.s to display their own opinions, and they are also used occasionally to air the grievances of constituents.<sup>9</sup> These seem unsubstantial substitutes for the sense of power and individual responsibility which go with the quasi-independent decisions of American congressmen.

Increasingly British M.P.s are complaining about their humble individual positions. Often what is wanted is a more frequent use of the free vote—which only the leadership has the prerogative to allow.<sup>10</sup> A particularly strong argument against the subordination of the individual member to the whips was made in 1954 when the Conservative Government sought and secured parliamentary approval of the boundary changes recommended by the commission charged with drawing election constituency lines. The changes were opposed by Labor M.P.s in their voting as well as in their thinking, but many Conservatives had also made known their objections without intending to defy the government whips by voting their convictions. These individual Conservative convictions, stemming from historical devotion to old constituencies or from dislike of the frequency and method of boundary changes, were occasionally reinforced by political disadvantages which certain changes caused to incumbent M.P.s. Yet all of these reasons for objection were not enough to cause Conservative M.P.s to refrain from supporting their party's government. It was this which was called "the debasement of the position of the Private Member" by one exasperated Labor opponent—who would undoubtedly have been as debased himself if his party's government had been in an analogous situation. Actually this particular Labor M.P. was candid enough to include his own party in his broad charge against the submergence of individual

<sup>8</sup> Christopher Hollis, Can Parliament Survive? (London, 1949), pp. 64, 71.

<sup>9</sup> A particularly clear instance of an M.P. addressing the House on behalf of a local interest group may be found in a speech by Barbara Castle concerning the Lancashire cotton industry, 530 H. C. Deb. 1743-52 (July 22, 1954).

<sup>10</sup> Note the explanation by Herbert Morrison, Government and Parliament (London, 1954), p. 133. A free vote was allowed on the question of raising the salaries of M.P.s, 528 H. C. Deb. 30-158 (May 24, 1954).

convictions.<sup>11</sup> However, what is to be discussed here is not whether this submergence is to be deplored, but why M.P.s have permitted it to take place.

Relevance of dissolution. The first and traditional answer of political science is to point to the power of parliamentary dissolution at the disposal of the prime minister. True enough, British constitutional practice does permit the use of this power by a government which wants to establish or strengthen its legislative majority. However, this holds only for the government party. In and of itself, the power of dissolution cannot account for the fact that the opposition is almost as effectively disciplined as are members of the government party.

Indeed, it is doubtful whether the power of dissolution can in any appreciable way account for the cohesion of parliamentary parties. That power, even in the form of threat, is simply not used in order to discipline M.P.s. It was so used in the nineteenth century, when governments lacked the solid majorities which party loyalties provide today, but there is a strong prima facie case that dissolution became obsolete as a weapon against M.P.s precisely when they ceased to be independent followers of their leaders. Nowadays dissolution remains the government's weapon, to be sure, but a weapon to be used against the opposition. The fact that the prime minister decides when to call an election is no small party advantage. To maximize its effectiveness, a government may be expected to dissolve Parliament, not when discipline is required because its own ranks are divided, but rather when its supporters can present a united front to the electorate and, if possible, embarrass the opposition should it happen to be disunited at the moment. The dissolution and election of May, 1955 illustrate this neatly.

Nevertheless, the idea that the power of dissolution is a deterrent to revolt by the parliamentary majority remains in the vocabulary of British politics. So experienced a hand as Herbert Morrison mentions it, but adds significantly that the government "must seek to retain the support of a parliamentary majority by persuasion, goodwill, mutual understanding, and, upon occasion, must make concessions, because the consequences to itself and to its electoral support are likely to be damaging if it goes to the country with its ranks divided."<sup>12</sup> In fact, in such a situation it is likely that the party leaders who form the government have more to lose by a dissolution than have many of the back-benchers. If an open division in the parliamentary majority should damage the party's electoral chances, as Morrison suggests, then the most important result would be the loss of enough marginal seats to destroy the party majority which permitted the leadership to hold ministerial positions.

While this result is also serious for individual back-benchers who lose the marginal seats, they often have some chance (though admittedly less than that of the leaders) of obtaining new seats in by-elections. But even without such an opportunity, a defeated back-bencher has lost less by way of salary, power, and prestige than has the former minister (and certainly much less than the former prime minister). Furthermore, it must be emphasized that for the bulk of the

<sup>11</sup> Harold Lever, 535 H. C. Deb. 1867-71 (Dec. 15, 1954).

<sup>12</sup> Morrison, Government and Parliament, p. 94.

M.P.s who occupy safe seats, a general election ordinarily involves no risk at all. Sure of renomination and sure of re-election many non-ministerial M.P.s can face an election with considerable equanimity. It is hard to believe that they could be seriously threatened by a dissolution. Campaigning is probably a bore and a nuisance, but it is a three-weeks' affair and in these days not always very expensive for the candidate personally. His organization is not a personal one as the American congressman's so often is. The party, or in some cases a trade union, picks up the check and does most of the electioneering. The candidate has to make local speeches and appearances, but it must be assumed that an M.P. has a high tolerance for politicking of this sort or he would have chosen some less extroverted occupation in the first place.

In order for a dissolution to be used effectively for disciplining the majority party, the leadership would have to be willing and able to eliminate its recalcitrant M.P.s during the general election. That is, the national leadership would have to persuade constituency parties to adopt candidates who, if elected, would be more loyal and obedient than some present M.P.s. In extreme cases, individuals have been purged in this way, but only incidental to the general election. Since 1918, at any rate, no party government has called an election principally to replace some of its own M.P.s with a more loyal crop. Nor has any recent party leadership threatened, even implicitly, to operate on such a basis. On the contrary, what happens with a general election in the offing is that the party draws its own dissidents (if they are appreciable in number) closer to the fold so that the opposition may not profit by an appearance of disunity. The relationship of the rebellious Bevanites to the Labor party at both the 1951 and 1955 elections is a case in point. Although the Labor leaders disliked the Bevanites no less at election time, they did not choose to hurt their party, and thereby themselves, by attacking the erstwhile rebels during the campaign. When the Labor government called the 1951 election, it was assuredly not for the purpose of disciplining the Bevanites.

Not only does it seem unrealistic for a party leadership to seek to discipline its followers by threatening to call new elections, but it is doubtful that individual M.P.s would adhere to the party line because of any such threat. This is not to say that the prospect of elections is unimportant in influencing parliamentary parties. Ordinary M.P.s, along with their leaders, do have good political reasons for maintaining their solidarity so long as the electorate regards that solidarity as a virtue. But the unity which flows from a respect for the British belief in the value of a cohesive parliamentary party is very different from a unity inspired by a fear of the leadership's power of dissolution.<sup>12</sup>

Isolated revolts. Freedom of action is not much of an alternative to party loyalty in the British system. No substantial rebellion like that of the Bevanites seeks freedom of action as its end. What the Bevanites as a group want is to convert the Labor party to their policies and their leadership. For this purpose, the Bevanites sometimes find it useful to exercise more freedom than is usual within a British party. On the other hand, an individual M.P. may genuinely prefer to act independently of his party, but he must then be willing to enter a political wilderness. The contemporary British House of Commons has no place either for an independent (completely without formal party affiliation) or for an independent Laborite or an independent Conservative. The parties have a practical monopoly, and their hold is strengthening, not weakening. The inglorious careers of some postwar independents will illustrate the point.

<sup>12</sup> See R. H. S. Crossman's explanation for his vote in favor of the German rearmament agreement which he "passionately" opposed. 533 H. C. Deb. 477 (Nov. 17, 1954).

Best known is the case of the four M.P.s ousted from the Labor party during the 1945-50 Parliament. All four had broken party solidarity by repeated stands in opposition to the foreign policy of the Labor government, and at least three of the four were widely believed to follow the Communist line. Undoubtedly it was the latter belief that made it feasible for the party to resort, as it rarely does, to the formal disciplinary weapon of expulsion. The four lost the official Labor designation, and (together with one earlier rebel) they called themselves "Labour Independents" and as such sought to retain their parliamentary seats in the 1950 election. Defeat was the lot of all the Labor Independents, including one, K. Zilliacus, who was personally popular in his constituency and who by 1950 was no longer accused of following the Communist line.<sup>14</sup> Nevertheless, not too much should be inferred from this very successful example of formal party discipline. Laborites as well as the Conservatives, as will be observed later, are often inhibited from conducting purges by doubts concerning the support of local constituency associations. If the relevant constituency's support is doubtful, the national leadership might want to avoid a full-fledged ouster because the price for its success might be too high in terms of local disaffection. But what the case of the Labor Independents does illustrate is the formidable difficulty which the leadership, in favorable circumstances, can raise for the purged member who tries to get re-elected without major party support.

A different kind of example is that of Ivor Thomas. The Labor party did not expel him; he resigned in 1948 because of his disagreement with the leadership. And this disagreement was related to Thomas' position to the right of the official Labor policy. There may also have been some non-ideological background to the resignation. Thomas, who had been active in the prewar Labor party, was elected to Parliament in 1942 and re-elected by the same constituency (Keighley) in 1945. In the 1945 Labor Government, he first became parliamentary secretary at the ministry of civil aviation and then in 1946 was promoted to the post of parliamentary under-secretary of state for the colonies. Since Thomas was a relatively young man, he seemed to have a bright ministerial future until October of 1947 when, during a cabinet reshuffle, he was dropped entirely from the Government.<sup>15</sup> The cause of this turn for the worse in Thomas' career is by no means clear. Nor, for that matter, is there any certainty about the reasons for Thomas' resignation from the Labor party in the following year.

The first indication Thomas gave of a public break with Labor was in a letter to The Times in mid-October, 1948. In that letter he proposed that the Labor Government abandon in the approaching parliamentary session all contentious legislation, meaning the nationalization of steel and the limitation of the delaying power of the House of Lords.<sup>16</sup> No one was surprised that the government ignored this suggestion and showed its intention, at the beginning of Parliament, to introduce the legislation to which Thomas objected. Thomas then took the floor of the House to announce his resignation from the Labor party, to attack its leadership for "a wanton and reckless act," and to declare his general objection to the socialist "concentration of power in the hands of the State."<sup>17</sup> In thus cutting himself off from the Labor party, Thomas was, in effect, surrendering a safe seat in the House of Commons. Or at least he was surrendering the seat as of the next general election. Thomas refused to comply with his constituency Labor party's request that he resign the seat immediately. But he was entirely aware that he held the seat only until the current Parliament was dissolved.<sup>18</sup>

<sup>14</sup> H. G. Nicholas, The British General Election of 1950 (London, 1951), pp. 251-52. Zilliacus was later re-admitted to the Labor party and elected as an M.P. in 1955.

<sup>15</sup> The Times (London), Oct. 8, 1947, p. 4.

His action in subsequently joining the Conservative party was understandable. He had obviously taken up its policy and its ideological position, and he had no political future in any other direction. As it turned out, neither did Thomas have much of a future with the Conservatives. The best that they did for Thomas was to adopt him as a 1950 candidate at Newport, in Wales, where Labor regularly had a substantial majority.<sup>19</sup> The expected defeat in the 1950 election appears to have ended Thomas' political career. In 1952 he changed his surname to Bulmer-Thomas, and under this name wrote a book on the party system.

"Crossing the aisle," as Bulmer-Thomas did is not a likely way to political survival in the present stabilized, or perhaps rigid, state of British parties. Even in times past it has been a very risky proposition, and it may have required the quality of a Winston Churchill to pull it off successfully. Today, at any rate, no M.P. concerned with his political future would risk a rebellion on the assumption that he could find a suitable place among his party's opponents. Since 1945 one can point to no instance of an M.P. who has shifted from one major party to the other and then been re-elected to the House.

Another but no more promising course of rebellion was pursued by Sir Richard Acland, also a Labor M.P., in 1955. Disturbed by religious and humanitarian scruples over his party's support of the Conservative Government's decision to manufacture hydrogen bombs in Britain, Sir Richard resigned not only from the Labor party but also from the House of Commons. It was his intention to force a by-election in his constituency of Gravesend and to stand as an Independent candidate on the issue of the hydrogen bomb.<sup>20</sup> Whatever

<sup>16</sup> Ibid., Oct. 15, 1948, p. 5.

<sup>17</sup> 457 H. C. Deb. 108-13 (Oct. 27, 1948).

<sup>18</sup> The Times (London), Oct. 29, 1948, p. 4. Incidentally, the executive council of the Keighley constituency Labor party claimed that it had decided to recommend that Thomas not be re-adopted as a candidate even before his letter to The Times.

<sup>19</sup> Ibid., Jan. 4, 1949, p. 4.

<sup>20</sup> Ibid., March 12, 1955. For an excellent sketch of Sir Richard Acland, see "Bart Errant," New Statesman and Nation, Vol. 49, pp. 46-49 (April 2, 1955).

chance he had of winning against the Conservative and the official Labor candidates was lessened by the fact that the general election supervened before a by-election was called. Labor voters could then vote for Acland only if they were willing to split the party's strength and so help elect a Conservative majority in the House of Commons. In fact, less than one-quarter of Labor's normal electorate voted for Acland, but this was more than enough of a break in the previous Labor majority to allow the Conservative to capture the seat. More significant for present purposes, however, is that Acland ran a poor third. Thus the result demonstrated the overwhelming attraction which major party candidacies retain for the British electorate when it is faced, as it always is in a general election, with the choice of alternative governments.

So individualistic and futile a proceeding is possible only for an M.P. who, like Sir Richard, places a higher value on the display of moral righteousness than on the future of his party or his own career in that party. This personality type is rarely successful in the politics of any time or place, and its presence in contemporary British politics seems either accidental or residual. The Acland dash for freedom is hardly indicative of a course which would or could weaken the hold of the parliamentary parties on their members.

Tolerated deviations. Instead of being moved by principles to the point of resigning or of forcing one's party to resort to expulsion, an M.P. may occasionally take individual positions and yet remain within the fold. In the process, he probably stamps himself as unlikely material for ministerial posts and otherwise makes his party relationships difficult. But still both parties do tolerate some deviations or eccentricities. They almost have to make some allowance for an odd quirk here and there. Otherwise party unity would be a good deal more brittle than it is in fact. The Labor party goes so far as to formalize its toleration in a standing order which "recognizes the right of individual Members to abstain from voting on matters of deeply held personal conscientious conviction."<sup>21</sup> In practice, abstention has been allowed on issues touching the pacifism or the alcoholic temperance of Labor members.

Without so explicit a provision, the Conservative party nevertheless tolerates an occasional deviation more complacently than does Labor. Perhaps this is because the Conservatives have less reason to fear open rebellions and because they have fewer habitual or congenital non-conformists in their ranks. One of the most interesting cases is that of Lord Hinchinbrooke. Never the most orthodox of Conservative M.P.s and fortified in his individuality by a distinguished ancestry, Hinchinbrooke openly took issue with his party's government in 1952. For rather special reasons, he announced during the Commons debate on the German peace treaties that he would abstain from voting in support of the German rearmament, to which his Conservative Government and party were committed.<sup>22</sup> However, then and subsequently, Hinchinbrooke remained a loyal member of the Conservative parliamentary party. His personal deviation would have been almost unnoticed except for the fact that the executive council of his constituency association was sufficiently aroused by

<sup>21</sup> 53rd Annual Report of the Labour Conference (1954), p. 202.

<sup>22</sup> 504 H. C. Deb. 1905-13 (Aug. 1, 1952).

Hinchingsbrooke's defiance of the national party to attempt, unsuccessfully, to initiate a purge.<sup>23</sup>

A more substantial deviation tolerated by the Conservative Government was that of the "Suez group" in 1954. The background for the incident was the widespread unpopularity within the Conservative party of the Government's plan to evacuate Britain's Suez canal base. For many back-benchers the plan represented another detested step in "scuttling the Empire." While the great majority of Conservative M.P.s did finally accept the cabinet's policy, there were about 40 who voiced open objections. Twenty-six of the 40 went so far as to vote against their government when the Suez evacuation agreement was presented to the House of Commons.<sup>24</sup> But except for one M.P. who temporarily resigned from the party; neither the back-benchers concerned nor the party leadership took any overt action. The loss of 26 votes happened to be something which, in the circumstances, the Conservative Government could afford. Although its majority over the opposition was still very narrow in 1954, the government knew that on the Suez issue the 26 Conservative rebels would be voting alone. Labor was thoroughly committed to evacuation and could not reasonably vote against the evacuation agreement. Thus the Suez group of M.P.s could deviate without risk of bringing the government down.

Yet this type of deviation must remain occasional, or even rare, if it is to be tolerated at all. Repeated breaks in party solidarity would give public notice of a disunited party which lacked the capacity to govern. This is the kind of reputation that British parties generally, and their leaders in particular, seek to avoid.

General perspective. What emerges from this review of some exceptional cases is not just that an individual M.P., or a group of M.P.s, may survive an infrequent deviation from a party position, but more significantly that survival is dependent on remaining within the bounds fixed by the party. Rebel M.P.s have not operated successfully either by asserting a full-fledged independence or by joining the opposing party. Remaining within the fold is all-important, and this requires a course defined by the party. It is not enough for an M.P. merely to declare that he is of a given party and then vote as he pleases. Exactly how far an M.P. can deviate from the line of his parliamentary party and yet remain a member depends on his personality, the particular constituency association, the significance of the issue, and the party to which he belongs. But, in general, there is no doubt that an individual's own convictions are ordinarily expected to yield when at variance with the position of the parliamentary party.

<sup>23</sup> The executive council did adopt a resolution of no-confidence in its M.P., but Hinchingsbrooke saved himself by getting a general meeting of the constituency association to overrule the executive council. This was a very considerable achievement, attributable to a unique personality in a largely rural constituency, and it is doubtful whether many other M.P.s could similarly survive after offending both national and local leaders. Hinchingsbrooke's constituency troubles were related in The Times (London), Oct. 6, 1952, p. 2; Oct. 13, 1952, p. 3; and Oct. 31, 1952, p. 6.

<sup>24</sup> 331 H. C. Deb. 495-504 (July 28, 1954), 724-822 (July 29, 1954).

II. THE LIMITATIONS OF DISCIPLINE

The power of a parliamentary party to remove a rebellious member from its ranks is real enough, and in the Labor party the procedure for doing so is most specific.<sup>25</sup> But whether the possession of this power is the crucial element in maintaining cohesion is most doubtful. Obviously, expulsion can be effective only insofar as a party values its solidarity enough to countenance such drastic discipline. Therefore, even if expulsion (or threat of expulsion) were to be regarded as the decisive weapon, the explanation for its effectiveness would lie in the nature of the party loyalty which supported its use rather than in the nature of the weapon. The fact is, however, that such drastic discipline is very limited in its applicability. The Conservatives can hardly be said to expel, or threaten to expel, any of their M.P.s. And the recent experience of the Labor party indicates that withdrawal of the parliamentary whip is reserved for isolated and extreme cases involving no more than about a half-dozen M.P.s at a time, and that actual expulsion from the external organization (which prevents campaigning as an official candidate) is even rarer. The limited scope and efficacy of the formal disciplinary weapon is illustrated by two well-publicized breakdowns in Labor unity, one over German rearmament and the other concerning Aneurin Bevan personally.

German rearmament. This issue requires some explanation of its background in Labor party affairs. Before Labor's defeat in the 1951 election, the party's government had indicated its agreement, quite possibly under American pressure, to the proposal to arm West Germany within the framework of European defense. At that time, however, German rearmament had not yet emerged as a prominent subject of controversy. Only after the Conservatives were in office, in mid-1952, was an actual rearmament agreement (the ill-fated European Defense Community) submitted to Parliament. By then Labor's general doubts, plus Bevanite agitation, were sufficient to cause the party leadership to oppose approval of the treaties providing for German rearmament unless certain "conditions," among them another attempt to negotiate with the Russians over Germany, were first fulfilled.<sup>26</sup> Thus any parliamentary revolt within the Labor party was avoided. Neither Bevanite nor non-Bevanite opponents of German rearmament had anything to revolt about on this occasion. The whole party could follow its leadership in voting against German rearmament—even if the leadership's reasons for opposition were different, and less fundamental, than those given by the left wing.

If other European parliaments had moved as rapidly in approving the European Defense Community as did the British Parliament, with its Conservative majority, the Labor party might have been saved a great deal of <sup>25</sup> The Labor party's disciplinary procedure is established in its Standing Orders. The parliamentary party has the power to withdraw the whip. The National Executive Committee (of the external Labor organization) is to be informed of such action and to decide whether expulsion from the party as a whole is appropriate. 53rd Annual Report of the Labour Conference (1954), p. 202.

<sup>26</sup> 504 H. C. Deb. 1699-1840 (July 31, 1952) and 1869-1960 (Aug. 1, 1952).

agony. But with German rearmament unsettled for so many years, Labor could not very well avoid a showdown. Through 1953 the party leadership was able to cover the rift in its ranks on the basis of a conference resolution that "there should be no German rearmament before further efforts have been made to secure the peaceful reunification of Germany."<sup>27</sup> This resolution did not suffice as a compromise after the Berlin meeting of early 1954, when Western ministers actually met with the Russians in the requisite effort "to secure the peaceful reunification of Germany." The failure of that effort caused the Labor leaders to assume, quite logically, that they were now under an obligation to accept German rearmament within a Western defense organization.

The problem was to obtain party support for this position. And on this score, Clement Attlee, as party leader, encountered difficulties at the outset. His resolution in behalf of German rearmament was approved by so narrow a margin (less than 10) in the parliamentary Labor party that it was obviously difficult for Attlee to unite his followers for any vote in the House itself.<sup>28</sup> The Executive Committee of the external Labor organization was also closely divided on the issue.<sup>29</sup> Plainly there was not enough wholehearted Labor support for German rearmament to counter both the outright left-wing opposition and the widespread non-ideological misgivings within the party.

The leadership's difficulty was compounded by the French Parliament's rejection of the European Defense Community and the subsequent development, in 1954, of the Paris Agreement as an alternative means of rearming the Germans. This meant that the issue of German rearmament would again be presented to the British Parliament. While approval by the Conservative majority could be assumed, the parliamentary Labor party would nevertheless be expected to take a united position, which at this issue it found so hard to achieve. Much of the disunion to be expected in the parliamentary party was foreshadowed by the debate at the Labor conference in the early Fall of 1954. Attlee's very conciliatory statement indicating support for German rearmament won the conference's approval by the barest of margins—3,270,000 to 3,022,000.<sup>30</sup> This paralleled the slender majority in favor of German rearmament within the parliamentary ranks, and indicated that the rift was substantial in both organizations.

The anticipated showdown came in November, 1954, when the Conservative Government asked the House to approve the policy of the Paris Agreement (of that October). Until nearly the last moment, it was assumed that the Labor leadership would impose its desire for an affirmative vote on the parliamentary party as a whole. There was no doubt that the top leaders themselves were convinced by the case for German rearmament, and that they were supported by a majority of Labor M.P.s who outvoted 71 opponents in a party

<sup>27</sup> 52nd Annual Report of the Labour Conference (1953), p. 151.

<sup>28</sup> The Times (London), Feb. 24, 1954, p. 8.

<sup>29</sup> Ibid., Feb. 25, 1954, p. 6.

<sup>30</sup> 53rd Annual Report of the Labour Conference (1954), pp. 92-108.

meeting which "accepted" the Paris Agreement. However, rather than risk many defections in an open parliamentary division, the leadership decided that Labor should not vote at all in the House of Commons. By making abstention on the Paris Agreement the official party line, Labor would at least save itself the embarrassment of having little more than half of its members in the "Aye" column and some of the others defying the leadership by voting "No." Labor's face could not be fully saved, since its general abstention policy was itself a patent confession of an inability to unite on any positive position. But this would not look so bad, it was calculated, as a split between two division lobbies.

Consequently Attlee, among others, accepted the anomaly of speaking in favor of the Paris Agreement and yet not voting for it. And Aneurin Bevan, for example, spoke against the Agreement and also abstained. But there were seven Labor M.P.s who refused to find unity in abstention.<sup>31</sup> One of these, John McGovern, was a supporter of German rearmament and did the completely unexpected by joining the Conservatives in voting "Aye." He had, as he is supposed to have said, the strength of Mr. Attlee's convictions. The other six rebels were bitter-end opponents of German rearmament, for pacifist or other reasons, and they insisted on voting "No" instead of abstaining. Clearly all seven had exposed themselves to party discipline because, even if motivated by pacifist convictions, they could not claim that such convictions entitled them, under Labor's Standing Orders, to vote against the party's collective decision to abstain. The most that the party conceded to pacifist scruples was the right to refrain from voting altogether when Labor supported an arms program. In the present circumstance, it was hard to see how the parliamentary party could avoid disciplining the seven rebels if its authority to discipline was ever to have significance. And the understandable reluctance to deal with the special case of McGovern became submerged in the political necessity of treating all rebels alike.

The Labor whip was withdrawn from the seven M.P.s almost immediately, but this comparatively mild action was upheld by a parliamentary party vote of only 131 to 93.<sup>32</sup> The sizable opposition to discipline, plus the fact that 70 or so Labor M.P.s did not vote at all in the party meeting, indicated a high degree of sympathy for the six opponents of German rearmament. This sympathy, or agreement with the six, was so great that many Labor M.P.s obviously wanted no discipline at all. Yet the consequences of withdrawing the whip were really not very serious for the rebels. All had already so established themselves as mavericks that they could hardly have been entertaining any ministerial ambitions. And so long as they were not ousted from the external Labor party organization they could be readopted as official party candidates for Parliament. About all they lost because of the withdrawal of the whip were the privileges of attending parliamentary Labor party meetings and of receiving information on how to vote in parliamentary divisions. Two of the rebels also lost their places, as Labor members, on Select Committees of the House, but these places involved only interesting duties and not power.<sup>32</sup>

<sup>31</sup> 533 H. C. Deb. 695-96 (Nov. 18, 1954).

<sup>32</sup> The Times (London), Nov. 24, 1954, p. 8.

What seemed really significant about Labor's handling of the seven rebels was the absence of anything like substantial punishment. This cannot be explained entirely as a matter of soft-hearted goodwill on the part of the leadership. The rebels (or at least six of them) represented so popular a point of view that their punishment almost had to be limited. Not only did the six rebels have considerable support within the parliamentary party; they also had the sympathy of a very large section of the external party. At least three of the six opponents of German rearmament received specific assurances of support from their own constituency associations.<sup>33</sup> And there was every reason to believe that the other three did not lack such support. In the face of this, the Labor leadership, even if it wanted to go further, could hardly manage a successful purge of the rebellious M.P.s without alienating or splitting the local organizations in such a way as to lose the constituencies altogether at a general election. It was manifestly impractical to try to read out of the party those who rebelled for what at least half (and perhaps more) of the rank-and-file zealots regarded as good and sufficient reasons. Therefore, it was understandable that only three months after its disciplinary action, the parliamentary party restored the whip to all seven M.P.s.<sup>34</sup> In effect, then, the Labor party had done no more than lightly slap the wrists of its rebels.

The case of Aneurin Bevan. The frustration of Labor's leadership was even more evident in the abortive effort to discipline Aneurin Bevan in 1955. As the leader of a fairly well-defined faction which had openly disagreed with official party policy off and on since 1951, Bevan had more than once given his right-wing opponents cause to seek his ouster. Finally during a parliamentary debate on defense in March, 1955, Bevan exposed himself in a way that seemed to afford an especially propitious opportunity for disciplinary action against him. The particular issue concerned the Conservative Government's motion to approve its policy of British manufacture of hydrogen bombs. The parliamentary Labor party had followed its leaders in agreeing in general to this policy and in submitting an amendment which did little more than object to the way in which the Conservatives were administering the defense organization.<sup>35</sup> But it was hardly surprising that Bevan and most of his followers found fault with the position adopted by a majority of their fellow Labor M.P.s. During the debate, Bevan himself showed that he was dissatisfied with both the government statement and the Labor amendment because they failed to make clear that nuclear weapons were to be confined (as he preferred) to retaliation against <sup>32</sup> Nevertheless, the exclusion of the rebels from essentially non-party posts does illustrate the domination of the parliamentary machinery by the party whips. 536 H. C. Deb. 802-54 (Jan. 31, 1955).

<sup>33</sup> The Times (London) carried stories about favorable constituency resolutions concerning Victor Yates (Nov. 29, 1954, p. 5), Ernest Bennet (Dec. 13, 1954, p. 4), and George Craddock (Dec. 14, 1954, p. 4).

<sup>34</sup> Ibid., Feb. 25, 1955, p. 8; March 11, 1955, p. 3.

<sup>35</sup> 537 H. C. Deb. 2066 (March 2, 1955).

the kind of aggression which itself employed such nuclear weapons. Also he repeated the familiar Bevanite demand for a policy that emphasized peaceful negotiations with the Soviet Union.<sup>37</sup>

These statements by themselves would not have been enough to expose Bevan to the full wrath of the leadership. He was not alone among Labor M.P.s in raising such objections during the course of the debate. And Bevan did not go so far as the Labor member who was against British manufacture of hydrogen bombs in any circumstances. But Bevan committed a less pardonable act against the party leadership when he openly challenged Clement Attlee during the latter's speech. Bevan addressed Attlee, as though he were questioning a Conservative opponent, to ask—or very nearly demand—that his leader explain whether the official Labor amendment meant support for the use of “thermo-nuclear weapons in circumstances of hostilities, although they were not used against us.” Incidentally, Attlee gave no specific answer to the question, and no doubt he thought it odd as well as rude that another Labor M.P. should seek to embarrass him in this way.<sup>38</sup> This was much more flagrant disrespect for party authority than was the behavior of Bevan and 61 other dissidents when they abstained from voting on the Labor amendment.<sup>39</sup> However great the latter offense, it could not effectively be punished anyway. Sixty-two rebels were too many to discipline.

Aneurin Bevan himself seemed to be another matter. His offense against Attlee was singled out for discipline even though it was appreciated that Bevan had spoken the sentiments of his followers and perhaps of some others as well. The apparent objective was to try to separate Bevan from the lesser rebels on the basis that his offense was of a special nature. Within a week of Bevan's “insult” to Attlee, it was known that Labor's shadow cabinet was going to recommend that the parliamentary party withdraw the whip and that this was considered only a prelude to Bevan's eventual ouster from the party at large. The withdrawal of the whip did take place after a week's delay occasioned by Bevan's influenza. However, by this time it was clear that any thoroughgoing discipline of Bevan would be achieved at a very high cost. The parliamentary party voted for withdrawing the whip by the margin of 141 to 122, and defeated a milder substitute resolution of censure by the still narrower vote of 138 to 124. Even these marginal victories might have been impossible if Attlee had not gone so far as to announce that he considered the votes to be questions of confidence in himself as leader.<sup>40</sup>

Attlee now appeared unwilling to push such questions of confidence any further and to be looking for some kind of compromise with Bevan. Indeed,

<sup>37</sup> Ibid., cols. 2116–22.

<sup>38</sup> Ibid., col. 2176. Attlee's discomfiture was indicated by the first sentence of his response: “My right hon. Friend is asking me that question.”

<sup>39</sup> The number of abstainers is arrived at by noting Labor M.P.s who did vote against the government's motion but who did not vote for the official Labor amendment. Ibid., cols. 2189–2200. For a refinement introduced into this method of calculation, see the Manchester Guardian Weekly, March 10, 1955, p. 5.

<sup>40</sup> The Times (London), March 17, 1955, p. 6.

earlier there were rumors that Attlee had been persuaded, against his own inclination, to support the ouster because it was favored by his right-wing lieutenants and by the principal trade unionists. At any rate, when the National Executive of the external Labor party first met to consider what it ought to do about Bevan after the parliamentary party's withdrawal of the whip, Attlee (an ex officio member) succeeded in amending the right-wing's expulsion motion so that before any action was taken a special committee would meet with Bevan to seek assurances as to his future conduct. Among other reasons for this conciliatory step, it is significant that Attlee and his supporters "pointed to the effect which his expulsion would have on the constituencies. . . ."<sup>41</sup> This was recognition of the considerable sympathy which had already been aroused in Bevan's behalf by the action initiated against him and of the unpleasant consequence of further alienating large numbers of Labor militants by expelling their champion. That consequence might ordinarily have been accepted, but in the Spring of 1955, with a general election anticipated, there was an urgent political reason to mend party fences. Thus the National Executive, despite its clear anti-Bevanite majority (like that of the parliamentary Labor party), adopted the tactics of conciliation rather than discipline. The great purge of Aneurin Bevan was called off.

All that Bevan had to do was to state to the Executive's special committee that during the intra-party discussion (which he regarded as entirely legitimate) he had not intended to "create difficulties for Mr. Attlee" or cause him "embarrassment in his position as the leader of the party." If, Bevan added, "my actions or speech could lend themselves to the interpretation that such was my motive then I am sincerely sorry and I apologize to Mr. Attlee for any pain I may have caused him. I ask for nothing more than the opportunity to serve our party under his leadership."<sup>42</sup>

This was neither a straightforward confession of wrong-doing nor much of an assurance that Bevan would trim his future conduct to the wishes of the party leadership. Whatever prestige the National Executive could now maintain had to be asserted in its own resolution rather than in anything it obtained from Bevan. Over the opposition of seven Bevanites, or pro-Bevanites, on the Executive, a majority of 16 supported an unusually sharp resolution approving the withdrawal of the whip by the parliamentary party. And the Executive warned that it would take "drastic action against future violations of party discipline."<sup>43</sup> The right-wing might take some comfort from these strong words, but Bevan's supporters had more cause to feel that the triumph was theirs. The Bevanite paper ran its story of the affair under the headline, "The Plot that Failed," and claimed that expulsion was halted because the "protest against this step had been so strong that those who started on this mad manoeuvre have been compelled to beat a retreat."<sup>44</sup>

<sup>41</sup> Ibid., March 24, 1955, p. 8.

<sup>42</sup> Manchester Guardian Weekly, April 7, 1955, p. 2.

<sup>43</sup> Ibid. "Tribune", April 1, 1955, p. 1.

One does not have to accept the view that expulsion was a "mad manoeuvre" in order to agree that the Labor leadership had beat a retreat. Whether the leadership was compelled to do so is a nice question of language. Certainly Attlee found it expedient to persuade his cohorts to stop short of the expulsion which seemed to have been the original intention. He did not persuade all of the leadership that retreat was necessary, but he secured the requisite majority. The leadership's retreat became complete late in April, when the parliamentary party restored the whip to Bevan. The rebel had suffered no more than a month of partial banishment from Labor councils. No doubt the speed with which Bevan was restored to parliamentary Labor status owed a great deal to the scheduling of the general election for May. Labor meant to present the voters with as much appearance of unity as it could muster.

Implications for unity. These two instances, involving German rearmament and Aneurin Bevan himself, do not indicate that formal party discipline is altogether useless. Its effectiveness with respect to relatively isolated rebels was previously observed. But it is apparent that the efficacy of discipline is decidedly limited when a party's leadership, though backed by a majority, is faced with parliamentary dissidents representing a substantial body of opinion. This is another way of saying that when there is a real and continuing factional division, the leadership cannot compel obedience. The Labor party has happened to have such a division, and the right-wing majority has lacked the means of bending the left to its will. The nearest thing to a solution—arrived at for the sake of appearances—has resulted not from the use of disciplinary weapons, but rather from statements of policy that make sufficient verbal concessions to the left without abandoning the substance of the leadership's position.

Perhaps the Labor rifts which party discipline has been incapable of resolving may be taken to mean that Labor no longer has the degree of solidarity supposed to characterize a British party. That interpretation, however, seems unwarranted. For one thing, the cases of German rearmament and of Aneurin Bevan are really exceptions, though significant ones, to the day-by-day parliamentary unity which Labor displays on almost all issues. And, secondly, the important breaks in the party's voting have come only during a period of opposition. It should be stressed that the Bevanites, whose policy differences with the Labor leadership were manifested in April, 1951, never voted against their party majority so long as Labor constituted the government. Of course, it is true that parliamentary disunity even in an opposition party is regarded as outside the regular scheme of things. And, most relevant to Labor's situation, disunity openly displayed is considered damaging enough to the party's cause so that the leadership seeks compromises which the dissidents can accept. Such compromises, it ought to be added, almost have to be sought if Labor is to be counted as an effective political force. Factional voting, by Bevanites no more than by others, can hardly be accepted as normal in the way it so often is by American congressional parties.

III. GENERAL OBSERVATIONS

The import of this study is that there appear to be no British party devices which provide a sufficient explanation of parliamentary cohesion. In the absence of such an explanation, it is tempting to turn to general features of the national setting for an understanding of why British parties are more cohesive than American. At least, it is possible to offer some suggestions.

First, there is the nature of the British constitutional system. While parliamentary government has itself been continuously shaped by the parties, the basic conception of executive responsibility to Parliament antedated modern parties and provided the constitutional mold in which these parties have operated. As we now know them, British parties developed around the principle of securing a legislative majority in order to gain control of the executive. Parliamentary parties were not always as cohesive as they are today, but their growing sense of unity in the last century has been conditioned by the desirability of such unity for the maintenance in office of an increasingly important executive authority. The British constitutional system adds to the importance of cohesiveness in a parliamentary party (or as we might say of "party responsibility") in a way that the American Constitution, with its separation of powers, does not. To be sure, there is some political advantage to be gained by an American party, be it a majority or a minority, in maintaining a high degree of solidarity among its legislators, but the stimulus is not nearly as great as it is for a British party, which must maintain its solidarity if it is to govern at all, or claim to be able to govern.<sup>45</sup> In this circumstance, it is understandable that cohesion has been made a political virtue.

Another consequence of the British constitutional system which bears on the maintenance of party solidarity is the concentration of power and prestige in ministerial offices. Without the important congressional committee positions which, under the American separation of powers, are awarded independently of executive authority, the British M.P. who is interested in political promotion has to concentrate on obtaining one of the ministerial positions at the disposal of the party leadership when it constitutes the government. This provides a strong personal incentive for some members to demonstrate their party loyalty, although it cannot account for the equally strong loyalty of other M.P.s who, because of advanced age or temperament, are unambitious for ministerial offices.

Second, some attention ought to be given to the "nationalization" of British politics, and thus to the fact that M.P.s are not expected to vote in response to the pressure of their local constituents. Although conceding that the parties themselves, once established nationally, have played a role in subordinating local issues and interests, it seems more plausible to stress the importance of Britain's relative smallness and homogeneity in facilitating the centralization, not only of governmental authority, but also of political parties. In Britain, party centralization appears to involve the subordination of a less substantial diversity of interests than would be the case in the United States. Parliamentary representatives, in accepting their party's national positions, do not have to run counter to a strong political localism and regionalism which, despite our growingly pervasive industrialism, remain matters of American tradition and habit. And, of course, the British do not have power centers comparable to American states.

<sup>45</sup> Compare the view of American politics expounded by D. W. Brogan. He holds that the United States Constitution is designed to make difficult an effective (that is, a unified) party system. Politics in America (New York, 1954), pp. 91-94.

The effective freedom of the M.P. from his own constituents may also be facilitated by the fact that British politics have remained largely uninfluenced by the conceptions of direct democracy, whose impact on American parties was so overwhelming in the Jacksonian era and again in the progressive period of the 1900's. Subjecting representatives to the vicissitudes of the direct primary, to take a leading example, has never appealed to the British. Nor have other aspects of American-style direct democracy made much headway against Britain's residual respect for a governing class especially trained for public life. It seems, therefore, that there may be less localism in British parliamentary voting not only for geographic reasons, but also because of a different attitude toward the relationship of the representative to the popular will.

Third, there is the possibility that cohesive parliamentary parties have resulted, in part, from an ideological division which has been assumed, at least until recently, to be much sharper in British politics than in American. If this assumption is warranted, it can be argued that an M.P. would be restrained from joining the parliamentary opposition on any given issue by a loyalty to his party more deep-seated than that felt by an American congressman. For an M.P. to desert his party might seem nearly equivalent to deserting his class. Ordinarily this kind of class-conscious politics is attributed to the rise of the Labor party, and so indirectly to the factors which have produced a large-scale socialist movement in Britain but not in the United States.<sup>46</sup> But it should be noted that British parliamentary parties were already more cohesive than American before Labor became a major political force. The most that might be said is that the solidarity of parliamentary parties has increased since the development of the Labor party.

All three of the above observations, it may be granted, are mainly speculative as to the cause of the relatively high cohesion of British parliamentary parties. Each observation involves general historical and social circumstances about which it is difficult to be definitive. What remains to be pointed out is that insofar as such broad environmental explanations are accepted, there seems little likelihood that American legislative parties can be made to resemble their British counterparts. Unlike devices of party organization, the conditioning factors of constitutional tradition, political history, geography, and socioeconomic background cannot be recommended for another country.

<sup>46</sup> The significance of this difference is discussed in the article on British mass parties referred to in note 5.

CASTE AND THE ANDHRA COMMUNISTS*

SELIG S. HARRISON

University of California (Berkeley)

The primary raw material of Communist power in economically less developed regions of the world is neither the landless peasant with outstretched rice bowl nor the intellectual in search of a cause. Even more basic than these frequently summoned symbols, the realpolitik of social tensions determines political events where economic scarcity aggravates the particularisms dividing man from man.

This contention gains strength from a study of Communist fortunes in a representative Asian setting. With little or no industrial economy to ease population density and underemployment, Andhra State on the southeast coast of India bears the familiar marks of Asian poverty. Here has emerged the most successful regional Communist movement in India. Yet the explanation for Andhra Communist strength does not lie in economic factors. The postwar decade in Andhra demonstrates that social factors can relegate even unusually powerful economic factors to a position of secondary importance.

A comparative analysis spanning three elections in Andhra shows that Communist success has depended primarily on the effective manipulation of social tensions. In Andhra these tensions have been twofold: the rivalry between two rising peasant proprietor caste groups, and the struggle of all Andhra, a Telugu-speaking region of 20,507,801 people, to win linguistic identity as a separate province within the Indian Union. Communist candidates have won their margins of victory most often when they have been able to exploit allegiance to caste and to language region. They have made the most of economic despair, signs of decay in the governing Congress party, and the reflected glory of international communism, but these alone do not get to the bottom of the Communist roots in Andhra soil.

The present study seeks to establish the crucial importance of caste manipulation as a source of Andhra Communist strength.<sup>1</sup> This is not to say that Communists monopolize exploitation of caste. Inevitably the institution of caste, so peculiarly integral to all Hindu social organization, pervades the entire political system in predominantly Hindu India. Whether caste in India lends itself more readily to political manipulation than do social factors elsewhere has not yet been explored. But Hindu caste discipline clearly wields a measure of political influence in India that cries for serious study. While the non-Hindu

* The field research for this study was conducted during the author's three years in India as Associated Press correspondent, 1951-54. Research was completed as a consultant to the Modern India Project, University of California (Berkeley). Statistical data were compiled with the assistance of the Littauer Statistical Laboratory, Harvard University, where the author was a Nieman Fellow in 1954-55.

<sup>1</sup> A forthcoming full-length study by the author to be published by the Modern India Project, University of California (Berkeley), seeks to analyze the challenge presented by regional particularisms throughout India to the development of Indian nationalism.

who presumes to assess this influence cannot escape his own limitations as an outsider, he sees at the same time that those in the fold who could speak with greater authority rarely do so by the very fact of their personal position.

As an example of Hindu caste discipline in political motion, the postwar decade in Andhra merits special attention. Caste has played so fundamental a role during this period that this examination becomes in effect a case history in the impact of caste on India's representative institutions.

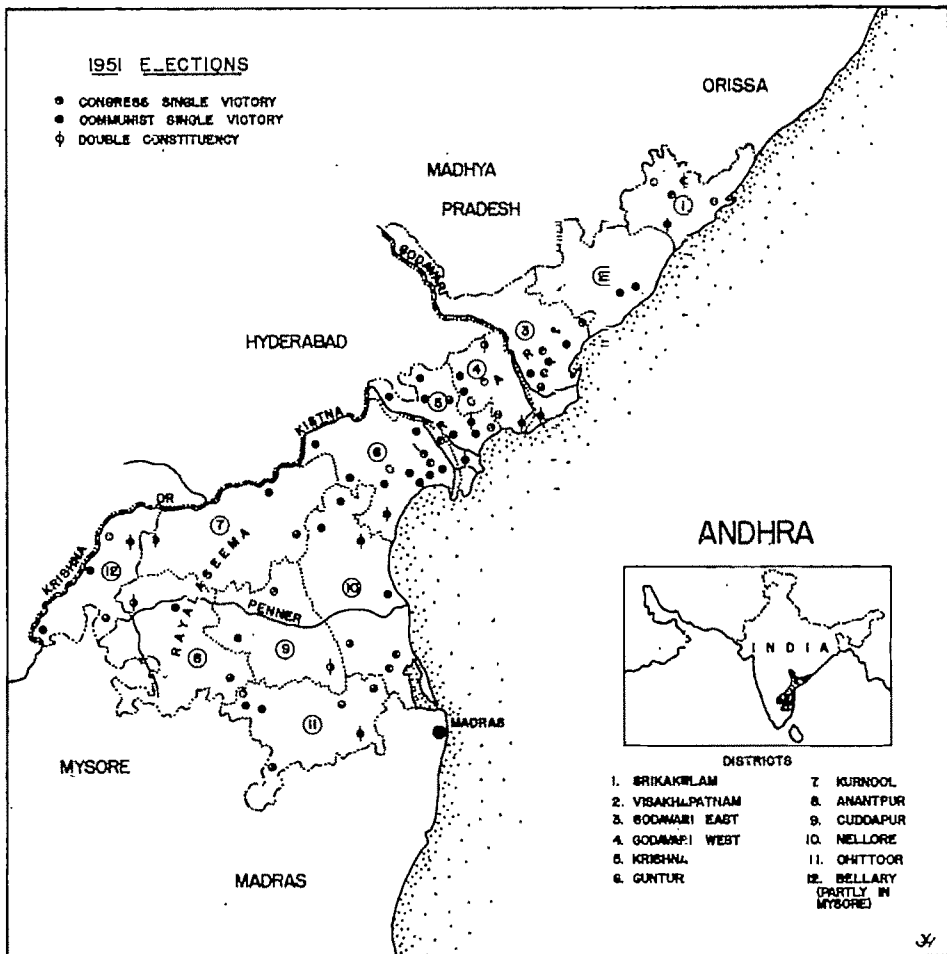

The accident of three free elections within a decade in Andhra—1946, 1951, and 1955—makes Andhra a uniquely convenient unit of study. The first of these elections came only a year before independence. The British Indian regime conducted a limited franchise ballot to choose provincial legislatures which, in turn, named the constitution-writers of India's first Constituent Assembly. By 1951, Prime Minister Nehru's government had launched nationwide direct elections on a basis of general adult franchise to select new members both of the lower house of the Indian Parliament and of state assemblies. The 1951 balloting set a relatively stable political pattern throughout India, with the notable exceptions of Andhra, Travancore-Cochin, and the Patiala and East Punjab States Union (PEPSU).

In the case of Andhra, the legislators elected in 1951 were seated alongside deputies speaking Tamil, Malayalam, and Kannada, in the legislature of multilingual Madras State, a sprawling political Babel carved out by British map-makers with little regard to south India's cultural differences. It was only after Potti Sriramulu, a prominent Gandhian advocate of provincial autonomy, fasted unto death in 1952 that the Nehru government demarcated Andhra as a separate state. When the new unit was inaugurated in October, 1953, the 160 Telugu members of the Madras legislature, including a 41-member Communist bloc, became the new Andhra legislature. A Congress cabinet took office, but factionalism within and Communist harassment from the outside brought its collapse on a no-confidence motion by November, 1954. New elections had to be conducted in February, 1955, the third in less than ten years.

For all Andhra political groups, this decade of near-deadlock was a rigorous exercise. Where else in Asia has a major Communist bid for power faced so intensive a testing process at the polls? Moreover, the checkered course of Andhra Communist strategy during the period under study enhances the significance of this examination. For the primacy of caste and language manipulation in Andhra Communist success has persisted through the gamut of a wartime united front, four bloody guerrilla years, and the present parliamentary phase of Indian communism.

By focusing on caste and language it is possible to discover why the Andhra Communists, while successively increasing their popular vote from 258,974 (on a limited franchise in 1946) to 1,208,656 (1951) to 2,695,562 (1955), were able to win a significant number of seats in the legislature only in 1951. To add to this seeming discrepancy, not only did the popular vote increase—it increased without disturbing the localized concentration of Communist power.

In all three elections Andhra communism demonstrated its greatest strength in the fertile rice delta where the Krishna and Godavari rivers empty into the Bay of Bengal. Contrary to the theme that poverty above all breeds communism, arid Rayalaseema in west Andhra has consistently failed to produce a significant Communist response.

I. "KULAK PETTAMDAR"

To find the keys to this puzzling situation it is necessary first to establish the major caste contours of the Andhra political landscape. As the Indian government's recent report on rural credit warned:

It is necessary to place the operational picture against the social background of rural India. This is more important than almost anything else for a true understanding of the working of rural credit, cooperative, governmental, or other, just as indeed it is also indispensable for the proper appraisal of the effects of any particular measure of policy or legislation or administration as they shape themselves, or sometimes fail to take shape at all, in the actualities of the Indian village.<sup>2</sup>

In the case of the Andhra Communists, the effective use of caste does not arise full-blown out of a bottomless tactical armory but rather out of the caste homogeneity of the Andhra Communist leadership itself. Since the founding of the Andhra Communist party in 1934, the party leadership has been the property of a single subcaste, the Kammas landlords, who dominate the Krishna-Godavari delta.<sup>3</sup> This fact carries enormous importance in view of the rising influence of the Kammas in Andhra life. The war and postwar years were a boom period for the Kammas farmers,<sup>4</sup> who own an estimated 80 per cent of the fertile delta land.<sup>5</sup> High prices for both food and cash crops made many Indian peasant proprietor castes newly rich, but for the Kammas, presiding over land as productive as any in all India, the boom was especially potent.

Kamma funds have made the Andhra party better able to support itself than any other regional arm of Indian communism. In fair political weather or foul a virile, expensively produced Communist press in Andhra's Telugu language has been kept alive by a Kamma publisher, Katragadda Rajagopal Rao,<sup>6</sup> whose family also operates one of India's largest Virginia tobacco plantations and virtually monopolizes the fertilizer market in Andhra.<sup>7</sup> As "the people who count"<sup>8</sup> in the villages of the delta districts, even relatively modest Kamma landholders have been in a position to put decisive influence on the side of the Communist party.<sup>9</sup>

Aruna Asaf Ali, a member of the Indian Communist Central Committee, has said that "a distinguishing feature of the Andhra party is its social content. The rural intelligentsia [numerically stronger and politically a great deal more mature than in the rest of India] has provided the party with a leadership that

<sup>2</sup> All-India Rural Credit Survey, Vol. 2: General Report (Bombay, 1954), p. 54.

<sup>3</sup> G. S. Bhargava discusses this in A Study of the Communist Movement in Andhra (Delhi, Siddhartha Publications, 1955), pp. 2, 14, 22-34; see also K. B. Choudary, A Brief History of the Kammas (Sangamjagarlamudi, Andhra: published by the author, 1955), pp. 98, 123.

<sup>4</sup> Choudary, A Brief History of Kammas, p. 124, notes that "the Second World War and the years that have followed have once again seen rocketing of the prices of paddy, pulses, turmeric, tobacco, and fruits. These have been very prosperous years for agricultural communities like Kammas."

<sup>5</sup> This is the private consensus of members of different Andhra castes. No official figures exist showing caste land ownership in Madras.

<sup>6</sup> Katragadda Rajagopal Rao's role is noted in "The Future of Andhra," Thought (New Delhi), Oct. 3, 1953, p. 4.

<sup>7</sup> The holdings of the six Katragadda brothers are described in P. C. Joshi, Among Kisan Patriots (Bombay, People's Publishing House, 1946), p. 4. This pamphlet reviews the Vijayawada, Andhra, session of The All-India Kisan Sabha.

<sup>8</sup> Kamma status in the delta is so described in "How Red is Andhra?," The People (pro-Congress weekly, New Delhi), March 4, 1952, p. 8.

<sup>9</sup> For an excellent description of the manner in which a dominant caste can mold village behavior, see All-India Rural Credit Survey, pp. 56-58.

knows its mind and is unmistakably competent."<sup>10</sup> Three wealthy Kamma intellectuals have maintained for at least the past 15 years key control of the Andhra Communist party: party secretary Chaudrasehar Rao, former national Indian Communist party secretary Rajeshwar Rao, and M. Basava Punniiah, a member of the Indian Communist Central Committee.<sup>11</sup> As a result, an Andhra Communist dissident has coined the epithet kulak pettamdar to attack the Andhra leadership, coupling the Russian word for rich peasant with the Telugu word for head of a caste or tribe.<sup>12</sup>

In sharp contrast to Kamma control of the Communist party, stands the power of the rival landowning Reddi caste in the Congress party.<sup>13</sup> This posture of political competition between the two caste groups is only a modern recurrence of an historic pattern dating back to the fourteenth century.<sup>14</sup> In the past century<sup>15</sup> the rivalry has sharpened to the point where the Kmmas have felt themselves an excluded "out" group in social and political life—a sociological fact which has figured prominently in the strategy of both major parties in the elections under study.

Kamma lore nurtures the image of a once-proud warrior clan reduced by Reddi chicanery to its present peasant status. Reddi duplicity, recounted by Kamma historian K. Bhavaiah Choudary, was first apparent in 1323 A.D. at the downfall of Andhra's Kakatiya dynasty. Reciting voluminous records to prove that Kmmas dominated the Kakatiya court, Choudary suggests that the Reddis, also influential militarists at the time, struck a deal at Kamma expense with the Moslem conquerors of the Kakatiya regime. The Kmmas lost their noble rank and were forced into farming.

In his research Choudary frankly has an axe to grind: he seeks to establish <sup>10</sup> In an interview with an editor of the New Age, Feb. 13, 1955, p. 7.

<sup>11</sup> These three have remained members of the secretariat of the Andhra Communist Committee in all reshuffles announced in the Communist press. The most recently declared (1954) membership of the Secretariat also included in its eight names four other Kmmas: M. Hanumantha Rao, a member of the Indian Communist Central Committee; G. Satyanarayana; K. Gopal Rao, a member of the lower house of the Indian Parliament; and Krishna Rao.

This caste breakdown and the tables in this study showing castes of Congress and Communist candidates and legislators have been compiled through the cooperation of members of major Telugu castes. The compilation has included a cross-check test of the designations made by each cooperating informant by other persons of different castes.

<sup>12</sup> Kulak pettamdar recurs throughout C.V.K. Rao, Andhra Communist Navakathwapu Bandaram [Bluff of the Andhra Communist Leadership] (Masulipatnam, Andhra, 1954). Rao is a member of the Devadasi caste. Partially translated from Telugu for the author.

<sup>13</sup> Reddi power in the Congress figures in D. V. Rama Rao, "Election Lessons," Swatantra, Feb. 15, 1952, p. 13; Choudary, A Brief History of the Kmmas (cited in note 3), p. 97; and an earlier article by the author, "How Nehru Did It in Andhra," New Republic, March 21, 1955, p. 7.

<sup>14</sup> See Choudary, A Brief History of the Kmmas (cited in note 3), p. 55, and his earlier three-volume history, Kammacharitra Sangraha (Sengamjagarlamudi, Andhra: published by the author, 1939), Vol. 1, p. 20. Partially translated from Telugu for the author.

<sup>15</sup> Bhargava, A Study of the Communist Movement in Andhra (cited in note 3), p. 14, traces the present degree of Kamma-Reddi enmity to the turn of the century.

Kamma claims to Kshatriya (warrior) rank, second in the traditional Hindu caste hierarchy, rather than their present Sat-Sudra status.<sup>16</sup> His main outline of Kamma and Reddi history, however, does not differ essentially from the consensus of more disinterested scholars.<sup>17</sup> Both Kammas and Reddis were probably warriors in the service of the early Andhra kings. Later they became farmers, some feudal overlords and others small peasant proprietors who to this day take part in the cultivation of their land. Between them they dominated rural Andhra, leaving Brahmans beyond the pale of economic power in the countryside.

For five centuries the Kammas have centered in the four mid-Andhra delta districts, which Choudary says were once known as "Kamma Rashtra" or "Kamma Land." The 1921 census<sup>18</sup> shows 600,679 Kammas congregated in the delta districts, with another 560,305 scattered in other Andhra districts and in pockets in neighboring Tamil territory.<sup>19</sup> The extent of Kamma dominance in the delta is exemplified in Guntur district, where all other peasant proprietor castes together totalled 149,308, less than half the Kamma figure.

The Reddis<sup>20</sup> gravitated to the five Rayalaseema districts of west Andhra. Here Kammas are in the minority; in Cuddapah, for example, Reddis numbered 211,558 to 20,171 Kammas, and in Kurnool, Reddis were 121,032 to 14,313 Kammas. Today in popular Telugu parlance the region is called "Reddisseema."

This geographical separation of the two powerful castes had a tribal logic; in any one local area, only one or the other caste group with its patriarch could be dominant. When British tax-collectors came onto the scene, they formalized the status quo, extending the sway of leading landholders in each caste over vast zamindari estates. Fourteen Kamma zamindars became the biggest estate owners in the delta country.

Despite their wealth, the Kammas and Reddis as a village-centered rural gentry lagged behind the traditionally education-minded Brahmans in gaining the English literacy that was the entry to political leadership in the early years of the independence movement. For example, the 1921 census showed that out of 79,740 literate Kammas, only 2,672 were able to read English, while out of 159,730 literate Telugu Brahmans, as many as 46,498 were literate in English.<sup>21</sup>

<sup>16</sup> Sat-(Good) Sudra status is accorded to Kammas, Reddis, Velamas, and other Telugu peasant proprietor subcastes to distinguish them from less prosperous Sudra subcastes, according to W. Francis, Census of India, 1901, Vol. 15: Madras, Part I (Calcutta: Superintendent of Government Printing, 1903), p. 136.

<sup>17</sup> See Edgar Thurston, Castes and Tribes of Southern India, 14 vols. (Madras: Government Press, 1909), Vol. 3, p. 94; G. MacKenzie, Manual of Kistna District (Madras, 1883), p. 53; Census of India, 1901, Vol. 15, p. 159; J. H. Hutton, Caste in India (London: Oxford University Press, 1946), p. 11.

<sup>18</sup> The last in which district caste tables for Madras are available.

<sup>19</sup> Census of India, 1921, Vol. 13: Madras, Part II, by G. T. Boag (Madras: Superintendent of Government Press, 1922), Table XIII, p. 119.

<sup>20</sup> Reddis are also referred to by anthropologists as Kapus. However, this terminology is confusing in contemporary Andhra; Kapu is loosely applied to other non-Brahman peasant castes.

<sup>21</sup> Census of India, 1921, Vol. 13, Table IX, p. 77.

Choudary explains this in the following way:

Shorn of their principalities, commanding officer's posts, and choudariships, Kammas had to content themselves with the lot of peasants and husbandmen. Learning only Telugu, they looked after their ryotwari [holdings]. Only about 1900 A.D., Kammas awakened to the fact that without English education they cannot better their position. The few educated Kammas who joined government service had to struggle hard to come up due to lack of patronage and the opposition of Brahman vested interests.<sup>22</sup>

It was inevitable that Kamma-Reddi competition would increase with the educational advancement of the two castes, and that the Brahman politicians who controlled the Andhra Congress party would gradually lose their actual—if not titular—party control to others exercising greater local power in Andhra. This is precisely what happened between 1921 and World War II. Both Kammas and Reddis, pushing forward with the anti-Brahman movement that swept all South India, supported the Andhra branch of the short-lived Justice party.<sup>23</sup> Then Reddi power lodged itself in the Congress behind a Brahman façade at the same time that a clique of young Kamma intellectuals was founding the Andhra Communist party. Choudary notes that Kamma youth were attracted by "the Communist Party, with its slogans of social equality," but he does not seek to explain why the party in Andhra became "predominated by Kammas" rather than Reddis.<sup>24</sup>

The circumstances explaining the polarization of Kamma-Reddi warfare on a Communist-Congress basis deserve further study. The consensus in Andhra points to geographical accident: the Kammas happened to be in the delta. Their political activity of every stripe had always been greater than in Rayalaseema. From the beginning of the independence movement Gandhian Congress leaders found their liveliest Andhra response in the delta rice trading towns of Vijayawada and Guntur, centers of the region's intellectual and political ferment. Thus, just as the then Brahman-dominated Congress drew its leadership from the delta, so the challenge to this leadership emerged within the strongest non-Brahman caste group in the delta. In addition, in the delta's legions of landless laborers there was the grist of a mass movement plain to any young Marxist intellectual looking for a cause.

The young Reddi intelligentsia in the Rayalaseema hinterlands was politically quiescent by comparison with the Kammas. The young Reddi who did desire a political career could best seek it in the Congress, where his caste group, gravitating almost by default, had cornered the market on the bulk of the party's non-Brahman patronage. Some young Reddi leaders were a part of the Communist party from its inception, but they have always been outnumbered by Kammas. Only one has held his own in the party hierarchy, Puchalapalli Sundarayya, whose real name is Puchalapalli Sundar Rama Reddi.<sup>25</sup> He is in a

<sup>22</sup> Choudary, A Brief History of the Kammas (cited in note 3), p. 122.

<sup>23</sup> A coalition of aggrieved non-Brahman castes throughout South India.

<sup>24</sup> Choudary, A Brief History of the Kammas (cited in note 3), pp. 97-98.

<sup>25</sup> A brilliant orator in Telugu, Sundarayya is the party's most popular mass leader in Andhra.

position comparable to that of the Kamma Congress veteran, N. G. Ranga, a nationally prominent Congress figure and another notable exception to the rule of caste politics in Andhra. Both of these politically displaced persons enjoy wide personal popularity, but both strike discordant notes within the otherwise relatively homogeneous leadership cliques of their respective parties.

II. THE ROLE OF LANDLESS LABOR

Against this historical backdrop it is now possible to examine the course of political events surrounding the 1946, 1951, and 1955 elections in Andhra in an effort to explain the consistent concentration of the Communist popular vote in the delta as well as its special potency in 1951.

In 1946, Andhra was the only region in India where the Communists felt strong enough to enter a bloc of candidates across one large contiguous group of constituencies against the candidates of the Congress—recognized champion of independence at a time when India remained under foreign domination. In Bengal, Malabar, and parts of north India, where the Communist party was also an election factor, Communist entries were pinpointed in scattered centers of industrial or farm labor, but in Andhra they were massed solidly over the delta. Of the 62 constituencies in areas now forming Andhra,<sup>26</sup> the Communists contested 29, all virtually side by side. Twenty-four were located in Krishna, Guntur, East and West Godavari districts, the delta belt commonly called the "Circars."<sup>27</sup> This concentration in the delta was no momentary accident of tactics but a reflection of the basic character of Andhra communism. The pattern of 1946 remains the pattern of 1955.

With Communist candidates almost exclusively centered in the delta in 1946 (see Table I), it was not surprising that most Communist votes were recorded there. Even in 1955, however, with only 57.4 per cent of the Communist candi-

TABLE I. LOCATION OF COMMUNIST POWER IN ANDHRA, AS SHOWN IN 1946, 1951, AND 1955 ELECTIONS

Year	Votes Cast in Four Delta Districts: * Per Cent of Total Votes Cast	Communist Votes Cast in Four Delta Districts: Per Cent of Total Communist Vote	Communist Candidates Contesting in Four Delta Districts: Per Cent of Total Communist Candidates
1946	55.1	94.7	89.2
1951	54.3	85.5	72.2
1955	56.2	72.8	57.4

* The four Andhra districts in the Krishna-Godavari delta are Krishna, Guntur, East Godavari, and West Godavari.

<sup>26</sup> "Delimitation of Madras Constituencies," Government of India (Provincial Legislative Assemblies) Order, 1936, cited in Jagat Narain, Law of Elections in India and Burma (Calcutta: Eastern Law House, 1937), pp. 250-58.

<sup>27</sup> Return Showing the Results of Elections to the Central Legislative Assembly and Provincial Legislatures, 1945-46 (New Delhi: Government of India, 1946).

dates running in the delta districts, 72.8 per cent of the Communist vote still went to these delta contestants. In 1951, 31 of the 41 successful Communist candidates were in delta constituencies; in 1955, 11 of 15. In all three elections, the delta has provided an average of 55 per cent of Andhra's total vote.

View this concentration in the delta alongside the failure of the Communists in 1955 to win more than 15 seats in a 196-member chamber<sup>28</sup>—at the same time that they were increasing their share of the popular vote from 18.6 to 31.2 per cent. Congress quarters reason hopefully<sup>29</sup> that the increased vote resulted naturally from the greater number of Communist candidates in 1955 (169 out of a total 560) than in 1951 (61 out of 614). Yet this explanation ignores the fact that the Communists retained their high proportion of the vote in their delta heartland. While their ambitious "shotgun" strategy helps explain why the Communists won comparatively few seats in 1955, other factors must be found to explain the consistent concentration of the Communist popular vote as well as its special potency in 1951.

Certainly one feature distinguishing the delta scene from other parts of Andhra is the high population density—especially the high percentage of landless laborers. Density runs from 900 to 1200 persons per square mile in the delta, as compared with 316 in the rest of Andhra. Thirty-seven per cent of the total agricultural population in the delta is landless labor, a concentration second only to Malabar District on the West Indian coast.<sup>30</sup>

Andhra Communist leaders have from the outset attempted to organize the Adi-Andhras, an untouchable subcaste comprising the bulk of the region's landless migrants.<sup>31</sup> Their success has been conceded by Communist leaders outside Andhra who granted that "the organized strength of agricultural workers in Andhra is by far the biggest in any province."<sup>32</sup> The likelihood that the votes of landless laborers have been a bulwark to Communist strength gains further support from an analysis of the concentration of Communist votes

<sup>28</sup> The Legislature was increased from 160 to 196 members before the 1955 elections in a new delimitation of constituencies.

<sup>29</sup> For example, The Hindu, March 10, 1955, p. 4. This issue also contains detailed election statistics.

<sup>30</sup> Thomas Shea, "Agrarian Unrest and Reform in South India," Far Eastern Survey, Vol. 23, pp. 81-88, at pp. 84-85 (June, 1954). See also District Census (1951) Handbooks (Madras: Government Press, 1953), Tables D-III Krishna, p. 183; West Godavari, p. 135; East Godavari, p. 292; Guntur, p. 206.

<sup>31</sup> For the history of the Andhra Communist party, see P. Sundarayya, Vishalandralu Prajaraajam [People's Rule in Vishalandhra] (Vijayawada: Vishalandhra Publishing House, 1946), Ch. 6. Translated from Telugu for the author.

<sup>32</sup> "The Struggle for People's Democracy and Socialism, Some Questions of Strategy and Tactics," The Communist, Vol. 2, pp. 21-90, at p. 35 (June-July, 1949). This was formerly the monthly organ of the Communist party of India.

For additional references to Communist organization of agricultural labor in Andhra, see N. Prasada Rao, "Agricultural Laborers Association," News Bulletin of the All-India Kisan Sabha, Oct.-Nov., 1952, p. 22, which terms agricultural labor "the rock-like base of the [Communist] movement in Andhra"; and "Second Andhra Agricultural Labor Conference," Aug., 1953, p. 6, setting organized strength in the region then at 94,890.

alongside the irrigation map of the delta. The same extensively irrigated delta rice country which, as a focus of farming, has dense settlements of landless labor, such as Tenali, Gudivada, Bapatla, and Bandar taluks (subdivisions) in Krishna District, is also the site of consistently high Communist voting.<sup>33</sup> After the 1951 elections, the Congress publicly acknowledged that Communist "canalization" of agricultural labor votes had played an important part in the election.<sup>34</sup> There is no evidence to suggest that this factor was absent in 1955. On the contrary, the Communists themselves claim that "the most oppressed and exploited strata of the people in the rural areas, the agricultural workers and poorest peasants, stood firmly by the party."<sup>35</sup> Independent press comment has accepted this as a fact.<sup>36</sup>

In 1946, however, the Communists could not have derived much benefit from this source of strength. Franchise limitations excluded all but 13 per cent of the population. In addition to a literacy requirement, only registered landholders owning, in addition to their homes, immovable property valued at the rupee equivalent of $10 or more were permitted to vote.<sup>37</sup> Therefore, landless farm laborers were unable to take part in the election.

In any case, the support of landless labor would not explain the two subsequent elections. To be sure, six of the 31 seats won by the delta Communists in 1951 were reserved for scheduled castes (untouchables). These seats, by their very nature, hang on the support of landless labor. In addition, these six reserved seats were in double-member constituencies in which the Communists also won the six non-reserved seats. In these double constituencies both general and scheduled caste voters can vote twice, each influencing the outcome in both seats; landless labor thus clearly played a role in the six non-reserved seats in these double-member constituencies. In the remaining 19 of the 1951 Communist victories, landless labor votes must also have been an important prop to Communist candidates. But if dependable landless labor support alone explains Andhra communism, why then could the Communists not win as many seats in 1955 as in 1951?

It is the contention of this study that Communist victory margins in 1951 stemmed from a timely confluence of events, favorable to the manipulation of social tensions, which did not recur in 1955. In 1951 the movement to carve a separate Andhra State out of Madras had reached a high emotional pitch. The Communists surcharged the election atmosphere with propaganda keyed to Telugu patriotism, while in 1955, with Andhra State a reality, the Congress

<sup>33</sup> Imperial Gazetteer of India, Provincial Series, Madras I (Calcutta: Superintendent of Government Printing, 1908), p. 309. See canal locations in frontispiece maps in District Census (1951) Handbooks; note also S. W. Cushing, "The Geography of Godavari," Bulletin of Geographic Society of Philadelphia, Vol. 9, pp. 2-3 (Oct., 1911), reprinted.

<sup>34</sup> The Hindu, March 3, 1952, p. 1.

<sup>35</sup> Ajoy Ghosh, "The Andhra Elections and the Communist Party," New Age, March 4, 1955, p. 1. New Age is the weekly organ of the Communist party in India.

<sup>36</sup> For example, see "Andhra Victory," editorial in Times of India, March 10, 1955, p. 4.

<sup>37</sup> Public General Acts and Measures, Vol. 1. Sixth Schedule, Part II: Madras (London, 1935-36), pp. 256-57. H.M.S.O.

could make Indian nationalism the issue. Furthermore, at the same time that they were exploiting Telugu solidarity in 1951, the Communists made the most of a bitterly tense moment in Andhra's caste rivalries—a crisis which the Congress was able to surmount in time for 1955.

III. THE 1946 ELECTIONS

At the end of the war, with the polarization of Andhra politics on caste-party lines almost complete, the Kamma Congress leader, N. G. Ranga, was on the far fringes of the Andhra Congress power structure. Inside, a personal rivalry raged between two prominent Telugu Brahman politicians: Pattabhi Sitaramayya, official historian of the Indian National Congress, and Tanguturu Prakasam, "Lion of Andhra," a mass idol, who won a legendary reputation in the independence movement when he bared his chest before British police, daring them to shoot. Sitaramayya typified the Brahman façade behind which Reddi power made its appearance. In 1946 he held firmly onto the Andhra Congress machinery, though Prakasam maneuvered many of his own choices into election nominations. N. G. Ranga was, then, part independent operator, part Prakasam satellite.

Frankly building his political career on a Kamma base, Ranga had articulated a "peasant socialist" theory<sup>28</sup> gingered by Western class slogans but boiling down in concrete terms to a defense of peasant proprietorship as opposed to land nationalization. In Andhra he organized a compact political striking force, bent on increasing Kamma influence in the Congress while at the same time fighting the Communists by reciting the story of Stalin and the peasant. In 1946, however, with Congress activity only beginning to regain momentum after the war, there was little time to put a striking force into action before the elections. Relatively few Kammas won Congress nomination and election, even in Kamma strongholds (see Tables II and III).

The Kamma Communist leaders were in a more favorable position. During the war the Andhra Communists fattened handsomely on the official patronage accorded all-India communism for support of the defense effort. The Congress, demanding freedom first, protested when Britain decided that India was at war. Thus, while Congress leaders spent the war in British jails, Communist leaders not only had a clear field to organize but actually had government support to popularize rationing and talk down strikes.<sup>29</sup> In parts of India where the Communist movement had gained a foothold before the war, this favored position presented a rare opportunity for rapid expansion. The Andhra Communists could take full advantage of the situation. Besides the wealth and influence of their Kamma leaders, they had capitalized as much as any regional <sup>28</sup> For example, N. G. Ranga, Outlines of National Revolutionary Path (Bombay, Hind Kitabs, 1945), pp. 109-10.

<sup>29</sup> The Communist role during the war is summarized in The Communist Party of India, Publication No. 2681, Research and Analysis Branch, Office of Strategic Services, August, 1945, p. 21; note also P. Sundarayya, op. cit., Ch. 6, where it is estimated that Andhra Communist membership rose from 1,000 in 1942 to 8,000 in 1945.

TABLE II. NUMBER OF CANDIDATES BY MAJOR CASTES IN ANDHRA DELTA DISTRICTS, IN 1946, 1951, AND 1955 ELECTIONS

Year	Communist				Congress
	Kamma	Reddi	Brahman	Other	Kamma	Reddi	Brahman	Other
1946	9	—	1	1	4	3	4	7
1951	22	2	3	15	17	7	2	20
1955	32	4	6	24	28	7	7	25

Note: Constituencies reserved for scheduled castes and tribes have been omitted. In the case of 1946, when certain constituencies were also reserved for urban as distinct from rural voters, and on the basis of labor union membership, religion, and sex, these figures apply only to general rural constituencies.

Communist party from the prewar united front with the Congress Socialist party, walking off with almost the entire Andhra Socialist organization in 1939.<sup>40</sup>

The Andhra Communists waged a vigorous campaign in the 1946 elections,

TABLE III. NUMBER OF ELECTED LEGISLATORS BY MAJOR CASTES IN ANDHRA DELTA DISTRICTS, IN 1946, 1951, AND 1955 ELECTIONS

Year	Communist				Congress
	Kamma	Reddi	Brahman	Other	Kamma	Reddi	Brahman	Others
1946	—	—	—	—	4	3	4	7
1951	14	2	3	6	3	3	—	4
1955	1	2	3	3	24	7	7	25

Note: Constituencies reserved for scheduled castes and tribes have been omitted. In the case of 1946, when certain constituencies were also reserved for urban as distinct from rural voters, and on a basis of labor union membership, religion, and sex, these figures apply only to general rural constituencies.

putting their major effort into Kamma strongholds. Because the sole successful Communist contestant won in a labor stronghold,<sup>41</sup> the dominantly rural nature of the Communist effort in 1946 has been overshadowed. Of the 24 delta seats for which the Communists contested, 17 were entirely in rural areas. Of these 17, six were reserved seats for scheduled castes. In each of the 11 remaining "general rural" constituencies, the per cent of the vote polled by the Communists was surprisingly high—ranging from a low of 11.5 to a high of 31.9, with the median falling just above 20.<sup>42</sup> When the franchise property restriction in 1946 is kept in mind, this figure assumes its proper importance. These were not to any substantial degree the votes of agricultural labor. Rather they were votes drawn from the general landed caste Hindu population in the countryside and from propertied voters in small rural centers.

<sup>40</sup> Jayaprakash Narayan, Towards Struggle (Bombay, Padma Publications, 1946), pp. 171, 174.

<sup>41</sup> P. Venkateswarulu in West Godavari-cum Kistna-cum Guntur (Non-union) Factory Labor constituency.

Here a caste analysis of candidates highlights the Kamma base of the Communist leadership. Omitting the six constituencies set apart for scheduled castes, a caste breakdown of the 11 Communist caste Hindu entrants shows nine Kammas, while of 18 caste Hindu Congress entrants for rural seats in the four delta districts only four were Kammas (Table II).

IV. THE KAMMAS AND MAO'S "PEOPLE'S DEMOCRACY"

After the 1946 elections, events in India led quickly to the final withdrawal of British rule and the establishment of the new Nehru government. The Indian Communist party, caught in the war time united front spirit of world communism, was swearing its love for Jawaharlal Nehru as a leftist force in the Congress when the Cominform made its celebrated switch to a terrorist line in Asia in late 1947. Party secretary P. C. Joshi became the scapegoat, and a new insurrectionist strategy was launched under the leadership of B. T. Ranadive. In different parts of India this strategy took different forms. Acid bombs were hurled in the streets of Calcutta as Ranadive talked of urban proletarian uprisings. But in Andhra a revolutionary form then distinctive in Indian Communist experience was taking shape. It combined in a paradoxical fashion the power of the Kammas in the countryside with the land hunger of the migrant untouchables in the delta and in neighboring Telengana, the Telugu-speaking southeast corner of Hyderabad State.

This was the so-called Telengana movement, organized along standard Communist guerrilla lines with wholesale land redistribution and parallel village governments. Clusters of villages in the delta and nearly all of Warangal and Nalgonda districts in Hyderabad went under Communist control from 1948 through 1950. Andhra and Telengana Communist leaders directed a two-way offensive north into Telengana and south into the delta, from a 40-village base of operations in Munagala Jungle in northwest Krishna District.<sup>43</sup> Communist squads raided villages by night, police battalions by day. When Indian Army troops conducted their 1948 "police action" against the Nizam of Hyderabad, they stayed on in Warangal and Nalgonda to drive the Communists out. It took them until 1951 to restore normal local government.

In all the tumult in the delta, most Kammas with their valuable paddy lands

<sup>42</sup> Ellore, 19.3; Bhimavaram, 19.4; Narsapur, 21.4; Bandar, 28.4; Beswada, 31.9, Guntur, 26.9; Narasarpot, 17; Tenali, 16.6; Ongole, 14.4; Rajahmundry, 11.5; and Amalapuram, 18.4.

<sup>43</sup> The designation of Munagala as headquarters during this period is part of a colorful description of the Telengana movement as seen by delta Congress leaders in Charges against the Madras Ministry (by Certain MLAs), published by A. Kaleswara Rao, (Madras, Renaissance Printers Ltd., 1948), p. 28.

went unscathed. So long as the middling-rich farmers, who make up the bulk of the caste, stayed above the battle, they were classified in Communist strategy as "neutralized."<sup>44</sup> This was outright deviation, not only from the Ranadive line, which saw all landowners as equally villainous, but also from the Moscow-Zhdanov line decreeing unequivocal guerrilla offensives throughout Asia. B. T. Ranadive, attacking the Andhra Secretariat, publicly charged that in Andhra Communist ranks "it is the rural intellectuals, sons of rich peasants and middle peasants, that preponderate in important positions. The party politically based itself on the vacillating politics of the middle peasants and allowed itself to be influenced even by rich peasant ideology." He contrasted Andhra's "wrong social base" with the working class base of the Tamilnad party and the "poor peasant" base in Kerala.<sup>45</sup>

The Andhra Communists had made no secret of their "rich peasant" policy within the party. They explicitly declared themselves on this point in a 1948 program report for the Indian Communist Politburo which stressed two major tactical rules of thumb:

1. In delta areas the pressure of population would be heavy, and as such slogans should be raised for the distribution of lands belonging to rich ryots among poor peasants and laborers . . .

2. Propaganda should be carried on to convince the ryots about the just demands of the workers, and we should also effect compromises with such of those ryots who would follow with us. Assurance should be given that we should not touch the lands of rich ryots.<sup>46</sup>

B. T. Ranadive singled out for special attack another statement of this position in a 1948 Andhra Secretariat document discussing tactics toward government rice procurement for rationing:

In the matter of procurement of paddy, the Secretariat believes that it is possible to neutralize the rich peasants as the government plan goes against the rich peasantry also. Though the rich peasantry as a class is not standing firmly in the fight, it is parting with paddy with dissatisfaction.<sup>47</sup>

This, Ranadive charged, "constitutes the real practical gist of the document, a program of class collaboration in rural areas, of bowing down before the rich peasant."<sup>47</sup>

Ranadive and the Andhra Secretariat waged unabashed open warfare that may have reflected a larger struggle in world communism. For then, in mid-1949, Mao Tse-tung did not yet control the Chinese mainland. Soviet policy still belabored Mao for his "New Democracy" with its expansive welcome to "patriotic" capitalists and rich peasants. The Andhra document specifically justified its "rich peasant" policies by pointing to Mao. But, Ranadive de-

<sup>44</sup> An example of this characterization is in The Communist, Vol. 2, p. 71 (June-July, 1949).

<sup>45</sup> Ibid., p. 34.

<sup>46</sup> The 1948 report appears in part in Self-Critical Report of the Andhra Communist Committee, January 1948-February 1952, Part Two, March 1949-March 1950, a party document not intended for publication.

<sup>47</sup> The Communist, June-July, 1949, p. 72.

clared, Mao's "horrifying" departures from accepted Stalinist dogma "are such that no Communist party can accept them; they are in contradiction to the world understanding of the Communist parties." Ranadive scolded the Andhra comrades, who "should have thought ten times before making such a formulation."<sup>48</sup>

John Kautsky has pieced together intricate chains of international Communist publications during the period of the Andhra-Ranadive exchange to show that in their controversy they "reflect in an extreme fashion the uncertainty between the 'left' and 'Maoist' views then prevailing in Moscow." Kautsky, describing the disorganized state of Indian communism, also notes the "peculiar internal cohesion and individual character" which makes the Andhra party a striking exception. "As a result, while other regional CPI organizations were at Ranadive's mercy, the Andhra Committee seems to have remained relatively immune from his interference."<sup>49</sup>

By January, 1950, the Cominform journal had endorsed the "path taken by the Chinese people,"<sup>50</sup> and by the summer of 1950 the Indian Communists were apologizing profusely to Mao.<sup>51</sup> They praised "New Democracy" as a model for India to follow, and replaced B. T. Ranadive with the Kamma Andhra Communist leader Chandra Rajeshwar Rao, whose family rice plantation sprawls over 290 acres of fertile delta land.

V. COMMUNIST CHANGE OF FRONT FOR THE ELECTIONS

National Indian Communist policy under Rajeshwar Rao's leadership proceeded to misread the Cominform editorial by assuming that it had been asked to pursue the Chinese path by adopting armed struggle.<sup>52</sup> The Telengana struggle was thus stepped up at the very moment when the Nehru government was bearing down on the movement with all its military might. By the Spring of 1951, the superior power of Indian government forces had crushed guerrilla strength in Telengana and the delta. At the same time, a factional split was growing between Rajeshwar Rao and forces led by S. A. Dange, the veteran Bombay Communist labor leader. Dange saw the plainly increasing stability of the Indian political scene and favored participation in the general elections scheduled for the end of the year. To resolve the crisis, Moscow summoned Rajeshwar Rao, his Andhra Kamma colleague Besava Punniiah, S. A. Dange, and party stalwart Ajoy K. Ghosh to the Soviet Union to put a Kremlin imprimatur on a peace settlement. The result was the selection of Ajoy Ghosh as party secretary and a new, moderate policy.

As its first peace overture to the government the Communist party sent out

<sup>48</sup> Ibid. p. 60.

<sup>49</sup> John H. Kautsky, Moscow and the Communist Party of India (Cambridge, Mass., Center for International Studies, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, 1954), pp. 124, 128.

<sup>50</sup> Editorial in For a Lasting Peace, for a People's Democracy, Jan. 27, 1950.

<sup>51</sup> "Statement of Editorial Board on Anti-Leninist Criticism of Comrade Mao-Tse-tung," The Communist, Vol. 3, pp. 6-35, at pp. 6-7 (July-Aug., 1950).

<sup>52</sup> M. F. Masani, The Communist Party of India (New York, 1954), p. 110.

feelers in mid-summer offering to behave as a legal party in exchange for the release of imprisoned detenus, many of whom were the strongest Communist election contenders. At first, the Communist press complained that the government of Hyderabad, where the initial overtures were made, "did not even bother to reply."<sup>53</sup> In a Parliament speech August 14, the then Home Minister Chakravarti Rajagopalachari declared that "the party cannot have it both ways, delivering speeches and carrying on other election activities while killing and terrorizing." As late as November 19, the official Congress party organ said that "it would be unprecedented for any government to release men convicted by courts or reasonably detained as enemies of the state."<sup>54</sup> Still, in spite of these declarations, the government had an historic last-minute change of heart,<sup>55</sup> and released most of the Madras Communist prisoners.

Communist leaders hurried from South Indian jails to their home districts with all the martyr's aura reserved in Indian society for those who suffer privation at the hands of authority. A notification in the Gazette of India dated August 11, 1951 showed 202 Communist prisoners in Madras, most of them—although district by district breakdowns are not available—from Andhra. Month by month figures in Home Ministry files show the Madras total of its detenus dropping to 86 in December and four by February, 1952. These figures do not include an almost equal number placed on parole at this time and later declared free. Thus, most of the Andhra Communist high command were freed in time to map election strategy for the January balloting. They campaigned feverishly to make up for their late start, well aware that the deep factional crisis then gripping the Congress camp presented a rare opportunity.

VI. 1951 ELECTION SETTING: DECAY IN THE CONGRESS

In the years between the 1946 and 1951 elections, Andhra Congress leaders were locked in a factional war, in which the fortunes of N. G. Ranga went first upward and then to rockbottom. The three-way tussle between Ranga, Patabhi Sitaramayya, and T. Prakasam was complicated by the multi-lingual nature of Madras politics during that period. To score a point at any given moment, each Andhra faction could reach across not only caste but also regional lines, striking at its rival by aligning with Tamil-speaking factions in the Madras government.

Prakasam, having helped his own lieutenants win Congress seats in the Madras Assembly, could command powerful support in the first skirmish of this period. In the 1946 wrangle for ascendancy in the multi-lingual Madras Legislature Congress party, Prakasam emerged with the prize of the Madras

<sup>53</sup> "For Settlement in Telengana," editorial in the then national weekly of the Communist Party of India, Crossroads, Aug. 3, 1951, p. 1.

<sup>54</sup> "Reds' Threat," Congress Sandesh, Nov. 19, 1951, p. 4.

<sup>55</sup> The decision to release the Communist detenus is generally attributed to Prime Minister Nehru. A high Indian official with responsibilities in this matter told the author at the time that Nehru felt the Communists would prosper more if permitted to increase their martyrdom behind bars than if out in the open where, given enough rope, they might eventually be their own undoing.

Chief Ministership. But his majority was perilous, for Tamil members of the Assembly had joined in electing him for factional reasons of their own. The ruling Tamil Congress bloc, predominantly non-Brahman, used Prakasam to head off Tamil Brahman Chakravarti Rajagopalachari in his bid for the Chief Ministership. Once successful, they hurried to hunt allies to replace Prakasam. Caste loyalties on both the Andhra and the Tamil sides thus vanished at the linguistic border. The 20 Andhra supporters of Brahman Sitaramayya lined up with the non-Brahman Tamil bloc and half of the Malayalam-speaking members of the legislature to unseat Prakasam.

To save his political position in his home territory, Prakasam joined forces with Ranga. Together they took control of the Andhra Congress machinery from Sitaramayya. Ranga won the Andhra Congress presidency, defeating N. Sanjiva Reddi, nominee of the Sitaramayya group.

In the bitter ensuing warfare, both sides aired charges of corruption which the Communist propaganda network carried into remote rural regions. As a result, the Congress leaders soon lost the prestige of their independence movement days. Prakasam followers charged Sitaramayya members of the new Madras regime with trafficking improperly in commercial permits and transport franchises, blackmarketing, and rampant nepotism. They also contended that the Communists enjoyed an unholy alliance with the active leader of Sitaramayya forces in the Madras government, Revenue Minister Kala Venkata Rao. Prakasam cited chapter and verse to allege that Rao, later a national general secretary of the Congress, helped arrange facilities for Red Flag meetings, looked the other way when Communists staged illegal squatter movements, solicited and received Communist help to defeat Prakasam candidates in local elections, and fed anti-Prakasam propaganda to Communist leaders.<sup>56</sup>

With the Kamma Ranga at the head of the Congress, the opposition to Prakasam and Ranga had strong caste overtones. Reddi forces were a part of the maneuvering that brought Ranga's downfall in April, 1951, when N. Sanjiva Reddi won the Andhra Congress presidency in a close 87-82 decision. Ranga and Prakasam, charging that the Reddi victory hung on "irregularities," walked out of the Congress. Fifty of their sympathizers on the Andhra Congress Committee followed them out of the party. Then came the final blow to Congress unity, a Ranga-Prakasam split. Prakasam announced that his candidates in the general elections would carry the symbol of the new Kisan Mazdoor Praja (Peasants Workers Peoples) party led by Acharya J. B. Kripalani. Ranga formed a Kamma front, the Krishika Loka (Farmers') party. Therefore, in delta election constituencies where Kamma influence counted, the three-way Congress split meant that at least two Kammas, a Ranga candidate and a nominee of the official Congress, and in many cases other Kammas named by Prakasam, the Socialist party, or independent local groups, all competed for the campaign support of their wealthy caste fellows.

<sup>56</sup> Charges against the Madras Ministry (cited in note - 3), pp. 6-7, 30-31.

VII. KAMMA SUPPORT DECISIVE IN 14 COMMUNIST VICTORIES

It was into this inviting situation that the Andhra Communists strode from prison in the fall of 1951. Already on good terms with their Kamma brethren because of their sweet reasonableness during guerrilla days, they warned that the Reddi-dominated Congress was out to get them. Ridiculing Ranga's KLP as a splinter group, they argued that he could not possibly emerge with a majority. The Communists presented themselves as political comers who would soon be able to protect the caste from the citadels of government power.

They had the issues on their side. Not only could they promise five acres and a cow to their traditional supporters, the Adi-Andhra landless laborers; they could also put the Congress on the defensive in the Andhra State issue. Then too, they could inflate popular discontent with food shortages and blackmarketing that grew worse while ruling Congress politicians seemed too busy feuding to take action—or, as the popular image had it, were knee deep in the trough of corruption.

The Kammas could well have been impressed with the apparently rising star of their caste fellows at the helm of the Communist party. Even the Kamma historian Choudary, outspokenly anti-Communist in his writings, recites with obvious pride a long list of Communist Kamma notables, adding that "many other young Communist legislators have turned out to be able debaters and formidable opponents."<sup>57</sup> The Kammas must certainly have considered how desirable it would be to crystallize friendly relations with a revolutionary leadership that had already shown it could be reasonable about whose land was confiscated.

Whatever the understanding<sup>58</sup> between the Communists and Kamma patriarchs, a significant section of the Kammas plainly put their funds, influence, and votes behind the Communist Kamma candidates (see Table IV). This factor appears to have tipped the scales in the delta. While the Kamma vote was divided, the share of Kamma support won by the Communists provided the margin of victory in 14 of the 25 delta general constituencies where Communist deputies were elected.<sup>59</sup> Three of the six Communist members of the lower house of Parliament elected in 1951 from the delta are Kammas.

The victorious Communist in 1951 drew on the numbers of the landless laborers and protest votes of erstwhile Congress supporters, but powerful Kamma backers gave him in a substantial number of cases even more decisive support—identification with village-level authority. In a society hardly out of feudalism, this is an intangible which should not be underestimated.

<sup>57</sup> Choudary, A Brief History of the Kammas (cited in note 3), p. 98.

<sup>58</sup> C. V. K. Rao, op. cit. (in note 12), says that Dharma Rao, a brother-in-law of Basava Punniiah, has enrolled hundreds of Kammas as actual party members on the promise that the caste group would benefit when the CP came to power. As an example of specific allusions to Communist Kamma support, see also "CPI May Win More Seats in Madras," The Statesman, Jan. 8, 1952, p. 1.

<sup>59</sup> The figure of 25 excludes six reserved constituencies in which Communists won in the delta.

TABLE IV. COMMUNIST KAMMA STRONGHOLDS IN ANDHRA* AS SHOWN IN 1951 AND 1955 ELECTIONS

Constituency	1951				1955
	Per Cent of Total Vote				Per Cent of Total Vote
	Congress	CP	KLP	Others	Congress	CP	Others
Krishna
Kanchi-Echerla	31†	52†	13†	4†	50†	47†	3†
Kankipadu	30†	54†	11†	5†	51†	49†	—
Divi	20†	44†	—	36†	59†	41†	—
Gudivala	14†	48†	—	38	—	42†	58†
Guntur
Chilakaluripet†	19†	55†	11†	15	56†	43†	1
Bapatla	32	36†	25†	—	56	40†	4
Mangalagiri	14	51†	23†	12	57	43†	—
Repalle	34†	52†	9†	—	60	40†	—
Ongole	12	40†	20†	28	54	46†	—
Ponnur	15	37†	21†	27	65†	35	—
East Godavari
Rajahmundry	27	40†	—	33	59	41	—
West Godavari
Kovvur	23†	30†	—	47†	63†	32†	5
Eluru§	26†	40†	—	34	62†	37†	1
Chintalapudi	32†	46†	—	22†	—	—	—

* Constituencies shown represent all those in which Kamma Communist candidates were elected in 1951. The outcome in the same constituencies is shown in 1955, though it should be borne in mind that new delimitation of constituencies prior to the 1955 elections makes the 1955 constituencies not exactly congruent with the originals under comparison. These constituencies do not necessarily represent the sites of greatest Kamma Communist success in 1955. The site of one 1951 Communist victory—Chintalapudi (West Godavari)—cannot be compared meaningfully with any 1955 constituency.

† Candidates designated in this manner are members of the Kamma subcaste.

‡ Renamed Paruchur in 1955.

§ Renamed Denduluru in 1955.

Note Percentages have been rounded to the nearest decimal. Communist-supported Kamma candidates running on other party tickets or as independents in other constituencies are not included in this analysis in view of the author's inability to gain a precise picture of the division of support in the constituencies concerned. A Communist-supported Kamma won election on the KMP ticket in Narasimhapeta (Guntur) while a CP-supported candidate lost on the KLP ticket in Tenali (Guntur) and another lost as an independent in Nuzvid (Krishna).

To a great extent the 1951 results in the domain can be explained simply by the multiplicity of candidates, which enabled the Communists to capitalize on a divided opposition. But it is necessary to examine the nature of this multiplicity.

The telling strength of the Communists in this opportunity came from the fact that they were uniquely situated to exploit the divisions in the Kamma camp. Their leaders were Kammas on Kamma ground. Kamma influence is spread evenly enough over the delta so that even in those delta constituencies where non-Kamma Communist candidates were successful, the Kamma population must have played an important role. Furthermore, a glance at the votes polled by the winning Communist Kammas places the factor of multiplicity of candidates in proper perspective. The average Communist Kamma winner polled 44.6 per cent of the votes. In only two constituencies, Eluru and Chintalapudi, did the combined vote of non-Communist Kamma candidates exceed that of the Communist Kamma victor. Even in defeat, Communist Kamma candidates in 1951 polled 33.1 per cent of the votes (see Table V), with their

TABLE V. DEFEATED 1951 COMMUNIST KAMMA CANDIDATES IN ANDHRA DELTA DISTRICTS

Constituency	Per Cent of Total Vote
	Congress	CP	KLP	Others
Krishna
Kaikalur	37†	36†	—	27
Guntur
Guntur	24†	23†	—	53
Duggirala	42	38†	13†	7
Prathipadu	26	25	22†	27
East Godavari
Pamarru	49†	46†	—	5†
West Godavari
Tanuku	29†	25†	—	46†

-† Candidates designated in this manner are members of the Kamma subcaste.

Note: Percentages have been rounded to the nearest decimal. Communist-supported Kamma candidates running on other party tickets or as independents in other constituencies are not included in this analysis.

margin of defeat a matter of from one to four percentage points in every instance where the successful candidate was also a Kamma. In sharp contrast, other defeated Communist candidates in the delta polled only an average 22 per cent. Thus the multiplicity of candidates alone cannot explain the large number of Communist victories. The fact that the Communists could compete strongly for the support of the caste group most strategically placed in delta politics was the key to the Communist sweep.

Outside the delta, too, in constituencies where the Kammas were a potent minority but not dominant, the Communists chose to rely on Kamma support. For example, in the Chittoor parliamentary contest, the Communists unsuccessfully supported a Kamma independent against a Reddi Congress candidate. In Nellore, a coastal district adjacent to the delta where the Kammas have only half the numerical strength of the Reddis,<sup>60</sup> the Communists lost out to Congress Reddis in three constituencies where they nominated Kammas.<sup>61</sup> Where they won in Nellore it was with Reddi candidates in two solidly Reddi constituencies,<sup>62</sup> and with a Brahman in another.<sup>63</sup> The 170 Reddis elected on the Communist ticket in Nellore may owe much of their strength to the prestige of the sole major Communist Reddi leader, Sundarayya, in his home district. Where scattered Reddis were elected in other districts,<sup>64</sup> the result appears to have hinged on local and personal factors. The only other Communists elected outside the delta were four Brahmans and one Velama, a petty landlord subcaste.

It was in Nellore that Kamma-Reddi bitterness in 1951 reached its high point in the defeat of the prominent Andhra Congress leader B. Gopala Reddi, Finance Minister in the Madras government, by a KMP Kamma candidate in Udayagiri constituency. Reddi, who once remarked lightly in the Madras Assembly that his was "a Reddi government for Reddis,"<sup>65</sup> told reporters that Kammas had "wreaked vengeance" on him.<sup>66</sup> His supporters explained that a would-be Kamma candidate in Chingleput had been refused a Congress nomination by Congress leaders there. The Kammas in Udayagiri blamed it on backstage maneuvering by Reddi. This was one of the rare episodes in which Kamma-Reddi enmity had ever burst into the open.

VII. THE RANGA-CONGRESS ALLIANCE IN 1955

After the 1951 elections and the formation of the Andhra State in 1953, open Kamma-Reddi warfare increased with the two rivals now pitted directly against each other. No longer was there the intervening presence of non-Andhra elements in a multi-lingual legislature. Even Jawaharlal Nehru could not bring N. G. Ranga under the wing of Sanjiva Reddy's party leadership.<sup>67</sup> The controversy over the choice of the new state's capital once again polarized Andhra politics on what was now widely conceded to be a regional-caste basis, the Reddi-dominated Congress winning the selection of Kurnool in Rayalaseema over the bitter protests of the Communists and Ranga's KLP as champions of the delta.<sup>68</sup>

Puchalapalli Sundarayya charged that the Congress:

... wanted to rouse regional feelings: it wanted to rouse communal feelings, and that is why it selected Kurnool as the capital . . . . The Congress raises the slogan of Reddi vs. Kamma. It says: if you want to change from Kurnool to any centralized place, then

<sup>60</sup> Census of India, 1921, Vol. 13, Table XIII, p. 115, shows 109,969 Kammas and 208,018 Reddis in Nellore.

<sup>61</sup> Venkatagiri, Gudur, and Rapur.

<sup>62</sup> Kanigiri and Darsi.

<sup>63</sup> Kovur.

<sup>64</sup> Nandikotkur in Kurnool; Kamalapuram and Rajampet in Cuddapah; and Anantapur in Anantapur District were the sites of other Communist Reddi successes.

<sup>65</sup> Quoted by D. V. Raja Rao, op. cit. (in note 13), p. 23.

<sup>66</sup> "Congress Reverses in Madras," Hindustan Standard, Jan. 14, 1952, p. 8.

<sup>67</sup> "Ranga Keeps Out," Times of India, Oct. 2, 1952, p. 1.

<sup>68</sup> For example, see "Andhra Election Scene," Times of India, Jan. 10, 1955, p. 6.

Kamma domination will come and Reddi domination will go. These are facts that cannot be controverted by anybody who knows anything about Andhra.<sup>69</sup>

A newspaper correspondent reported during this episode that:

In recent years the rivalry between the Reddys of Rayalaseema and rich Kammās of delta districts has grown to alarming proportions. Congressmen have tended to group themselves on communal lines, and the Sanjiva Reddy-Ranga tussle for leadership which finally resulted in Ranga's exit from the Congress is a major instance in this regard. And rightly or wrongly the choice of Kurnool is looked upon by the Kammās as another major triumph for the Reddys.<sup>70</sup>

Ostensibly, the Congress stand for Kurnool in the capital dispute honored a 1937 commitment by Congress leaders from the delta that the underdog Rayalaseema area could have first claim in the location of the capital or High Court of the future Andhra State, with the delta getting the one left over. But in the 1953 wrangle there was more at stake. Both the Communists and the KLP were voicing not only the local pride of the delta communities seeking the capital, but real estate and mercantile interests as well.<sup>71</sup>

By the time the first Andhra Congress ministry had collapsed in November, 1954, a scant year after its installation, Congress leaders in New Delhi had come to realize that firm intervention from outside would be necessary to forge a united front for the new elections in February, 1955. From Jawaharlal Nehru down, there was a determination that the history of the 1951 Kamma defection should not repeat itself. For N. G. Ranga this was an important political moment in which his whole future as a Kamma spokesman lay at stake. Nehru summoned the forces of Ranga, T. Prakasam, Sanjiva Reddi, and assorted other anti-Communist Andhra leaders to map a united election campaign. Working closely with such Kamma Congress powers as Kotta Raghuramaiah, India's delegate to the U.N. Trusteeship Council, Ranga emerged from the negotiations with control over nominations in 38 constituencies as part of a Congress United Front, enough to assure a single Kamma entry by Congress forces in all Kamma strongholds. The regular Congress organization received 136 constituencies and the People's party, a Prakasam rump group comprising Andhra remnants of the defunct KMP, won control of nominations in 20 constituencies.

Although Sanjiva Reddi, leader of what by then was popularly called "The Rayalaseema Junta," sulked in protest against the very principle of alliance with Ranga,<sup>72</sup> the pressure for a joint front against the Communists was too much for him. The Congress high command assigned Bombay Congress strong man S. K. Patil to enforce factional unity. With the Congress camp united, independents shunned battle. There were 78 straight contests between <sup>69</sup> "We Demand Free and Fair Elections," Parliament speech by P. Sundarayya, cited in For Victory in Andhra, CPI publication (Delhi, 1955), p. 13.

<sup>70</sup> Times of India (Bombay), June 16, 1953, p. 7.

<sup>71</sup> In "The Future of Andhra," Thought, Oct. 3, 1953, G. S. Bhargava reports that Kamma property owners in Vijayawada had confidently based land investments on the expectation that the capital would be there, and suffered heavy losses.

<sup>72</sup> "Rift in Andhra Congress," Times of India, Jan. 1, 1955, p. 10.

the Congress and the Communists, 65 more with only three contestants, and in only the remaining 53 was there the dispersion of 1951. The Communists, confidently dashing into the fray, had announced their candidate lists in the first week of December to place themselves squarely on the offensive. But this cut two ways: the Congress had time to march caste with caste in selecting candidates. The upshot was that in their delta stronghold the Communists won only 11 seats, two of these in reserved constituencies, as opposed to their 31 delta seats in 1951. A solitary Kamma was elected on the Communist ticket.<sup>73</sup>

Ironically, in 1955 their caste may in certain cases have been a liability to Kamma Communists. The defection of C.V.K. Rao, a Communist leader of the Devadasī caste, was openly trumpeted in anti-Kamma terms by Rao's election-rump "Communist Unity Centre." Handbills ridiculing Communist leaders as "Red landlords" sufficiently nettled them to elicit a special campaign appearance by Rajeshwar Rao. Announcing that he and his brother had donated the equivalent of $40,000 over the years to Communist coffers, Rajeshwar Rao added: "I do not say that all our property is exhausted; there is still something left. We shall spend it, along with our lives, in the service of the people."<sup>74</sup>

The Communists made every bit as intensive an effort in 1955 as in 1951 to capitalize on the Kamma "social base"<sup>75</sup> in the Delta, running Kamma candidates in 29 delta constituencies. Underscoring the Kamma orientation of Communist tactics is the fact that in nine of these 29 constituencies, the Communist candidate was the only Kamma in the field.

With anti-Communist Kamma forces consolidated in the Congress, however, the Communists could not make their Kamma support a decisive factor in 1955. Confronted with a single Kamma opponent (see Table IV), the Communist Kamma candidate was in a defensive position. N. G. Ranga had recaptured the initiative in the contest for Kamma support by showing he could drive a hard bargain for the caste within Congress councils. The 28 Kamma Communist losers still won substantial support in their caste strongholds—an average 38.7 per cent of the votes. But this was a drop from an average 44.6 per cent polled by the 14 Kamma Communist winners in 1951.

Despite this six per cent decline in their Kamma strength, the Communists increased their popular vote in most of the delta just as in the rest of Andhra.<sup>76</sup> This is explained by the even distribution of their 1955 vote over a wide range of constituencies, in contrast to spotty 1951 voting concentrations in constituencies where they then enjoyed strong Kamma support. Unlike 1951, when the Communist Kammass fared better than other Communist candidates, the Communist Kammass in 1955 were on a par with the 34 other defeated Communist

<sup>73</sup> V. Visweswara Rao in Mylavaram constituency, Krishna District.

<sup>74</sup> New Age, Dec. 26, 1954, p. 16.

<sup>75</sup> This phrase is attributed to the Communist in "Caste Factor," Times of India, Feb. 1, 1955, p. 6.

<sup>76</sup> While the popular vote increased in Krishna, for the Communists their increase did not keep pace with the overall increase; the Communist percentage of the total in the district dropped from 48 per cent in 1951 to 44 in 1955.

candidates in the delta. Defeated non-Kamma Communist candidates in the delta in 1955 averaged 38.3 per cent, while in 1951 non-Kamma Communist losers had polled only 22 per cent, and even defeated Kammas had polled only 33.1 per cent.

The Communist share of Kamma support went a long distance with the Congress Kamma camp divided in 1951, but the Ranga-Congress alliance made Communist inroads on Kamma backing less significant in 1955. Nor did the issues fall on the Communist side in 1955 as they had in 1951. The Kammas responded to the general strength of the Congress cause, coupled with a successful appeal to the caste's economic stake in keeping the Communist party out of power. The Congress election platform stressed agricultural price support. The Communist press bitterly complained that propertied interests had ganged up against them. In a reference to Divi, the home constituency of the Kamma Rajeshwar Rao, the Communist weekly New Age declared that "all quarrels of caste or community have been forgotten. They [the landlords] have united to face the common people. They are all in the Congress now."<sup>77</sup>

While Congress leaders such as S. K. Patil deluged all Andhra with effective anti-Communist propaganda, the body blow to the delta Communists came from the fact that the veteran anti-Communist ideologist, N. G. Ranga, now had the prestige to make an effective appeal in the Kamma constituencies, the central arena of the contest. G. S. Bhargava reported from Andhra that credit for delivering the telling punch in the delta "must go to the KLP leader, Mr. N. G. Ranga, who for the first time carried the fight against communism into villages hitherto regarded as impregnable Communist fortresses."<sup>78</sup> A. Kaleswara Rao, a Grand Old Man of the Andhra Congress, wrote the author at the time polling was about to take place: "The Congress United Front formed by Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru, roping in Sri Ranga . . . is very successful in the Communist-infested districts, e.g. in central Andhra. The Kamma community, which is predominant in this area, have joined the Congress United Front with patriotism."<sup>79</sup>

The reference to patriotism is important, for undoubtedly the fact that a procession of respected national Congress leaders came to Andhra to denounce the Communists in unequivocal terms of nationalism played an important election role, not only in rousing Kamma support, but throughout Andhra. Jawaharlal Nehru attacked the Communists as "professional maligners of the Indian people."<sup>80</sup> Congress president U. N. Dhebar warned Andhra voters that "if one Communist state in India is established, our international strength will be lost."<sup>81</sup> S. K. Patil's posters and pamphlets blasted the Communists as out-

<sup>77</sup> New Age, Jan. 17, 1955, p. 3.

<sup>78</sup> G. S. Bhargava, "Verdict on Communism," Ambala Tribune, March 15, 1955, p. 4.

<sup>79</sup> Analysis prepared for the author, dated Feb. 19, 1955, Vijayawada. Rao has served on the All-India Congress Committee for over 30 years. He was elected a member of the Andhra legislature from the Vijayawada constituency in the 1955 election.

<sup>80</sup> Times of India, Jan. 16, 1955, p. 4.

<sup>81</sup> The Hindu, Feb. 8, 1955, p. 4.

right traitors, painting gruesome pictures of horror in China and the Soviet Union.<sup>82</sup> The fall of Malenkov on February 8, just as polling was getting underway, was a convenient reminder of past purges. Moreover, the Congress had dulled the ideological edge of the Communist appeal at its national session at Avadi in January by announcing a "socialistic pattern of society" as its goal. What hurt even more, the Communists were denied the support of Russian policy and its propaganda machine. Pravda published an historic editorial on the eve of India's Republic Day, January 26, marking the end of seven years of attacks on the Nehru government and confounding the Communists' election strategy. How could the Communists parade the banner of an international big brother who praised "the outstanding statesman, Mr. Jawaharlal Nehru,"<sup>83</sup> at the same time they were waging an election campaign against his party?

VIII. WILL THE KAMMAS AND REDDIS WORK TOGETHER?

By successfully making Indian nationalism a live issue in a state election, the Congress, still for all its sins a symbol of independence, was calling forth its trump card. The resultant election-time atmosphere was a complete reversal of 1951, when the Communists had been able to wrap themselves in the banner of the Andhra provincial autonomy movement and make Telugu patriotism a live ballot box issue.

But Andhra's formation as the first frankly linguistic state in India, while relaxing the tension between the Telugus and the central government, only heightened the political struggle among Telugu castes. The newly intimate confrontation of Kammas and Reddis in Andhra typifies one of the less obvious consequences of linguistic provinces in India. By and large, the endogamous group or subcaste in India is bounded on a linguistic basis.<sup>84</sup> Thus, the power relationship of castes to each other in a multi-lingual political unit with its many caste groups differs radically from the reality of their relationship in the smaller linguistic unit. The Kammas and Reddis were part of the welter of castes in the old Madras State, but in Andhra they face each other as titans.

Dr. B. E. Ambedkar, Nehru's former Law Minister, sees this through the eyes of an outcaste when he warns that the formation of linguistic provinces "means the handing over of Swaraj to a communal majority."<sup>85</sup> Switzerland, Ambedkar said in a Parliament debate, "has no difficulties as a multi-lingual state because linguism there is not loaded with communalism. But in our coun-

<sup>82</sup> See 'Nehru's Congress Filth,' New Age, Feb. 6, 1955.

<sup>83</sup> Cited in Times of India, Feb. 1, 1955, p. 3. The editorial also stated that the Indian Republic was "a peace-loving state upholding its national independence," which has "set itself to the grim task of gradually eliminating colonialism."

<sup>84</sup> Irawati Karve, in Kinship Organization in India, Deccan College Monograph Series (Poona, 1953), discusses the conjunction of caste and language region at length (esp. pp. 1-24); G. S. Ghurye, Caste and Class in India (Bombay: Popular Book Depot, 1950), p. 23, says that "in the beginning of the 19th century the linguistic boundaries fixed the caste limits." See also pp. 19 and 32; and J. H. Hutton, Caste in India (cited in note 17), p. 10.

<sup>85</sup> B. E. Ambedkar, "Linguistic States—Need for Checks and Balances," Times of India, April 23, 1953, p. 4.

try linguism is only another name for communalism."<sup>86</sup> "Take Andhra," he wrote, "there are two major communities spread over the linguistic area. They are either the Reddis or the Kammas. They hold all the land, all the offices, all the business. The untouchables live in subordinate dependence on them. Take Maharashtra; the Marathas are a huge majority in every village in Maharashtra. . . . In a linguistic state what would remain for the smaller communities to look to?"<sup>87</sup>

The broad implications of the conjunction between caste and language region and, more specifically, of the change in the vantage of castes which is likely to result from the formation of new linguistic provinces, deserve searching study. In the case of Andhra, it is already clear that political stability will depend to a great extent on the ability of Reddi and Kamma leaders to work together in a united government.

Developments since the 1955 elections suggest strongly that the future Kamma-Reddi relationship remains to be decided. At first, N. G. Ranga announced that the KLP, which had kept its party identity intact as a member of the election front, would return unconditionally to the Congress.<sup>88</sup> It was generally understood that Ranga had been promised the presidency of the Andhra Congress, with B. Gopala Reddi to be named Chief Minister. Reddi did become Chief Minister, but in the election of the party president, the forces of Deputy Chief Minister N. Sanjiva Reddi successfully fought N. G. Ranga with a Kshatriya candidate, Alluri Satyanarayana Raju. Ranga's defeat was a setback not only to Kamma-Reddi amity but also to the personal prestige of Gopala Reddi, and a signal for Sanjiva Reddi to assail him as a Kamma stooge.

A breakdown of Congress legislators elected in 1955 shows 85 out of the 146 deputies divided between the three major peasant proprietor subcastes, with Reddis the largest group (45), Kammas next (24), and the Telagas a newly-active political force (16) to be reckoned with. The Gopala Reddi cabinet reflected the Kamma and Reddi strength in the party's legislative ranks with two Reddi ministers (Gopala Reddi and Sanjiva Reddi), two Kammas (K. Chandramouli and G. Latchanna),<sup>89</sup> and two Brahmans (Kala Venkata Rao and Nageswara Rao). The Telagas, not yet able to make their weight felt, received no representation in the ministry; here may be the makings of a new "out" group. Further, subcaste divisions within both Kamma and Reddi ranks could harden into a still more complex array of political battle lines.

The Indian Government's announced intention to merge Andhra and Telingana in a "United Andhra" poses the prospect of a basic realignment in the power balance between Telugu castes. If this merger takes effect, the delta Kammas in the new larger unit would confront not only the Reddis of Rayala-

<sup>86</sup> "Ambedkar's Plea for Amendment of Constitution," Hindustan Times, Sept. 3, 1953, p. 3.

<sup>87</sup> B. R. Ambedkar, "Linguistic States—Need for Checks and Balances" (cited in note 85).

<sup>88</sup> "KLP to Join the Congress," The Hindu, March 1, 1955, p. 4.

<sup>89</sup> Latchanna is a member of the Sree-Sainas, a Srikakulam subcaste group kindred to the delta Kammas and organized politically by Ranga's KLP.

seema, but also the politically distinct Telengana Reddis—whose rivals on their home ground have been the Telengana Brahmins. Already the Reddi-Brahman rivals in Telengana and the Kamma-Reddi antagonists in Andhra can be seen each jockeying to establish ties across the border. To complicate matters still more, the Telengana Communist leadership lacks caste homogeneity. Ravi Narayan Reddi and a Brahmin, D. V. Rao, lead rival factions. How will these rivals adjust to their new common relationship to the delta Communist leaders?

Whether or not the solidarity of their leadership suffers in a United Andhra, certainly the Communists, in their efforts to make a comeback, will exploit caste disaffection wherever they can. In 1955 their campaign manifesto showed a new interest in such politically strategic Andhra artisan castes as the Kammari (blacksmith), Kummari (potter), Vadrangi (carpenter), Rajaka (washermen), Mangali (barber), and Ganda (toddy tapper).<sup>90</sup> As an opposition playing its main role outside the legislature, the party will be in a free-wheeling tactical position, able to step in wherever there is an opening in the Congress flank.<sup>91</sup>

The failure of the Andhra Communists to win strong legislative representation in 1955 is by no means a final political verdict. In doubling their popular vote, not only did their strength remain concentrated in their demonstrated stronghold, but also in two of the delta districts, West Godavari and Guntur, they increased their poll by as much as 16 per cent and 10 per cent respectively.<sup>92</sup> Furthermore, as The Hindu has pointed out,<sup>93</sup> "in a large number of constituencies they missed success by very small majorities."<sup>94</sup> These facts spell a clear warning against "underrating the threat to peace and progress that the Andhra Communist Party is still potentially capable of offering."

<sup>90</sup> A Communist-backed toddy-tappers' agitation in the summer of 1954 is noted in Marshall Windmiller, "The Andhra Election," Far Eastern Survey, Vol. 24, pp. 27-28 (April, 1955).

<sup>91</sup> The Congress government in Andhra appears to be assured its tenure until 1960 under Article 172 of the Indian Constitution, providing for five-year duration of state legislative assemblies. Under this provision Andhra need not elect a new legislature when the next general elections are held throughout India, probably in 1957. The formation of a united Andhra, incorporating Telugu districts now in Hyderabad state, could necessitate earlier elections.

<sup>92</sup> West Godavari, 195,024 in 1951 to 265,193 in 1955; Guntur, 289,932 to 392,268.

<sup>93</sup> "Andhra Verdict," The Hindu, March 9, 1955, p. 6.

<sup>94</sup> While the Congress margin of victory averaged 12 per cent in Krishna and West Godavari district constituencies, 16 per cent in Guntur, and 21 per cent in East Godavari, these margins do not represent crushing defeat when it is kept in mind that these were straight fights pitting a three-party Congress coalition on one side against the Communists on the other.

Moreover, the per cent of voting in delta constituencies for Communist candidates shows an average decline in Krishna only, from an average 48 per cent of the constituency vote in 1951 to an average 43 in 1955. In Guntur it increased from 40 to 41; in East Godavari, from 38 to 39; in West Godavari, from 32 to 31.

Outside the delta, where the Communists made virtually no effort in 1951, they emerged in 1955 with an average 22 per cent of the votes in 18 Vizagapatnam constituencies where they contested; 23 per cent in 12 constituencies, Srikakulam; 35 in 13, Anantapur; 26 in 8, Cuddapah; 30 in 11, Kurnool; 37 in 15, Nellore; and 34 in 11, Chittoor.

CANADIAN PUBLIC ENTERPRISE: A CHARACTER STUDY

LLOYD D. MUSOLF

Vassar College

Were evidence to be drawn only from very recent American experience, a strong case could be made for the notion that the status of business enterprise owned and operated by the government tends to be rather anomalous in a "free enterprise" country. Whatever may be said about the existence of a "mixed economy" in the United States, the philosophy of the Eisenhower Administration is plainly one which casts doubt on the legitimacy of public enterprise.

With American experience in mind, this article attempts to characterize the status of public enterprise in Canada, a country whose economic system is also based on private enterprise. In the Canadian "free enterprise" garden, how should the public enterprise plant be described—as a creeper vine, a hothouse flower, or a hardy but unspectacular perennial? To what extent has it affected its surroundings and in turn been affected by them? The study proceeds on the assumption that specific examples of public enterprise furnish the best basis for generalization about its character. The examples are confined to the national government in order to keep the study within manageable limits and to facilitate reference to American experience (although no extensive comparison is intended).

I

On the surface, Canadian public enterprise resembles its American counterpart in several ways. In each country government-owned enterprise has been created in answer to the needs of the moment rather than in response to long-range plans or considerations of organizational symmetry. Too, markedly different purposes have been served by public enterprise in both Canada and the United States. A recent compilation indicates that there are in the Canadian government five credit and financial agencies, eight commodity trading and procurement agencies, a dozen producing and business agencies, and 16 management and research agencies.<sup>1</sup> Within each of these categories a similar diversity exists. The first category, for example, contains agencies whose respective functions are to lend to farmers, insure exporters against non-payment by foreign buyers, carry out a variety of activities in the field of housing, make loans to small industry, and perform all the functions of a central bank.

Equally familiar to Americans and Canadians is the virtually automatic use of the corporate form for government-owned enterprise. As in the United States, this organizational form has benefited from the respect in which it is held (for different reasons) by both businessmen and reformers. This phenomenon, in turn, has been perpetuated by the absence of a systematic attempt in either country to nationalize industry, using the corporate form as the vehicle. As a final point of similarity, haphazard employment of the public corporation for a number of purposes, variety in organizational attributes of different corporations, and concern about maintaining democratic control over corporations have combined to produce remedial legislation in each country. The Canadian counterpart of the Government Corporation Control Act of 1945 is the Financial Administration Act of 1951.<sup>2</sup> It attempts to classify "Crown corporations" into three categories on the basis of general purpose and degree of financial independence. "Departmental" corporations, at present 10 in number,<sup>3</sup> are described by the statute as "responsible for administrative, supervisory or regulatory services of a governmental nature." In terms of financial treatment, the Act lumps them with departments, and the only apparent reason for retaining the corporate form is to simplify processes of litigation.<sup>4</sup> The financial treatment accorded "agency" and "proprietary" corporations—the other groupings established by the statute—is similar to that ordinarily associated with corporations. By the terms of the Act, agency corporations are given somewhat less fiscal freedom than proprietary corporations,<sup>5</sup> but one observer has noted that "there is apparently no single factor determining into which category a corporation will be placed."<sup>6</sup> In differentiating the two groups according to purpose, the Act describes agency corporations (now 10 in number)<sup>7</sup> as engaged in trading, service, procurement, construction, or disposal activities, and proprietary corporations (now 14 in <sup>2</sup> Statutes of Canada, 15-16 Geo. VI, c. 12 (2nd sess., 1951). Part VIII applies to corporations. It should be noted that the operation of this part of the Act is limited by (1) the supremacy of other statutes in case of conflict; and (2) the exclusion of five corporations. Two of the excluded agencies are joint Dominion-provincial boards, and the other three (the Canadian Wheat Board, the Bank of Canada, and its subsidiary, the Industrial Development Bank) are excluded for reasons which pertain to their respective attributes.

<sup>1</sup> J. E. Hodgetts, "The Public Corporation in Canada," in The Public Corporation, ed. W. Friedmann (Toronto, 1954), pp. 56-58. Two of the second group of agencies are now being liquidated.

<sup>3</sup> Agricultural Prices Support Board, Atomic Energy Control Board, Canadian Maritime Commission, Director of Soldier Settlement, The Director, the Veterans' Land Act, Dominion Coal Board, Fisheries Prices Support Board, National Gallery of Canada, National Research Council, and Unemployment Insurance Commission.

<sup>4</sup> H. R. Balls, "The Financial Control and Accountability of Canadian Crown Corporations," Public Administration, Vol. 31, pp. 127-42, at p. 130 (Summer, 1953).

<sup>5</sup> Proprietary corporations escape from the following provisions: "Each agency corporation shall annually submit to the appropriate Minister an operating budget . . . for the approval of the appropriate Minister and the Minister of Finance." (Section 80 [1].) "The Governor in Council may make regulations with respect to the conditions upon which an agency corporation may undertake contractual commitments." (Section 83.) Proprietary as well as agency corporations are required to submit capital budgets for approval.

<sup>6</sup> Frank A. Milligan, "Financing the Canadian Crown-Corporations: General Financial Provisions" Seminar Paper No. 67, Seminar on Organization and Administration of Public Enterprises in the Industrial Field, Rangoon, Burma, March, 1954 (mimeo), p. 5.

<sup>7</sup> Atomic Energy of Canada Limited, Canadian Asbestos Limited, Canadian Commercial Corporation, Canadian Patents & Development Limited, Crown Assets Disposal Corporation, Defence Construction (1951) Limited, Federal District Commission, National Battlefields Commission, National Harbors Board, and Park Steamship Company Limited.

number)<sup>8</sup> as engaged in lending, financial, commercial, or industrial operations. Unlike agency corporations, proprietary corporations are "ordinarily required" to conduct their operations without appropriations, but in practice this description does not fit all of them.

In all likelihood, the most obvious difference between public enterprise at the national level in each country is the far greater scope of Canadian operations in the fields of transportation, communication, and (to some extent) production. Public corporations operate one of Canada's two large railroad systems (with such subsidiary services as express, telegraph, and hotels), and the only trans-continental systems in civil aviation, radio, and television (the last-named not fully completed). They conduct commercial operations at seven important harbors, mine and refine uranium, produce atomic energy and synthetic rubber, operate shipping lines, and furnish transportation and electric power facilities in areas of northern Canada.

The significant fact about the substantial scope of Canadian public enterprise in certain important economic areas, however, is that it does not justify automatic inferences about a pro-government ownership sentiment any more than Canada's reputation for financial conservatism justifies automatic inferences about its choice of private enterprise for each and every task. This will be more apparent after a review of the factors which delimit public enterprise territory in Canada.

II

The operational area for government enterprise is bounded at its extremes by two familiar Canadian landmarks: (1) the tradition that the national government should act aggressively to establish and maintain national economic unity; and (2) the tradition of an economic system anchored on private enterprise. The first factor argues for the creation of sufficient government enterprise to assure accomplishment of the national goals; the second signifies the absence of an ideological drive to place industry in the government's hands.

The vital part played by the state in developing Canada has been noted often by the country's economists. "The role of the state in the economic life of Canada," Professor Alexander Brady has remarked, "is really the modern history of Canada. . . ."<sup>9</sup> Confederation itself, another economist has argued, "can be interpreted as a political adaptation to the unfavorable impact of the first industrial revolution in Canada."<sup>10</sup> At the very least, the Confederation document—the British North American Act—obligated the national government to undertake a commercial venture in order to bind the Maritime Provinces to Quebec and Ontario. Soon after satisfying this obligation by building the Intercolonial Railway, the government heavily subsidized the Canadian Pacific in order to reinforce British Columbia's links to the nation and to provide the first transcontinental railroad. The government also built canals, provided protective tariffs and bonuses for secondary industry, and opened the western lands to settlement. These actions performed the vital function of supplementing the inadequate efforts of private capital. Generally speaking, they were popular, as Sir John A. MacDonald's "National Policy" in particular demonstrated.<sup>11</sup>

<sup>8</sup> Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, Canadian Farm Loan Board, Canadian National Railways, Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships Limited, Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation, Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, Eldorado Aviation Limited, Eldorado Mining and Refining Limited, Export Credits Insurance Corporation, Northern Transportation Company Limited, Northwest Territories Power Commission, Polymer Corporation Limited, St. Lawrence Seaway Authority, and Trans-Canada Air Lines.

<sup>9</sup> Alexander Brady, "The State and Economic Life," in Canada, ed. George W. Brown (Berkeley, 1950), p. 353.

<sup>10</sup> Maurice Lamontagne, "The Role of Government," in Canada's Tomorrow, ed. G. P. Gilmour (Toronto, 1954), p. 122.

The stimuli which made the state take an active role—"the pioneer nature of the country, the physical structure of the half-continent, the imperial sweep of settlement after 1867, the influence of the interesting ideas and instruments of Britain and the United States, and the quick response of the whole society to the advance of western industrialism"<sup>12</sup>—retain much of their force today. Partly this is so because it has been characteristic of Western society, in whose dynamic nature Canada shares, to advance constantly its concepts of minimum requirements. Thus, an old field of concern for the state—transportation and communication—has continued to challenge the government as new inventions have come along. In the case of transcontinental aviation and radio broadcasting, for example, the government chose to create public corporations in the 1930's to operate these services rather than allow chaotic private development. As examples of relatively recent actions designed to bind the nation together, the reasoning involved is worth considering briefly.

The swift advance in the commercial possibilities of air travel—as demonstrated by private air lines in the United States—had caught Canada by surprise. Private enterprise, in the opinion of the Liberal Government, was not up to the task of providing the nation with efficient transcontinental air service. Lamenting the fact that a "score or more" of private companies had ended on the financial junkheap, C. D. Howe, Minister of Transport, told the House of Commons in 1937: "Our task in Canada is to set up this service without all the lost motion that has been expended during the past ten years."<sup>13</sup> The creation of Trans-Canada Air Lines, a corporate subsidiary of Canadian National Railways, followed. At a later date, in reviewing the airline's remarkable progress, Howe tied T.C.A. into the tradition of national development in the following words:

<sup>11</sup> The term was popularized by MacDonald and the Conservatives in the campaign of 1878. Its meaning is generally restricted to the institution of the protective tariff, but cogent arguments have been made for subsuming the entire group of policies named above under the title. See V. C. Fowke, "The National Policy—Old and New," Canadian Journal of Economics and Political Science, Vol. 18, pp. 271-86 (Aug., 1952), and Brady, "The State and Economic Life," in Canada, pp. 38-59.

<sup>12</sup> Brady, "The State and Economic Life," in Canada, p. 353.

<sup>13</sup> Debates, House of Commons, Canada (hereafter referred to as Debates), 1937, p. 2215.

Facilities for transportation and communication have been among our most powerful tools in the fashioning of Canadian unity . . .

T.C.A. serves in the same high tradition. . . . Canadian distances have already lost much of their old significance . . . and a new sense of nationhood is being fostered by Canada's new accessibility to its citizens. In particular, Canadian industry and business have received a major stimulus from air transport . . .<sup>14</sup>

The creation of the Canadian Radio Broadcasting Commission (predecessor of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation) in 1932 demonstrated that government ownership for the sake of national development was not a monopoly of the Liberal party. Radio broadcasting had to be under government auspices for three reasons, Conservative Prime Minister R. B. Bennett told the House:

First of all, this country must be assured of complete Canadian control of broadcasting from Canadian sources, free from foreign interference or influence . . . so that national consciousness may be fostered and sustained and national unity still further strengthened . . .

Secondly, no other scheme . . . can ensure . . . equal enjoyment of the benefits and pleasures of radio broadcasting . . .

[Thirdly] . . . the air itself . . . is a natural resource over which we have complete jurisdiction . . . I believe that there is no government in Canada that does not regret today that it has parted with some of these natural resources for considerations wholly inadequate and on terms that do not reflect the principle under which the crown holds the natural resources in trust for all the people.<sup>15</sup>

The years since the onset of World War II have witnessed a merger of the national development theme with that of national defense. Each reinforces the strength of the other. Does it aid defense or development more when, for example, public corporations mine and refine uranium or build transportation and electric power systems in remote, primitive areas of the country? The pace of events still outruns the capabilities of private interests in conquering Canadian geography alone, even if business wished to devote its efforts to relatively unprofitable projects. In view of world events and Canada's own ambitions, it is evident that continued government action of this sort will be needed in the foreseeable future.

The second familiar Canadian landmark that affects the scope of public enterprise is the prime role of private enterprise in the economy. The logic which gave an active economic role to the state has never been extended (except in platforms of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, the democratic socialist party) to the nationalization of industry. No huge existing industries have been taken over by the government, unless one includes the acquisition of the bankrupt railroads during World War I.

In the instance of the railroads, not only was the prosperous Canadian Pacific left intact, but the reasoning by which the other private railroads were acquired demonstrates the limited role of sentiment favoring public ownership. The onset of war had abruptly shut off the flow of immigration and of foreign capital, a situation which immediately threatened the solvency of several railroads that had just reached a period in their development when earnings might offset the heavy initial expenditure of capital and begin to repay extensive government loans made in the developmental period. The Debates of the House of Commons reflect the shock of the members at the grim turn of events—a shock made all the greater because of the rosy vision of Canada's future entertained especially by members from the Prairie Provinces. Although much time and energy were spent in recriminations and attempts to fix the blame for the "needless duplication" and "costly overbuilding" of railroads, the problem of what to do remained. Public ownership was arrived at only after a painful canvass of various alternatives. To let the railroads go into receivership was not considered a viable alternative because foreign investors had relied on the guarantees given by the national and provincial governments in connection with bonds issued by the railroads.<sup>16</sup> Default on the guarantees, it was felt, would affect Canada's credit adversely at the very time it was fighting a great war. Further loans to the railroads were out of the question because it was suspected that public opinion would not tolerate them, a feeling summed up by the Conservative Minister of Finance when he declared: "If the public does the financing, the public should enjoy the ultimate reward."<sup>17</sup> Government leaders were certain that public opinion would not allow the bankrupt roads to fall into the hands of the gigantic and prosperous Canadian Pacific.<sup>18</sup> Finally, once a segment of a transcontinental road was acquired from a bankrupt company, it was financially necessary to take over the rest of the line.<sup>19</sup> Thus, the acquisition of the Canadian Northern was followed by that of the Grand Trunk and the Grand Trunk Pacific.

<sup>14</sup> Debates, 1945, p. 1358. A member of the Opposition responded with further words of praise "for what they [T.C.A.] have done in helping to develop the country" (p. 1359).

<sup>15</sup> Debates, 1932, pp. 3035-36.

In emphasizing that the Canadian government more or less "backed into" ownership of the railroads, it is not intended to imply that public ownership sentiment was non-existent. As a matter of fact, the Debates contain considerable evidence that the House was well aware of popular sentiment, especially in Ontario and the West, favoring government ownership.<sup>20</sup> Nevertheless, it is apparent that this sentiment did not govern the situation. The Borden Government drew a sharp line between taking over bankrupt railroads and wholesale nationalization, rejecting the latter as highly detrimental "to the credit of the Dominion and to our prospects for future financing."<sup>21</sup>

Just as pragmatic considerations outweighed public ownership sentiment in the acquisition of the bankrupt railroads, so they have prevailed in subsequent

<sup>16</sup> Debates, 1917, p. 4218.

<sup>17</sup> Debates, 1917, p. 4015.

<sup>18</sup> Debates, 1919, p. 1741.

<sup>19</sup> Debates, 1919 (2nd sess.), p. 1054.

<sup>20</sup> Debates, 1917, pp. 4275 and 4384, and 1919 (2nd sess.), p. 1057.

<sup>21</sup> Debates, 1917, p. 4015. It is true that the M.P.s' awareness of public ownership sentiment produced an almost ludicrous jockeying to gain credit for public ownership measures while denying a doctrinaire bias toward the principle. (See pp. 1811 and 2115.) Furthermore, several prominent Conservatives seem to have expected public ownership to play an increasingly important role as the industrialization of Canada proceeded.

ventures in public enterprise. In fact, freed of the elements of surprise and reluctance manifest in the railroad situation, the government has appeared to weigh practical aspects even more deliberately. One of the best illustrations is found in a debate on the government's proposals for liberalization of credit to small businessmen, farmers, and fishermen in 1944. The flexibility of the Liberal Government's approach was demonstrated by the fact that an Industrial Development Bank was proposed to handle loans to small businessmen, while the commercial banks were to be agents in making government-backed loans to farmers and fishermen. Highly practical reasons were offered for employing public enterprise in one instance and rejecting its use in the other.<sup>22</sup> In the course of debate government spokesmen were called upon to defend their stand against nationalization of all commercial banks, which had been demanded by the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. The Minister of Finance took the position that:

The question of nationalization of an industry or a specific firm should not be one of ideology. We should neither shrink from nationalization because of an economic philosophy based on fear, nor embrace it rashly. . . . We should use it only where it alone can serve the public interest or can serve it better than any alternative form of organization. Commercial banking, I am convinced, is not one of those cases. . . .<sup>23</sup>

In his rebuttal, M. J. Coldwell, the C.C.F. leader, recited a number of alleged inadequacies in the banking system and emphasized that "It is on these grounds then, that we call for the national ownership and control of the financial system, and particularly the banks; not, as the minister suggested, on some doctrinaire theory that their socialization will destroy the present system."<sup>24</sup> This denial of a doctrinaire approach, it may be noted, came from a source usually identified as one of the most doctrinaire on the subject of public enterprise.

A highly pragmatic attitude, then, has consistently demonstrated its usefulness in any situation where the traditions of national economic development and private enterprise may come into conflict. This attitude has probably been able to emerge more easily because business and government are constrained by the circumstances toward moderation. Business cannot easily boast of an exclusive role in building the economy, as it tends to in the United States, for it is faced not merely with a history of government enterprise dating back to Confederation, but with an even more vital present. Furthermore, under the brand of Keynesianism practiced by the Canadian government, it has a close working arrangement with the government in the promotion of prosperity and industrial development.<sup>25</sup> Probably it is also restrained by a consciousness of its own limited strength, its vulnerability to a charge that subsidiaries of American corporations are prominent in its midst, and a fear that a reactionary stand might strengthen the hand of the C.C.F. and bring on nationalization. The government, for its part, has not exhibited—under either the Conservatives or the Liberals—any inclination to push public enterprise for its own sake; in this it has but mirrored its recognition and approval of private enterprise as the foundation of the economy. Although it has not shrunk from taking action necessary to attain the goal of economic unity, even if this has meant launching a commercial venture, it has done so only in response to demonstrated need.

<sup>22</sup> J. L. Ilsley, the Minister of Finance, argued as follows: "The house will appreciate, however, that unlike the industrial development bank, which will operate with a relatively few offices and a comparatively small but highly skilled staff, a similar agency to provide intermediate credit for agriculture could do its job effectively only with literally thousands of branches or offices throughout rural areas readily accessible to farmers. Some of the United States farm credit organizations were considered as possible models, but . . . the same objective could be attained more speedily and effectively and at a fraction of the cost by a comparatively simple extension of existing lending facilities. Moreover, a new set of institutions would have taken years to build up and to equip with competent and experienced staff." Debates, 1944, p. 2558.

<sup>23</sup> Debates, 1944, p. 2547.

<sup>24</sup> Debates, 1944, p. 2718.

This section has attempted to sketch a rough profile of Canadian public enterprise. The portrait takes fuller shape through consideration of some of the conditions under which public enterprise operates.

III

The existence of public enterprise in a predominantly private enterprise economy inevitably poses certain problems of adjustment. Are units of public enterprise to be operated as a monopoly or in competition with business? Broadly speaking, shall public enterprise furnish an operating standard for private enterprise? Should the operating conditions of public enterprise be made as nearly like those of business as possible? An examination of the Canadian answers to these questions should help to evaluate the extent to which that country's public enterprise has affected, and in turn been affected by, a "free enterprise" setting.

It is consistent with the empirical nature of Canadian economic development that monopoly and competition exist side by side on the public enterprise scene without causing any apparent uneasiness. Public corporations have a monopoly in the production of synthetic rubber, atomic energy, and certain lines of munitions. Public enterprise is in direct competition with business in railroads, telegraph, and express services. It co-exists with private enterprise but does not enter into direct competition with it in such fields as aviation, radio, and credit. The line of reasoning which backs up the existence of each of these arrangements is worth examining briefly.

<sup>25</sup> See the "White Paper" issued by C. D. Howe, the Minister of Reconstruction and Development in 1945 (Employment and Income, with Special Reference to the Initial Period of Reconstruction, Ottawa, 1945); an article by Howe, "Industrial Development in Canada," Public Affairs, Vol. 11, pp. 207-13 (Dec., 19-31, in which the author lists "four principles underlying our industrial development program"; and O. J. Firestone, "Investment and Economic Development in Canada," The Nation (Canadian Supplement), May 31, 1952, pp. 18-20. For an indication of the extent to which business regards itself as a partner of government, see John T. Bryden, "Government and Business," in Canada: Nation on the March (Toronto, 1953), pp. 67-74, and Howard Gamble, "The Road to Tomorrow," Canadian Business, Vol. 27, pp. 22-24, 50 ff. (Jan., 1954). Gamble asserts: "There is in Canada probably a greater genuine liaison and rapport between government and business than in any other country" (p. 50).

The justification for monopoly has ranged from the supposed inability of private enterprise to cope with a vital economic function to a desire to eliminate waste and duplication. The crown companies created during World War II under the auspices of the Department of Munitions and Supply<sup>25</sup> are the foremost examples of the first line of reasoning. The criterion used by the Minister was as follows:

If private business was able to carry out the war objective, private business was given that opportunity. The government has created Crown companies only to undertake work that private industry was not willing to undertake.<sup>27</sup>

For those few crown companies not liquidated by the coming of peace, further justification had to be sought. By way of example, it was found for Polymer Corporation Limited, the country's sole manufacturer of synthetic rubber, in the argument that business was benefited at a time of uncertain supply of foreign rubber, that no private rubber industry existed in Canada, and that "We would be glad to sell the Polymer Corporation to private industry, if private industry would buy it."<sup>28</sup> As with Canadian Arsenals Limited, the needs of national defense also played an important part in perpetuating the government monopoly.<sup>29</sup>

Elimination of waste and duplication as an argument for monopoly is best illustrated by the field of civil aviation, where the government's airline is the only transcontinental operator. The lesson derived from railroad over-building and resultant bankruptcy at the time of the First World War was not lost on the Liberal Government in creating Trans-Canada Air Lines in 1937. It was set up, the Minister of Transport said later, "to avoid the duplication of services that were the outgrowth of competitive building for profit in the field of surface transportation."<sup>30</sup> Its exclusive franchise recognized "the principle that our small population would not warrant competition on this route."<sup>31</sup>

Competition between public and private enterprise—as exemplified by the <sup>25</sup> The Minister was authorized by statute to procure the incorporation of Crown companies under the federal Companies Act, 1934, or provincial companies acts—all statutes designed for the use of private corporations. Twenty-eight companies were created under the authority given the Minister. See J. de N. Kennedy, History of the Department of Munitions and Supply, 2 vols. (Ottawa, 1950). A few Crown companies survived the war, and authorization to create others has been given to several agencies since the war. The word "Limited" in the title identifies this special type of public corporation (see notes 7 and 8).

<sup>27</sup> Debates, 1946, p. 2176.

<sup>28</sup> Ibid., p. 1517.

<sup>29</sup> See Disposal and Peacetime Use of Crown Plant Buildings, Department of Reconstruction and Supply (Ottawa, 1948), p. 3.

<sup>30</sup> Debates, 1944, p. 1573.

<sup>31</sup> Address by C. D. Howe, Minister of Trade and Commerce and Minister of Defence Production, Los Angeles, California, October 8, 1954 (press release).

railroad industry—finds its justification in the incentives it furnishes.<sup>22</sup> In 1917, when public ownership of all Canadian railroads was being urged on him, the Conservative Minister of Railways and Canals voiced his doubt whether “a government monopoly would be a very great improvement upon a private monopoly” because “once the incentive to service, which is brought about by competition, is removed it is not so sure that a monopoly, even if it be a public monopoly, would be the best thing for the public.”<sup>23</sup> One of the reasons given by Acting Prime Minister Sir Thomas White in 1919 for preserving the identity of the privately-owned Canadian Pacific when other railroads were being combined under government management was that “there should be two railway systems in this country, one of which will be, so to speak, a check, in the sense of efficiency in the administration, upon the other.”<sup>24</sup> The political virtues of this arrangement were recognized by R. B. Bennett, the Conservative Prime Minister from 1930 to 1935, when he gave a prominent place in his successful campaign of 1930 to the slogan, “Amalgamation? Never. Competition? Ever.”<sup>25</sup> But the depth of the feeling which it evokes is perhaps best illustrated by the following statement of a leading Canadian economist:

It is the hope of democracy in Canada that both [railroads] will continue to strive earnestly but that neither will succeed, and that the impossibility of running two competitive railways will continue. . . . We may hope that the aggressiveness of the Canadian Pacific Railway will keep politics out of the Canadian National and that the aggressiveness of the Canadian National Railways will keep the Canadian Pacific out of politics and out of the Canadian Treasury, and that the results will permit the continuation of democratic government.<sup>26</sup>

Despite the strength of the belief in railroad competition, it would be misleading to assert that competition begins to compare with monopoly as a guiding principle for public enterprise in Canada. Granted the existence of the powerful Canadian Pacific and the absence of an ideological drive for nationalization of all railroads, nothing was left to a government which had inherited various bankrupt railroads but to compete—and to compete vigorously—if the jumble of roads was to survive. The announced determination to operate the system “as though it were a private corporation”<sup>27</sup> and the appointment of a daring and experienced railroad man to head it testified to the vigor of the attempt, at least. Transcontinental aviation and radio, however, offer a contrast. Here private enterprise—partly because it lacked the substantial subsidies furnished the Canadian Pacific—never succeeded in establishing transcontinental links, and, after public enterprise entered the field, was deliberately <sup>22</sup> Cf. the instituting of competition between public corporations in the fuel industry by the British Conservative Government. Ernest Davis, “Government Policy and the Public Corporation,” The Political Quarterly, Vol. 23 pp. 104-16 (April-June, 1955).

<sup>23</sup> Debates, 1917, p. 4217.

<sup>24</sup> Debates, 1919, p. 2110.

<sup>25</sup> The words were used in a speech broadcast to the nation from Winnipeg. Quoted in Debates, 1932-33, p. 2800.

<sup>26</sup> Harold A. Innis, Political Economy in the Modern State (Toronto, 1946), pp. 159-60.

<sup>27</sup> Debates, 1919 p. 1018.

precluded from doing so by governmental policy. Competition, in short, has been highly touted only where no practicable alternative to competition was thought to exist. Outside the area encompassed by the railroads and their subsidiary services, a deliberate policy of non-competition with business is in force, according to Liberal government leaders.<sup>38</sup> This policy reflects political wisdom in Canada because it maintains freedom of action for those occasions when an extension of public enterprise is called for,<sup>39</sup> and at the same time undercuts the argument that nationalization is the inevitable consequence of such an extension.<sup>40</sup>

Despite the appeal of a policy of non-competition, signs of unrest are accumulating in the areas of the public economy that lie on the border between monopoly and competition. In radio, television, and aviation—which have been split between public and private enterprise, with the major portion reserved to the government—circumstances favor continued, and perhaps increasing, friction. As the country becomes more heavily populated, industrialized, and wealthy, the “chosen instrument” policy, established in the pessimistic 1930’s, runs the risk of appearing unsuited to a young and vigorous land. The Canadian Association of Radio and Television Broadcasters has long agitated for the right to form a network of private radio stations and thereby enter into direct competition with the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.<sup>41</sup> This argument and its corollary—that the Corporation’s regulatory powers over private radio stations should be turned over to an independent regulatory commission which would supervise the activities of both public and private radio—have been steadfastly resisted by the Cabinet, aided by the findings of a Royal Commission regarding the cultural needs of Canada.<sup>42</sup> The advent of television has in-

<sup>38</sup> For example, speaking of the successful government ventures in synthetic rubber production and uranium mining and refining, the Minister of Defence Production asserted: “. . . if they did not have monopolies they would be crown companies in a competitive field, which is contrary to government policy.” Debates, 1951, p. 2004. See also Debates, 1946, p. 2176.

<sup>39</sup> “The government has no intention of going into business unnecessarily. Occasions have arisen in the past where it was important and, I suggest, imperative, that the government go into business on a very large scale. Such occasions may occur again, and if they do I hope the government of that day will be bold enough to meet the situation.” C. D. Howe, Minister of Reconstruction and Supply, Debates, 1946, p. 1517.

<sup>40</sup> An illustration is found in a colloquy between C. D. Howe and a leading Conservative that occurred while Polymer Corporation was under discussion (Debates, 1944, p. 1715):

“Mr. Howe: ‘With what private industry does it compete?’

Mr. Diefenbaker: ‘It does not compete in the matter of manufacture, true enough, but it is actually the first move along the road to socialization.’

Mr. Howe: ‘It is a wholly non-competitive industry.’

Mr. Diefenbaker: ‘That is true.’”

<sup>41</sup> For a recent statement of the Association’s case, see the Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence of the Special Committee on Broadcasting, House of Commons, Canada, Seventh Session, Twenty-first Parliament, 1952–53, pp. 252–92 and 311–17.

<sup>42</sup> See Report, Royal Commission on National Development in the Arts, Letters and Sciences (Ottawa, 1951). As recently as March 31, 1955, Prime Minister Louis St. Laurent

tensified this basic disagreement. Television's rapid progress in the United States under private auspices, the availability of American television to certain Canadian viewers while others may not have even the single C.B.C. channel available the caution with which applications for private television stations have been granted by the C.B.C.—these factors have brought government television, which has been plagued by the high cost of extending its services in a vast, bilingual country, under a certain amount of public disapproval. Inasmuch as the government has announced its intention to complete a transcontinental microwave television network by 1958 to add to its two transcontinental radio networks, the "chosen instrument" policy appears under no immediate threat. Whether the Corporation will lose its regulatory powers to an independent board depends in no small measure upon whether Canadians will regard more seriously in the future the contention—borrowed from the separation of powers doctrine—that the C.B.C. should not "act at the same time as both controller and competitor, nor as both judge and litigant, nor as both judge and prosecutor."<sup>43</sup>

In aviation—where transcontinental routes have been monopolized by the government's airline, other domestic routes have been left to private industry, and international routes have been assigned to either—there has also been pressure from private interests for a policy of competition, although the excellent reputation of Trans-Canada Air Lines minimizes this assault. The stage is set, however for more vigorous competition with the government's chosen instrument than in radio or television, for there already exists a single powerful rival, Canadian Pacific Air Lines, offspring of the Canadian Pacific Railway and operator of all private international routes and nearly all of the private domestic routes. The government airline does not possess regulatory power over private interests, as does the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, and only the timely intervention of the Cabinet has prevented at least one significant inroad on the public monopoly in transcontinental aviation. In 1953, after the Air Transport Board had approved the application of Canadian Pacific Air Lines to establish a competing air freight service across most of the continent, the Cabinet voided the action on the ground that the prospective volume of traffic did not yet justify duplicating the government's service.<sup>44</sup> Last year, however, the Cabinet made its first concession to competition in international routes when it approved a trans-Arctic service between Vancouver and Amsterdam, a shorter route to Europe than that used by Trans-Canada Air Lines.

---

once more reaffirmed the government's policy with respect to the regulatory powers of the C.B.C. Debates, 1955, p. 2564 (daily edition). It should be noted, however, that in December, 1955, a Royal Commission on Television Broadcasting was appointed to consider inter alia "the licensing and control of private television and sound broadcasting stations in the public interest."

<sup>43</sup> Brief submitted by the Canadian Association of Broadcasters (as it was then called), Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence of the Special Committee on Broadcasting, House, 1952-53, p. 315.

<sup>44</sup> A. W. Currie, Economics of Canadian Transportation (Toronto, 1954), p. 544.

Reference to a current trend in the United States may bring the developments noted above into perspective. Under the so-called "businessman's administration" in the United States, the emphasis is frankly upon getting government out of competition with business. This was, in fact, one of the terms of reference of the second Hoover Commission.<sup>46</sup> At those points where Canadian business co-exists with public enterprise but is restricted in its actions (radio, television, aviation), the businessman's aim is to get into competition with the government. This seeming contrast yields quickly to a twofold explanation. First, it is apparent that the dissimilar aims listed above are but two different stages of a drive by business to improve its position vis-à-vis public enterprise. Second, the contrast is explainable in terms of each nation's economic development. In order to assure the nation of essential economic services it was not necessary for the American government to pre-empt certain vital areas of the economy, as the Canadian government was forced to do. Where Canadian business is confronted with pre-empted areas it naturally raises a clamor to enter the forbidden preserves. As economic growth continues, a logical expectation is that the forbidden grass will appear ever greener. Already such catchwords as the following are appearing in sections of the press: "... no economic or political principle in this country says that public ownership should be without competition, that it should have a right to monopoly . . ."<sup>46</sup>

The second question posed at the beginning of this section—whether Canadian public enterprise furnishes an operating standard for private enterprise—needs no extensive discussion. Undoubtedly, the Canadian National Railways sets a standard for the Canadian Pacific in the sense that the latter is conscious of a need to remain efficient in order to be certain of not being absorbed by its rival. The C.N.R.'s power to set standards is greatly limited by circumstances, however. Originally it had to integrate the operations of various inherited railroads, whereas the C.P.R. has combined its natural advantage of a unified structure with a fine record of efficiency. Consequently, the Canadian Pacific, more often than not, has been the pacesetter. Doubt has also been expressed—in various quarters and for different reasons—whether even such relatively similar forms of enterprise as the C.N.R. and the C.P.R. can be truly compared.<sup>47</sup> Finally, direct competition as a method of setting standards for private enterprise was arrived at almost accidentally in the case of the railroads, has not served as a precedent, and therefore has no standing as current public policy. Once away from the example of the railroads, not even the milder "yardstick" form of competition, as exemplified by the T.V.A., prevails as a method of assuring that public enterprise sets a standard.<sup>48</sup> As in the United States, business competition is chiefly relied on for obtaining good business behavior, and gov-

<sup>46</sup> New York Times, March 20, 1955, p. E7.

<sup>46</sup> "That C.P.A. Trans-Arctic Service" (editorial), Ottawa Journal, Jan. 24, 1955, p. 6.

<sup>47</sup> See, e.g., Debates, 1923, p. 1616, and 1932-33, p. 2771; also R. J. Manion (a former Minister of Railways and Canals), Life is an Adventure (Toronto, 1936), p. 295.

<sup>48</sup> A fact already noted by Professor Hodgetts, "The Public Corporation in Canada," in Friedmann, The Public Corporation, p. 54.

ernment regulation ranks ahead of government ownership as a method of reinforcing this approach.

To the third question—whether the operating conditions of public enterprise should be made as nearly like those of business as possible—the Canadian answer appears to be more strongly in the affirmative than might be expected. Two very different lines of reasoning support this answer: first, a concern that public enterprise should obtain a measure of business's secrecy and unity of purpose in operation, and secondly, that public enterprise should be exposed to as many of the normal business costs as feasible.

Influential in popularizing the first line of reasoning was the accident that the first major commercial venture of the Canadian government in this century involved strenuous competition with a private firm. From the start it was recognized by government leaders that the Canadian National Railways needed privacy and autonomy in its daily operations in order to compete with its able rival. Although the Liberals fought this notion vigorously as an invasion of parliamentary responsibility, they espoused it themselves after replacing the Unionist Government in December, 1921. Thus, Prime Minister Mackenzie King asserted that under the Liberals the president of the C.N.R. would always have "precisely the same degree of latitude and freedom as the shareholders of the Canadian Pacific would give to Mr. Beatty the C.P.R. president."<sup>49</sup> This point of view matched that of his Unionist predecessor who—exasperated at the flow of questions about the C.N.R.—asked the House: "... how is the Canadian National Railways directorate going to make a success . . . of its efforts to compete with the Canadian Pacific, if every day it is subject to having every action . . . disclosed to the public and to its competitor while . . . the competitor need disclose nothing at all?"<sup>50</sup> Business concepts, then, exerted a powerful influence at the formative stage in the development of the public corporation, even though it was always apparent that the public corporation could never attain the degree of autonomy characteristic of its opposite number.<sup>51</sup>

When public enterprise expands and diversifies in a "free enterprise" country, it is apt to run into a feeling that various cost factors facing business should also be charged to the operations of public enterprise. Curiously enough, this belief—which operates as a second factor in rendering public enterprise more like private—seems to have produced more tangible results so far in Canada than in the United States, despite the extremely vigorous stand of American business groups on the matter. Several bits of evidence in support of this statement may be cited.

<sup>49</sup> Debates, 1923, p. 3674.

<sup>50</sup> Debates, 1921, p. 1182.

<sup>51</sup> A point amply demonstrated by the harassed Liberal Minister of Railways and Canals, when he said in the House: "Suppose M. Beatty's shareholders met and stayed in session four or five months every year; suppose every day a portion of his staff was compelled to be taken from their work to answer all kinds of questions; suppose that . . . among his shareholders there was a large number who made no bones about declaring him and his board of management incompetent; what would Mr. Beatty do? He would resign in five minutes." Debates, 1924, pp. 2632-33.

Since 1952 the government's "proprietary corporations"—the group most nearly comparable to private enterprise—have had to pay federal income tax at the same rate as private corporations.<sup>52</sup> Levied in response to mounting agitation since World War II,<sup>53</sup> the tax was justified by the Minister of Finance as designed "to make the financial statements of these crown companies more comparable with private industry, and make it easier to assess the relative efficiency of their operations."<sup>54</sup> Moreover, the hope was expressed by another government spokesman that the provinces would now tax their own public corporations and thereby put them "in a position where a better or more accurate comparison can be made of the relative efficiency of publicly-owned corporations competing in the same field."<sup>55</sup>

Two other recent tax changes may be cited in support of the contention that the Canadian government has attempted to lessen the difference in operating costs between public and private enterprise. One is the government's instructions to public corporations to conclude agreements with municipalities for the payment of grants in lieu of taxes.<sup>56</sup> Undoubtedly, the principal reason for the directive was to satisfy the clamor of tax-hungry municipalities.<sup>57</sup> The connection between this step and the one just reviewed, however, was made plain by the Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance, who stated that "the principle is really the same in payment by federal corporations of both municipal taxes and federal taxes . . ."<sup>58</sup> A second pertinent tax change, announced in the Budget Speech of 1952, effected a substantial reduction in the federal income tax paid by privately-owned public utilities engaged in the generation and distribution of electrical energy, gas, or steam.<sup>59</sup> Although it was adopted

<sup>52</sup> Statutes of Canada, 1 Eliz. II, c. 29 (1952). The provision was an amendment to the Income Tax Act, Statutes of Canada (1948), 11-12 George VI, c. 52, which had provided in section 57 (1) (d) for exemption of "a corporation, commission, or association not less than 90% of the shares or capital of which was owned by His Majesty in right of Canada or a province or by a Canadian municipality."

<sup>53</sup> See, for example, Debates, 1946, pp. 1517, 2129, and 2150.

<sup>54</sup> Debates, 1952, p. 1253. The amounts paid by each eligible corporation can be ascertained quickly from their financial statements, which are published annually in Volume II of the Public Accounts of Canada.

<sup>55</sup> Debates, 1952, p. 2093.

<sup>56</sup> In November, 1949, Minister of Finance Douglas Abbott announced to the House that "in general the policy of the government will be to authorize its Crown corporations to work out fair and equitable agreements with the municipalities in which their properties are situated." Debates, 1949 (2nd sess.), p. 1706. In June, 1951, the Minister used stronger language to describe the situation, saying that the corporations had been "instructed" to negotiate agreements. Debates, 1951, p. 4217. The reason given by the Minister for permitting each corporation to work out its own "fair and equitable" agreements was that "the character of the operations of these Crown corporations varies a good deal" (p. 4224).

<sup>57</sup> See Debates, 1945, p. 1424 and 1946, pp. 1517, 2129, 2148, and 2163. The cities have no legal recourse if a corporation refuses to conclude such an arrangement. There has not been complete satisfaction with the size of the payments. See, e.g., Debates, 1951, p. 4226.

<sup>58</sup> Debates, 1952, p. 2092.

<sup>59</sup> Ibid., p. 1253. The relief granted "will take the form of a deduction from the tax otherwise payable of an amount sufficient to reduce to 43 per cent the tax payable under chiefly to forestall applications for rate increases by these companies, the Minister of Finance agreed with a member of the Opposition that "This clause will have a tendency to bring more nearly into line the activities of privately-owned utility corporations and those of publicly-owned corporations . . ."<sup>60</sup>

IV

Canadian public enterprise, as the foregoing pages demonstrate, is complex in character. It occupies only a modest segment of the economy, but it literally links the nation together. Although it has had a long history, it has never won the emotional allegiance of Canadians. Without an ideological drive to sustain it, it has achieved a vital place in the economy because of its decisive importance in the continuing task of nation-building. Exceedingly pragmatic as Canadian public enterprise appears to be, the consistency with which it is used in situations involving challenges to national economic unity virtually gives its motivating factor the status of a theory. Though this in turn renders public enterprise relatively uncontroversial, the four parliamentary parties do not hesitate to express varying notions about it, ranging from a reduction in its scope to nationalization of industry. In the face of this activity by party orators, however, "The average Canadian has something less than enthusiasm for arguing the merit of private versus public enterprise."<sup>61</sup>

Complex though its character may be, Canadian public enterprise generally obtains more candid and dispassionate treatment than is customary in the United States. Wholesale approval or condemnation of the principle of public ownership frequently yields to honest attempts to judge the performance of individual units of public enterprise.<sup>62</sup> Neither the extension of public enter-the Income Tax Act on that part of a corporation's taxable income that is derived from such distribution or generation." At the 1952 corporate income tax rate of 50 per cent, the reduction amounted to 14 per cent.

---

<sup>60</sup> Ibid., p. 2845. Earlier, in response to complaints that provinces with privately-owned public utility companies were being discriminated against because publicly-owned companies in other provinces paid no federal income taxes, the federal government had arranged to turn over to a province half of the income tax collected from such private companies within its borders. This step and the 1952 reduction were regarded as parallel moves.

<sup>61</sup> W. A. Mackintosh, "The People and Their History," in Canada: Nation on the March, p. 13.

<sup>62</sup> For example, in commenting on the loss of 28 million dollars suffered by the Canadian National Railways in 1954 under Liberal auspices, a Conservative newspaper pointed to the reduction of 32 million dollars in operating expenses as proof that the loss "was not helped by failure on the part of management to economize." Falling revenues were blamed, and it was acknowledged that "it is not always possible to match falling revenues with cuts in costs." The railroad's plans for meeting competition were noted. Editorial, Ottawa Journal, March 23, 1955, p. 6. Earlier, in referring to the anticipated loss, the president of the C.N.R. was reported as viewing it as a "crushing disappointment," particularly because making a profit is essential for a public corporation "Exhortations from an executive officer are a poor substitute for the discipline of a profit and loss account." Ottawa Journal, Nov. 4, 1954, p. 38.

prise nor, on the other hand, its taxation, appear to have aroused major displays of public emotion. When such contrasting developments can occur almost simultaneously and in a relatively calm atmosphere, the explanation must go deeper than the difference between Canadian and American temperaments or forms of government, significant as these matters may be. Judging from the picture which has been sketched in these pages, the principal explanation may be that in Canada laissez faire never had the opportunity—through force of circumstances—to reach the status of a dogma or of an emotional catchword. It became neither a folk myth to which eternal allegiance was due nor a bête noire to be overcome at all costs. Consequently, to a very real extent the guiding criterion in Canada is that expressed by C. D. Howe, who is, fittingly, both a prolific launcher of public corporations and a highly successful businessman: “. . . there is only one test of the strength and weakness of either private operation or government operation, namely, which can best serve the need of the public of Canada.”<sup>63</sup> The reservation which must accompany this statement—and which points up Canada’s basic economic conservatism and kinship to the United States—is found in another quotation, this one by Prime Minister Louis St. Laurent: “. . . I think we are all most happy when free enterprise does what is required to be done and public authorities do not have to intervene.”<sup>64</sup>

<sup>63</sup> Debates, 1945, p. 1397. Behind this statement is another made by Howe on a different occasion: “We in Canada have always had to live by compromise. . . .” Address at Case Institute of Technology, Cleveland, April 10, 1953 (press release).

<sup>64</sup> Debates, 1952–53, p. 4764.

EXECUTIVE POWER IN VENEZUELA

LEO B. LOTTE

Ohio State University

Throughout most of its national history, Venezuela has been the victim of long and tyrannical dictatorships, broken only by brief spells of semi-democratic government. Constitution after constitution has fallen before the whims of self-made generals. Numerous major revolts and countless minor civil uprisings have scarred the country, all having the twofold objective of acquiring for their leaders national power for power's sake and the privilege of organizing Venezuela as a private economic and political domain.

In almost all instances the politicians have traveled a bloody road to national power. Having once established themselves in the presidency, they demonstrated considerable reluctance to observe the functional separation of powers decreed by the constitution. As a result of this attitude the legislature and judiciary were weakened to the point of impotence. The raison d'être of these branches thus came to be the legalization of the programs and activities of the executive, even if this meant, as it often did, violating the constitution. The purpose of this article is to examine the evolution and application of executive power.

I. UNDERLYING FACTORS AND FORCES

The periods of dictatorship to which the Venezuelan people have been subjected have helped to condition them to the principles of authoritarianism in the organization and application of political power. It can be argued that the Venezuelan people themselves have encouraged and cultivated the development of ejecutivismo in government, for the struggle for personal power has been aggravated by a clearly-defined tendency of the people to associate themselves with powerful personalities rather than with programs and issues.<sup>1</sup> It has not been difficult in the past for any political aspirant, once having demonstrated his leadership abilities locally,<sup>2</sup> to acquire a sizeable following willing to support him in almost any political endeavor. The Venezuelan people, moreover, have been disposed to turbulence and excitement in their political life, and they have always been ready to utilize force and violence to achieve their ends.<sup>3</sup> Psychological factors such as these have been partly responsible for creating a political climate conducive to the growth of executive supremacy.

<sup>1</sup> This tendency is by no means peculiar to Venezuela. See William L. Schurz, Latin America (New York, 1949) and Cecil Jane, Liberty and Despotism in Spanish America (Oxford, 1929) for a discussion of the trait as it appears generally in Latin America. The Venezuelan sociologist, Carlos Siso, in his La Formación del Pueblo Venezolano, 2 vols. (Caracas, 1951), Vol. 2, argues that even in the bloody struggle that marked the federal war in the middle of the 19th century thousands of men identifying themselves only with leaders, died without being aware of the cause for which they were fighting.

<sup>2</sup> See William S. Stokes, "Violence as a Power Factor in Latin American Politics," Western Political Quarterly, Vol. 5, pp. 445-68 (Sept., 1952)

<sup>3</sup> Ramón David León, Hombres y Sucesos de Venezuela (Caracas, 1952), p. 15.

An examination of the milieu in which the acquisition and manipulation of national political power operate reveals three important elements: military influence, caudillismo,<sup>4</sup> and the philosophy of the democratic caesar (cesarismo democrático). All three were present as early as 1830 and were epitomized in a statement made at that time to the Venezuelan patriot, General Páez, by partisans who were advocating secession from the union with Colombia. "General," they said, "you are the fatherland." This declaration reflects as faithfully today as it did a century ago the outstanding characteristics of the attitude which has distinguished the relations between those who rule and those who follow in Venezuela.

The first of these factors, military influence, has been predominant in politics in Venezuela since the nation achieved independence in 1821. In the majority of cases the successful contender for the presidency was a man who had first demonstrated his power in regional military affairs. The roster of Venezuelan executives is notably lacking in men of a non-military status. Although it is true that in the 27-year rule of General Juan Vicente Gómez (1908-1935) several civilians occupied the presidency, they did so only with the acquiescence of Gómez, who tolerated no deviation from his wishes. Indeed, since 1894, only one civilian president has possessed real power in his own right. In 1947 the Venezuelan people elected Rómulo Gallegos to the presidency, by a plurality of 600,000 votes over the closest opposition candidate. Less than a year later the electorate saw him forced from office by a dissatisfied military clique, which announced that its greatest honor would be "... to demonstrate to the country that we know how to rule. . . ."<sup>5</sup>

Military affiliation and rank are still the most important assets in the politics of modern Venezuela.<sup>6</sup> The incumbent President, Marcos Pérez Jiménez, continues the strong military tradition. By a recent action of the Venezuelan Senate, he was promoted from the rank of Colonel to that of Brigadier <sup>4</sup> Derived from the Spanish word caudillo, the term encompasses all the phenomena associated with the caudillo. Roughly equivalent to our political boss, the caudillo is a person who possesses the real authority in a given area. He may be a government official, but as often as not he has no official connection with the government. See Stokes, op. cit.

<sup>5</sup> Gaceta Oficial, Jan. 3, 1949.

<sup>6</sup> The Venezuelan constitutionalist Ernesto Wolf, in his Tratado de Derecho Constitucional Venezolano, 2 vols. (Caracas, 1945), Vol. 1, p. 401, asserted that the title of general had come to be a necessity for the discharge of the duties not only of the presidency but also of most other high offices. From 1945 until June of this year, however, the highest active military rank was that of colonel. Military rank is no longer essential for "other high offices" and in Congress, at least, a change of emphasis from military to academic rank has occurred. In the Congress of 1873, for example, 19 of the 30 senators and 50 of the 70 deputies were generals. In the present Congress (1953 figures) there are no generals. Fifty-five per cent of the Senators and 32 per cent of the members of the Chamber of Deputies carry the academic title of Doctor. See Gaceta Oficial, April 17, 1953.

General.<sup>7</sup> He rose to power with Army support and remains in power today because of it, despite his "election" by the Constitutional Assembly in April, 1953.

The second important power factor is the concept of caudillismo. Prior to the Gómez era, the presidents of Venezuela were able to exercise power only by placating, conciliating, or destroying the numerous petty provincial and regional rivals. Skill and diplomacy backed by force were necessary prerequisites for men striving to become el presidente. Each of these men saw himself in the role of national redeemer, fighting a righteous war to release the people from the iniquities of those who governed. The political machine of Guzmán Blanco (1870-1888) was enduring and effective because he was astute enough to come to understandings with local chieftains instead of ignoring their demands or fighting them.<sup>8</sup>

Regional leaders received different treatment at the hands of Gómez, who made it a practice to subsidize the caudillos by providing them with sinecures, thereby cementing their loyalty to him personally. The virtual disappearance of strong local leaders does not mean that caudillismo is dead in Venezuela. It means merely that provincial chieftains have been replaced by men who owe their eminence in national politics to their ability to placate and juggle the various power groups within the Armed Forces. The best evidence of this new trend in politics can be found in the documents released by the Military Junta in 1949 in an attempt to justify its overthrow of the government the preceding year.<sup>9</sup>

The documents clearly show that all segments of the Armed Forces were represented in the conclaves that preceded the revolution. Following the successful outcome of the revolt, the military forces collectively assumed the sovereign power of the people and vested it in a military committee or junta. The power distribution in this instance was effected not on regional bases, but rather on national military bases. The three men who exercised power did so by formal agreement with and the tolerance of the other national military leaders. Subsequent events brought about various changes in the composition of the junta, but the power remained firmly in the hands of the Armed Forces, represented by the person of Marcos Pérez Jiménez.<sup>10</sup>

Although regionalism no longer plays the significant role in politics that it did prior to the Gómez regime, nevertheless one element of it lingers on in the dominant position of the Andean states in the national power structure. In the

<sup>7</sup> Under Venezuelan law only the Senate may promote officers of the Armed Forces above the rank of Lt. Colonel.

<sup>8</sup> See Charles C. Griffin, "Regionalism's Role in Venezuelan Politics," The Inter-American Quarterly, Vol. 3, pp. 21-35 (Oct., 1941).

<sup>9</sup> Documentos Oficiales Relativos al Movimiento Militar de 24 de Noviembre de 1948 (Caracas, 1949).

<sup>10</sup> In December, 1952 Pérez Jiménez dispensed with the committee form of government altogether and proclaimed himself Provisional President, even though his own newly-elected Constitutional Assembly, scheduled to meet in January, 1953, was charged with the task of electing a Provisional President.

last half-century, military elements in the Andean state of Táchira have furnished almost all of the rulers of Venezuela. Generals Castro (1903-1908), Gómez (1908-1935), López Contreras (1935-1941), and Medina Angarita (1941-1945) were natives of this state. It does not seem coincidental that the incumbent President is also a native son of Táchira.

The importance of the Andean region in politics is suggested in an interesting document ascribed to former President López Contreras.<sup>11</sup> In that paper a definite procedure was outlined for pressing the presidential candidacy of Pérez Jiménez in the elections of 1952. In the alleged opinion of López Contreras, Pérez Jiménez was the logical candidate for the high office. His election, Contreras argued, would fittingly round out 50 years of Andean rule. To this end he advised the candidate to launch his campaign in some central state and to end it in Táchira. He was cautioned, furthermore, to include prominent Andeans in his cabinet.

Andean pre-eminence in national politics has naturally given rise to bitterness and jealousy in the Venezuelan people, but so strong has been the power of that region that the people have been unable to take corrective action.<sup>12</sup>

The third factor that must be considered in an analysis of power factors in Venezuela is the philosophy of the democratic caesar, a doctrine made popular by Vallenilla Lanz during the regime of Gómez. In this era of "sonnets and sociology," it was only one of a number of efforts made by the supporters of Gómez to rationalize and justify his harsh dictatorship. The philosophy revolves around the premise that for Latin America dictatorship is not a necessary evil, but the ideal and appropriate form of government. The nature of the Venezuelan people, so the argument ran, excluded every system of government that was not a presidential dictatorship. Vallenilla Lanz asserted that the authority of the caudillo was founded on the "unconscious suggestion of the majority." He viewed Venezuelan society as made up of an unstable people who grouped themselves instinctively around wise, strong, and valiant men.<sup>13</sup>

The desire of Venezuela to separate from the Colombian union in 1826 was caused, Lanz says, by the attempt to substitute the impersonal prestige of the law for the personal prestige of the caudillo. The true character of Venezuelan democracy, according to the sociological school that espoused Lanz' doctrines, manifests itself in the predominance of a single individual sanctioned by the collective will of the people. In Venezuelan theories the democratic caesar always represents the popular sovereign. He is "... democracy personified, the nation made man. In him are synthesized those two antagonistic concepts: democracy and autocracy, that is to say, equality under a chief."<sup>14</sup> The democratic features of the various constitutions were the targets for the followers of

<sup>11</sup> Hispanic World Report, Vol. 2, pp. 17-19 (Dec., 1949).

<sup>12</sup> Ramón David León discusses this subject in his De Agro-pecuario a Petrolero (Caracas, 1944). See also the dedication in his Hombres y Sucesos de Venezuela (Caracas, 1952).

<sup>13</sup> Cesarismo Democrático (Caracas, 1929), p. 283.

<sup>14</sup> Ibid., p. 307.

this doctrine, who were for the most part contemptuous of the constitutions of the country because they contained republican principles. Lanz agreed with Bolívar that Venezuelan society did not contain the elements necessary for the success of such principles.<sup>15</sup> Another disciple of the school called democracy a "mystic doctrine" and declared it was giving way to a national desire to make one's country great by "... utilizing all its forces, organized to function harmoniously through the control which can be exercised only by a Supreme Dictator."<sup>16</sup>

In the more liberal political period which followed the death of Gómez, the influence of the philosophy decreased. There is today, however, a resurgence of the cesarismo doctrine in Venezuela. It does not take much imagination to read into the actions and methods of the present government much of the political dogma of the philosophy.<sup>17</sup> Certainly the cult of the hero is not dead, for evidence of it can be seen everywhere. Huge posters of the President are conspicuously displayed and constant adulatory references are made to him in the press and radio.<sup>18</sup> The complete absence of press criticism of the President and his government can be traced in part to stringent censorship and in part to the sedition law of 1926 making it a crime to offend the President in any manner either orally or in writing.

II. ELECTION OF THE PRESIDENT

Constitutional provisions dealing with the selection of the President of the Republic have varied. Since the turn of the century, however, the duty of choosing the chief executive has usually fallen to the Congress sitting as an electoral body. Congressional election of the President became an integral feature of the seven constitutions drafted under Gómez. His complete control of the Congress

<sup>15</sup> Ibid., p. 220.

<sup>16</sup> Pedro Manuel Arcaya, The Gómez Regime in Venezuela (Washington, D. C., 1936), p. 59.

<sup>17</sup> In a recent interview noted in Time (Feb. 28, 1955), p. 29, President Marcos Pérez Jiménez said, "I make every effort to give Venezuelans the kind of government adapted to them. . . . We are still in our infant years and we still need halters. . . . There must be a leader who shows the way without being perturbed by the necessity of winning demagogic popularity."

<sup>18</sup> It is extremely difficult to learn from public utterances what the people really think about their President. While he is in office, the outward attitude toward him is one of abject servility. But experiences of the past have taught the Venezuelan leaders that fame is fleeting when they have been relieved of their command. The memory, statues, and properties of Gómez were reviled, destroyed, and confiscated in an outbreak of violence following his death in 1935. Yet earlier in the same year a member of Congress referred to him in the following terms: "There always surges from the bosom of the people a superior man, a light who illumines the way to the promised land, a Moses who, with his magical wand can cause not only the water to gush from the rock, but the spirit of love and fraternity to spring from the human heart. For us this man, with a soul as lofty as the clouds of his native Andes, is Juan Vicente Gómez." Diário de Debates de la Cámara de Diputados (Caracas, 1935), No. 1.

and the state legislatures insured his election year after year; either to the presidency or to the office of his choice. His repeated nomination and election by the Congress was possible because he had eliminated the constitutional prohibition against re-election.

During his long regime attempts were made to justify most of his activities. Thus it was asserted that his favored principle of indirect election of the President was the most suitable method for Venezuela, taking into consideration the backward conditions of the masses. Supporters of indirect election argued that the people were not capable of exercising suffrage intelligently because, easily influenced by their natural instincts and lacking the power to distinguish or appreciate superior spirits, they were prone to elevate to power persons of their own level.<sup>19</sup>

Methods of indirect election other than the traditional one involving the Congress have been experimented with in Venezuela. They include election by a Federal Council, by municipal councils and state legislatures, and by an Electoral Body. Influenced by his study of the Swiss Council, Guzmán Blanco in 1881 had his Congress draft a new constitution to create a permanent Federal Council. Each of the nine states of the Union was represented in the Council by a senator and deputy who were elected from the membership of Congress. It was further stipulated that the Council would select one of its own members as President for a two-year term. Casually ignoring these precise constitutional instructions,<sup>20</sup> the Council proceeded to choose Guzmán Blanco, who was neither senator, deputy, nor member of the Federal Council, to succeed himself as President.

In 1901 the election of the President was removed one step further from the people when the electoral prerogative went to the municipal councils and the state legislatures. Under this arrangement the official state candidate was the person who received a majority of votes in the various municipal councils of the state. The duty of the state legislature was to ascertain who this person was and to transmit his name to the national Senate, where the state votes were counted. The man who received an absolute majority of these votes was declared President.

Still another variation of the council idea was the Electoral Body of 14 members, established by the Constitution of 1904. Each of the states (whose number by now had been arbitrarily increased to 13), as well as the Federal District, was represented by delegates chosen by Congress from its own membership for the express purpose of naming the President. The Electoral Body was free to name one of its own members, or it could look elsewhere. The Body was dissolved following the discharge of its task.

Election of the President by Congress was embraced as a principle in 1909 and continued to be standard procedure until 1947, when direct popular election was introduced.

<sup>19</sup> Luis Acosta Merlo, El Poder Ejecutivo (Caracas, 1917), pp. 24-25.

<sup>20</sup> Constitution of 1881, Article 62: The Federal Council elects the President of the United States of Venezuela from its own membership. . . . The election of any person not a member of the Council is null and void.

Although the constitutions of Venezuela repeatedly have affirmed that the governmental system is based, among other things, on the alternative principle, the history of Venezuela demonstrates that real alternative government, that is, change of leadership, has been generally achieved, not through peaceful means, but through force and violence. The Supreme Court in 1940 finally brought theory into line with practice when it said that "... in our public law renovation or alternabilidad of the public powers implies renovation of command and not of persons."<sup>21</sup>

The bloody revolution of 1945 stemmed in some measure from the widespread feeling among the political opposition that President Medina Angarita would resort to imposición or the presidential practice of exerting subtle pressure on Congress to elect as his successor a man of his own choice. In view of the fact that Medina's political party completely controlled the Congress, the opposition was rightly pessimistic about the possibility of electing its candidate.<sup>22</sup> It was under these circumstances that the major opposition party, Acción Democrática, turned a willing ear to Army overtures and joined in the revolt against Medina's government. It was a foregone conclusion that the Constitutional Assembly elected in 1946 under the auspices of the Junta Revolucionaria (the committee of military officers and Acción Democrática men who ruled Venezuela following the revolt) would eliminate the provisions which had prevented their bringing about a change of leadership by legal peaceful means. The Assembly duly wrote the principles of direct, universal, and secret suffrage for public officials into the constitution. In 1947, therefore, Venezuela elected a President directly for the first time in its history. The result was an overwhelming, but shortlived, victory for Acción Democrática and its candidate, Rómulo Gallegos.

The same principles of election were reaffirmed in the 1953 constitution. Yet the members of the Constitutional Assembly, acting under a transitional clause appended to the constitution, reverted once more to indirect election to name Provisional President Marcos Pérez Jiménez as Constitutional President.<sup>23</sup> The transitory provisions, under which the Constitutional Assembly assumed the right to organize the public power for a five-year period in violation of the document it had just written, gives evidence of what can happen when a strong executive is backed by a subservient majority party.

It would be foolish to predict the future of the direct election principle, in view of the fact that the will of the people, clearly expressed in the 1947 election, was set aside in such a short time. The opportunity to test its application will not arise again until 1958, if the present constitution and regime endure that long. Meanwhile, Venezuela is governed completely by men who owe their election, not to the electorate, but to an Assembly selected for the express purpose of writing a constitution.<sup>24</sup>

<sup>21</sup> Memoria de la Corte Federal y de Casación, 2 vols. (Caracas, 1941), Vol. 1, p. 198.

<sup>22</sup> Medina's party and Acción Democrática had both agreed on the same man, Señor Escalante. When illness forced Escalante to retire from the race, Medina nominated Angel Biaggini, former Minister of Agriculture. This man was totally unacceptable to A.D.

<sup>23</sup> The Constitutional Assembly also chose all the members of the National Congress, the state legislatures, and the municipal councils, a total of 1,802 men, plus an equal number of substitutes.

III. THE INFLUENCE OF THE EXECUTIVE IN CONSTITUTIONAL REFORM

Venezuela has had 24 constitutions since independence. They have been written and discarded with such frequency that Venezuelans cynically refer to them as "little yellow books which are made every year and broken every day."<sup>25</sup>

This large number of constitutions can be attributed in part to the resort to violence to bring about political change. The fundamental laws of 1858, 1864, 1901, 1904, 1947, and 1953 were produced by constitutional assemblies convoked by the victors following the successful outcome of a revolt. The remaining number, and even those mentioned above, were motivated to some extent by the personal wishes of the strong man in government. Indeed, one of Venezuela's most eminent historians declared that the principal weakness of the Venezuelan constitutions lay in the fact that they were nothing more than responses to the whims of el presidente.<sup>26</sup>

The present pattern for amending the constitution was established in 1893. The document of that year stipulated that either Congress or three-fourths of the state legislatures in ordinary session could take the initiative in proposing amendments. Prior to this time, only states could initiate amendments. The procedure to be followed was that used in enacting laws. When the initiative came from Congress, approval by three-fourths of the states was necessary. If, on the other hand, Congress acted favorably on a matter proposed by the states, ratification by two-thirds of the states would suffice.

When one considers the dominant influence of the executive in government, it becomes clear that the provisions which permitted the Congress to initiate amendments lent themselves readily to manipulation by all-powerful presidents. The requirement of ratification by the states presented no real obstacle to frequent executive tampering with the constitution. The 1874 document, for example, was drafted by the national Congress upon the request of all 20 states. The Congress in 1881 submitted a draft project of a new constitution to the states at the request of President Guzmán Blanco. The states in turn unanimously requested the Congress to adopt all the amendments suggested by the dictator. The 1922, 1925, 1928, 1929, and 1931 constitutions of Gómez were approved unconditionally by all of the states of the Venezuelan union.<sup>27</sup> The unanimity with which the states have repeatedly accepted presidentially-inspired reforms clearly indicates that they have been powerless to check the impulses of the executive.

<sup>24</sup> The office of the vice-presidency has had a chequered history in Venezuela. Abolished by the constitution of 1864, the institution was later reintroduced in 1904, when two vice-presidencies were created. Vice-President Juan Vicente Gómez soon demonstrated how the post could be used as a springboard to power, when he seized control of the government in 1908 during the absence abroad of the legal President. As Chief Executive, Gómez took immediate action to eliminate the office through which he himself had illegally come to power. Later, however, possessed by dynastic ambitions and feeling himself in absolute control of the government, he instructed his docile 1922 constitutional congress to restore the dual vice-presidency and to elect to the posts his brother and one of his many sons. Following the assassination of the brother and the disgrace of his son, he abolished the institution once more. It has never been restored.

<sup>25</sup> Wolf, Tratado de Derecho Constitucional Venezolano (cited in note 6), Vol. 1, p. 315.

<sup>26</sup> José Gil Fortoul, Filosofía Constitucional (Caracas, 1940), p. 12.

The proliferation of Venezuelan constitutions does not mean that they have differed radically from one another. Indeed, with one or two exceptions, notably that of 1947, they are greatly similar. It is customary in Venezuela to promulgate a new charter each time an amendment, however minor, takes place. The new document therefore differs from its predecessor only in the deletion or addition of certain sections or perhaps in new wording.

Within this framework of constitutional development, it is instructive to examine more closely the influence of the President in the process of amending the basic law of the land. A subservient Congress and controlled state legislatures have given the executives a blank check for all the changes they desire. Gómez, in his capacity either as Chief of the Army or as President, was personally responsible for seven constitutions. Following the cóltepe de estado of December 19, 1908, by which he ousted the legal President, he shrewdly used his powers as Chief of State to dictate a new constitution. In this way he forced the Congress and state legislatures to legalize his regime and caused the Congress to install him as Provisional President. During the four-month interval between his seizure of power and his election as Constitutional President, Gómez set about organizing the Republic in his own interests. A serious challenge to his power occurred in 1913, when deposed President Castro made an attempt to regain his office. Gómez personally took the field against him and defeated him.

Perhaps it was Gómez' desire to remain free to combat such insurgents and at the same time to retain his hold on the presidency that led to the curious performance in 1914. In that year Gómez discarded the 1909 constitution and presented his Congress of "plenipotentiary deputies" with a Provisional Constitutional Statute, which they promptly adopted. Such a singular method of amending the constitution was without precedent in Latin America. A puppet of Gómez, Márques Bustillos, was elected Provisional President under its terms. The Statute suppressed the Council of Government<sup>28</sup> and created in its stead the office of Commander-in-Chief of the National Army for the duration of the provisional government. The Commander-in-Chief was entrusted with powers ordinarily vested in the President, such as those dealing with the reorganization and command of the Armed Forces. The Congress elected Gómez to this post. The purpose of this wily maneuver became clear when the same body proclaimed a new constitution two months later in which the clause against re-election was eliminated. The Congress was then free to re-elect Gómez for a seven-year term. Appended to the constitution was a transitory provision which revealed a more subtle purpose of the Provisional Statute. Two articles are in point:

<sup>27</sup> See Ulises Picón Rivas, Índice Constitucional de Venezuela (Caracas, 1944) for a discussion of the various constitutions and their backgrounds.

<sup>28</sup> The Council of Government had been established in accordance with the constitution of 1893. It was composed of nine members, one from each state, elected by Congress for four-year terms. It had both deliberative and consultative functions.

Art. 137. The Provisional President of the Republic . . . will exercise his office until the new constitutional officers take possession of their posts . . .

Art. 138. The Commander-in-Chief of the National Army will continue in his office until the Constitutional President of the Republic takes possession of his office and meanwhile the Provisional President will exercise in accord with the Commander-in-Chief the powers set forth in Articles 22, 23, 24, 25 and 70 of this constitution.

Under the terms of these articles, Gómez, who had been elected Commander-in-Chief under the Provisional Statute and Constitutional President under the 1914 Constitution, was free to choose which office he cared to exercise. Instead of assuming the presidency, however, he continued in his military post and vigorously set about organizing the defenses of the country. During the next seven years, therefore, Venezuela had the unique experience of having a Provisional President performing the functions of a Constitutional President-elect who did not choose to assume the office, but who nevertheless exercised all of its powers. In 1922 Gómez resumed open control of the destinies of the nation as President under a new constitution which combined once more the office of the presidency with that of Commander-in-Chief.

Presidentially-inspired changes are abundant in his 1925 constitution. Previous charters had forbidden presidential absences from Caracas for more than 25 days. This restriction irritated Gómez, who preferred to live in the city of Maracay. It was therefore deleted. In part, the 1925 document stemmed from the dictator's desire to find a formula for presidential appointment of state governors without destroying the form of a federal system. The solution appeared in clause 27 of Article 100. In that section the Chief Executive was empowered to exercise those state powers which the states in their several constitutions might delegate to him. The states thereupon obediently and docilely delegated to Gómez the right to appoint their governors. In spite of several attempts since then, they have never recovered the prerogative of electing their own executives.

Alterations in the fundamental law in response to presidential orders are not restricted to the Gómez constitutions. They can be found in almost all Venezuelan constitutions. The 1857 changes were occasioned by the desire of President José Tadeo Monagas to extend his term beyond the legal limit. Under his tutelage the 1830 prohibition against re-election was eliminated, and the President's term of office was extended from four to six years. It has been alleged that this act initiated the custom of legalizing usurpations of power through the simple device of revising the constitution. Certainly it has caused Venezuela to fluctuate ever since between "anarchical tumult and despotic order."<sup>29</sup>

Still further evidence of personalismo is contained in the 1874 revision modifying the federal document of 1864. The reforms of this period were written into law at the express suggestion of President Guzmán Blanco. Although the term of office was reduced from four to two years, the principal reason for amending the constitution appears to have been the institution of the controlled vote, whereby electors were obliged to sign and deposit their ballots in the presence of election officials.

The most recent example of presidential influence in bringing about constitutional change can be found in the drafting of the 1953 document. The only draft brought before the Constitutional Assembly was that written by the leading members of the President's party in cooperation with the executive branch of the government. This party, the Independent Electoral Front, and its affiliates dominated the Assembly and were instrumental in strengthening the powers both of the President and of the central government. One result of the labors of the Assembly was to end once and for all the fiction that the states possessed the right to elect their own executives, a right which passed unconditionally to the national executive. Powers of the state legislatures and municipal councils were curtailed and their sources of revenue drastically reduced.

This recitation of presidential influence in constitutional development does not exhaust the list by any means, but it is long enough to lend support to the thesis that many of the changes have had their origin in nothing more than the individual will of the President.

IV. PRESIDENTIAL POWERS

Extent of Presidential Powers. The powers which the President of Venezuela has exercised in the past and may exercise today in an almost unlimited fashion are indeed extensive. Chapter III of the 1953 constitution, which deals with executive powers, divides them into three categories: those which the President possesses in his Council of Ministers; those exercised by him through his individual ministers; and those which belong exclusively to him. This is a purely formal division which has little practical meaning because the President has complete control over his ministers. It may be said, therefore, that he is in unrestricted possession of all three categories of powers.

In his Council of Ministers, the President may call extra sessions of Congress; issue and revise administrative regulations; create, suppress, or modify public services; conclude treaties, contracts, or agreements with other states; decree additional credits to the budget; and initiate actions against officials in the government who give cause.

<sup>29</sup> Ambrosia Perero, Historia Orgánica de Venezuela (Caracas, 1943), p. 147. See also W. S. Robertson, History of the Latin American Nations (N. Y., 1922), p. 410, and Picón Rivas, Índice Constitucional de Venezuela (cited in note 26), pp. 45-46.

Through his individual ministers, the President's power extends to the administration of the national fiscal system; the direction of foreign relations; the nomination and removal of state governors and all other national employees whose appointment is not entrusted by the Constitution to other officials; the administration of territories and national dependencies; the establishment of standards for the utilization of the income of the states and the coordination of state budgets with that of the national; the negotiation of loans and the making of contractual agreements.

By himself the President may name and remove the ministers of the Cabinet; reserve any portfolio for himself, and delegate his powers to the minister of his choice; attach to his executive office any public service he deems convenient; declare war and negotiate peace when Congress so decrees; direct war, exercise those state powers delegated to him by the states in their respective constitutions, and exercise all other powers which the constitution and ordinary law vest in him.

In times of national or international emergency, moreover, the President, together with his ministers, may suspend the constitutional guarantees, either totally or in part, with the exception of the prohibition against the death penalty.

These powers taken in the aggregate bestow a tremendous grant of authority on the President and completely overshadow the paltry grants to the Congress. If there is any one section of the constitution which can be said to reflect the reality of modern Venezuelan politics, it is that dealing with executive powers.

Exercise of the Presidential Powers. In the abnormal situation brought about by the suspension of a constitution and the automatic dissolution of state and national legislative bodies which this entails, the executive has resorted to decree law to carry on the functions of government. In times of institutional normality, the President does not have to rely on decrees for ordinary law because his control of Congress is such that his legislative proposals encounter no resistance. In most matters he prefers to demonstrate his respect for the precepts of the constitution by working through his Congress. Even the strongest dictators of Latin America "... generally share the colonial Spaniard's awe of the letter of the law."<sup>30</sup>

Although the main body of Venezuelan law rests upon legislation duly passed by Congress, the President has been able to effect far-reaching and major governmental changes without consulting Congress. His power to do so comes from such constitutional clauses as those giving him the right to establish or abolish new public services. He has had a free hand in such important matters as the creation of new executive departments.<sup>31</sup> The Ministries of Agriculture and

<sup>30</sup> Schurz, Latin America (cited in note 1), p. 122.

<sup>31</sup> Other matters which seem more properly within the scope of the legislature have also been subject to executive action. Specific examples include the organizational laws

Livestock and Health and Social Assistance were created by executive decrees of López Contreras in 1936, just as the Ministries of Justice and Mines and Hydrocarbons were established by decrees of the Junta in 1950.

Apart from the more common use of the decree as a regulatory and implementing device, the power is frequently used by the President to provide additional credits to various sections of the departmental budgets.<sup>32</sup> In practice, the discretionary power which the executive enjoys with respect to the expenditure of public funds depends solely on whether the revenue received during the year is larger than that anticipated in the budget. Through his power to decree additional monies, the President in 1936 and 1937, for example, authorized additional expenditures totalling 40 per cent of the original budget. Similar figures can be cited for almost every year since that time.

Until 1945 the major portion of the additional funds was assigned to Chapter Seven of the budget of the Ministry of Interior Relations. Chapter Seven was devoted to "extraordinary expenditures of public service as they occur." This extremely elastic clause was allegedly used by Gómez as a source of generous gifts to his family and friends. Concerning the use of the Chapter, one Venezuelan authority critically comments that, although governments of every country provide secret funds for extraordinary expenditures, Venezuela exceeds them all. Chapter Seven, he argues, served to cover inadmissible expenses of public funds for purposes and ends that had no official justification.<sup>33</sup> The Technical Economic Commission supported this contention when it concluded that "without a doubt, a considerable part of the program to which these large sums were destined was formulated hastily, planned insufficiently and extravagantly, and thus did not reach their proper end."<sup>34</sup>

In the period 1914-1942, a total of 1,714 additional credits were decreed by the President in the amount of approximately $32 million dollars. This sum represents a 20 per cent increase over the budgeted figures during the same period. Of this amount, 579 credits totaling about 41 million dollars were allotted to the account of Chapter Seven. It has proved impossible to account for the money spent, since it was customary to credit the funds in a lump sum without specifying details relative to their expenditure or control.

In numerous instances the executive made additional funds available to various departments within a matter of days after Congress had enacted a new budget.

---

of the newly nationalized judicial system and the social security system. The vast Centro Bolívar project in the Center of Caracas and the fantastically expensive superhighway from Caracas to La Guaira both owe their existence to executive decrees.

<sup>32</sup> Additional credits to the budget began in 1914, when Gómez included the power in the constitution of that year, presumably because of the disturbance and emergencies which he thought World War I would bring to Venezuela. The power was not discontinued when the war ended.

<sup>33</sup> Ramón David León, De Agro Pecuario a Petrolero (cited in note 12), p. 142.

<sup>34</sup> A. M. Fox et al., Informe presentado al Sr. Ministro de Hacienda de los E.E.U.U. (Venezuela por la Misión Técnica y Económica (Caracas 1941), p. 42.

Chapter Seven had become so notorious by 1945 that one of the first acts of the Junta Revolucionaria was to abolish it. There seems to be no reason to conclude, however, that conditions have changed much. Indeed, a Special Reserve Fund has replaced the infamous Chapter Seven as an instrument of executive power.

Large cash surpluses accumulate in the Venezuelan treasury as a result of the governmental practice of underestimating the national revenue. Since 1944 the President, acting upon data supplied by the Minister of Finance, has had the power to transfer these surpluses from the Treasury to the Special Reserve Fund.<sup>25</sup> It is from this Fund that the President may now decree expenditures of sums not authorized in the budget. At the present time the power of the executive in this respect is less fettered than at any other time in the past. Although the 1945 constitution specified that money had to be available and the expenditure necessary, the 1953 constitution does not impose these conditions. Nor does it specify that the expenditures have to be submitted to Congress for its approval, as was the case in preceding documents.<sup>26</sup> The Congress therefore possesses no effective power of the purse.

The limitations on the ends to which the Special Reserve Fund may be used are those which the executive himself sets up in his budget decrees. Article Four of the 1953-54 budget stipulates that the money of the Fund can be applied only to financing extraordinary works of public utility, to increasing the tempo of works already underway, and "for ends of fiscal compensatory policies when they may be considered beneficial to national interests." In view of the fact that the sole judges of these conditions are the President and his Council of Ministers, it would appear that the restrictions exist only insofar as these officials choose to respect them. It is clear, too, that the Special Reserve Fund is a source of tremendous power for the President and that in the hands of unscrupulous men it could be the means of great personal enrichment.

Because the government steadfastly adheres to the principle of a balanced budget and because it always spends more than it plans, recourse to the constitutional power of the President to decree additional credits has been necessary. Discussing the use of the device, the Technical Economic Mission saw no justification for the practice of consistently underestimating national income and expenditures. In the opinion of the Mission "... all the ordinary and periodical expenses are well known at the very moment the budget is prepared."<sup>27</sup>

<sup>25</sup> See, for example, the Gaceta Oficial for April 4 and June 7, 1952 for transfers of 30 million and 70 million bolívares, respectively.

<sup>26</sup> In practice the requirement of congressional approval for additional credits was of no importance. Congress, in recess the greater part of the year, was prevented from giving previous authorization. When it reconvened, it was presented with accomplished fact. The obligation of the President to prove the need for the additional sums was met by his sending the Congress the Gaceta Oficial in which the decree granting the credit appeared. See Wolf, Tratado de Derecho Constitucional Venezolano, Vol. 2, p. 275.

<sup>27</sup> Fox, et. al., op. cit., p. 272.

Another common use of the decree power of the President relates to the creation of the organisms known as "autonomous institutes." These are institutions established and regulated by federal law possessing definite legal personalities and their own property, distinct and independent from the national Treasury. The presidents of Venezuela have made repeated use of their legal power to create these institutes.<sup>38</sup> The establishment of these quasi-governmental bodies involves an initial investment of large sums of public money and the appointment of administrative personnel. Given the nature of the government in Venezuela, there can be no doubt that the personal influence and power of the President increase each time he adds a new service to the executive branch of the government.

One further use of the decree power should be noted. Like many other Latin American executives, the Venezuelan President has the constitutional power to suspend individual guarantees, either totally or in part, when in his opinion and that of the Council of Ministers situations arise which create or could create national or international emergencies. The 1947 constitution limited the President in this respect insofar as it required him to submit the suspension decree with his reasons to Congress within ten days of its promulgation. The 1953 charter does not bind him with such a limitation. It must be assumed, therefore, that legal requirements are satisfied when the President discusses the matter in his annual report to Congress.

The power to suspend individual rights is an effective political weapon in the hands of the presidents who have used it to protect their regimes from possible overthrow. Limitations placed on the guarantees in times of unrest and revolt or following violent changes in power have had a paralyzing effect on the political life of the nation. The curtailment of civil liberties in 1928, 1942, 1943, 1945, 1948, and 1950 affected, among other things, the inviolability of home and mail, records and account; liberty of travel; freedom of speech, press, and assembly; freedom from arbitrary arrest and the right not to be held incommunicado. In spite of the fact that the 1953 constitution contains ample guarantees of civil liberty, the citizens of Venezuela do not at present enjoy it in full measure, for the restrictive decrees of 1948 and 1950 have never been completely rescinded.

V. EXECUTIVE-LEGISLATIVE RELATIONS

Vis-à-vis the President, the Congress has been called an "assembly of employees" whose initiative extends mainly to erecting statues or approving degrees of honor or additional titles to the President, "... in other words to proclaim[ing] to the face of the earth their absolute submission to him who names them, gives them lucrative employment, and humors them when they ask for something."<sup>39</sup>

<sup>38</sup> Among those recently established are the Venezuelan Development Corporation, the National Institute of Sanitary Works, the Venezuelan Airmail Line, the National Agrarian Institute, the Institute of University City, and the Central Institute of Social Insurance.

Wolf elaborates on this theme and offers as a partial explanation for the failure of Congress to achieve its rightful place in the scheme of government the fact that it is composed largely of public officials. In spite of clear constitutional prohibitions, public officials of all categories run for office in the national Congress. Senators and deputies circumvent the restriction by resigning temporarily from their other government posts. Their replacements clearly understand, of course, that these officials will return to their jobs when the sessions are over.<sup>40</sup> Taking into consideration the fact that the President appoints employees of the national government, and that state workers are named by the governor, who is himself an appointee of the President, it seems reasonable to conclude that any claim to independence on the part of the legislature is meaningless as long as this situation exists.<sup>41</sup>

The subservience of Congress to the executive is said to date from 1848, when President Monagas, in answer to a congressional attempt to impeach him, instigated mob action that led to the death of three deputies in the halls of the Capitol. It has been asserted that as a result of this action "... constitutional government in Venezuela was sacrificed, the legislature was made subservient to the executive, and law became dictatorial fiat."<sup>42</sup>

Venezuelan students of government generally agree that the main role of the legislature has been to enact into law, speedily and without modification, all proposals that come to it from the executive branch. Gómez' proposals were always translated into law exactly as they came from the dictator.<sup>43</sup> Since then, the power to initiate legislation has become almost exclusively an executive function. Although most of the recent constitutions have said that "laws may be initiated in either of the two legislative chambers by members of either or by the national executive power," the majority of bills originate in the executive departments. Recommendation by the President is enough to insure their passage. In the formulation of bills and particularly in the preparation of the budget, little attention is given to the wishes of individual legislators.

<sup>39</sup> R. Seijas, El Presidente (Caracas, 1891), p. 53.

<sup>40</sup> Wolf, Tratado de Derecho Constitucional Venezolano (cited in note 6), Vol. 1, p. 316.

<sup>41</sup> An effective civil service system does not exist. In the absence of standards and criteria for the selection and employment of personnel, the possibility of an individual's obtaining a government job varies in direct proportion to the strength of his kinship or friendship with the employing official. Or, as the Venezuelans say, "Fulano es amigo." The personalismo which pervades the government creates an atmosphere in which personal loyalty to the President or to his immediate subordinates constitutes the prime requirement for securing and holding a job. See Enrique Tejera, Los Empleados Públicos (Caracas, 1945), passim.

<sup>42</sup> W. H. Pierson, "Foreign Influence on Venezuelan Political Thought, 1830-1930," Hispanic American Historical Review, Vol. 15, pp. 3-42, at p. 18 (Feb., 1935).

<sup>43</sup> One Gomecista member of Congress, after the death of the dictator, was stung by criticism on this point. "Everyone knows," he said, "that orders accompanied every bill not to change so much as a comma." Cited in Wolf, Vol. 1, pp. 315-16.

This state of affairs led the Senate in 1945 to instruct its Committee on Public Finance to study ways and means by which the senators could compel the President to consider their financial wishes when the budget was being prepared. The Senate resolution went so far as to demand that the President give his reasons for failing to consider congressional recommendations in the budget. The Committee was astute enough to recognize the demand as unrealistic and informed the Senate that no way could be devised to fasten such an obligation on the President. The budgets are passed year after year with no modification or with very insignificant changes. In the light of the evidence, it appears that Congress can neither collaborate effectively with the executive nor control his expenditures. Indeed, the 1953 constitution specifies that the budget submitted by the President will go into force on July 1 of each year whether or not it has been approved by Congress. Such a provision makes a complete mockery of congressional control of the purse.

Further evidence of legislative deference to the executive lies in the automatic approval which the Congress unfailingly gives to the annual administrative reports which the President, his Cabinet, and the Supreme Court are required by the constitution to deliver to it. These officials appear in person before a joint session of Congress. The tremendous size of some of the reports and the speed with which they are approved indicate that for the Congress approval is a mere formality.<sup>44</sup> Certainly it makes no effort to analyze the contents, and almost never are the reports criticized. On the contrary, extravagant and flowery praise is usually heaped upon the President. The approval accorded to the report of Provisional President Marcos Pérez Jiménez in 1953 is typical. Doing little more than rephrase the contents of the President's message, the Assembly declared that it had reached the conclusion that Armed Forces overthrow of the government in 1948 was fully justified. The Provisional President was congratulated upon his conduct of the affairs of the nation during the four-year period in which Congress was not in existence.

The Veto Power. The veto power of the President of Venezuela is in many respects similar to that of the President of the United States. It is more extensive, however, in that it includes the item veto. The pocket veto, on the other hand, is unknown in Venezuela. In the extremely unlikely event that Congress should defy the President by passing a bill over his veto, the President must promulgate the law within five days or raise the issue of constitutionality and send it to the Supreme Court. The Court has ten days in which to rule on the validity of the law. If the statute is upheld, the President has no choice but to sign the bill into law within five days. Such an elaborate procedure has no practical meaning whatever, since the Congress rarely acts on any legislation that does not have its origin in the executive branch of the government. In any event, the Congress does not pass legislation which would displease the President.

<sup>44</sup> The 1953 Constitutional Assembly, in the midst of preparing a new constitution, approved the entire lot, some of which ran to five bulky volumes, in two weeks.

VI. ADMINISTRATION

Presidential powers are formally exercised through the media of two executive institutions: the Cabinet and the Council of Ministers. Actually, these bodies are practically identical in personnel. "Cabinet" is the term used to designate the heads of the executive departments in their individual capacities.<sup>45</sup> The Council of Ministers, on the other hand, refers to the formal meeting of these officials under the chairmanship of the President. As has been mentioned above, the chief executive may use certain of his powers only with the concurrence of the Council of Ministers.

Rightly or wrongly, one may surmise that a legal limitation of this kind indicates a desire by the constitutional assemblies to restrain the executive in the use of the extensive powers granted to him. A closer scrutiny of the pertinent articles, however, reveals an inconsistency which, it can be argued, defeats the purpose of such an arrangement. Two articles are in point:

Article 111. The Ministers are the legal organs of the President of the Republic.

Article 115. The written order of the President of the Republic will not excuse a Minister from personal responsibility which he incurs through the illegal use of his powers.

If these stipulations mean anything, it is that the ministers are completely under the control of the President and have no more discretionary authority than he wishes to give them.<sup>46</sup> He does not countenance contrary opinions of his ministers, and members of his Cabinet who offend in this respect are quickly eliminated. The device by which this is accomplished is the well-established custom of mass resignation of the Cabinet. This action is always publicly held to be a voluntary and patriotic move designed to give the President a free hand to make the changes he deems necessary.<sup>47</sup> The dismissal of a minister is never made openly. In the majority of instances Cabinet resignation en masse has been followed by reappointment of most of the ministers, either to their former posts or to different portfolios.

Such changes in Cabinet personnel have been fairly frequent since 1936, over thirty reorganizations having occurred since January of that year. Only <sup>45</sup> In 1954, for the avowed purpose of promoting greater administrative efficiency, the Congress authorized the President to divide the highest official agencies into three groups: National Policy, Production, and General Service. The National Policy Group includes the Office of the President, and the departments of Defense, Foreign Relations, Interior, and Treasury. Production comprehends the Ministries of Agriculture and Livestock, Mines and Hydrocarbons, Public Works and Labor. General Services is in charge of Justice, Health and Social Welfare, Communications and Education. Under this division the National Policy Group is responsible for general administration; Production concerns itself with the national development of the country's physical conditions; and General Service has the responsibility of advancing the moral, intellectual, and material wellbeing of the people. See Venezuela Up-to-Date, Vol. 5, p. 3 (June, 1954).

<sup>46</sup> Time, Feb. 28, 1955, p. 28 alleges that Pérez Jiménez "demands plenty of action, but he rarely needs or wants suggestions from his cabinet. He treats the ministers as a team of technicians; their two-hour Saturday sessions are brisk and businesslike."

<sup>47</sup> Wolf, Vol. 1, p. 415.

ten have involved major changes, however.<sup>48</sup> Wolf's complaint that a minister scarcely had time to familiarize himself with his job before he was removed is less valid today than it was in 1945. Since that date the tendency has been to retain capable ministers for an increasingly longer period of time.

Although the 1953 constitution does not specifically declare that ministers must enforce presidential decrees (as had been the case in previous charters), the existence of such an obligation is clearly implied in Article III. Constitutional restrictions on the employment of various presidential powers except through the medium of the Council of Ministers give rise to the ambiguous situation in which the minister is technically the colleague of the President in the Council of Ministers, but his subordinate in the Cabinet.

VII. SUMMARY AND CONCLUSIONS

The institutional authoritarianism which has characterized Venezuelan politics during its independent life continues in full force and vigor today. The concept of executive dominance expressed in such ideas as cesarismo democrático and the hierarchical structure of the executive branch make it possible for the influence and power of the national executive to extend to all levels of government and facilitate the implementation of the wishes and orders of el presidente. The Congress elects the judges of the Supreme Court from among men known to be sympathetic to the President and his program. The Supreme Court in turn selects the inferior judges from lists presented to it by the President. District attorneys and prosecutors are appointed solely by him. The function of presidentially-appointed state governors is to see that nationally-determined policies and programs relating to the states are carried into effect in as efficient a manner as possible.

In all instances policy originates with the President. His Cabinet and Council of Ministers are in fact subordinate to him and act mainly in a consultative capacity. Nevertheless, their concurrence in decisions made solely by the President is useful in the sense that it gives the appearance of multilateral consideration to a unilateral decision. This is particularly true when a measure is contemplated about whose popularity there is some doubt.

The intimate connection between the Armed Forces and the government has contributed greatly to the growth of heavy-handed presidential control of all government activities. Army circles have always been extremely influential in Venezuelan politics, and military methods in reaching a decision and in implementing it have been utilized almost exclusively in designing governmental policy. Orderly development toward democratic government has been seriously retarded by the interference of the military in the governmental process. Indeed, it was dealt a severe blow when the Armed Forces in 1945 and 1948 abolished the Congress, state legislatures, and municipal councils.

<sup>48</sup> Four have occurred since the revolution of 1945. The changes in administration from López Contreras to Medina Angarita brought about completely new cabinets, of course. López was responsible for 12 more shuffles, in which he shifted men from one post to another. In a four-month period one minister occupied three different ministries before being eliminated altogether. López moved at least ten men from one portfolio to another. Reshuffling the Cabinet was most common during the terms of López and Medina Angarita. It was used infrequently by the provisional governments of 1945-47 and 1948-52. The present regime has made several changes.

Almost continuous military control of the government during the past 50 years and the fact that the present regime responds to the orders of a military President justify the prediction that the establishment of civil, responsible government in Venezuela is remote. It seems inconceivable that the Armed Forces, in their self-appointed role of saviors of Venezuela, will voluntarily relinquish their great political power. They may possibly permit some relaxation, but one may be sure that no regime will endure in which they do not have a weighty voice.

At the present time the Venezuelan military President and his political party control the national, state, and local units of government, and presumably they will remain in control until the expiration of their five-year term in 1958. At the end of that time a new electoral statute will almost certainly be promulgated. It seems probable that if the present regime is able to maintain its firm control, the provisions of the statute will be liberal. If there is political agitation in the country, it is altogether likely that an excuse will be found for not having elections at all. In any event, it appears highly unlikely that within the foreseeable future the Venezuelan people will be able to go to the polls in the expectation that their wishes will be respected. The orderly elections of 1947 and 1952 demonstrated that the people were ready for free, fair, and untrammelled elections and that they were both eager and capable of going about the process of choosing their leaders in peaceable fashion. It has therefore been discouraging for them to see their will flouted by men who, while proclaiming their steadfast devotion to the principles of democracy, have yet to demonstrate their respect for the democratic process. Violations of promises to honor the electoral results have disillusioned the Venezuelan people. The fiasco of their 1952 election endeavor and the alleged executive manipulations of the results have, without a doubt, dealt a blow to the growth of political maturity in Venezuela.

RESPONSES TO PLANNED POLITICAL CHANGE IN A TANGANYIKA TRIBAL GROUP*

J. GUS LIEBENOW, JR.

Northwestern University

The rapid succession in which independence or a large measure of self-government has been achieved by dependent territories in Africa has been one of the more striking political phenomena of the postwar period. It would be rash indeed to prophesy the total eclipse of colonialism in the modern world, for the situations obtaining in Eastern Europe and Southeast Asia, as well as the fears expressed by the Ashanti in the Gold Coast and the southern tribesmen in the Sudan regarding the shape of the independent state, can be indications that political dependency can be reasserted in new forms. Nevertheless, the brand of Western colonialism which reached its zenith prior to World War I appears to be drawing to a close, and in a number of instances the metropolitan power concerned is actually planning the liquidation of its empire.

The causes of this vaporization of colonialism in Africa are complex. In some cases the significant factor is rooted in international politics, as in the military defeat of Italy or the encouragement given by Arab and Asian states to rising nationalist groups. In other instances the financial position of the metropolitan country or the anti-colonial policy of a major political party has been the crucial factor. Of equal standing with these causal factors have been the developments taking place within the dependencies themselves since the beginning of World War II. A number of forces leading to the disintegration of the existing social order have been intensified in this period, and frequently the basis for reintegration has been found in a demand for self-government. Some of the forces of disintegration, such as the impact which Islam or Christianity has made on the traditional value system, have been long in developing. In this category, too, would belong the mixed reactions of the Africans to the presence of European settlers: on the one hand, imitating the new techniques in agriculture and animal husbandry, and on the other, resenting the alienation of relatively fertile land. It has, however, been the impact which the large-scale governmental programs in economic and social development have made on the dependencies that has accelerated the process of social disintegration.

The disintegration has had a number of common manifestations. In the first place, there has been a shift from the predominantly subsistence economy characteristic of most African dependencies to one approaching a cash economy. This has broken into the parochialism of the peasant cultivator, turning his attention from the economic unit based on the village or the kinship group towards larger units of economic organization—trade unions and cooperatives—and larger territorial units in which to dispose of his crops or services.

* This article is the result of a field study in Tanganyika during 1954, made possible through grants provided by the Social Science Research Council and the Program of African Studies, Northwestern University.

In some instances the new cash economy has upset social rankings by permitting peasant cultivators to purchase bicycles, pay their children's school fees, or acquire other benefits which had in the past been symbols of superior social rank. Moreover, the cash economy may also threaten the social station of those traditionally in control of the land. It does this either by emphasizing the importance of new forms of property, such as merchandizing, transport, and salary-earning skills, or by creating demands for private ownership of land.

A second feature of this disintegration has been the intensifying of role differentiation in the communities concerned. In many East African societies, for example, community role differentiation—apart from that which exists in the kinship groups—has been relatively slight. There may be a few individuals occupying distinct roles as chiefs, court elders, rain-makers, or blacksmiths; however, the majority of the people could be classified as "those who do the work of all," that is, cultivation, hunting, and animal husbandry. Under the impact of Christianity, formal education, and the recent development programs, new community roles have been added and old ones intensified. Thus, we witness the emergence of a new elite composed of teachers, priests, clerks, and medical assistants who are capable of granting or withholding community services and who have been anticipating a share in the respect, wealth, and political affairs of the community. Their emergence, in turn, has brought about a reaction from the traditional elite, which recognizes a threat to the existing order.

A third feature of postwar social disintegration has been the areal disparities in economic and social development within a given dependency. Thus, at the same time that the introduction of a cash crop is leading to the attainment of social cohesion within a larger territorial unit, it may also be contributing to the dissolution of historic tribal or regional cohesion or to the hardening of historic separatisms. Furthermore, just as individual Africans often regard their less-educated fellows with disdain, so also can a disparity in educational programs tend to result in a pejorative attitude on the part of a tribal group of superior education towards a tribal grouping which is largely illiterate.

While much of the social disintegration leading to demands for political reform has its roots in economic change, one must be wary of mono-factoral explanations. It may be that the economic changes in a territory are such that they (1) do not intensify community role differentiation but merely add the alternative generalized role of unskilled wage laborer, and (2) do not upset social rankings, because the benefits of economic change are largely retained by the existing elites. Cases in point might be the Portuguese territories in southern Africa and—outside Africa—the oil-rich Arab territories. Furthermore, even where the benefits are widely distributed in the form of health services and improved housing, and where the imparting of skills does lead to increased role differentiation, it may still be possible to control the type of education and external influences available to the new elites and thereby forestall demands for alteration in the political order. With many qualifying remarks about the overt use of force, motivations, and the nature of the control apparatus, this is substantially what has been happening in the Belgian Congo until recently and in the Communist dependencies of Europe and Asia.

It would appear that economic and social changes are more apt to lead to demands for alterations in the political order when the administering authority either actively encourages, or at least does not take effective steps to prevent, the occurrence of certain activities. These activities vary from case to case, but a tentative list might include: the formation of popular associations; the establishment of Western-type universities; permitting students and others to travel abroad or have easy access to foreign visitors; the introduction of a legal system which stresses protections for the individual; the purchase of radios; relatively uncontrolled distribution of foreign books and periodicals; and the introduction of representative political institutions at some level or for some group within the territory. Admittedly, the above list "stacks the cards" in favor of conditions usually met in British and, to a lesser extent, in French territories; however, it is precisely in the dependencies of these two powers that African independence movements have been succeeding. Nevertheless, the policies of these two powers present some sharp contrasts. France rejects independence as a goal for the African dependencies in favor of immediate equal membership in the French Union; yet, she refuses to take the steps necessary for making that political equality a reality. Britain, on the other hand, holds out the prospect of eventual membership in a Commonwealth of independent states and has been actively engaged in planning for that eventuality. One may question whether British motives are based on altruism, self-interest, financial necessity, or a combination of these. One may also question whether the plans undertaken are best calculated to achieve the stated ends. However, one can hardly question that plans are being put into operation in Tanganyika and other areas of British Africa which are making significant alterations in the political order of the dependencies concerned.

The degree of success which a metropolitan power may achieve in planning political change in a dependency is conditioned by a number of factors. One of these is the character of the dependency relationship itself; that is, whether the relationship was established and sustained through the use of overt force or through the acceptance by the dependent peoples of certain benefits accruing from the relationship. There is, furthermore, the question of whether the political goals sought are actually obtainable in view of the economic conditions or certain cultural values prevailing in the dependent society. Closely related to this is the problem of how the transformations are to be brought about: through the gradual modification of existing institutions or through a rapid introduction of new institutional patterns. The former approach may in certain cases be better calculated to capitalize on existing loyalties in securing adherence to the new goals. In other cases, however, the existing institutions may constitute enormities which are repudiated by the new elites and which thwart the attainment of new goals.

A further consideration involves the character of the agents who are to effectuate the change. Questions arise concerning their number, racial origins, familiarity with the local culture, and experience regarding the political system they are attempting to introduce. Much depends upon personal relationships, such as whether an attitude of intimacy or aloofness is required in dealing with the dependent people and whether the living style and social life of the agents divorce them from the local community. There is also the question of whether other individuals, such as settlers, priests, merchants, and private persons identified with the agents and the situation of dependency, may complicate the task of the agents in establishing rapport.

Finally, and probably most significant of all, there are the unplanned and—from the point of view of the goals sought—undesired responses on the part of the dependent people to the political alterations planned. Some of these responses may be the product of incompatibilities in the overall program of the administrators. Equally important, however, are the resistances which may be presented by the existing elites to the changes envisioned and the pressures of the new elites to accelerate the rate of change and divert the character of the change to forms more acceptable to them. It is this manifestation of selectivity that presents some of the greatest problems for political planners.

I. THE GENERAL CHARACTER OF SOCIAL CHANGE IN SUKUMALAND

The area selected to illustrate the problems of political planning is Sukumaland, which embraces five districts of the Trust Territory of Tanganyika. It includes within its confines over one million inhabitants, most of whom are Wasukuma. Although the Sukuma is the largest of Tanganyika's tribal groups, it constitutes only one-eighth of the Territory's total population and is but one of a polyglot mixture of over one hundred such groupings enumerated in the recent census. Consequently, events in Sukumaland can best be considered in the context of economic and social change and the administrative policy of Tanganyika as a whole.

During the period of German rule in East Africa (1885–1916), a certain amount of economic development had been carried out by way of rail and road construction and the introduction of cash crops. There was, however, a great areal disparity in development, with major efforts being concentrated on the accessible coastal strip or the fertile and healthful highlands areas around Kilimanjaro and Meru. Sukumaland, which occupies an inland position south of Lake Victoria and which had sleeping sickness, malaria, and recurrent periods of drought to offer the potential settler, missed many of the early effects of European contact. Moreover, unlike the Wachagga and other groups who resisted German rule and thus experienced closer administration during the period of pacification, the Wasukuma chiefs were in many instances openly friendly to the Germans. Consequently, the simple requirements of administration disturbed but slightly the existing social system. A similar paucity of contact obtained with respect to the activity of Christian missionaries, even though the White Fathers Order, the Moravians, and the American pastors and lay workers of the Africa Inland Missions early established themselves in Sukumaland. Here the extent of medical services was small and the educational facilities were open primarily to the sons of chiefs and others who could afford the expense.

The rate of economic development slackened considerably after the Germans surrendered the Territory in 1916. In fact, during the first three decades of British administration Tanganyika was referred to as the "Cinderella" of the Empire. Many officials attribute the lack of private or governmental investment to the uncertain political status of Tanganyika as a League of Nations Mandate. Whatever the reason, administrative efforts in that period constituted little more than holding operations, with available funds having to be diverted to combat the famine which followed the recurrent seasons of drought and locust invasions or to alleviate disruptions during the depression.

During the Second World War, despite the reductions in European staff, the economic situation in Tanganyika began to alter considerably. The increased demands of the armed forces for cotton, sisal, cattle, and other products of Tanganyika led to an increase in the cash character of the Territory's economy. Economic changes were further intensified in the postwar period by the programs undertaken with funds from the United Kingdom's Colonial Development and Welfare Act. For the Sukuma economic system these events constituted somewhat of a "shock treatment," with the acceleration of cotton production being the prime factor. Prior to the war, agricultural production was largely subsistence in character. Cattle, of which the Wasukuma have close to a million head, played a significant role in neither a subsistence nor a cash economy; rather, as is true of many other groups in East Africa, cattle were a feature of the prestige economy and figured prominently in rites connected with birth, marriage, and burial. The attitude towards cattle has resulted in a mixed reaction on the part of the Wasukuma to the administration's economic programs. With regard to cotton, legumes, and other cash crops, they have needed only slight encouragement to increase cultivation, and it is from these sources that the bulk of the new prosperity is derived. One increment in the new prosperity, however, is received largely with reluctance. This is the income derived from the sale of cattle, many of which are sold as part of the compulsory destocking program. From a technical standpoint, destocking can be justified as a soil conservation and animal husbandry measure; nevertheless, the cultural values associated with the ownership of cattle persist, and destocking has presented a source of discontent among the more conservative peasants which has been utilized by popular leaders in their campaign against the existing political order.

Concomitant with changes on the economic front which were adding new groups of wealthy cotton growers, small traders, and transporters to the Sukuma communities, changes were also taking place with regard to educational and social service programs of the government. Again leaving aside the question of British motivations, it can be noted that these programs have done much to raise the standard of living of the people of Tanganyika. In Sukumaland, for example, good progress has been made in the eradication of malaria, bilharzia, and other endemic diseases. Through grants to local authorities or the missions, the government has come close to achieving its ten-year target of having 28 per cent of Sukuma children enrolled in primary schools. Furthermore, although they are in many instances highly unpopular with the Wasukuma, a number of programs have been introduced for conserving or developing water, soil, forests, and other natural resources. These programs have further intensified community role differentiation by increasing the ranks of teachers, agricultural instructors, rural medical aides, and other natural resources personnel.

The new elites have in fact been insisting upon a greater share in the political order of Sukumaland, but it is a matter of question whether they would have been demanding this as early as they did had it not been that the administration has actually been insisting upon the inclusion of these new elites in the political affairs of Tanganyika. Furthermore, since the administration is planning the political changes, it is evident that they would prefer to have the new elites participate in the evolution towards self-government in accordance with plans devised by the government.

Political planning in postwar Tanganyika has had three main features. The first of these concerns the level at which political reform is to begin. While it is true that much has been done by way of reconstituting the legislative and executive councils and other territorial institutions, the main burden of political reform has taken place at the local level. In part this tendency may be attributed to the value which the British themselves place upon local government in the United Kingdom. A more telling reason, however, seems to lie in the fact that "Tanganyika" is a term which has political significance to Europeans, Asians, and a small, although growing, number of African civil servants and members of such organizations as the Tanganyika African National Union. The overwhelming majority of Africans have their political interests attuned to a much smaller unit, approximating the tribal group. Even the tribal group may be beyond the political horizon of many Africans, for the fact is that in pre-European times the Sukuma, Nyamwezi, Ha, Chagga, and other large groups each lacked centralized political authority. In the case of the Wasukuma, the tribal group was divided into more than 50 autonomous chiefdoms. The term Wasukuma merely designated a group of people who lived in the northern part of the cultivation steppe, who spoke a common language, observed similar customs and laws, and had social links based on the spread of kinship ties throughout the hinterland chiefdoms. Inter-chiefdom hostilities within tribal groupings have persisted even where the British have created tribal-wide councils, and inter-tribal hostilities are even more evident, as in the armed clashes which the Wasukuma have on their borders with young Masai warriors. Tribal separatist attitudes, even among the emergent elites, have been manifest in the reluctance of the powerful tribal-based political associations in Buhaya and Uchagga to affiliate with the territorial-wide Tanganyika African National Union.

The second broad feature of postwar political planning is the vehicle through which the reforms are being introduced. Under the influence of Governor Sir Donald Cameron, who had served under Lord Lugard in Nigeria, the system of indirect rule was introduced into Tanganyika in the middle 1920's. Under this system an attempt has been made to utilize traditional authority systems as vehicles for local administration. Some of the difficulties involved in the application of this policy will become clear in subsequent comments upon the traditional authority system of the Wasukuma. The general policy in the postwar period still looks to the utilization of chiefs in local administration even though in some areas indirect rule has been completely abandoned and in other areas substantial modifications have taken place with regard to the authority of the chief and the creation of representative institutions.

The third feature of postwar planning concerns the nature of the new political institutions. Although the reforms were initially subject to a great deal of experimentation, it became apparent by about 1950 that the general pattern of local government sought for Tanganyika was one based on the English system, with the multi-purpose local council being the cardinal feature. Depending upon the area and population of the unit, as well as historic associations, the local government of a unit may actually consist of a pyramid or tier of councils serving levels from the village to the district or even a county. It is only at the higher levels, however, that financial responsibility is granted with respect to levying rates and cesses and to planning and spending for social service and natural resource development programs. The lower-echelon councils are largely electoral bodies and inter-communication forums for ascertaining grass-root sentiments and disseminating information regarding the work of the superior councils. These councils are to be representative bodies, including traditional authorities as well as members of the new elite groups, and including councillors chosen from the diverse tribal and racial groups resident within the unit. For Sukumaland, the crucial problem has been whether these and other political innovations can be acceptable to both the emergent groups and the traditional leadership.

II. THE TRADITIONAL AUTHORITY SYSTEM OF THE WASUKUMA<sup>1</sup>

The lack of centralized political authority among the Wasukuma in the pre-European era meant that there was not one authority system but rather 50 or more parallel systems; however, the similarity of political institutions throughout Sukumaland justifies one's speaking of "the" traditional authority system. Each chiefdom was in large measure a politically autonomous unit, although temporary military alliances among chiefs who belonged to the same royal clans were often arranged. There was no subordination of one chiefdom to another, even though a number of chiefdoms originated by "hiving off" from larger units and even though chiefdoms suffered defeat in war. In the latter case, a victorious chief might ravage the fields and carry off slaves or cattle, but he was afraid to risk the vengeance of the ancestors of the defeated chiefdom by incorporating the area within his own domain.

The dominant feature of the internal political system was the prominence of the hereditary chief, who on cursory examination might appear to have exercised autocratic powers. His role as supreme magistrate in his chiefdom extended to judgments involving the death penalty and confiscation of all the property of the convicted party. Moreover, the payment to the chief of annual and extraordinary tribute in the form of cattle, grain, or labor; his collections from court fines and fees; and his share in the distribution of the product of a tribal hunt made him the only truly wealthy person in the chiefdom. He was able to use his wealth to reward the faithful and withhold benefits from the obstinate. Furthermore, although few chiefs appear to have been military field commanders, it was, nevertheless, the chief who decided the issue of peace and war and distributed the spoils. Much of his success in warfare depended upon the strength of his elite guard, which was composed of specially trained slaves who stood in a client relationship to the chief. In exchange for a high share in the spoils, they provided protection for the chief against external invasions and against internal threats to his authority. An additional client relationship existed between the chief and the headmen, who assisted him in hearing minor court cases, collecting tribute, and allocating land in their areas. Since many of the headmen were sons of chiefs and thereby excluded from the succession under the prevailing matrilineal system, they constituted no threat to his authority.

<sup>1</sup> In addition to my own findings, I am indebted here to the writings of Hans Cory, especially The Ntami (London, 1951) and The Indigenous Political System of the Sukuma (Nairobi, 1954).

It is not merely the multiple roles of the chief and the institutionalization of group supports for his authority which give one the impression of autocracy. The basis for this impression is the fact that one of the main supports for chieftaincy authority is his putative magico-religious powers to secure success in battle, the arrival or abatement of the rains, a good harvest, or the termination of an epidemic or a locust invasion. This semi-divine character of chieftainship was made manifest to the people in the ceremonies performed at the time of his enthronement and in the rituals connected with the annual agricultural cycle and in times of crises. The consequence of this is that responsibility for the performance of chiefly duties appeared to lie not so much with the people as with the tribal ancestors, who indicated their approval by bringing good fortune to the chiefdom.

In probing more deeply into the character of the traditional system, the impression of autocracy is considerably diminished. The dependence upon magico-religious supports was a precarious one at best in a land where drought and pestilence are recurrent phenomena. It was in times of "failure" in the chief's powers that responsibilities to empirical sources internal to the social system became evident. In a minor crisis, banishment of the witch-doctor who acted as the chief's intercessor might be a sufficient remedy in appeasing the people. In more serious crises, when famine was threatening, the true character of the chief's tribute, as a tribal bank, was clearly revealed in the distribution of meat and grain to the people. If the crisis persisted, only the past successes and benign character of his rule were sufficient to save a chief; and the remembered histories of a number of Sukuma chiefdoms are replete with cases of deposition of chiefs who "failed" in their magico-religious duties.

In addition to this vague responsibility to "the people" manifest in times of crisis, there were institutionalized checks on chieftaincy autocracy that were in operation at all times. One of these was the authority of the Banang'oma, or royal courtiers. The Banang'oma were the brothers and maternal uncles and cousins of the chief, who were eligible to succeed him. They thus had a proprietary interest in preserving the reigning dynasty equally against external attack and from internal disintegration, which might result from an injudicious use of chieftaincy authority by the incumbent. In many respects the courtiers acted as a council of state, shielding the chief in public and thereby enhancing the impression of divinity, controlling his public and private affairs, attending to his burial (which included hurrying the process along if a wasting disease threatened the notion of divinity), and electing his successor from among a host of candidates.

In addition to the royal institution, popular organizations in the Sukuma villages, such as the dance societies and those based on the age-grade system, also served as counter-balances to the exercise of chieftaincy authority. This was manifest in several respects. In the first place, many political functions in Sukumaland were performed independently of the chief. The regular provision of assistance to the aged and distressed, for example, was a function of the dance societies. One of the age-grade groupings, the elika (or young men's societies), played an essential part in the maintenance of social order in the chiefdom through establishing and enforcing codes of good conduct upon its members. Moreover, the chief relied heavily on the elika in recruiting warriors, organizing collective labor turn-outs, and assisting new immigrants in their planting and house construction. In these matters the leaders of these associations, the basumba batale, were far from being in a position of subservience to the chief. Their organizations worked on a contract basis, securing a portion of the chief's tribute for their services, and the contract was secured through the process of "collective bargaining" between the chief and the basumba batale. Moreover, it was the basumba batale, acting jointly, who demonstrated before the chief's hut and demanded his abdication when it was evident that his religious powers had "failed" him.

Finally, it must be understood that the roles of supreme magistrate and distributor of the spoils of the chase did not come to the Sukuma chief as a right secured through conquest of his people. It came, rather, through his popular acceptance as an impartial arbiter who was above the inter-clan and inter-personal frictions of the chiefdom. The first chiefs were Hamitic strangers who appeared on the scene at a time when the increasing density of settlement made it difficult to resolve conflict by a resort to blood vengeance or by flight into the bush. The Hamites were accepted because the original Bantu regarded them as being superior in bearing, intellect, and mode of economy—namely, cattle herding; however, the acceptance did not constitute total submission. The settlement of intra-clan disputes and even of certain categories of inter-clan controversy was excluded from the jurisdiction of the chief's court. Moreover, the chief arrived at his judicial decision only in the presence of clan elders, who were concerned not only with the preservation of Sukuma law and custom but also with the interests of their clan members. Moreover, in extreme cases, clan members suffering at the hands of a chief who had abused his authority or who had failed in other respects to protect lives and property could still remove themselves to a neighboring chiefdom. This withdrawal of allegiance thereby deprived the tyrannical chief not only of a warrior and laborer but also of a source of tribute.

III. MODIFICATIONS IN THE AUTHORITY SYSTEM UNDER EUROPEAN RULE

After almost 70 years of European administration in Tanganyika, the modifications in the traditional authority system of the Wasukuma have been substantial, notwithstanding the fact that the British administration during a great part of this period has been committed to the policy of indirect rule. The authority system of the Wasukuma has been altered with regard to at least five general categories: the external political system, the bases for political authority, the relationship of the internal units to each other, the content of political activity, and the delineation of chieftaincy roles.

The External Political System. Under the impact of the European ban on tribal warfare and the requirements of the European administration, the relationship of the Sukuma chiefdoms to each other has been reconstituted. For efficiency of administration, a number of minor chiefdoms have been consolidated or brought under the jurisdiction of a larger neighbor. Also under the rubric of improving administrative control, the autonomy of the remaining chiefdoms has been diminished by the fact that the British have created federations of chiefs. These occurred first on the district or sub-district level and then, in 1947, on the tribal level. Although the chiefdoms remain as administrative and judicial units for the purposes of general legislation, administrative policy, financial affairs, and the definition of Sukuma tribal law and custom, it is the supra-chiefdom federations which have greater significance. Even more important than the alteration in the inter-chiefdom relationship has been the fact that a new external relationship obtains: namely, that between the chiefdoms and the European administrations. The consequences of this relationship become apparent in the examination of other alterations in the traditional authority system.

The Bases for Political Authority. In the traditional period the basis for chieftaincy authority lay partly in the chief's responsibility to an external, non-empirical source as well as to certain empirical sources internal to the system. To a certain extent that external basis for chieftaincy authority has not disappeared even though Christian and Moslem beliefs in monotheism and secular teachings regarding the character of natural phenomena have partially undercut the belief in his magico-religious powers. It is surprising, however, to find that most of the better-educated Christian and Moslem chiefs I interviewed still regularly observe the annual rituals connected with the agricultural cycle. Although several of these chiefs stated that they perform these rites only for the "entertainment" of their people, it is obvious that the signs of obeisance made to the chiefs by commoners on these and other occasions are not those accorded the ordinary mortal in Sukumaland. Moreover, the religious role of the chief may appear in new forms. Two recent cases, for example, have occurred in which Roman Catholic chiefs have attempted to use their official position to aid in the collection of funds to build a church and a new school.

Under European rule the mainstay for chieftaincy authority is still external to the system, although the non-empirical element is substantially reduced. I refer to the fact that, in the final analysis, the question of whether an individual exercises chieftaincy authority depends upon his acceptance by the European administration. This was so under the German administration, as is evidenced by the fact that a number of chiefs were deposed and in some chiefdoms the hereditary system was abandoned entirely in favor of the appointment of akidas, who were central government servants. Under British rule the factor of recognition has been explicit in both the Native Authority Ordinance of 1927 and the African Chiefs Ordinance of 1953. True the administration has permitted the Wasukuma to follow hereditary succession in electing chiefs and has required as a basis for continuance in office that the chiefs act in a responsible manner towards the interests of their people. Nevertheless, these responsibilities exist, not because they were present in the traditional authority system, but because the British administration accepts these things as part of its policy. The supremacy of the European administration is evident in the fact that a duly-elected claimant must secure recognition from the Governor before assuming office. Moreover, the right of deposition of a chief remains the prerogative of the Governor, and any individual or group (such as the basumba batale) who attempts to usurp this function would be tried for sedition. Finally, the responsibility of the chief to the central government has been manifest in the abolition of tribute and the introduction of a central government tax, part of the proceeds of which have gone to pay the salary of the chief. Unlike tribute, which was used for the benefit of the whole chiefdom in times of famine, the chief's salary may be used entirely for his personal benefit.

The concomitant feature of the chief's responsibility to the European administration has been the fact that he has at his command the power of the European administration to carry out his duties. This power may in extreme cases be made manifest in the arrival of armed police to put down threats to the chief's authority; but the surprising thing is that the overt display of force is seldom required and even murderers in Sukumaland seldom make an effort to flee or resist an unarmed messenger who comes to arrest them. It may be that the occasional displays of force or the remembrance of European might in two wars have been factors in this compliant attitude; however, the persistence of cultural attitudes towards authority is probably also a significant item.

Relationship of the Internal Units. The relationship of the internal units of the traditional authority system was affected by the alterations in the sources of political authority. Despite the intent of the advocates of Indirect Rule to utilize traditional systems, the fact is that in Sukumaland they concentrated largely upon one part of the system, the hereditary chiefs. In part this can be attributed to the lack of knowledge or indifference of individual administrators regarding the actual operation of the traditional system. There was, however, also the conflict facing an understaffed administrator as to whether he should insist that the chief proceed quickly with the tasks of road construction, sanitation, or soil conservation, or whether he should require that the chief consult with the clan elders, basumba batale, and the Banang'oma before undertaking these ventures. The former decision was the one often taken. As a consequence of focusing attention upon the chief, the other elements in the system have withered in significance. Only in Maswa District, for example, are the basumba batale actually recognized in a Native Authority order as performing even a minor political function. The role of the Banang'oma, moreover, has been reduced to that of instructing a chief on tribal history and custom during traditional rituals. The elective role of these courtiers has all but disappeared in the face of administrative efforts to make the selection of a chief subject to more broadly-based popular ratification, and in the face of conflicts with administration over the criteria—rain-making ability and conviviality at tribal dances—sometimes employed by the Banang'oma in choosing their candidate.

The supremacy of the chief within the system was also enhanced by the delineation of chieftdom boundaries. This diminished the freedom of action of the headmen, who in the past were able to achieve a certain degree of political autonomy through threats of "hiving off" from the chieftdom. The appointment and salary of the headmen, moreover, have been under the control of the chief. Clan and individual mobility have been thwarted also by the delineation of boundaries and by the power granted the Native Authorities to restrict movement of persons during famine and other emergencies. Finally, although one group of chieftaincy clients, the elite guard, has vanished with the ban on tribal warfare and slavery, a new group committed to supporting the authority of the chief has emerged in the form of Native Authority messengers and clerks. In the appointment of the lesser officials, nepotism has played a major part. There was some justification for this in the past inasmuch as only relatives of chiefs were likely to have had the required education, and the personal responsibility which the chiefs bore for financial matters made it seem reasonable that he should have about him those over whom he had some personal control.

With the appearance of an emergent elite in the postwar period there have been two diverse tendencies at work seeking to restore internal checks upon chieftaincy authority. One of these—the appearance of popular associations—will be discussed subsequently. The second tendency has been the efforts of the administration to bring to the operation of local government the talents of teachers, traders, and other individuals who were excluded under a system based on royal birth and nepotism. These leaders were, however, brought in as individuals and not as representatives of a group. It was hoped that by meeting with the chiefs and headmen in councils they would begin to accept some of the responsibility for initiating and planning local programs, suggesting new sources of local revenue, and formulating legislation for the development of natural resources. The councils constitute a comprehensive system which covers the village, chieftdom, district, and Sukumaland levels. Each council consists of the Native Authorities concerned, a number of councillors nominated by the District Commissioner, and a number of councillors elected initially at the village level, with each superior council drawing part of its membership from the council subordinate to it. It should be stressed that the chiefs and nominated members on the higher councils constitute a majority of the membership, and that in any case, all decisions of the council require administrative approval.

Content of Political Activity. Several of the political functions performed within the traditional Sukuma system have now been pre-empted by the European administration. This applies especially to the maintenance of external defense and the preservation of social order; to a great degree it also applies to the functions of regulating internal relationships within the system and the provision of material security. With regard to these latter functions, much authority has been left to the chiefs, and the postwar tendency has been to entrust authority to the people themselves acting through their councils. The provision of social services in the European period has not only been intensified, but has also had three features which differentiate it from the performances of the traditional period. In the first place, while road construction, the provision of markets, and malaria control have provided benefits to the people, these measures were often initially introduced to increase the efficiency of administrative control. Second, although public health services and education are readily accepted by the people, the necessity for other services—especially those dealing with natural resources conservation—are neither understood nor readily accepted. Third, the methods employed for securing benefits for the people are based largely on scientific knowledge, whereas in the traditional period great emphasis was placed on methods based on the putative value of magico-religious performances.

The Roles of the Chief. As we have seen, the religious role of the chief has been diminished under the impact of Christian and Moslem teachings, while his position as controller of tribal wealth and his role in military affairs have been eliminated by the European administration. In their stead, the administration during the period between the wars concentrated on the legislative, judicial, and executive roles of the chief.

The legislative role of the Sukuma chief is actually a European innovation. Formal law-making had not been a distinct performance in the traditional system even though a chief might establish precedents in hearing court cases or in the process of administering his chiefdom. Under the Native Authority Ordinance, however, one of the main duties of the chiefs, or chiefs meeting in councils was to issue rules and orders for the governing of their chiefdoms. There has been a certain unreal quality in the legislative role of the chiefs: in most cases the chiefs did not initiate the legislation, nor were they always in sympathy with its purposes. The plain fact is that in many instances the term "Native Authority" was a legal fiction meaning "District Commissioner." This has been especially true with regard to the preparation and approval of the annual financial estimates by the Native Authority. The discussions in the council have constituted more of an educative process, looking towards the future acceptance of responsibilities, than of an actual wielding of authority. The substance of the rules and regulations also calls to mind Plato's Laws, for they attempt to set up standards of moral conduct regarding drinking and gambling and standards of technical performance with regard to animal husbandry, disease control, and cultivation; usually these standards are quite alien to those prevailing in the existing value system.

This spirit of educating the people to new standards also has pervaded the executive and judicial roles of the chiefs. Much of the executive work of the chief and his natural resources assistants is devoted to teaching the people new methods of cultivation or of detecting disease in livestock. The teaching aspect, however, has often assumed the characteristics of police enforcement; in many years, over half of the court cases heard by the chiefs have dealt with infractions of the Native Authority rules and orders—legislation which they had been parties to issuing and enforcing. In other aspects of his judicial role the chief may actually be performing a service similar to that of his ancestors, for the administration has accepted customary law as a part of the legal system of the Territory. Murder and other more serious crimes, however, have been removed from the jurisdiction of the local courts.

In the postwar period the roles of the chiefs have been subjected to further manipulation by the administration in view of the dual goals of increasing local responsibility for development programs and of increasing the democratic character of political institutions. To meet this latter goal the chiefs, as already noted, have been required to share their legislative role with elected and nominated councillors. Furthermore, in line with the territorial policy of separating the judiciary from the executive, the Sukuma chiefs have been required to appoint deputies, who have gradually been assuming the greater burden of court work and will eventually emerge as independent magistrates.

To meet the problem of increasing local responsibility, the administration has decided to concentrate on the role of the chief as a tribal executive in charge of the administration of social and economic programs. It was felt by administrators at the end of the war that the corps of chiefs then holding office was poorly qualified to accept this new responsibility. Consequently, without eliminating the form of hereditary succession, District Commissioners have taken a greater hand in the selection of new chiefs as vacancies arise through death, retirement, or deposition. Although in some instances a District Commissioner actually searches for a possible claimant with the qualifications of superior education, experience, and modern outlook, the usual process is for the administrator to indicate beforehand that certain candidates, because of their previous histories, would never receive the Governor's recognition as chiefs. While such procedures may be questionable methods for introducing popular control over the appointment of chiefs, they have achieved the effect of raising the level of the group with respect to education and general training. Moreover, after their elevation to chieftainship, chiefs have been required by the administration to take short courses in agriculture, veterinary services, and general administration. Thus, without abandoning the criterion of royal birth the Administration has attempted to bring the political system into line with the new economic and social system, where intelligence, education, and experience are criteria for leadership. It was hoped that in this way the Administration could bridge the gap separating the chiefs from the new elite.

IV. SUKUMA RESPONSES TO PLANNED POLITICAL CHANGE

A number of Sukuma chiefs have taken quite readily to the British conception of the duties of a modern chief. Prepared by education or previous experience and assisted further by maintaining close liaison with administrative and technical officers, they have seized the initiative in organizing local councils at all levels or in initiating new programs in water development or sanitation. By lecture and by example they are attempting to convince their people of the benefits to be derived from following new techniques in agriculture or animal husbandry. In most cases these chiefs have attempted to combine their modern approach to local government with a continued reliance upon traditional ritual and their hereditary position to carry along the less educated citizens.

Enthusiasm by the Sukuma chiefs does not, however, appear to be the typical reaction. Most Sukuma chiefs seem to find it genuinely impossible to pursue both the goal of being responsive to the wishes of their people and the goal of educating or coercing them into accepting new standards. The District Commissioner might convince the chiefs that cattle destocking, contour cultivation, or a cess on cotton might be in the interests of Sukumaland; it is another matter for the chiefs in turn to convince the cattle owners or cotton growers. Moreover, it is questionable whether the chiefs are actually convinced of the efficacy of the new programs; in one district the chiefs and headmen were among the worst offenders of the Native Authority soil conservation rules. Regarding the problem of finance, furthermore, the chiefs are beginning to consider the problem of relating expenditures on social services to sources of local revenue; however, for the most part the "Native Treasury" still remains a substitute term for "District Commissioner."

Comments made by a number of chiefs indicate that they regard the addition of popular councillors to local government bodies and the diminution of their judicial authority as a not-so-thin edge of a wedge which will eventuate in their becoming tribal relics. They have been especially alarmed by the formation of a multi-racial county council in the Lake Province, which for most purposes is superseding the authority of the Sukumaland Federal Council. There is no guarantee that the chiefs need be represented on the county council at all and in any case only a minor fraction of the 47 Sukuma chiefs could be represented in view of the government's intention to limit the size of such deliberative bodies.

The reactions of the illiterate mass of "commoners" to the new political developments were also mixed, but by far the most prevalent reaction seemed to be one of lethargy. The peasant cultivator is dubious about the value of the new standards of technical performance the chiefs and the administration are encouraging him to adopt, and he is dubious about the form of local government institutions as well. He prefers to have his court case heard by the chief rather than the deputy; and he feels it to be presumptuous of a "commoner" to attempt advising a chief or headman even when they genuinely solicit advice in council meetings. Lethargy, however, is not the sole response of the illiterate "commoners." In a number of rural areas the newly-formed village councils have taken upon themselves the task of constructing new schools and dams by community effort instead of waiting for Native Treasury funds to be made available; and they have been enthusiastic in helping the headmen distribute famine food, pass on information about new soil conservation measures, and collect taxes. At times the enthusiasm runs so high that the councillors attempt to take over the judicial and executive work entirely, and it is necessary for the administrators to restrain them. Although the British administrators seem to regard a response of this character as being a welcome, albeit misguided, sign of advancement, it would appear that the responses on the part of the more educated Wasukuma to modification in the political order do not always meet with the same approbation. I refer especially to the postwar emergence of popular political associations and of cooperative societies with a politically-oriented leadership.

Producers cooperatives have emerged in a number of areas of Sukumaland. Some, like an association in Kwimba District based on the marketing of clarified butter, limit their activities to predominantly economic questions and have no noticeable antipathies towards the local chiefs and headmen. The same cannot be said, however, for the much larger cooperatives based on the cotton industry. Almost from the inception in 1949 of the Lake Province Growers Association (since enlarged and renamed the Victoria Federation of Cooperation Unions), political and racial questions have been in the forefront. In part this stems from the fact that the cooperative movement arose from feelings on the part of the African growers that they suffered badly at the hands of the Asian businessmen who controlled much of the marketing system. Moreover, it was not until 1951 that the government was willing to recognize the validity of the grievance and to register the cooperatives as legal societies. The administration then took hurried steps to facilitate loans for the purchase of capital equipment and in other ways ensure the orderly entry of the societies into the marketing system.

To a great extent the Association thrived on the government's opposition, and it became a rallying point for varying types of discontented elements in Sukumaland. In some of the activities of the Association's leadership—for example in the protest over the controlled price of cotton and the levying of a local government cess on raw cotton—they differ hardly at all from those associated with farm groups in England or America. The leadership of the Association, however, has also expressed itself publicly on a range of other political questions less directly concerned with cotton production. These include attitudes of opposition to the cattle destocking program, the use of communal labor turn-outs for dam construction and bush clearance, the agricultural bias of the new curriculum for the middle schools' tie-ridge cultivation, and variations in standards of hospital facilities for Europeans, Asians, and Africans. Some of the most vigorous complaints on the part of the Association's leaders have been reserved for the chiefs and the new system of councils. Individuals I interviewed seemed to regard the chiefs as either ignorant of the real sympathies of the people or mere "puppets" of the administration. Where the attitudes of these leaders were not clearly in favor of the abolition of hereditary chieftainship, they were at least in favor of divesting the chiefs of all but their ceremonial roles.

With regard to the system of local councils, the leaders of the cotton cooperatives felt that the idea was sound but that the system had failed in its application. They felt that the councillors were usually the "cooks and houseboys" of the chiefs, that discussions were devoted to trivial matters, that items of consequence were decided beforehand by the chiefs and the District Commissioners, and that decisions of the councils were seldom communicated to the people in the villages. The thin line separating economic and political associations in Sukumaland is perhaps evidenced by the fact that some of these leaders felt that the Growers Association or the local societies should be permitted to elect councillors to these new local government bodies.

It is not unusual for an economic organization to engage in political controversy; indeed, they do so often enough in America and Britain. Nevertheless, administrators have regarded this tendency in Sukumaland with double misgivings. In the first place, it was felt that continued political activity had distracted the leadership of the Association from its primary concerns: developing the cotton industry and establishing the societies on sound cooperative principles. Second, District Commissioners have often felt that the leadership of the Association considered that as the head of a large organization it was better qualified to speak for the people than were the chiefs or the newly-created councils. They ignored the fact that many of the members (which include about 20 per cent of the estimated male taxpayers in Sukumaland) joined the societies merely for economic reasons and do not endorse the political views of the leadership. It is obvious that the government would much prefer to have political issues discussed in the new local councils, making these bodies the primary arena for political activity in Sukumaland.

Much of what has been said above with respect to the political grievances of the leaders of the Growers Association also applies to the leaders of the manifestly political bodies in the area, the Sukuma Union and the branches of the Tanganyika African National Union. The activities of political associations, however, have actually resulted in open conflict with the chiefs. This is especially so with regard to their campaign urging people not to participate in communal labor turn-outs or to observe destocking and soil conservation orders. The character of the Tanganyika African National Union's activities was such that in 1954 the government felt justified in disbanding several of its chapters, on the grounds of maintaining public order. The Sukuma Union has refrained from activity of a violent character thus far, limiting itself instead to defending in court individuals who have allegedly been abused by the chiefs or attempting to get its members elected to village and chiefdom councils. With regard to the last enterprise, they have not as yet succeeded, which is not surprising in view of the fact that over 40 per cent of its membership of 8,000 resides in Zanzibar and scattered areas of Tanganyika. The Tanganyika African National Union differs from the Sukuma Union in several other respects. The latter is composed largely of Wasukuma or the related Wanyamwezi, appeals to rural as well as urban elements, and confines itself mostly to problems of development within Sukumaland. The National Union, on the other hand, has a polyglot tribal membership and appeals mostly to the class of township clerks and traders; its leadership in Sukumaland takes stands on broad questions such as East African federation, the Meru land controversy, and independence for Tanganyika.

In a small but selective sampling in Sukumaland, I was able to obtain data on the background and attitudes of the leadership of the economic and political associations, which provide some clues to the origins of their antagonism to the existing political system. Histories of employment and travel in other parts of Sukumaland, as well as the fact that their main ties were now with an urban area, indicated that these individuals have no particular loyalties to an individual chiefdom. Economically, they were almost on a par with the chiefs, deriving their income from salaries, merchandizing, income from rents on buildings or fishing boats, and income from the cotton fields which were tended by the families left behind in the rural areas. With regard to education as well, the emergent leadership felt that it could claim equality with the chiefs, and a surprising number of the new political leaders are ex-school teachers. A further interesting comment on their educational background is the fact that a preponderance of these leaders were educated by the American Africa Inland Missions or the Seventh Day Adventists. Thus, some of the anti-chief attitudes may be a manifestation of conflict with Roman Catholic chiefs, who are in the majority in Sukumaland. There may also be a more deep-seated reason for the Protestant character of the leadership, such as the traditional Roman Catholic acceptance of authority as opposed to the fundamentalist—and especially American fundamentalist—emphasis on individual initiative and a vague distrust of governmental activity. One further factor in the background of the political and economic leaders interviewed was the fact that three-fourths of them were related to chiefs, sub-chiefs, or headmen. A few actually had histories of being claimants to a chieftainship, and their grievances in some cases appear to date from the rejection of their claims by the District Commissioner, the Banang'oma, or the people meeting in assembly.

Some interesting attitudes were voiced regarding other races in Sukumaland. It was almost unanimously felt that European administrators and missionaries (who make up the bulk of the European population outside of the self-contained mining settlements) were doing a commendable job of educating the Africans; however, the statements were usually qualified with remarks about the rate at which the Africans were being permitted to advance, the observance of the color bar, and the fact that "it will be better when Africans can do the job themselves." With regard to the Asians, who are the ubiquitous shopkeepers of East Africa, the attitudes were almost unanimously pejorative of the contribution Asians were making to the development of the Territory. Both of these racial groups were treated alike, however, when it came to the matter of the multi-racial county council in the Lake Province. The African leaders interviewed felt that Africans at this stage could not compete effectively with Europeans and Asians in debate, and consequently they would find that real authority was going to the other races.

V. APPRAISAL

If the attainment of self-government is taken as a goal which all dependent people have a right to expect (and the United Nations Charter seems to accord it that status), then something by way of commendation should be said for the fact that Britain acknowledges this as a goal for Tanganyika and has been taking steps to achieve it. Moreover, although critics in Tanganyika or in the United Nations may disagree over the methods employed or the rate at which political developments are taking place, there is seldom criticism of the general plan of achieving self-government through representative bodies, which are entrusted with the responsibility for the social and economic development of the people. Something also by way of praise may be said for the character of the agents introducing political change in Tanganyika. It is the opinion of this writer that the calibre of administrators in the Territory is outstanding. For the most part administrators exhibit an enthusiasm for their work, employ a great deal of tact and friendly humor in their relations with the people, are well versed in Swahili, are conscientious about getting about the districts and seeing things at first hand, and are generally regarded by the Africans as being personally honest and fair in their performance of judicial and administrative duties.

Nevertheless, it is apparent that the implementation of political change has met with some serious obstacles. One of these might consist of the very enthusiasm of administrators which was praised above. One sometimes feels that the personal zeal of the District Commissioner in establishing new councils and introducing new programs is often well in advance of the enthusiasm of the chiefs and people to make these councils operate effectively or to achieve the ends of the program. As a consequence the councils and programs may stagnate, or, in the interest of "getting the job done," the District Commissioner himself may attempt to run council meetings and personally oversee the details of a program. In either case these alternatives win only contempt from the leaders of the popular associations.

A further difficulty consists in the resistances offered by both the chiefs and the new economic and political leaders to the substance and procedures involved in the political changes. Resistances might be encountered in any situation of planning in a dependency; however, when the task set for the administrators consists in no less than the rebuilding of political institutions which have taken several generations to develop, the resistances are bound to be of greater magnitude. Moreover, the administrators are expected to perform this task with a relatively small staff, without frequent resort to the use of overt force, and in a milieu in which the mass communication media, the educational system, and the triennial United Nations Visiting Mission are subjecting to question almost any action taken by administrators in dependent territories. Furthermore, the very system of democratic values and representative institutions the British are attempting to introduce in the area inculcates the idea of open discussion and choice. Consequently, a selective attitude on the part of the chiefs or the new elites should not be surprising.

Regarding the reaction of the British administrators to the selectivity of the emergent elite, several comments might be made. One can agree that the economic goals of the cooperative societies might be better attained if the leadership devoted itself primarily to those ends; nevertheless, I find it difficult to agree that local councils should constitute the only legitimate channel for political activity in Sukumaland. The generally hostile attitude obtaining between the government and the popular associations, the ban on certain categories of central government and local government personnel joining political associations, and the disbanding (although with much justification) of chapters of the Tanganyika African National Union would indicate that the administration does indeed want to limit political activity to the new councils. It may also be acknowledged that the attitude of the popular leaders, in respect of the goals of the administration, makes it an "irresponsible minority." Such minorities, however, have a way of thriving on governmental opposition and becoming majorities. Moreover, in according these minorities certain genuine responsibilities in political affairs, the character of their attitudes may be altered. Both of these last statements are borne out in recent events in the Gold Coast and in the Chagga area of Tanganyika.

The question remains: "What will become of the chiefs?" In view of the attitudes of the Sukuma peasants towards their chiefs, the continued utilization of these traditional authorities would seem to be a justifiable policy—at least until it can be demonstrated that some other group is better qualified to speak for the best interests of the people. It may be, however, that emergent leaders in Sukumaland will take the same course pursued by the Baganda and the Wachagga. This course consists of finding in a modernized hereditary chieftainship the institution through which the various strands of Westernization and Sukuma heritage may be brought together, and a new sense of unity of purpose achieved in Sukumaland.

THE CONTRIBUTION OF MEDIEVAL THOUGHT TO THE AMERICAN POLITICAL TRADITION*

EWART LEWIS

Oberlin College

That there was a continuity between medieval political thought and the body of systematic theory that surrounded the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution is by now a commonplace. But when we speak of the medieval contribution to the American political tradition, it is important to avoid the implication that what medieval thought contributed was identical with what American thought received. Between the close of the fifteenth century and the latter part of the eighteenth lie some two and a half centuries of crowded thought and experience, which more or less profoundly changed the meaning of concepts continuously in use. The more we learn of medieval theory, the clearer it becomes that it must be interpreted in its own terms rather than in terms of its derivatives. And the American political tradition, of course, cannot be fully understood in terms of its historic roots. Perhaps the chief service which the history of ideas can offer to political theory lies in providing material for the sharpening of concepts through a comparative analysis. For the full understanding of the meaning of an idea, one needs to know not only what it is, but also, I suggest, what it is not. Thus there may be value in an attempt to define the medieval meaning of some concepts that were a significant part of the medieval contribution: in particular, sovereignty, natural law and natural rights, and consent.

Medieval political thought was a response to a special historical situation. In contrast to the states of classical antiquity, the medieval state was comparatively distinct from other social institutions; it was a late-comer in a society already organized by feudalism and by the church—a society, however, still characterized by constant violence and injustice. Thus political thought was oriented toward topics that had not aroused much interest in the closely-interwoven societies of Greece and Rome: on the one hand, an examination and defense of the powers necessarily implicit in government; on the other hand, an examination of the bases and limits of governmental authority and of the juristic relationships between government and other institutions. Moreover, the expanding theory of the state had to take into account the ideas of right implicit in feudalism, and the ideas of right explicit in the teachings of the church. Thus medieval political thought developed an extremely complex character; this complexity was enhanced by the variety of intellectual sources, from different cultures, on which it drew.

* This article is a slight revision of a paper read at the American Political Science Association meeting in Boulder, Colorado, September, 1955. The paper was intended only to suggest a tentative interpretation as a basis for further discussion; a treatment of medieval thought on this scale and in this perspective necessarily involves extreme simplification and a dogmatic assertion of some points that may well be controversial. The footnotes now added are, of course, not exhaustive, but they call attention to some of the material that supports, illustrates, or opposes my general contentions here.

In the context of the medieval problem, one of the most important strands of thought was that which supported and clarified the gradual concentration of coercive power in the king and the gradual emancipation of an effective public authority from the bonds of feudal traditions. Roman law provided medieval thinkers with a basic distinction between private law and public law, and with suggestive phrases—phrases which medieval interpretation sometimes stretched far beyond their original meaning: e.g., “the prince is not bound by the laws,”<sup>1</sup> which became the nucleus of the medieval recognition that, if the essence of rulership lay in its control of the coercive machinery of law enforcement, one could not logically expect that machinery to control the ruler.

I cannot trace here the whole story of the medieval enunciation of the public-law principles that gradually defined the implicit character of public authority: e.g., that public power is inalienable; that the ruler can have no peer, and no superior; that subordinate offices are delegations of the supreme power; that in the area of government the ruler can finally be guided “solely by the judgment of his own mind”; that judicial authority includes authority to promulgate, interpret, and dispense from the law; that from the decision of a supreme judge there can be no appeal to another court.<sup>2</sup> These principles might still construe the ruler as a discretionary administrator and judge within the framework of a static private law, and many medieval thinkers stopped at approximately this point. But as early as the thirteenth century one can find instances of the recognition that human law might properly be changed to meet men’s changing wisdom or changing needs.<sup>3</sup> This idea, interwoven with the idea that the ruler concentrated the public force of the community, and with the concept of legislation to be found in Roman law, led steadily to its corollaries: that the ruler could make and change positive law; that the validity of custom rested on his tacit consent; that legislation was the supreme act of public authority, from which all other powers flowed; even, occasionally, the extreme claim that, although the ruler continued subject to natural law, he was its only competent interpreter.<sup>4</sup> These principles were by no means all accepted by all medieval publi-

<sup>1</sup> Digest, 1, 3, 31; cf. John of Salisbury, Policraticus, Bk. 4, Ch. 2; Aquinas, Summa Theologiae, Ia IIae, q. 96, a. 5.

<sup>2</sup> Many of these ideas were suggested by John of Salisbury, from whose Policraticus, Bk. 5, Ch. 6, the quoted phrase is taken; in the thirteenth century, they are explicit in, e.g., Bracton, Aquinas, or Aegidius Romanus: see C. H. McIlwain, The Growth of Political Thought in the West (New York, 1932), pp. 320–33, 373–82, and Constitutionalism Ancient and Modern (Ithaca, 1940), Ch. 4; Ewart Lewis, Medieval Political Ideas (London and New York, 1954), Vol. 1, pp. 244–54; their medieval formulation owed much to the study of Roman law: see, e.g., Fritz Schulz, “Bracton on Kingship,” English Historical Review, Vol. 60, pp. 136–77 (May, 1945).

<sup>3</sup> E. g., Aquinas, op. cit., q. 97.

<sup>4</sup> Note the relation between ruler and positive law, ibid., qs. 90–97, passim; in Aegidius Romanus, De Regimine Principum, Bk. 3, Pt. 2, Chs. 12, 29; cf. Lewis, op. cit., Vol. 1, pp. 20–23; for the thirteenth-century civilists, see R. W. and A. J. Carlyle, A History of Mediaeval Political Theory in the West (London, 1903–36), Vol. 2, Pt. I, Ch. VII, and Gaines Post, “The Theory of Public Law and the State in the Thirteenth Century,” Seminar, Vol. 6, pp. 42–59, at pp. 51 ff. (1948). The dominant trend in medieval thought was that which insisted that the king’s promulgation or changing of law should be associated cists, but they represent a developing body of thought which, as recent scholars have pointed out, left very little for Bodin to do.<sup>5</sup>

The significance of the process, I suggest, lies in an increasingly clear perception that the government of laws cannot eliminate the government of man; that government by its very nature includes large areas of discretion which must be areas of decisive authority. The point has been by no means obvious in societies whose traditions have remained—as medieval customs did not—a roughly adequate basis for their practical and moral demands, but in Western civilization the medieval recognition and acceptance of some of the juristic implications of the rule of man have been the necessary premises for everything that has since happened in political thought.

By the time of the Founding Fathers, a chief problem of political theory was to mitigate the dangers inherent in the rule of man; the American adaptation of Montesquieu's separation of powers was an attempt to neutralize the dangers of discretion by dividing it. While separation of powers has some medieval roots, it is not a medieval idea. The characteristic medieval conclusion from the recognition that government was a matter of discretion was that all kinds of discretion must be combined in a single sovereign to insure unity of authority. The complex of powers which made up supreme authority might, as in the old Roman republic or the medieval Italian commune, belong to the community; but in the larger and looser units to which such government was unsuited, the inescapable alternative was the concentration of authority in the king. In matters where basic private rights were involved, royal authority might be qualified by a characteristically medieval device: the insistence that it be exercised through formal procedures—through due process of law or through "consultation and consent." But this qualification did not imply a balance of mutually independent agencies with distinct functions and powers. In proportion as the medieval agencies through which royal authority was partly channeled developed their own self-consciousness and claims to autonomy, the Middle Ages provided the institutional basis for the later doctrine.<sup>6</sup> But in the context of medieval with the consent of the weightier elements of the community, as, e.g., in Bracton, De Legibus et Consuetudinibus Angliae, intro. and Bk. 3, Ch. 9, sec. 3, and, two centuries later, in Fortescue, De Laudibus Legum Angliae, Chs. 7, 18; but the king's monopoly of legislative sovereignty was defended by one group of jurists: see Walter Ullmann, The Medieval Idea of Law as Represented by Lucas de Penn- (London, 1946), esp. pp. 48-55, 94 ff., 104; Lucas himself held that the ruler might specifically derogate from natural law, but that a law intrinsically unjust or unreasonable was invalid; in the fifteenth century, Aeneas Sylvius insisted that every action of the ruler must be presumed to be just: De Ortu et Auctoritate Imperii Romani, Chs. 16-23; see also Otto Gierke, Political Theories of the Middle Ages, tr. F. W. Maitland (Cambridge, 1927), pp. 84 ff. and notes 290, 292.

---

<sup>5</sup> See Max A. Shepard, "Sovereignty at the Cross-roads: A Study of Bodin," Political Science Quarterly, Vol. 45, pp. 580 ff. (Dec., 1930); Ullmann, op. cit., passim, points out resemblances of Bodin's thought to that of Lucas de Penna, which he knew.

<sup>6</sup> By the end of the Middle Ages, this had been reflected in the notion of mixed monarchy, which appears particularly in conciliarist thought and in Fortescue; see Shepard, "The Political and Constitutional Theory of Sir John Fortescue," in Essays in History and Political Theory in Honor of Charles Howard McIlwain, ed. C. Wittke (Cambridge, Mass., 1936), pp. 289-319; Lewis, op. cit., Vol. 1, pp. 271-75.

thought, such a doctrine would have seemed an illogical negation of the unity of decision which was of the very essence of the role of government, and in the context of medieval fact, it could only have produced an anarchic play of private interests.

Another American remedy for the dangers of discretion was based in the conviction that certain natural rights of man lay completely outside the area of public authority; and this idea derived, chiefly through Locke, from two quite distinct medieval ideas. A pre-governmental law protecting private rights was for medieval men no flight of speculation but a fact of crude experience. In feudal thinking, the customary law and the rights that it protected were absolute limits to royal power. But the customary law was not the law of nature, and the rights of status and property that it protected were not the rights of man, but simply the rights of those men who happened to have them. The more sophisticated medieval idea of a supreme natural law was a very different concept. One of its most important functions was to undermine the prestige of the customary law and to reconstrue its pattern of absolute rights into a more flexible pattern of rights based on and qualified by their utility to man. Natural law also helped to develop the theory of royal authority. And, finally, the medieval theory of natural law was the vehicle for the church's insistence that the political order was a part of the moral order and must be tested, not only in its general structure and tendencies, but in its specific actions, by the standards of a reasoned morality.<sup>7</sup> Thus, in contrast to Lockian natural law, which balanced the rights of individuals against the rights of the state but provided no norms for the guidance of either within their separate spheres, medieval natural law purported to be a "rule or measure" for the whole area of positive rights and positive law: it provided general criteria for the qualification of private rights and for the judgment and validation of commands admittedly within the scope of the ruler's competence. The application of natural law to specific circumstances was not, of course, a matter of simple deduction; where it allowed possibilities of choice, that choice must rest upon authority. But the broad principles of natural law defined the goals and limited the range of licit means.

The theories of natural law with which the American Fathers were familiar had been formed partly in emulation of contemporary science and mathematics. They dealt in absolute statements claiming a universal validity and purporting to be rigidly deducible one from the other. Medieval natural law had a much more flexible character—vividly illustrated by the fact that one of the principles most frequently cited by medieval men was the maxim, "Necessity has no law."<sup>8</sup> While medieval writers continually insisted that the first principles of natural law were universal and permanent, they also insisted that its bearing on positive institutions might vary, as changing circumstances affected their intrinsic justice or their utility to human needs.<sup>9</sup> The ruthless application of general moral criteria to a world of varying circumstance inevitably leads to contingent rules and to a final casuistry.

<sup>7</sup> A. P. d'Entrèves, Natural Law (London, 1951), Ch. II, particularly analyzes this aspect of medieval natural law as illustrated by Aquinas; I am indebted to his whole discussion of the changing meanings of natural law.

<sup>8</sup> Gratian, c. 11, D. I de consecratione; used at first by canonists and civilists in the equitable interpretation of private law, this maxim was applied to public law in the thirteenth century; it might or might not be labelled a principle of natural law, but its use always implied a rational appeal to the fundamental order of justice whose self-evident cogency over-ruled more contingent principles of right.

One will look in vain in medieval writings for any codification of the principles of the natural law to which civilists, canonists, theologians constantly appealed. Aquinas's justly celebrated analysis<sup>10</sup> is only a suggestive outline—and it was by no means generally accepted. One may detect the medieval appeal to natural law in a whole spectrum of phrases: "natural law dictates," "evident reason shows," "it is natural to man," "it is just," "it is useful," even "it is expedient." Usage varied, but any one of these phrases might mean that positive laws or institutions were being tested by the criteria of reason, with the assumption that their general or immediate validity depended upon their passing the test. The appeal to natural law might be an appeal to certain maxims that classical or patristic writers had labelled as axioms of natural law: e.g., "it is licit to repel force with force"; or to statements that medieval thinkers nosed out for themselves, apparently because they had a sort of natural-law smell about them: some statements from Aristotle, for instance, or the famous "what touches all should be approved by all," whose medieval career could never have been predicted from its modest origin in a section of the Corpus Juris on the testamentary rights of co-heirs.<sup>11</sup> The appeal to natural law might take the form of an analogy with the non-human world: e.g., "the common natural rule is by one." It might take the form of an appeal to Scripture—though with a clear understanding that many Scriptural precepts applied only to given conditions.<sup>12</sup>

<sup>9</sup> This is clearest in Aquinas or Occam but is latent or apparent in most medieval discussions of the relations of natural law, jus gentium and civil law, especially as focussed on questions of the legitimacy of property and servitude or of the bases of equity, the dispensing power, the emergency powers of a ruler or of a general council: see Lewis, op. cit., Vol. 1, pp. 6-15, 96-98, and "Natural Law and Expediency in Medieval Political Thought," Ethics, Vol. 50 (Jan., 1940), pp. 144-63; Max A. Shepard, "William of Occam and the Higher Law," this REVIEW, Vol. 26, pp. 1005-24 (Dec., 1932), Vol. 27, pp. 24-39 (Feb., 1933); Charles C. Bayley, "Pivotal Concepts in the Political Philosophy of Ockham," Journal of the History of Ideas, Vol. 10, pp. 199-228 (April, 1919).

<sup>10</sup> Summa Theologiae, Ia IIae, q. 94.

<sup>11</sup> Codex, 5, 59, 5; on the early evolution of this maxim, see Poser, "A Romano-Canonical Maxim, 'Quod Omnes Tangit,' in Bracton," Traditio, IV (1946), 197-251. Here again, this rule might or might not be called a principle of natural law, but it was used as such.

<sup>12</sup> Canonist thought did not usually follow Aquinas's distinctions between divine and natural law but rather insisted on their ultimate identity, conceiving natural law as a sort of epitome of Christian morality, which had its fullest revelation in the Scriptures. But the canonists' sophisticated interpretation of the Scriptures in terms of a continuous and rationally systematized ethical tradition avoided many of the difficulties of this approach. When Protestantism and the printing-press had thrown open the Scriptures to miscellaneous amateur use, a continuing identification of natural and divine law bred considerable confusion, which may well have contributed to an ultimate weakening of the prestige of both. On the other hand, in proportion as rationalist natural law cut loose both from the Scriptures and from systematic philosophy, it inevitably took on a somewhat arbitrary and partisan appearance.

Deduction from simple maxims, from analogies, or from generally respected principles of right might lead to a dilemma or to an unacceptable conclusion; reason went on from there to distinguish, to explain, to qualify. Or the appeal to natural law might be a direct appeal to reason: through an analysis of the self-consistency of a rule, of its justice, of its suitability to the ends it purported to seek, of its general utility to human nature, of its expediency in a given factual context.<sup>13</sup>

The important part played by the concept of utility in the medieval theory of natural law contrasts with the eighteenth-century separation, and even conflict, between utilitarian theories and theories of natural rights. One reason for the conspicuous role of utility in the medieval theory, and for its constant concern with the context of circumstance, lies in the varied forms in which the idea of natural law first came to the attention of medieval scholars. Classical sources offered them at least four distinct definitions of natural law; to these Gratian added a fifth when he identified natural law with divine law, and therefore with the Scriptures. So far as the content of natural law was suggested, it obviously varied with these definitions: the natural law that had prescribed for the state of innocence "the common possession of all things and the equal liberty of all men" was clearly at odds with the natural law that now endorsed slavery and the payment of debts; "the repelling of force with force" was not easily harmonized with "turning the other cheek"; "the law that nature has taught all animals" was surely different from "right reason applied to commands and prohibitions." Medieval treatments of the problem varied,<sup>14</sup> but on the whole the solution was found in the view that the more concrete prescriptions of natural law were related to its ultimate norms as somewhat variant means to constant ends. This appears most clearly in Aquinas's solution, or in Occam's concept of "natural law in the third sense,"<sup>15</sup> but the same tendency pervades all medieval theory.

Thus the medieval theory of natural law was not, primarily, a theory of natural rights but of what, under given circumstances, was naturally right. Into the notion of what was naturally right there entered, indeed, the concept of common human claims based on common human characteristics. More or less explicitly, medieval thinkers tended to find in man a natural need for self-preservation; for family relationships; for social communication; for order, peace, and justice; for opportunities of rational, moral, and spiritual development. But such claims did not stake out an area of individual competence from which the state was clearly barred; they were claims upon the state as well as claims against it. They dictated no clear-cut Bill of Rights<sup>16</sup> but rather a delicate and variable adjustment among the several institutions, private and public, that served man's various needs in varying ways.

<sup>13</sup> For examples of some explicit appeals to natural law, see Lewis, Medieval Political Ideas, Vol. 2, Index, "natural law: content of." But it is impossible to assess the full meaning of natural law in the Middle Ages if one looks only at the instances in which natural law is specifically cited: note, e.g., the common-law concept of "reasonableness," which, as Sir Frederick Pollock pointed out in Essays in the Law (London, 1922), pp. 54-59, played the same role and was part of the same system of ideas; note also the civilist approach from the concept of a basic justice which could be equated with natural reason.

<sup>14</sup> Carlyle, op. cit., Vol. 1, Chs. I-III, Vol. 2, Chs. III, IV; Dom Odon Lottin, Le droit naturel chez saint Thomas et ses prédécesseurs (Bruges, 1926); Ullmann, Medieval Papalism (London, 1949), Ch. II; also references in note 10 above.

<sup>15</sup> Georges de Lagarde, La naissance de l'esprit laïque au déclin du moyen âge, Vol. 6 (St.-Paul-Trois-Châteaux, 1946), pp. 143-58, argues that Occam's "natural law in the third sense" was a mere rational construct, without relation to primary natural law on the one hand or to human law on the other; but cf. Shepard, "William of Occam and the Higher Law" (cited in note 9); Richard Scholz, Wilhelm von Ockham als politischer Denker und sein Breviloquium de principatu tyrannico (Leipzig, 1944), pp. 18-28; Lewis, Medieval Political Ideas, Vol. 1, pp. 14 ff. and notes.

In contrast to the Lockian system, which placed the sanctity of private property among the first imperatives of human nature and treated government as a kind of afterthought, medieval thought typically regarded both property and government as essential instruments of human needs and purposes. Thus they were coordinate in origin and validity. Each were institutions of human construction; both were rooted in natural law because both were necessary to man, or at any rate to sinful man; but the specific rights of both were subordinate to, and limited by, the purposes they must serve.

For Locke and Jefferson, liberty was one of the natural rights of man. The idea that some sort of claim to freedom was inherent in human nature flickers through medieval theory, but it remained ambiguous and undeveloped. Serfdom was a recognized part of the medieval structure of property; any coercive government seemed an infringement on liberty thus "the equal liberty of all men" was usually interpreted as fully applying only in the state of innocence; the freedom with which political theory was practically concerned was the freedom of those who were free—an incident of private-law status. Moreover, in typical medieval thought, the concept of freedom did not include a claim to a share in political self-determination; this idea appeared occasionally—notably in Cusa—but the implications of liberty could also be defined in Aristotelian terms: the free man, unlike the serf, could not rightfully be subordinated to any interest narrower than the common good.<sup>17</sup>

These considerations, increasingly explicit as medieval theory developed, led typically to the view that the customary private law and the rights of status

<sup>16</sup> One may suggest that Holmes' decision in Schenck v. United States (249 U. S. 47 [1919]) is, in structure and method, a neat instance of the sort of thinking that in the Middle Ages would have implied an appeal to natural law, issuing in the conclusion that natural law prescribed both the general right and the limitation upon it. The fact that the absolute prohibitions of the Bill of Rights still have a sort of natural-law aura about them, while their qualifications may seem to rest only on judicial interpretation, is an index to the shift that has occurred in the meaning of natural law. In the field of civil liberties, the practical gain may well outweigh the loss in theoretical clarity; in the case of property-rights, the balance-sheet is less clear.

<sup>17</sup> Cf., e.g., the varying implications of freedom in Aquinas, Summa Theologiae, I, q. 96, a. 4, and De Regimine Principum, Bk. 1, Ch. 5; Thomommo of Lucca, De Regimine Principum, Bk. 2, Chs. 8 f.; Marsiglio, Defensor Pacis, Dictio 1, Ch. 12, sec. 6; Occam, Dialogus, Pt. 3, Tr. 1, Bk. 2, Ch. 6 and Tr. 2, Bk. 2, Ch. 50; Cusa, De Concordantia Catholica, Bk. 2, Ch. 14.

and property embodied in it were normal boundaries to the rights of government, but that, on occasion, those boundaries could be infringed "for a just cause," or for "the common necessity or utility." Here medieval thought found room for equity, for the dispensing power, for the forfeiture of liberty or property as a penalty for crime, for the occasional change of laws which time had rendered obsolete. But the issue that particularly focussed this conception was, of course, the issue of taxation.<sup>18</sup>

In the scholarly theory of taxation, as expressed by civilists, canonists, and theologians, the custom-law conception that private rights were an absolute boundary to public authority yielded to the conception that "the welfare of the commonwealth" was among the basic interests of men—that the state was no mere convenience, but a necessary condition, and a part, of the common good. This conception did not imply a personification of the state or the balancing of a separate raison d'état against the interests of private men; it rather implied that the common interest in the maintenance of the state took precedence, on occasion, over the common interest in the maintenance of the private law. Thus, in the "case of necessity," the private rights which were a normal barrier to the area of discretion were temporarily dissolved. "Necessity has no law": in this instance, no private law.

Now there were lawyers and publicists who said simply that it was the ruler's function to determine when this situation existed, but the more typical medieval answer was that, in this admittedly abnormal situation, the king's finding of a "case of necessity" should be combined with the consent of the private men whose normal rights were thereby affected. The maxim, "What touches all should be approved by all," came to be cited as the rational principle on which this procedure was based.

I need barely mention the tremendous historical consequences that followed from the medieval application of this principle. But I want to emphasize that the medieval theory that originally rationalized the participation of subjects in the decision of certain public questions was very different from some theories <sup>18</sup> The following section leans heavily on Gaines Post's analysis of the legal theory of taxation and consent in the articles already cited and "Plena Potestas and Consent in Medieval Assemblies," Traditio, Vol. 1, pp. 355-48 (1943), and "The Two Laws and the Statute of York," Speculum, Vol. 29, pp. 417-32 (April, 1954). The legal theory described by Post seems to me to be partly reflected and supported by theologians: e.g., Aquinas, De Regimine Judaeorum; Tholomeo, op. cit., Bk. 2, Ch. 9; John of Paris, De Potestate Regia et Papali, Ch. 7; Occam, Dialogus, Pt. 3, Tr. 2, Bk. 2, Ch. 23; cf. Bayley, op. cit.

The emphasis here is obviously a departure from the familiar emphasis, e.g., in McIlwain, Growth of Political Thought in the West (cited in note 2), pp. 370-73, 382-85: that the dominant trend of medieval thought was that which set the private law as an impermeable limit to royal right and thus balanced the absolute authority of the king in government against the absolute proprietary rights of his subjects, construing grants of supply as "in the main voluntary with the subject" (p. 373) and making the whole taxation process essentially a bargain between two mutually independent centers of right. McIlwain recognizes the existence of an alternative "Romanist" tradition; evidence seems to be accumulating that the influence of "Romanist" ideas on medieval theory was both earlier and more extensive than was once supposed.

later associated with those consequences. It did not, of course, imply popular sovereignty. What sovereignty there was in the medieval kingdom belonged to the king. Nor did it imply an appeal to self-determining wills, each with an irreducible right to grant or to refuse. As theory saw it, the problem of taxation was not primarily a dilemma in the realm of subjective will, an issue between what the king wanted and what his subjects wanted, to be solved by persuasion or dickering. It was a dilemma in the realm of objective rights, to be solved through a formal procedure in which all relevant rights were recognized as relevant, and in which the question requiring consent was presented as a rational question to be determined through consideration of the objective nature of the situation—like the question that a judge puts to a jury. Given this procedure, the issue of right hinged on an issue of fact. If the king could present a valid case for his claim of manifest necessity or utility, the rights of the subjects automatically dissolved; they had no rightful alternative except to consent; if they refused, it could be argued that the king had a right to go ahead anyhow. But if the king did not have a good case, he had no right, for the authority of a king evaporated wherever it was misused.

Now this whole view had certain implications worth discussing. It assumed, for one thing, that an assembly of subjects could unite in a rational recognition of the imperatives of the common good because it was their common good. This assumption did not always work, but where it did, it began to chip at the edges of the argument that unity demanded the concentration of all decisions in the one will of the king. The assembly that had at first been conceived primarily as representing private men began to seem more and more like a public institution. The English parliament, in particular, was able to insist that it be associated with the king in the changing of the customary law and in determining major questions of public policy. In the actual course of this development, the clash of wills and the discovery of techniques of bargaining played, of course, a considerable part. But through the Middle Ages—and, I suggest, considerably beyond—the assumption continued that the considerations on which decisions were made by “the king in parliament” should be and would be objective considerations of the common good.

Just when and how the primarily objective and rationalist medieval view of the common good was transformed into the primarily subjective and voluntarist modern view is not for me to say. But I suggest that some of the muddle-headedness with which Locke is charged was due to the fact that he was looking at things in a somewhat medieval way; and even the Founding Fathers were a couple of centuries nearer the Middle Ages than we are. By the time one gets to The Federalist, one finds, I think, a continuing confidence that there is an objective common interest that rational men can and will find, combined with the different idea—not present in medieval thought nor, for that matter, in Locke—that a common interest has to be integrated from the diverse interests of factions. Curiously enough, in spite of their reverence for Aristotle, medieval thinkers were almost completely obtuse to the sense of Aristotelian theory that starts with the notion that the opposition of class interests is a first datum of politics;<sup>19</sup> so far as I know, that idea first clearly re-enters political theory with Harrington. Clinging to the conviction that the larger imperatives of justice and natural law were based in universal reason, and that the interests of all classes were objectively harmonized in a common good, medieval thinkers could assume that, while authentic differences of opinion could appear on questions of practical detail, any wilful deviation from what was "manifestly" necessary, just, or useful must be an instance of perversity or ignorance—neither of which, of course, could constitute a claim to right.

In this conviction lay the bases of the medieval principle of the nullity of misused authority, which issued in various and complex doctrines of private disobedience and resistance, public deposition, or the nullification or reinterpretation of the king's ordinances by the king's officers. These doctrines did not typically assume that the individual, the community, or the magistrate was superior to the king, still less that he was responsible to their wills; they implied simply that the king's right lapsed when it was definitely abused, and that rational men could see when that had happened.

Another result of the objective and rationalist medieval approach was to ease the medieval transitions from personal consent to the consent of representatives and from the rule of unanimity to the majority rule. From the time of Rousseau, people have been scolding Locke for the sleight-of-hand with which he made these transitions. But, from a modern voluntarist point of view, the really shocking transformations occurred in the Middle Ages, when the principle, "What touches all must be approved by all," was used to describe the consent of a majority of representatives—and, be it observed, of representatives equipped with "full power"<sup>20</sup> and unrestrained by any of the modern devices for securing responsibility to their constituents. We know a good deal about the immediate interests and the institutional and ideological context that facilitated the revolutionary acceptance of consent through representatives and of the binding power of a majority,<sup>21</sup> but we shall look in vain in medieval writings for any extensive or fundamental defense of this revolution. And I suggest that one reason was that the people who were concerned with theory were not looking at it from a modern voluntarist point of view. The representative was there to represent not so much the wishes of his constituents as the rational acquiescence that they would be bound to give to a rationally-compelling case. And, in a matter which had really nothing to do with separate interests or desires, a majority could be assumed to be what canonists called "the greater and wiser part," whose decision could plausibly be taken as the perception of what was right.

<sup>19</sup> The nearest one comes to this seems to be in some of Marsiglio's arguments, op. cit., Dictio 1, Chs. 12, 13, for the inclusion of all classes of citizens in the legislator; but note that Marsiglio was not sufficiently concerned about the possibility of deadlock between opposing classes to provide any precise rules for the computation of votes, and that he seems to have taken for granted that the process he rather vaguely describes would result in almost unanimous consensus on "a proper and true ordination of just things"; cf. Alan Gewirth, Marsilius of Padua (New York, 1951), Vol. 1, pp. 182 ff. The argument from the difficulty of securing agreement in a group was, of course, one of the standard arguments for kingship, but this argument typically proceeded without any allusion to class interests.

<sup>20</sup> On this phrase, see Post, "Plena Potestas and Consent in Medieval Assemblies" (cited in note 18).

<sup>21</sup> M. V. Clarke, Medieval Representation and Consent (London, 1936), Chs. XII, XIII, traces the role of some of these factors in thirteenth-century England.

The assumption that a community could unite in the recognition of its common needs supported the late-medieval development of the doctrine, already long present in medieval thought, that the customary law and the authority of rulers had been originally established by the people. This doctrine was not necessarily connected with a doctrine of popular sovereignty; it did not issue in an argument that rulers should be responsive to mandates from the popular will; nor was it designed to vindicate the rights of individuals against the state. Its development was partly a defense of the autonomy of the state against some of the more extreme claims of papalist theory, and partly an attempt to define a legal basis for some specific public functions exercised by representative bodies: e.g., consultation and consent, election, deposition. In most instances, it was a juristic or historical doctrine rather than a moral one: it was not an attempt to answer Rousseau's famous question, to which medieval thought had already replied. Thus the typical discussion could proceed mainly by the assertion of a plausible hypothesis which required no great effort of abstraction: one simply postulated, in the distant past, a community which needed laws and a government, which did not have any, and which was capable of sufficient consensus to provide for its needs. It could then be assumed that the constituent community had retained for itself certain non-governmental rights which came into play in special circumstances.

Occasionally, however—certainly in Cusa, perhaps in Marsiglio or Occam<sup>22</sup>—one finds the suggestion that the consent of the community was an essential factor in the legitimacy of authority itself, on the grounds of the natural freedom of men. But this suggestion still occurred within the framework of the characteristic medieval conviction that government was necessary to man—that it was, as James of Viterbo had put it, "from God through the mediation of nature, which tends thereto, and through the mediation of reason, which carries out the tendency of nature."<sup>23</sup> "Voluntary servitude," Cusa said, "was bound to that necessity, on account of the necessity itself."<sup>24</sup> Thus the consent of man to coercive authority was a step in the implementation of a rational dictate, an active cooperation in the carrying out of a moral imperative, rather than a decisive act of self-determining will. The discretion of the community appeared only in its more concrete decisions: its choice of a ruler, its embodiment of the general rules of natural law in "the laws of the lands," adapted to its special needs and circumstances.

<sup>22</sup> Cusa, op. cit., Bk. 2, Ch. 14; Marsiglio, op. cit., Lectio 1, Ch. 12, sec. 6; Occam's strongest statement is in his Breviloquium (ed. L. Baudry), p. 121; cf. Gauthier, op. cit., pp. 219 ff.; Lagarde, op. cit., Vol. 6, pp. 188-92; Lewis, Medieval Political Ideas, Vol. 1, pp. 28, 159-62, and notes.

<sup>23</sup> De Regimine Christiano, Pt. 2, Ch. 3.

<sup>24</sup> Op. cit., Bk. 3, preface.

Thus, although the idea of an original contract appeared at times in medieval thought, it did not play the pivotal role that it played in later systems.<sup>25</sup> It was not needed to explain the moral obligation of obedience, which followed directly from the fact that government was necessary to man. It was not needed to explain the moral limits of obedience, for the government that was necessary to man was inherently limited by principles no human will had made. The contract, in medieval thought, was little more than a convenient symbol for a contingent, reciprocal relationship, whose particular form might well have been shaped by human agreement, but whose essential obligations were far more deeply based.

When Jefferson said that "governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed," the principle he enunciated was derived from medieval thought, but his meaning was surely not the medieval meaning. Just how far the reinterpretation of inherited concepts had gone by this time, I am not competent to decide, but I shall try to point out the general directions of change.

Between the fifteenth century and the eighteenth the idea of freedom had moved into a central place in political theory and developed implications that had been scarcely rudimentary in medieval thought. The idea that reason could discover what, objectively, was right had been complicated by the pervasive growth of the idea that the objective rights of man included a considerable right to determine what he wanted, and this idea had given a new significance to the notion of consent. The discussion of the basis and limits of political authority had given a larger place to the role of will—with at least a suggestion that men might have chosen to remain in a quite tolerable state of nature. Legislation and taxation and economic regulation had come to be part of the regular business of government; the area of discretion increasingly involved matters that affected all men deeply, and on which men deeply disagreed. The Reformation, the constitutional struggles of seventeenth-century England, and the long-continued Anglo-American experience with representative institutions had accumulated evidence that, even within a common ethical tradition, the specific, day-to-day formulation of the common good would involve a clash

<sup>25</sup> Contrast the central role of the contract in Locke with its peripheral role in, e.g., Aquinas's several discussions of the limits of political obligation (he mentions a contract only once, and then at the end of his discussion in De Regimine Principum, Bk. 1, Ch. 6); or in the analysis of the limits of obedience by the "voluntarist" Occam, Dialogus, Pt. 3, Tr. 3, Bk. 2, Chs. 20, 26–28. Altogether many medieval writers agreed in the belief that government had originated through an act of the community, and although medieval writings are sprinkled with references to Augustine's "general compact of human society to obey its kings" (Confessions, Bk. 3, Ch. 8, q. Gratian, c. 2, di. 8), discussions of the obligations of ruler and subjects could, and often did, proceed quite as well without as with any reference to this compact.

Note also the shift in the significance of the contract implied in Locke's insistence on unanimous consent compared with the medieval references to the constituent consent of "the people."

of factions, and that it could not safely be entrusted to any single will or group of wills. The governmental agencies that in the Middle Ages had appeared as projections and qualifications of the king's will had come to be more clearly differentiated in function and to be construed as distinct in origin and power. Detached from the single person of the king, the notion of sovereignty had become more complex, its location uncertain; it might even be asserted that sovereignty could be divided. The concept of rational consensus on questions of "manifest" right had been shrinking back from the realm of governmental action, to protect all the more rigidly the matters on which no government should act. Within the realm of action, appeals to reason and, especially, the appeal to utility were becoming appeals to public opinion, disconnected from the theory of natural law. And, although the concept of a supreme natural law still lingered, natural law had changed: it had lost much of its flexibility and its claim to pervade all issues of social right; it was congealing into dogmatic rules stated without qualification; its chief concern was the arrangement and maintenance of invariable rights. The experience of seventeenth-century England had suggested that a right that varied with circumstance too easily became no right at all. In the course of that experience, the English common-law had been assimilated to the law of nature; and the permanent inviolability that medieval natural law had attached to the moral needs of man had come to adhere to certain institutional means, and notably to the structure of property. In general, the attention of political theory had been shifting from the recognition of discretionary authority and the definition of the moral principles that qualified it, to a search for techniques to limit discretion, to direct it, and to keep it responsible to the subjects' will. For, in proportion as the medieval idea of the intrinsic sovereignty of government was being confronted with the younger idea of the intrinsic sovereignty of the individual, the chief problem of practical and theoretical politics was becoming the problem of how to reconcile the two. But this was a question that medieval political thought had never had to face.

POLITICAL THEORY AND THE STUDY OF POLITICS: A REPORT OF A CONFERENCE*

(Rapporteur: HARRY ECKSTEIN, Harvard University)

This is a report of a conference on Political Theory and the Study of Politics organized by the Department of Political Science of Northwestern University, thanks to a grant by the Carnegie Corporation of New York. The conference was held on February 24, 25, and 26, 1955, in Evanston, Illinois.

The following papers were presented at the conference and are available upon request to the Department of Political Science of Northwestern University: "The Unity of Political Theory," by Norman Jacobson, University of California (Berkeley); "The Place of Classic Political Theory in the Study of Politics," by Mulford Sibley, University of Minnesota; "Political Ideology as a Datum for the Study of Politics," by Frederick Watkins, Yale University; "American Political Theory and the Study of Politics," by Robert McCloskey, Harvard University; "Political Philosophy and the 'Science' of Politics," by Carl Friedrich, Harvard University; "Political Philosophy in the 20th Century; An Appraisal of its Contribution to the Study of Politics," by Lindsay Rogers, Columbia University.

The following persons, in addition to the members of the Department of Political Science of Northwestern University, participated at the Conference: David Easton, University of Chicago; Cortez Ewing, University of Oklahoma; Frank Grace, University of Michigan; Pendleton Herring, Social Science Research Council; Thomas Jenkin, University of California (Los Angeles); Evron Kirkpatrick, American Political Science Association; Avery Leiserson, Vanderbilt University; Norton Long, Western Reserve University; Austin Ranney, University of Illinois; David Smith, Swarthmore College; John Stewart, Rockefeller Foundation; Kenneth Thompson, Rockefeller Foundation; and Sheldon Wolin, University of California (Berkeley). Roy C. Macridis, Northwestern University, organized the conference and acted as chairman and Harry Eckstein, Harvard University, was the rapporteur.

The report indicates the most significant aspects of the discussion and highlights the false distinction between "behaviorists" and "theorists." At the same time it meets squarely the issue of the role of political philosophy in graduate instruction in political science.

It should be pointed out that this report is not meant in any sense to be a comprehensive summary of the proceedings of the conference. No stenographic notes were kept, and Dr. Eckstein did not attempt to reproduce the individual arguments presented in the various papers. He followed and often participated in the discussions that took place, and what he wrote may be considered to be in the nature of an interpretive commentary upon the conference. In a number of instances he may have omitted important remarks made by individual participants, while in other instances he may have summarized only too briefly arguments that to some participants appeared to be important. This in a sense was unavoidable.—ROY MACRIDIS, Northwestern University

The issues which arose during the discussions of the conference fall fairly conveniently into three compartments.

First, we obviously had to settle, with reasonable clarity, what we were talking about: what "political philosophy" is, what "political science" is, and whether they are really distinguishable. The basic issue of the conference was to determine the relevance of the one to the study of the other, and if we had decided that they were really the same thing, there would simply have been no problems for us to discuss. On the whole, we felt that a valid, if not necessarily sharp, distinction was to be made between the "philosophical" and the "scientific" approaches to the study of politics and that we were not discussing absurd or tautological issues. We agreed, however, that all types of political inquiry involve the construction of theory, implicit or explicit, and that the title "political theory" has been unjustifiably appropriated by the historians of political thought.

* Reprints of this article may be obtained on request to the Curriculum Development Project, Political Science Department, Northwestern University, Evanston, Illinois.

Second, what is the point of studying the political philosophies of the past? Why insist that they be part of the equipment of the professional political scientist? Ought we not to stop "hesitating to forget our founders" and relegate them to the general education courses, where all good obsolete Greats properly belong? Needless to say, these questions, less aggressively phrased, took up most of our discussions. Needless to say also, they resolved themselves into two categories of questions. That is to say, the utility of political philosophy might be found either in the intrinsic ability of the best of past political thought to sharpen the wits of contemporary political thinkers, much as any difficult intellectual exercise sharpens the mind and deepens the imagination, or in the ability of political philosophy to serve as a thought-saving device by providing the political scientist with a rich source of concepts, models, insights, theories, and methods.

Third, what should be the role of contemporary political philosophers in the field—not of teachers of the history of political philosophy, but of people who still devote themselves to creative political philosophy?

The conference did not reach agreement on all of these large issues, nor did we succeed in isolating all the subsidiary problems they pose. But our discussions at least touched on all of them.

I. THE END OF THE STUDY OF POLITICS

Most of the disagreements which arose during the discussions of the conference arose from certain fundamentally different ideas about the "end" of the study of politics. It is very difficult to state precisely in what sense our ideas on this subject differed; certainly we never had a sharply focussed debate on it. But there were perceptible differences in mood among the members, a certain something in the "climate of opinion" which was omnipresent, if only as an undercurrent, in the debates we did have. In sharply focussing the issue, therefore, there may be some distortion of what was actually said at the conference.

For the sake of clarity, it may be useful to deal with the various shades of opinion which gradually emerged on the subject in terms of a dichotomy of views. On the one hand, there were certain people who would probably not object to being called behaviorists if I confess to loose usage of the term; these people seemed to feel that the main task of contemporary political science (its historic mission, as it were) is to transform the field of political studies into a genuine scientific discipline. What this means will be discussed more concretely below. On the other hand, there were certain people (anti-behaviorists, again loosely speaking) who felt that the end of the study of politics was something they called political wisdom, and that wisdom about (or in) politics could not be achieved at all, or that it could not be best achieved, by the sort of discipline the behaviorists seemed to want. The vast majority of the members of the conference, however, steered a careful, even if at times ambiguous, middle course between these extremes.

What troubled the "behaviorists," of course, was the extreme eclecticism and individualism of effort in political science. The field seemed to them to lack all the characteristics of a discipline, especially the constant accumulation of tested theories, a high degree of meaningful communication among its practitioners, and a high degree of cooperative research activity. This, they felt, makes us different not only from the natural scientists (a difference which might be justified on the basis of differences in subject-matter and practicable research techniques), but also from other social scientists, especially economists and sociologists, and for this they felt there was no justification at all. But exactly why does political science have so extraordinarily little "discipline"? The diagnosis of the behaviorists is a familiar one. We do not accumulate, communicate, and cooperate sufficiently because we have no common language, no common problems, no significant methodological agreement in the field as a whole; and we lack these highly desirable things because we do not have a comprehensive and shared model (or conceptual scheme) of the political process which could guide our researches and give them a collectively coherent structure. Our task, therefore, is to unify and to systematize our field; at any rate, this, if not the ultimate end of the study of politics, should be our immediate goal.

Obviously, however, the behaviorists were not willing to buy discipline at the price of "wisdom." Therefore, when the "anti-behaviorists" opposed them with pleas for wisdom they clearly had something rather special in mind, something which can be roughly put as follows (and it can only be put "roughly"):

- (1) Wisdom is to be found not in "explanation" but in "understanding." "Explanation," the anti-behaviorists felt, involves the systematic collection of data and the rigorous application of theoretical procedures (hypothesizing and testing, presumably) to the data, generally in accordance with a set of arbitrary rules which, properly observed, result in something called "verified theory." The whole process, in short, is a mechanical sort of game rather than genuinely intellectual, speculative activity. In its most repulsive form, it is "scientism," which was defined by one member as the use of mathematical procedures for the manipulation of political data. "Understanding," on the other hand, goes to the very core of experience; it involves, presumably, some deeper, perhaps more intuitive grasp of the meaning of reality. It is more likely to grow out of a flash of insight than a long evening with the logarithm table; it is certainly more likely to be found in an aphorism than in a conceptual scheme. One can get "understanding" only from a sensitive, critical, imaginative mind, not from a mere human IBM machine.
- (2) Wisdom, moreover, penetrates certain kinds of experience which a "scientific" discipline either could not or would not touch and which may be the most important in our field. There is, in the first place, the field of moral speculation. Morality cannot be factored out of politics or the study of politics, it only because the very function of politics is to formulate imperatives and to back them with collective force. There is, again, the field of immediate practical activity. We cannot wait for the scientific machinery to grind out rigorously tested results before we act. Action is thrust upon us; policies have to be made, usually on the basis of something less than total knowledge and absolutely systematic calculation. Nor should the student of politics wash his hands of the charges he has no influence practical activity simply because he is not in command of a commonly shared theoretical system. At the very least, he has sufficient knowledge and experience to justify his influence. And one may even suspect that "wisdom," in the rather vague sense used here (a good grasp of data, keenness of mind, highly-developed critical power), is more likely to be useful in practical activity than any systematically formulated theories would be, even if we had them.

In a sense, all this means simply that the behaviorists wanted to train, the anti-behaviorists to cultivate people engaged in the study of politics. But the vast majority—the "Marsh" of our Assembly—felt that the distinction between discipline and wisdom is a false one. They believed that we not only could but must have the best of both possible worlds. And this feeling seemed to grow out of genuine reasons rather than equivocation or politeness toward the extremists in the group.

In the first place, the moderates agreed on the desirability of "discipline" in the field, if by discipline is meant the cooperative and progressive accumulation of tested theories and a high degree of meaningful communication among the practitioners of political science. They did not, however, agree that the field was unprogressive and inchoate now. We do make progress, even though we may not be as self-conscious of it as people in other social sciences. What, after all, constitutes progress in a field like political science? It involves: first, increasing refinement in the definition of problems (learning what sort of questions to ask and not to ask); second, increasing conceptual precision; third, the accumulation of specific hypotheses about specific political systems and political behavior in general; fourth, the systematic conceptual analysis of the field; and fifth, the application of useful concepts, theories, and techniques from other fields to our subject-matter. One can easily cite long lists of recent works which make "progress" in all of these senses: e.g., Welton's analysis of the epistemological status of certain traditional problems in political philosophy, a whole spate of books (by Lasswell and deJouvenel, among a good many others) on "power," Goguel and Williams' analyses of the French political system, David Easton's diagnostic study of the current state of political science, the impressive use of psychological techniques by the authors of The Authoritarian Personality (who, to be sure, are not professional political scientists), DeGrazia's use of anomie theory in The Political Community—one could go on for pages. And one need scarcely mention the accumulation of concepts and theories, the increasing refinement of techniques, the checking and rechecking of old theories, and the constant cross-fertilization of the field achieved by the best of the political "behaviorists" themselves.

The moderates, therefore, disagreed first of all with the behaviorists' diagnosis of the condition of the field. They disagreed also with their apparent desire for the organization of our work on the basis of some authoritarian conceptual scheme. They felt, in short, that eclecticism was desirable. No single line of approach, no conceptual map, however large its scale, could ever exhaust the richness of any field, least of all a field as rich as politics. If we all agreed on a single line of approach, we should soon find ourselves mistaking the map for reality and feel that we had progressed when we had translated familiar facts into unfamiliar jargon. The sense of being in on a mystery, which distinguishes most of the economists and some sociologists from ourselves, may not be an altogether unmixed blessing, particularly if it involves the identification of "science" with the rules of some esoteric methodological and conceptual game. The moderates felt, as Mill felt, that only pseudo-progress could be achieved by rigid conformity of any sort.

What then distinguished the moderates from the anti-behaviorists? The essential difference between them was that the moderates were unwilling to strip the field of all "scientific" pretensions and to concede that insights are superior to systems and aphorisms superior to correlations. The moderates felt simply that insights need to be subjected to rigorous analysis and that no aphorism can stand on its own two feet merely because it issues from a sensitive mind. Hence, of course, their insistence on eclecticism: the simultaneous cultivation of what the anti-behaviorists called "understanding" and "explanation," i.e., insight and discipline. They also felt that no real distinction was to be made between wisdom and science; that, in effect, the anti-behaviorists were using a value-laden term merely to conceal a profound anti-scientific bias.

These views led to three fundamentally different positions on the subject of the conference. One group felt that political philosophy probably does no one any great harm, but that it does very little good, either, so far as the condition of political science is concerned. Another group felt that political philosophy comprises all that is genuinely admirable and useful in the field. The third felt that political philosophy should have a major place in our departments precisely because it can play a useful role in political "science" itself.

II. POLITICAL PHILOSOPHY AND POLITICAL SCIENCE

What we called "political philosophy" is generally called "political theory" in the departments of political science. As I have said, we all agreed that this involves a mistaken use of the word "theory." Theorizing plays a role in all kinds of inquiries, even inquiries which pretend to do nothing more than collect data. After all, criteria of selection imply judgments of significance, and what are judgments of significance if not theories? Thus, we agreed that the theorist-behaviorist dichotomy, which seems to be taken seriously by most political scientists, is naive at best and dangerous at worst; dangerous, in the sense that a sharp separation between "theory" and "empirical" inquiry is likely to lead to both bad theorizing and bad empirical work.

What then did we mean by "political philosophy"? In the first place, we meant the great political speculations of the past, the works of people generally taught in our political theory courses. We were aware, of course, that it is arbitrary in the extreme to label as "philosophy" anything written before the First World War and to withhold the term from almost everything written thereafter. We decided on this meaning of the term, nevertheless, simply because we wanted to discuss the value of studying the Greats who had written on our subject.

Many members of the conference, however, thought that there was a more serious distinction to be made between political science and political philosophy. Political science, of course, is concerned with the analysis of actual political behavior. Political philosophy, we felt, could be distinguished from it on at least three reasonable grounds: subject, scope, and criteria of validity.

So far as subject is concerned, political philosophy is distinguished chiefly by the fact that it deals not only with matters of fact but also with matters of norm: either moral theory in the abstract or questions of immediate practical activity. Political philosophy, in short, is "concerned with ends as well as means"—one of the most frequently used phrases at the conference. In addition to moral theory, political philosophy also involves another kind of speculative activity, not strictly part of political science but highly relevant to it. This sort of speculative activity we might perhaps call "meta-theory": theory about theory. The term refers to something I have difficulty in putting very precisely, but anyone who has followed the trend in the contemporary philosophy departments will know what I mean. Modern philosophy seems increasingly to have given up the historic work of philosophy, the search for substantive truth. It seems increasingly to concentrate on commenting upon what the people who do search for substantive truth are doing: the language they use, the methods they employ, the epistemological and metaphysical implications of their activities, and so forth. Someone has said—and with some justification—that modern philosophers (in Britain and America) are "clever dilettantes who criticize the work of dull specialists." But this is not meant to poke fun at "meta-theory," which can obviously be extremely useful in the development of science. Meta-theory, in the sense the term is used here, includes analysis of the sort of problems one can fruitfully raise, the sort of language (concepts) one should or should not employ, the "ultimate implication" of substantive research findings, methodological analyses, general criticisms of research procedures and findings, and, not least, the overall programmatic analysis of a field, "programmatic" referring to the sort of analyses which are meant to lead to research rather than to present research findings. Weldon's Vocabulary of Politics and much of the work done by the Social Science Research Council's committees are fairly familiar cases in point.

So far as scope is concerned, political philosophy is characterized chiefly by system-building, i.e., the construction of comprehensive theories of politics. The line cannot be drawn precisely because we have no convenient measures of partialness and comprehensiveness. But one can at least illustrate the extremes. On one extreme would be, let us say, a theory explaining the defeat of the British Labor party in 1951; obviously such a theory is not likely to involve the ordering of a very great range of political experience. On the other hand would be theories like Marx's analysis of the state and the determinants of political power, which obviously involve the ordering of almost the whole of political experience and call for a judgment as to what is significant and insignificant in experience as such. Bentley's analysis of the process of government might also be cited on the Marxian extreme, despite his claim to have devised merely a basis for research, and Bentley is especially worth noting here because he is a political analyst to whom the philosophers and the scientists can clearly lay an equal claim, the former on the basis of both the scope and the meta-theoretical aspects of his work.

When we came to "criteria of proof" as a factor distinguishing political science and philosophy, we found ourselves in much muddier waters. Some of us felt that anything validated by correspondence is "science" and anything validated by anything else (or not validated at all—"above validation," perhaps) is philosophy. This would, of course, put moral theory in the realm of philosophy, since one certainly does not test moral theory by correspondence, if one tests it at all. Similarly, meta-theory would be philosophy since it, in a sense, is merely theory about testing itself.

The chief task of the conference was, of course, to discuss the utility of political philosophy in each of the two senses I have outlined: the study of the Greats, and the study of "comprehensive" political theories, theories of political obligation (moral theories) and meta-theoretical writings on political science.

III. THE UTILITY OF POLITICAL PHILOSOPHY

No one disputed that the Greats were worth studying for their intrinsic interest. Even the most extreme behaviorists felt that no one need apologize for being interested in the history of thought in our field. They considered the history of political thought to be as worthwhile as any other sort of history. It could no doubt give a great deal of amusement; it was probably as mentally stimulating as chess and as aesthetically pleasing as great art. We agreed that we did not want to breed philistines and that anything amusing, anything mentally stimulating, anything aesthetically pleasing needs no further defense. The question was, of course, whether the history of political thought was anything more than amusing to people who find their amusement in such things. What precisely would be lost if we surrendered our Greats to the history, philosophy, and General Education departments, as have most of the other fields? The behaviorists certainly would not have been very sad to see Plato and Locke deported to other jurisdictions, but the others felt that the loss would be both sad and harmful, most of all to the behaviorists themselves—and not only because they felt that moral theory, whatever its "scientific" status, was ultimately inseparable from political theory. The following are some other more important reasons:

1. Even if a good grasp of political philosophy cannot be immediately converted into brilliant scientific results, the majority of us felt that analysis of the Greats at least sharpens the wits, deepens the imagination, and refines one's critical powers—and that even the dullest specialist can use all the wits, imagination, and critical powers he can develop. There is no real distinction to be made between a cultivated mind and a trained mind, since some speculative ability is required in even the most routine of behavioral inquiries and practical activities. The majority of us felt that the attitude which underlies the British examination for the Administrative Class was entirely right; there were very few Huxes and Opimians among us.<sup>1</sup> One member of the conference who had had a great deal of administrative experience in Washington felt that, even on the lower bureau levels, men who had a broad grounding in "liberal arts" subjects showed greater capacity and, above all, greater adaptability than men trained mainly in a specialty. Most of us agreed that if the generalizing mind is desirable in a government bureau, it is even more desirable in a scholarly discipline. And most of us felt that speculative and critical abilities are not simply natural gifts, but talents to be developed by contact with great speculative and critical works. This, however, constitutes a defense of the liberal arts in general, not of political philosophy in particular.

2. Secondly, most of us felt that there is a need in any field for people who do not fully share the assumptions and attitudes of the orthodox "scientists." Every social organization has a tendency to isolate and punish the eccentric, to compel conformity to its dominant conceptions of ultimate truth and ultimate value, and frequently for good reasons. But the majority of the conference was sufficiently of the classical liberal persuasion to feel that too much success in this respect is self-defeating. No one can be sure that the scientific assumptions of today will not turn out to be the metaphysical nonsense of tomorrow; but we can be fairly certain that it is almost always the non-conformist who breaks new ground and makes "progress." One way to prevent the over-routinization of new and temporarily dominant ideas is, of course, to keep the history of ideas constantly in mind; if nothing else, this will engender a healthy perspective to-

<sup>1</sup> Miss Hux (in T. L. Peacock's Gryll Grange): "The poor young men . . . are not held qualified for a profession unless they have overloaded their understanding with things of no use in it. . . ."

The Rev. Dr. Opimian: "Very true. Brindly would not have passed as a canal-maker, nor Edward Williams as a bridge-builder. I saw the other day some examination papers which would have infallibly excluded Marlborough from the army and Nelson from the navy. . . . Fancy Watt being asked how much Joan of Naples got for Avignon when she sold it to Pope Clement the Sixth."

Compare, on the other hand, the remark of Mr. Flosky (in Nightmare Abbey), who speaks for the "wisdom" party (Flosky is a parody on Coleridge, a political philosopher in good standing): "My dear Miss O'Carroll, it would have given me great pleasure to have said anything that would have given you pleasure; but if any person living could make report of having obtained any information on any subject from Ferdinando Flosky, my transcendental reputation would be ruined forever."

ward the authoritarian tendencies which generally afflict every field of inquiry at every stage of its development. Another way to prevent it is to present the student with a variety of different approaches to the analysis of the same subject; and this, in lieu of a sufficient number of eccentrics in our departments, can be accomplished by studying the eccentrics who fill Professor Sabine's book. Thus, while some of the behaviorists agreed that the study of political philosophy is useful as long as we do not have a real discipline of political science, the rest felt that it would be particularly useful when and if we ever got a discipline worthy of the name.

3. The majority felt, however, that there is a still stronger argument to be made for retaining the history of political ideas as a central part of the field. This argument rests on the very nature of the social as distinguished from the natural sciences. The study of society must be historical and "dynamic" precisely because the social sciences do not deal with a closed universe into which nothing new ever intrudes and in which a fixed mechanism plays itself out into a constant uniformity of motion. Most of us were on the side of Heraclitus and Hegel: "Everything is and is not, for everything is fluid, is constantly changing, constantly coming into being and passing away." Whether the natural sciences also deal with a dynamic universe the conference, unlike Engels, did not dare to discuss; but we felt reasonably certain, at any rate, of the need for dynamic models and theories in the social sciences.

Consistently with this attitude, we felt that the impression of unreality many of us get from sister-fields like economics and sociology is due to the prevalence of static models in these fields. Nor did we think it accidental that static models should be so prevalent in them. We agreed with one of the members that the emphasis on methodological rigor in these fields results in an exaggerated preoccupation with the "here and now" and hence with static analyses of static social situations. Political philosophy, even if it cannot claim the logical rigor of economic theory or the empirical comprehensiveness of the Yankee City series, at least accommodates the "intelligent" analysis of the real essence of our subject, dynamic change in time. We felt, of course, that a rigorous dynamic approach to social behavior may some day be worked out by the behaviorists. But the majority felt that the work of the economists, sociologists, and our own behaviorists offered no immediate hope of this and that there was such an affinity between systematic rigor and static analysis that there was every prospect of disappointment in the future. Hence, at least in the short run—and probably also in the long run—a healthy emphasis on dynamic analysis presupposes an equally healthy emphasis on political philosophy, as distinguished from the sort of thing the behaviorists wanted.

4. There is still another argument to be made for political philosophy on the basis of the dynamic historical nature of political science—and here we come much closer to the "cash value" of political philosophy to the behaviorists. The documents which comprise the history of political thought are simply one of the sources (many sources) on which we can construct knowledge of politics in the past. They are not absolutely reliable documents; they are certainly not compendia of the sort of information about the past all of us want. Hence the tendency of the rigid behaviorists to neglect the past for the here and now: we simply cannot do in the past what The Authoritarian Personality has done in the present. But this is a fault which documents in political philosophy share with all other historical documents, and even perhaps with contemporary documents. After all, Plato's Dialogues and Aristotle's Politics may contain more information relevant to the general analysis of political behavior than all the voting statistics compiled and sifted for Erie county. The problem of checking and evaluating the information contained in the documents of political philosophy merely involves the application of historiographical techniques. That does not mean that the problem is easy to solve in every case; it does mean that a discipline for coping with it exists—a discipline incidentally, in which most of us unfortunately have no technical training. The point is that political behavior in the past is an indispensable datum for the analysis of political behavior as such; hence we must make the best we can of the sources we have on past political behavior, and the history of political thought is one of these sources. There may be better ones, but in historical research one must use everything one can get.

5. Moreover, the history of political thought, not least because of the moral consciousness of the political philosophers, may be particularly informative on a matter of obviously central importance in the field: political ideologies. Most of us agreed that political activities and political attitudes are inseparably related aspects of the same phenomena. Conceptions of "legitimacy," the myths in men's minds, the way in which they view the world and the way in which they translate their world-views into political "directives" are absolutely fundamental to the correct analysis of political behavior. Even our behaviorists were not behaviorists in the more narrow sense of the term.

But here a disagreement emerged among the members of the conference which was never successfully resolved, even among the moderates. Do the highly refined ideologies which constitute our History of Political Thought courses really and accurately reflect ideologies which have actually influenced behavior? Do the sort of people whom Max Weber called Kathedersozialisten really have the same sort of attitudes as the people who actually go to the barricades? If we agreed on anything here, it was on the point that no general judgment could be made on the matter; every case must be treated on its own merits. We felt that probably all political philosophies (above all American political philosophies) reflect popular ideologies; that the consciousness of even the most free-floating intellectual is conditioned by the consciousness of his society; and that this social consciousness can manifest itself not only in conformity with an ideology but also in revolt against it. Hence, the majority of us felt that all political philosophies are potentially useful sources of politically significant ideologies.

We also felt, however, that the unsophisticated identification of political philosophy and politically significant ideology is full of dangers. The fact that Rousseau's political thought has both democratic and totalitarian implications

(if it does) does not mean, ipso facto, that they are the sources of British socialism or that British Socialists think like Green, Bradley, and Bosanquet. Hence, positing a one-one relationship between "political philosophy" and politically significant "ideology" is, perhaps more often than not, merely a way of avoiding difficult historical research.

Many of us felt that, in most cases, we have available infinitely better sources of politically significant ideologies than the cream of political thought, and that neither the political behaviorists nor the political "theorists" have scratched even the surface of these sources—although the historians have, usually for purposes different from ours. The "behaviorists" have not extracted the juice from the sources because they are too current-events-conscious and frequently lack a decent training in historiography. The "theorists" have neglected them because they lack adequate training in empirical research techniques and because they are not genuinely interested in political behavior. There is, consequently, a vast territory of politically significant information which lies fallow, mainly because we seem unable to reach a reasonable compromise between the study of Plato and the study of local government in Illinois.

Many members of the conference felt that the priority of research in ideologies should be given to these sources (legal documents, novels, letters, memoirs, pamphlets, handbills) rather than to the Greats. Others, however, felt that the Greats were at least a source of what we want and that the evaluation of their "relevance" posed no problems intrinsically different from the problems posed by the other sources.

6. If political philosophy is valuable as a source of data, it is also valuable as a source of ideas for analyzing the data. The history of political thought is indisputably a gold-mine of concepts, models, hypotheses, and methods which may turn out to be useful even in the analysis of contemporary political behavior.

What really disturbed us on this subject was not whether political philosophy is useful but why the reservoir of potentially useful ideas in the history of political thought is not being used more. After all, if we want a "cumulative" discipline we need not begin entirely from scratch; we need only use whatever is useful in past thought on politics. The reason we rarely do this is plain and has already been mentioned: the fact that the behaviorists have a generally insufficient interest and preparation in the history of political thought and the fact that the historians of political thought hardly ever do anything but expound the history of political ideas.

This is the real core of the difficulty, and the real reason, many of us felt, why it was necessary to have a conference on the relevance of political philosophy to political science at all. Their relevance to one another seemed beyond question to the majority at the conference. And if the majority is right, the problem of the conference is ultimately a political rather than an intellectual problem: how to persuade the practitioners in the field to develop a healthy interest and to acquire a healthy preparation in both political science and philosophy. It should be added that we did not feel that this is simply a matter of persuading the behaviorists to take their Aristotle out of the basement. It would also involve persuading the political "philosophers" to stoop to the grimy work of empirical analysis occasionally. Our villain, in the final analysis, and not surprisingly, was simply the "behaviorist"- "theorist" dichotomy.

IV. THE ROLE OF THE CONTEMPORARY POLITICAL PHILOSOPHER

But what of the contemporary political philosopher, i.e., the man who is less interested in expounding the history of political "theories" than in adding to them? What sort of work might he do? And, above all, in what special ways can he be useful to the political "scientists" other than those in which all political "theories" are useful to them?

1. The anti-behaviorists felt, on the whole, that he should perform two roles. First, he should undertake the never-ending task of ethical and moral reflection: ethical reflection toward the definition and critique of ultimate imperatives, moral reflection toward the definition of actions which can approach the imperatives in practical activity. In effect, he should address himself to the matter of ends and means, to the problems of choice in practical activity rather than the analysis of behavior as a given. His function, in this sense, is to be a source of directives for society in general. Second, he should use his critical powers, experience, and general knowledge—his "wisdom"—in commenting upon contemporary political experience: analyzing broad trends in political development, criticizing the activities of statesmen, trying to penetrate the inner meaning, as it were, of contemporary political life.

2. The moderates felt that the chief task of the contemporary political philosopher was to provide a constant flow of theoretical ideas and concepts to those more interested in empirical work; ideas and concepts, however, which have no claim to "wisdom" other than their utility and testability in "scientific" analysis. They felt that it was perhaps not entirely necessary for every practitioner in the field to possess both a highly-developed theoretical imagination and a rigorous command of empirical research methods. Instead, there might well be some sort of rational division of labor. At any rate, the moderates could not see why certain political scientists should not devote their efforts chiefly to speculation, provided that they were sufficiently aware of the problems and difficulties arising in empirical analysis to make their ideas useful to the behaviorists.

3. Interestingly enough, the behaviorists, more than anyone else, insisted on the system-building and meta-theoretical functions of the contemporary political philosopher. It is not difficult to see why they should insist on system-building. After all, if the immediate task of political science is to transform itself into a unified discipline, we need someone to perform the unifying function: someone to construct the authoritative model of the political process and program for research which would govern our future activities, to coin the interrelated concepts, to chart the map, and to base the system on the relevant work already done in detail. This would be the unique function of the political philosophers. They would be sources not of moral directives but of scientific directives. Here, of course, the behaviorists and anti-behaviorists might join hands—as usual, the extremists turn out to be not so entirely different from one another—for the wise philosopher of the anti-behaviorists would be peculiarly fitted to play the unifying role in the field. But perhaps this is not entirely fair, since the behaviorists would vehemently insist that even the wisest of conceptual schemes is merely a program for research and can have no claim to validity in and of itself.

Even more important, the behaviorists insisted that the political philosophers should play a more constructive role as “critics” of the work of the political scientists, i.e., that they should increasingly assume the position which modern philosophy in general is assuming toward the substantive fields. There should be less expounding of the ancients and more keeping the moderns up to the mark. The contemporary political philosopher should be constantly engaged in the critical analysis of the political scientist’s concepts, the methods he uses, the models which seem to govern his work, and the consistency of his findings and reasonings. He should constantly clarify the basic assumptions of the behaviorist’s work and its “larger” implications. This is the service in which he can most help the work of political science and find a justifiable niche for himself in our academic departments. He should, in short, be a methodologically and linguistically sophisticated critic, in constant process of refining the products of empirical activity.

CONCLUSION

At the end of the conference, many of us felt that a real problem confronting us was revealed by our discussions. How and why had the political “philosophers” and the political “scientists” managed to drift so far apart in their work when most of them were so eager to concede that they had much to learn from one another? It would be tedious and not very useful to go into all the possible explanations. The important thing is not to hold post mortems—which might after all only widen the breach—but to begin making some attempts to bring the two closer together. Some of us believed that the most promising step at present would be to attempt some sort of collaborative analysis of the area in which political science and philosophy touch most closely on one another, i.e., the field of politically significant “ideologies.” However this may be, it is hoped that this report will stimulate further thought in tackling this problem of collaborative work between “philosopher” and “scientist.”

REVISION OF THE NOMINATION AND ELECTION PROCEDURE OF THE ASSOCIATION

A SYMPOSIUM

At the Council meeting in Boulder in September, 1955, Professor Norman J. Padelford, Chairman of the Nominating Committee in 1954-55, presented a proposal for revising the provisions of the Constitution governing the election of officers of the Association. The Nominating Committee was itself divided on the question of the recommendations and the Council, after voting down the proposals, referred them to the Executive Committee for further study.

The Executive Committee decided to ask Professor Padelford to write a brief statement setting forth the proposals and the arguments for them to be published in the Review. At the same time it decided to ask one member of the 1954-55 Committee, who had been opposed to the proposals, to set forth the arguments against them; Mr. Howard R. Penniman was asked to do this. The Executive Committee decided to send these statements to several people from different sections of the country for comment and to print the Padelford and Penniman statements along with the comments in the Review. Not all those asked to comment did so; five replies, however, were received and are printed here along with the two main papers.

It is the hope of the Executive Committee that the printing of this material will stimulate thinking and discussion on the problem and that many members will take the time to write the Executive Committee expressing their views and any alternative proposals they may have. Letters should be addressed to Mr. Evron M. Kirkpatrick, Executive Director, The American Political Science Association, 1726 Massachusetts Avenue, N. W., Washington 6, D. C.

THE CASE FOR REVISION

NORMAN J. PADELFORD

Chairman of Nominating Committee, 1954-55

I

One of the most vital aspects of any democratic organization should be the procedure by which its elective officers are chosen. For many years the elective officers of The American Political Science Association have been nominated by a select committee appointed by the President and elected by ballot at the Annual Business Meeting of the Association. An eminent succession of officers has been brought to the leadership of the Association by this process. And on the whole there has been little complaint about the persons elected to office.

Complaints have been forthcoming, however, that the present procedures are undemocratic and that there is growing apathy among a substantial portion of the membership regarding the annual elections. Specifically, objections have been voiced that (1) the present constitutional provisions afford members little opportunity for exercising a choice in the election of officers, and (2) elections are determined by the unrepresentative character of the Annual Business Meetings, where attendance is often relatively small.

II

As the Constitution stands, opportunity is afforded to every member of the Association to vote for the elective officers by attending the Annual Business Meeting. There are no qualifications or bars to voting other than being a member in good standing and not even union labels have to be shown to attend and vote. On occasion, members have turned out in large numbers for the elections when they have believed a serious issue was at stake. And they have overridden the slate presented by the Nominating Committee. But this has been highly exceptional. Furthermore, the Constitution (Article V, paragraph 2) does provide a "safety valve" in permitting additional names or a substitute slate to be brought in to the Annual Meeting, provided notice is given to the Secretary 24 hours in advance and a petition is signed by 10 members. Normally, however, the Nominating Committees' slates are voted through without challenge or the presentation of additional names giving the members opportunity to exercise any real choice.

It can hardly be gainsaid that attendance at the Annual Meetings is determined to a considerable degree by factors of location, time, academic or other conflicting duties, costs of travel, and other elements over which many members have little or no control. Many of our members, especially those teachers who are dependent upon their own salaries for travel and hotel expenses, are unable to attend each year. They are thereby denied the opportunity of registering a vote either for or against the slates presented.

Attendance at the Annual Business Meetings in the past few years has been in the neighborhood of 100-150. This is a small fraction of an association now numbering over 5,000 members. It matters little whether this ratio of attendance to total membership is larger or smaller than that of other comparable learned societies. And it is not questioned that those in attendance have elected a competent, distinguished line of officers. The point is that a large percentage of our membership is not in fact able to participate in the choice of our elective officers year after year. Under the circumstances it is more or less inevitable that a "who cares?" attitude has grown up among many and that elections are regarded as being "cut and dried," determined by a handful who are prejudiced in favor of a coterie of big-name institutions, chiefly east of the Missouri and north of the bluegrass country.

More democracy may not be a universal cure-all for shortcomings in democratic processes. But in a society of political scientists whose members are accustomed to professing the virtues of democracy and of supporting the universal—even the absentee—ballot, surely some means must be conceivable by which a considerably larger percentage of the membership of this Association may be enabled to participate in the annual election of officers. Wider and more regular participation in this respect could lead not only to removal of existent criticisms but also to an enlivened sense of responsibility for and interest in the larger aspects of Association activities. Moreover, such increased participation in elections would compensate for the accidental factors that so often govern attendance at the Annual Business Meetings.

III

Concern has been expressed lest an extension of the voting privilege would result in the election of ill-balanced groups of officers. There should be no insuperable problem in this regard, however, if the Nominating Committees discharge their responsibility properly. Long and dedicated work is required if the Nominating Committees are to weigh adequately all of the factors that should be taken into account in selecting suitable groups of nominees from the field of all possible candidates. The elective offices of the Association have always been regarded as honorary positions to be filled upon a basis of recognition of the scholarly and public accomplishments and contributions of members. It is vital that this aspect of nominations and elections be preserved if the larger on-going interests of the Association are to be advanced. At the same time, the elective officer groups should be broadly and fairly representative of the different fields of political science, of the various regions of the country and of the various types of institutions in which political scientists are located. Finally, it is essential to the wellbeing of the Association that the elective officers each year should possess such a combination of knowledge, experience, and personal qualities that they may be able to work together effectively as a team in furthering the work of the organization in the year that lies immediately ahead. Such a balance can be achieved only if the election stage is preceded by adequate deliberation on the part of competent Nominating Committees. It cannot be gained or preserved by reducing nominations or elections to the huckstering of political campaigning. For this reason it is desirable that the present methods of selecting slates of nominees be retained. Given adequate effort by the Nominating Committees, there is little reason to fear that elections will not turn out satisfactorily if changes are made to permit polling a larger share of the membership.

It has been customary in recent years to invite members of the Association, by means of a published notice in the December issue of the Review, to submit names of suggested nominees to the Nominating Committees. This has been genuinely useful to the Committees. Last year some 130 members situated in more than 80 institutions sent in suggestions. As a result 47 names were placed before the Committee for the position of President-elect. Eighty-three persons were suggested for the vice presidency; 104 for membership on the Council, and several each for the offices of Secretary and Treasurer. The very size of such a list reveals something of the range of personnel from which the Nominating Committees make their selections, as well as some indication of the magnitude of the work done by these Committees.

The Nominating Committees of the past two years have been satisfied that the existent constitutional provisions do provide a genuine opportunity for membership participation in the nomination stage and that members are taking advantage of this opportunity.

On the other hand, few departments of political science appear to discuss collectively possible nominees or send in names for the benefit of the Committee. If the departments would assume some more active measure of responsibility for discussing and forwarding nomination suggestions, this could be additionally helpful to the Nominating Committee.

IV

In contrast to the opportunities for membership participation in the nomination process, there is relatively little provision for exercising a choice in the final election of officers. And members who for any reason are unable to attend the Annual Business Meeting are denied both a vote and an opportunity to register any choice in the election. Little use has been made of the "safety valve" clause in Article V, paragraph 2 permitting additional nominations to be offered from the floor. Taken in conjunction with the timing of the annual election and the inability of most members to take part in it, the normal absence of any element of choice on the balloting contributes to lethargy concerning the election of Association officers.

It may be argued that allowing a choice on the ballot will introduce lobbying activity into the election of officers or result in denying representation to some area or field. These are conceivable risks. Statements have been made, on the other hand, by members of other professional associations having as large and as widely dispersed a membership as ours that they have been able to devise election methods giving each member a vote and a choice regardless of attendance at the Annual Business Meeting without introducing undesirable political maneuvering or the election of poorly balanced groups of officers.

In the interests of democratic procedure and of stimulating more lively concern with the business of the Association on the part of a larger circle of the total membership, it is time that two steps were taken toward liberalizing and democratizing the election procedure.

Suggestion No. 1 is to amend Article V, paragraph 2 of the Constitution to permit the Nominating Committee to name one person each for President-elect and for Treasurer, but twice as many nominees for the offices of Vice President, Council member, and Secretary as are to be elected each year.

Some consideration was given to this idea at the time of the Constitution revision in 1953. It was then felt that this would unduly complicate the work of the Nominating Committee, that it was unnecessary, and that it might result both in electioneering and in possibly obtaining groups of officers not representative of the society as a whole.

Having served on the Nominating Committee during the past two years, and as chairman this last year, it is my personal opinion that a suitably constituted, conscientious Nominating Committee, representing within itself a cross-section of the membership, can prepare a slate of nominees allowing the element of choice suggested above and still insure a proper balance among the elected officers. The number of competent persons recommended to the Committee last year amply testifies that there is no lack of personnel from which to make selections allowing such a choice on the ballot and yet representing all fields and regions. Maintenance of the desired balance can be easily handled by setting up categories within which choices may be made.

It has been argued that some persons would not wish to have their names appear on the ballot if there were a chance they might be defeated. This is possible. It is also true that persons defeated might be disappointed. This is hardly unique. This is a small price to pay for the general advantages that might be gained. Moreover, experience might well show that most active members would be willing to stand for election if asked to do so.

As Chairman of the Nominating Committee in 1955, I consulted with officers or active members of 12 other professional associations on their nomination and election procedures. These included such comparable groups as the American Economic Association, American Historical Association, Industrial Relations Research Association, American Statistical Association, Mathematical Association, Modern Language Association, American Chemical Society, etc. In 10 instances the multiple-choice nomination is used for officers other than the President-elect. No instance was mentioned of an organization having been adversely affected by giving the membership a choice in electing officers below that of the President. It was reported that electioneering had occurred in the American Economic Association when their Constitution provided for submission of two names for the presidency. But this is said to have disappeared to any undesirable degree since single nominations for that office have been employed. The same is said to be the case in the Industrial Relations Research Association. Most of the other Associations consulted, some with a smaller membership, others with many times that of ours, such as the American Chemical Society with a membership of 60,000, find the multiple choice for officers below that of President and for Council members altogether satisfactory and desirable. Many of these associations have a comparable multiplicity of fields represented in their memberships.

Suggestion No. 2 is to amend Article V, Paragraph 1 of the Constitution to provide for the annual election of all elective officers by means of a printed mail ballot to be sent to all members not later than May 15 of each year together with a post-paid return envelope.

Eleven of the twelve societies consulted employ the mail ballot, believing this to be more democratic and effective than election at the Annual Business Meetings. To conduct a postal ballot by May 15 will require that the Nomination Committee complete its work by May 1. This should present no difficulty. Moreover, a deadline should be fixed for returning the ballots, since a ballot conducted over the summer would obviously produce poor results.

If the experience of other associations is at all meaningful, it is conceivable that at least 40-50 per cent of the members of the Association would participate in the elections. Is such an enlarged participation to be dismissed as being of no consequence? If so, this is in effect saying that one does not care whether the majority of members of the Association are or are not able to take part in electing the officers of the organization. Why should the Political Science Association expect its members to journey to a remote city, at a good deal of expense to themselves or their institutions, to cast a vote for elective officers when in public affairs it is always expected that local polling facilities and a mail ballot for those who are absent and unable to cast their ballot in their own community will be provided? It would make as much sense to require all political scientists to journey to Washington every four years to cast their ballots for the President of the United States as to have to go to Washington, Chicago, New York, or Boulder to vote for the President and officers of the American Political Science Association each year. The former would be considered an outrageous requirement, even if members had business to transact in the Capital while there! Has the time not come for this Association to demonstrate that the principles of equality of opportunity and democratic choice can be applied here?

Experience in other professional societies suggests that the combination of a representative Nominating Committee, a single nomination for the President-elect and Treasurer, but dual nominations for other officers, taken together with the postal ballot, will produce a dignified election of competent members of the organization who have concerned themselves with its affairs over the years, and at the same time give every member the satisfaction, and the responsibility, of casting a vote and exercising some element of choice in so doing. This should produce no more accidents or undesirable practices than the present undemocratic method of choosing our officers.

Some other steps might be considered along with the postal ballot, such as including a place for suggesting names for the following year, and possibly sending bills for annual dues with the ballots. This is done by the American Economic Association thereby saving costs in mailing and at the same time reminding members that privileges and responsibilities go hand in hand. Members of the AEA say that there has been no substantial criticism of this procedure. On the contrary, it has been said that this has promoted regularity of payment.

V

There are problems and questions connected with such changes in the procedures of the Association. Some of these were faced by the Constitutional Revision Committee in 1953; others were not. In any event, they are worth examining anew in the light of experience in this and other associations.

When the previous Constitution was submitted to the Association in 1943, the Chairman of the Revision Committee, Robert E. Cushman, remarked that "an association which includes constitutional law among its fields of study should possess a model constitution which might well be imitated by other learned and professional societies." The present Constitution unquestionably is a model in many respects. But so far as democracy in elections is concerned, we are trailing among our peers.

No system is likely to insure 100 per cent participation in the election of officers. But it is conceivable that with care possible dangers that may seem to lurk in some of the changes suggested above can be avoided and that the present method of selecting our officers may be improved upon in such a manner that the Association will enlist a more substantial proportion of its membership in this phase of its activity. And with this it is not unreasonable to suppose, may come broader participation in the intellectual pursuits of the Association.

THE CASE AGAINST REVISION

HOWARD R. PENNINGTON

Member of Nominating Committee, 1955

Much attention is given in Mr. Padelford's memorandum to the question of the degree of democracy existing in the American Political Science Association under existing nomination and election arrangements. I am doubtful of the relevance of that question in an organization of the character of the Association, and even more sceptical of any assertion that there is some necessary relationship between the belief of members of the Association in democracy for the state and what they ought to desire in the way of election procedures in their own Association.

The Political Science Association is a single-purpose organization established to advance the research and teaching of political scientists of the United States. The membership of the Association is to a very large extent homogeneous and is in agreement about the nature and purpose of the Association. In other words, the area of consensus within the Association covers almost all problems which come within the area of action by the Association. The above facts are of importance when considering nomination and election procedures.

Different groups and areas are represented in the Association but they are not conflicting groups and areas nor do they have conflicting or differing interests. Represented in the Association are geographic areas, various divisions of emphasis such as constitutional law, political theory, local government, etc., and large and small, private and public institutions. These differences do not represent a conflict of interest so far as the Association's program is concerned. Each area, field of interest, and type of institution needs to be represented on any governing body because each brings to the governing body information and knowledge which should be brought to bear upon a discussion of policy within the Association—policy aimed at the accomplishment of the single purpose of the Association as stated in paragraph one.

The purpose and character of the Political Science Association are unlike the purposes and character of the state. The state is concerned with many functions: it is concerned with social, economic, political problems within the state itself, and it is concerned with international affairs. On these matters, citizens hold widely different opinions. There are conflicting interests which must be taken into account. The state, certainly any large state, is composed of a heterogeneous people of differing and frequently conflicting interests. In a democratic state, we believe that it is essential to allow expression of opinion concerning the conflicting interests and that it is desirable to allow the establishment of political parties to bring about a coalition of interests in order that programs may be presented to the people for decision by majority vote at elections. The area of consensus within the democratic state may be broad or limited. All that is required is that there be agreement that the processes of democracy be approved by the vast majority of the people so that they are willing to have decisions determined by a majority vote of the people. If the area of consensus includes an agreement on an economic system, on social legislation, and on international relations, so much the better. So wide an area of consensus is not, however, likely or required in a state.

Note then the differences between the single-purpose professional organization like the Political Science Association and the state in composition of the membership, in the area of consensus, and in the number of conflicting interests existing within the organization. Note also that in the democratic state it is essential that we have parties and divisions in order that we may debate issues of conflict and decide those issues. By contrast, in the single-purpose organization such as the Association, to have divisions or parties is to create an artificial division based either on personalities or upon issues that have been created where issues previously did not exist.

The Association needs the knowledge of various disciplines, areas, and types of schools, but no one suggests that a conflict among these should be created or stirred up merely to satisfy a general belief in democracy applicable in another kind of situation. Indeed, it is argued by all that any system of selection of officers should assure the representation of all segments of the profession. The present system does assure that representation.

Unless one slate is placed against another slate by the Nominating Committee, with each of the slates nicely balanced to assure representation of area, subject matter, and type of school, there seems no obvious way to assure the representation of all segments of the profession on the Council. Any arrangement which provides for voting on individual candidates either by area or on a national basis makes it literally impossible to assure representation by all groups and at the same time provide a serious choice for members of the Association. Suppose we wish to assure representation of teachers of the various courses, of an area, of large and small institutions, private and public institutions, and of the bureaucracy. Do we tell the people of the Washington, Virginia, and Maryland area that no teaching institutions shall be represented from this area, or do we say that the bureaucracy will not be represented? Or must we, in California, pair a small college, basic course teacher against another small college, basic course teacher, thereby eliminating all others from possible consideration for the Council from this area? Or if the Nominating Committee decides that the best candidate is a political theorist from a large institution, then must the Committee find another political theorist from another large institution from the same area? If one is not available, must the logical choice then be dropped or should a constitutional law man be placed in nomination against the political theory man? If the latter is the case, what, aside from luck, is to prevent the selection of a Council made up of constitutional law men or research professors in behavioral politics or a political theory group?

If it is argued that all candidates should be selected on a national rather than a regional basis, how is there any assurance that there will not be over- or under-representation of any given area, teaching division, or type of institution?

Curiously, it is argued that the presidency ought to be excluded from the proposed new system of voting. We apparently should have democracy but not in the selection of the highest office available to Association members. The president is not to be selected in competition because it is feared that a contest will create political campaigning for an office which is intended to do honor to a man for his contribution to the profession. To propose two candidates would, it is argued, invite organized campaigns for one or the other of the candidates, thus removing the sense of honor and of award in the selection of the final choice. But why is this not true for the other offices which are also offered in recognition of achievement and which should therefore be equally free from organized campaign efforts?

If I am to judge from my two years' experience on the Nominating Committee of the Association, the Political Science Association has within it a few who would gladly organize to elect a person or persons on something other than a spontaneous basis and possibly even for reasons other than the recognition of his scholarship or his contribution to research and teaching in the profession. In both years that I was a member of the committee, at least one campaign was obviously carried on for at least one candidate. Letters were mimeographed, and apparently sent to hundreds of members of the profession asking that Mr. X be suggested to the Committee.

One supporter of Mr. X. carelessly included the mimeographed letter with his own letter when writing to the Chairman of the Nominating Committee. At least one letter supporting Mr. X came from a man who had more or less ostentatiously resigned from the Association several years before. Other letters supporting the candidacy of Mr. X came from equally unlikely sources. The Committee was perhaps swayed by this effort but probably to resist rather than to support Mr. X. Supposing, however, that there had been a contest or mail ballot, Mr. X might well have won by a sizable margin. The kind of screening process which now shows up such maneuvering would still remain at the level of nominations, but maneuvering would be invited at the level of election by the presentation of opposition candidates. It is certainly true that an organized group would have greater effect on a nation-wide mail balloting than on a committee or business meeting where campaigning soon becomes obvious. It is difficult to see the value of opening the association for electioneering of this sort when there is so little evidence of a widespread desire for a change in the present arrangements which were developed by serious leaders of the profession after serious consideration 13 years ago.

The argument for "change" asks for democracy and at the same time argues against politics. Democracy without politics is difficult to conceive. Yet we are invited to support an amendment which it is argued would provide just that.

A word or two should be said about the concern expressed over the small attendance at the business meetings and about the infrequency of use of the so-called "safety valve" clause in the Constitution. Business meetings, it is said, are attended by not more than 100 to 150 persons out of a membership of perhaps 6,000. It is implied that the remaining 5,900 are deprived of their vote because of the difficulty of attending Annual Meetings. The facts in the matter are somewhat different. Meetings in New York are attended by about 1,800 to 2,000 people, in Washington by 1,500 to 1,800, and in Chicago by 1,000. Conventions in the Far West are attended by 600 to 700. Of this fairly sizable number of members of the Association who attend the conventions, only 100 to 150 feel that is necessary to attend the Business Meeting. The remainder of the group apparently feels that the Association is running about as they desire and therefore that it is unnecessary for them to spend an hour and a half discussing policy for the Association. Members at the convention are certainly not prevented from attending business meetings because of excessive travel cost or any of the other reasons that are alleged to be important in the failure of members to attend the Business Meeting. These members are already present but do not feel that the Association's affairs will suffer from their absence from the Business Meeting.

It is suggested that because the "safety valve" clause has been used infrequently, members of the Association have not been protected against capricious action by appointed committees. The conclusion does not follow. The failure of members to act under the clause may mean that the members of the Association find it unnecessary to use a device which is available to them in case the Nominating Committee commits gross errors in its selection of proposed officers. The device is simple enough, so that at any time members may avail themselves of it successfully. What seems to be involved, therefore, is a lack of desire to use this device, probably because of a willingness to accept as sound the nominations of the designated committee.

Both on theoretical and on practical grounds, there seems to be no reason for a change in the existing procedures for either nominations or elections. If real issues arise, members may avail themselves of existing arrangements to nominate candidates other than those proposed by the Nominating Committee. Certainly more than 150 members can attend the Annual Business Meetings if they wish to upset or modify the slate proposed. Until real issues arise there is little reason to create artificial divisions or to encourage conflict within the Association by changing nomination and election procedures that appear to be satisfactory to the bulk of the Association members.

I have attempted to deal with the basic argument of Mr. Padelford's proposal with only a brief note on one or two of the lesser arguments. If I had addressed myself to all the individual points he advances, I would have questioned other assumptions and other statements of facts for which there seems to be little or no evidence. For example, on the basis of my conversations with members of other associations which follow other nomination and election procedures, I doubt his implicit assumption that the other procedures really are more democratic, result in better candidates, or fully satisfy members. I would have questioned the view that a mail ballot is more democratic or would be likely to produce better results and a more satisfied membership. I would have questioned whether there is any empirical evidence that, as Padelford says, "elections are regarded as being 'cut and dried,' determined by a handful who are prejudiced in favor of a coterie of big name institutions, chiefly east of the Missouri and north of the bluegrass country." If any significant number think this is so, an examination of lists of officers and Council members in the last dozen years would provide evidence that it is not; if anything, the West and South are overrepresented in relation to the proportion of total membership from those areas. Finally, I would have questioned Mr. Padelford's reasoning in asking for a change in existing arrangements after he himself states that "an eminent succession of officers has been brought to the leadership of the Association by this [the present] process. And on the whole there has been little complaint about the persons elected to office. . . . those in attendance [at the Annual Meeting] have elected a competent, distinguished line of officers."

COMMENT BY AVERY LEBERSON

Vanderbilt University

1. Mr. Padelford's memorandum states positively and without qualification: "The Nominating Committees of the past two years have been satisfied that the existent Constitutional provisions do provide a genuine opportunity for membership participation in the nomination stage and that members are taking advantage of this opportunity." I interpret this finding of fact on the part of an uncoerced and independent political scientist to mean that the Association is presently securing the essence of democratic consultation and participation where it counts, namely, in the responsible nomination and selection of qualified candidates for its elective offices. The document also says concerning the election process as a whole: "An eminent succession of officers has been brought to the leadership of the Association by this process. And on the whole there has been little complaint about the persons elected to office."

2. In view of this degree of fundamental agreement with respect to the crucial matters of fact, it would appear to be unnecessary to elaborate speculative arguments as to whether the Association should be or would be made "more democratic" if (a) the Nominating Committee were to name two candidates for each elective office other than the President-elect and Treasurer, and (b) a mail ballot were substituted for the Annual Business Meeting as the final step in electing officers. What I have to say further is provoked by this example of the contemporary propensity to tinker with the Constitution in a burst of misplaced moral energy in the name of democracy that ought to be discharged on issues that are vastly more pressing.

3. Proposal (a) is trivial, and there would be little objection to it if the author had not chosen to support it with no less than four express or implied propositions which are highly debatable in theory and extremely doubtful as premises for action: (1) increased participation in formal elections is desirable as an end in itself; (2) increased participation is desirable as long as we don't have "politics" and "electioneering"; (3) increased participation in formal elections implies "an enlivened sense of responsibility for and interest in the larger aspects of Association activities"; (4) the proposal should be supported by political scientists because they belong to a society whose members are accustomed to professing the virtues of democracy.

4. A reasonable case is made for Proposal (b), substituting a mail ballot for the Annual Business Meeting electing officers (which incidentally would require amending Article VII as well as Article V), as a purely technical device to increase membership participation in the formal voting for officers. A mail ballot would probably have this effect, but more is involved here than securing a 50 or 60 per cent participation in the annual elections. The purpose of our Association is "to encourage the study of Political Science." In my 20 years' membership I have gradually become convinced that by and large the 150 members who take the trouble to come to the Annual Business Meeting are more interested in promoting the study of politics and government than the 5,000 who stay away, including the 700-800 who attend the Convention but don't come to the Business Meeting. I am a member and officer of one of the Associations Mr. Padelford cites as an example of greater democracy than ours, and I can assure him that there is no more effective membership control of policy and officers under a mail ballot than under our convention system.

5. In summary, Mr. Padelford fails to demonstrate that a mail ballot would promote the paramount purpose of the Association, and he does not consider the possibility that a mail ballot might have the effect of further centralizing control over the affairs of the Association and reducing the widespread informal participation in the nominating process that now exists.

COMMENT BY NORTON LONG

Michigan State University

It seems to me that Dr. Padelford's paper and that of Dr. Penniman raise issues of fact and principle that cannot be resolved without further inquiry. Dr. Padelford asserts that our present procedures have proven satisfactory in producing officers of high quality and adequate representativeness. The controlling reason for changing our procedures is their alleged undemocratic character. This character is claimed to result in apathy on the part of the membership and loss of the sense of effective participation in the government of the Association. Dr. Penniman does not challenge this assertion of fact or consequence but claims that the remedy would be worse than the disease yielding all the evils of the direct primary and pressure politics. He does not rebut Dr. Padelford's evidence from the experience of comparable associations nor does his assertion of the administrative infeasibility of a responsibly-developed slate of multiple nominations seem persuasive:

Dr. Padelford's proposal appears to neglect the need for some means of supplementing committee nominations by action of the membership at large. Some provision for the right of revolution against even a multiple slate would seem desirable.

Dr. Penniman's fears of politics and pressures betray an unwillingness to face the facts of associational life that exist to an observable degree with us as with the A.M.A. and the Bar Association. The need for a Nominating Committee that will provide a well considered slate is as necessary with us as in the political arena. The need for effective means to reflect important membership sentiment that conflicts with what, from one point of view, seems an unselfish aristocracy and from another a self-perpetuating oligarchy is equally clear. Finally, the need to provide all significant segments of the Association with a responsible sense of participation in its government must be met if morale is to be maintained.

There seems evidence to sustain Dr. Padelford's view that significant dissatisfaction exists. Whether his proposals will remove this ought to be explored. Dr. Penniman's fears seem either groundless or the price of some greater degree of democracy. An association of adult political scientists ought to be able to resist the dangers of anarchical pressure politics. It ought also to be sufficiently cognizant of its own teachings to realize that responsible oligarchy tempered by the contingent right of revolution is perhaps the most that we can hope for and that this is no small achievement.

COMMENT BY F. W. CCKER

Yale University

I have doubts about the usefulness of Professor Padelford's first, and main, suggestion—that the Constitution be amended to permit the Nominating Committee to name one person each for President-elect and Treasurer, and twice as many nominees for the other offices. I agree that our present large membership, with the inevitably small attendance at our annual business meetings, makes our present electoral procedure "undemocratic"—or seems to make it so. And I agree that our "safety-valve" device accomplishes little or nothing in the way of changing the effects of the normal operation of our system of nomination and election.

We all agree, I believe, that a Nominating Committee should select nominees widely representative of fields, regions, types of institutional association, and types of professional achievement; and I think we agree that we should try to have presidents who are likely to show that sort of wisdom in appointing Nominating Committees—which is one of a president's most important duties. I think I agree with Howard Penniman that, if the proposed change is needed, it is needed as much in the choice of President as in the choice of other officers.

I believe that all must realize that we have so many members qualified for our elective offices that none of us can expect that all such members can hold office or care particularly about that distinction. None of us believes that holding an office in the Association is the only or the chief mark of distinction in our profession. So, obviously, there is no particular significance in the fact that some members happen not to have held any office in the Association. Yet it seems to me a little unfair to publicize annually, among our members, the names of members who are "defeated" in an election. I agree with Penniman in his view of the inadequacy of the comparison of our elections with political elections—in which nominees are voted for, or against, fully as much on the basis of policies advocated as on the basis of a candidate's personal qualifications.

I am not certain about these unfavorable conclusions on Padelford's "Suggestion No. 1." The fact that majorities of members in associations in affiliated fields (e.g., economics) have apparently found the proposed method of some use, after considerable experience with it, may well be a good argument in favor of Padelford's proposal.

In any case, I believe that a Nominating Committee should do everything reasonably possible to encourage members to send in proposed names to the Committee; and I believe that the Committee, before making its final decision on its nominations, should discuss its tentative nominations with the Executive Council. And I agree with Padelford's recommendation that the departments of political science might well assume more active responsibility in discussing possible nominees and in sending in names to the committee on nomination.

COMMENT BY CHARLES AIKIN

University of California, Berkeley

Member of Nominating Committees of 1947, 1955-1956

A number of Nominating Committees have considered the plan, or a reasonable facsimile of the plan, proposed by Professor Padelford. The Committee on Constitutional Structure of 1948, as well as the Committee on Constitutional Revision of 1953, studied proposals for multiple nominations. The basic idea back of such plans has been rejected by these Committees, or has not been received favorably by the Council. Professor Penniman's response to such proposals is persuasive. The opinion is widespread that, for an organization such as ours, there is no adequate substitute for the careful consideration that can be given to nominations by a representative Committee.

The adoption of a plan for multiple nomination of officers—including the office of President-elect or not—would lighten the work of Nominating Committees. Members of these Committees work with painstaking care in an effort to represent the Association as faithfully as possible; and their most difficult decision is the last one in which, after a series of eliminations, the candidate for each position is named. Multiple nominations would eliminate this onerous phase of the task by leaving it to a "free-for-all" at the Annual Meeting or through a mail ballot. A planned lottery at this point, while being undemocratic, would be less troublesome and less expensive, and undoubtedly would create a great deal of interest—if that is what is wanted.

The Association may decide to be democratic to the degree of presenting to the membership two or more slates of nominees. If that were done, the Nominating Committee, presumably, would emphasize divisions within our electorate; otherwise the plan of submitting multiple slates would have little utility. In such a case it would be anomalous to have both "party" slates selected by a single committee. And if any such system were followed, the danger of disrupting the fine work of the Association would become real.

Despite the strength of Professor Penniman's argument, there is a weakness in our present system. Committees on nomination are appointed, not elected, and their actions are almost always decisive. Thus, individual members of the Association have only the right to advise (exercised with some reluctance) and the power to reject (almost never exercised). The Association might well provide for the election of a committee on nominations rather than for its appointment. Members of such a committee would be elected from regions with as many candidates put forward as political scientists in each area cared to nominate and the election would be by mail ballot, administered by the national office of the Association. This committee—having faced the same exacting responsibilities Nominating Committees of the past have faced—would put its candidates for offices in nomination, following the procedure adhered to at the present time. This procedure would enable members of the Association to participate in the process of selecting their officers without having to take the drastic step of challenging a carefully prepared slate at the national convention.

This change might not "be imitated by other learned and professional societies." But yet, through such a change the strength of the present system of nominations could be retained and "a more substantial proportion of its membership" could be enlisted in the selection of officers.

COMMENT BY HARVEY C. MANSFIELD

The Ohio State University

It does not become one who holds, for a few more weeks, the least onerous of the Association's elective offices, to argue too enthusiastically in favor of the status quo. Professor Padelford's two modest proposals, confined to the offices for which he urges them, and applied with a modicum of ingenuity, can no doubt be made to work satisfactorily, without upsetting the harmonious conduct of the Association's affairs. I would rather see them adopted than have any substantial proportion of the membership cherish a grievance chargeable to the present system.

Nevertheless, the changes look to form rather than substance, and appeals on their behalf in the name of democracy miss the mark, I think, on two counts. Wider participation in the elections would not make the system more democratic in fact, and if it did make it so in appearance, the membership would not be the gainers. We need to distinguish means from ends. The essence of the present system is the business of nominations. It is now measurably democratic. The Committee derives its authority from a Constitution freely agreed to and its members hold their places by the appointment of an elected President.

The Committee proceeds on principles of merit and geographic and professional distribution known to and desired by all, and there is ample opportunity for any member to bring any candidate to its attention. No one is excluded from consideration on any undemocratic criterion. The Committee is an efficient instrument to serve a common purpose at a minimum cost to the general membership.

To multiply, by a mail ballot, the number of those who overtly share in the ratification of the Committee's recommendations—when most members who now attend the Annual Meetings do not think it worth the bother of attending the Business Meeting in order to do so—will not add to the effectively democratic character of the process. On the other hand, to the extent that the practical choice is transferred, by the offering of multiple nominations, from the Committee to the mail ballot, the likelihood that the original goal will be as satisfactorily met, and the agreed principles be as fully applied, is diminished rather than increased. A general ballot by mail is sometimes a convenient means for securing consent to a specific proposal. It is not a handy way of deciding on the best application of a set of general principles to the complex choices involved in constructing a slate of officers.

BOOK REVIEWS, NOTES, AND BIBLIOGRAPHY

REVIEWS OF BOOKS.....	505
Emerson, with Supplementary Chapters by Elsbree and Thompson , Representative Government in Southeast Asia; Schiller , The Formation of Federal Indonesia, 1945-1949. GEORGE MCT. KAHN.....	505
Jones , The Fifteen Weeks (February 21-June 5, 1947); Price , The Marshall Plan and Its Meaning. ROBERT W. TUFTS.....	509
Westerfield , Foreign Policy and Party Politics: Pearl Harbor to Korea. GABRIEL A. ALMOND.....	512
Lindsay , China and the Cold War: A Study in International Politics. JAMES T. WATKINS IV.....	514
von Fritz , The Theory of the Mixed Constitution in Antiquity: A Critical Analysis of Polybius' Political Ideas. HARRY V. JAFFA.....	515
Einaudi, Byé, and Rossi , Nationalization in France and Italy. HENRY W. EHEMANN.....	519
Young , Congressional Politics in the Second World War. GEORGE B. GALLOWAY.....	520
Deane , The Political Ideas of Harold J. Laski. MAX LERNER.....	522
Mason , Security through Freedom: American Political Thought and Practice. K. C. COLE.....	525
Hofstadter and Metzger , The Development of Academic Freedom in the United States; MacIver , Academic Freedom in Our Time. PETER H. ODEGARD.....	527
Heimann , Vernunftglaube und Religion in der Modernen Gesellschaft: Liberalismus, Marxismus und Demokratie. SIGMUND NEUMANN...	532
Bracher , Die Auflösung der Weimarer Republik: Eine Studie zum Problem des Machtverfalls in der Demokratie. JOHN H. HERZ.....	533
Pollock, Bretton, Grace, and McHargue , German Democracy at Work: A Selective Study. ROY C. MACRIDIS.....	534
Rackman , Israel's Emerging Constitution, 1948-51. B. M. GROSS	536
Beloff , Foreign Policy and the Democratic Process. E. S. FURNISS, JR.	538
Simmons (ed.) ; Continuity and Change in Russian and Soviet Thought. JOHN S. RESHETAR, JR.....	539
Allport , Becoming. CHARLES M. HARDIN.....	541
Kohn (ed.) , German History: Some New German Views. LAWRENCE D. STEEFEL.....	543
Bailey, Simon, Dahl, Snyder, de Grazia, Moos, David, and Truman , Research Frontiers in Politics and Government: Brookings Lectures, 1955. EARL LATHAM.....	544
Buehrig , Woodrow Wilson and the Balance of Power. H. BRADFORD WESTERFIELD.....	547
BOOK NOTES AND BIBLIOGRAPHY.....	549
AMERICAN GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS.....	549
FOREIGN AND COMPARATIVE GOVERNMENT.....	576
INTERNATIONAL LAW AND RELATIONS.....	587
POLITICAL THEORY, RESEARCH, AND METHODOLOGY.....	598

BOOK REVIEWS

Representative Government in Southeast Asia. BY RUPERT EMERSON, WITH SUPPLEMENTARY CHAPTERS BY WILLARD H. ELSBREE AND VIRGINIA THOMPSON. (Cambridge: Harvard University Press. 1955. Pp. vii, 197. $3.50.)

The Formation of Federal Indonesia, 1945-1949. BY A. ARTHUR SCHILLER. (The Hague, Bandung: W. Van Hoeve, Ltd. 1955. Pp. viii, 472.)

Professor Emerson's book is the first scholarly and comprehensive approach to problems of representative government in postwar Southeast Asia. As such it will be of benefit to students of comparative government as well as to those having a particular interest in the political development of the countries of this area. Not only will it prove of value to specialists in these fields; it is also admirably suited to students enrolled in courses on Asian government and politics who have had little or no previous background. (This reviewer has made it required reading in an introductory survey course on Asian governments and politics.) In addition to the competent and sometimes excellent descriptions and analyses of postwar developments in the particular countries of Southeast Asia, the book contains a lucid distillation of Professor Emerson's long study of some of their most basic common problems. (Those who have read his classic, Malaysia, will find that his observations on postwar developments in Malaya and Indonesia give additional poignancy to several of the important conclusions reached in this earlier work.) Separate chapters are devoted to Indonesia, Burma, Malaya (all by Professor Emerson), the Philippines (by Willard H. Elsbree), and Rural and Urban Self-Government (by Virginia Thompson). Those on Malaya, Indonesia, and the Philippines are particularly well done. Thailand and Indo-China are dealt with briefly by Professor Emerson in his Conclusion and also covered to some extent by Virginia Thompson in her chapter. The book's major emphasis is upon the postwar period, the discussion of events being carried up to the end of 1954.

Willard Elsbree's brief but stimulating chapter on the Philippines contains a realistic assessment of the potential of representative government there. He gives particular attention to the socio-economic environment conditioning the growth of political institutions, a setting which he notes is far from ideally suited to their development along democratic lines. Meriting special mention is his able discussion of the presidency.

Virginia Thompson, confronting a subject concerning which there is a great paucity of material, has generally done well with what is available but has been able to sketch the picture only partially. (Professor Schiller's book helps supplement this insofar as Indonesia is concerned.) In her treatment of Indonesia it would have been useful had she given more attention to the impact of the Japanese occupation upon local government. Certainly in Java, where the Japanese introduced their tonari gumi system, this impact was considerable and has in substantial areas left a significant residue.

The book's most important contributions are to be found in Professor Emerson's two essays, the Introduction and the Conclusion. He begins by observing that all those countries of Southeast Asia which have had an opportunity to shape their destinies freely have adopted constitutions modeled primarily on well-established Western patterns, rather than attempting to derive inspiration from earlier periods of their own culture. The leaders who are guiding the governments of these countries are almost exclusively from their new Westernized elites. The political experience and thinking of these men has been powerfully—thus far decisively—influenced by Western models, and in the course of drafting their constitutions they have been preponderantly influenced by the political systems operating in the colonial powers from which they have so recently severed themselves. Thus all of these countries have taken on at least the formal trappings of Western representative government, and in three of them, Burma, Indonesia, and the Philippines (with the possibility that Malaya may soon join their ranks), their leaders are conscientiously trying to make these institutions function in at least rough conformity with Western democratic norms. In these three countries there has been an abrupt transition from colonial (and pre-colonial) autocracy to a profound commitment to representative government. Yet representative democracy is a fragile plant which is not easily transplanted. Its even rare flowering in the West has been relatively recent and presumably possible only because of combinations of particularly fortunate circumstances. Moreover, in the West the transition from authoritarian to democratic rule was a slow and gradual process, and the gradual enfranchisement of segments of the population in general kept pace with the development of a new economic and social life and with the spread of mass-based education and literacy. On the other hand, "In Southeast Asia the modern world has come with a rush and there has been no time for the kind of slow adaptation to new circumstances which is generally characteristic of the West."

Having made these general observations, Professor Emerson proceeds to analyze in more specific terms some of the obstacles which confront any continuing development of the Southeast Asian countries in the direction of representative government. First of all, there is the tradition of opposition to government which inevitably developed in the countries under colonial rule, a tradition which was reinforced during the brief but harsh period of Japanese occupation. It is obvious that this tradition militates against the growth of responsible opposition parties, and there is no doubt that the roads of Indonesia and Burma towards representative democracy have been made steeper because of this obstacle. Secondly, the authoritarian tradition in all of these countries is still generally widespread and engrained, a formidable obstacle to the development of the political individualism and egalitarianism which have been so essential to the foundations of democracy in the West. Nor is there as yet in these countries the widespread sense of broad popular participation in government and the feeling that government should be responsive to the popular will which has come to characterize democracies in the West.

Whereas there is widespread agreement that in the West an important condition for democratic government has been the existence of a strong middle class enjoying a degree of economic strength and autonomy vis-à-vis the government, in most of Southeast Asia—in Burma, Indonesia, and Thailand in particular—there is virtually no such middle class. Insofar as such an element does exist, it is composed primarily of bureaucrats who are, of course, dependent upon the government. Commerce and large-scale production have been carried on in Southeast Asia almost exclusively by outsiders, either Chinese, Indian, or European. In general throughout the area the prospects for development of the sort of capitalism necessary for the growth of a substantial independent middle class are meager. This is particularly true in Burma and Indonesia, where there exists a strong tendency for many of the nationalist leaders to equate colonialism and capitalism, the only capitalism they have known having been that of either their alien colonial masters, or of Indians or Chinese whom the colonial authorities encouraged to immigrate. On the basis of the experience of the last two decades in the Philippines and Thailand, it appears justified to conclude that “if representative institutions are to have any real significance for Southeast Asia, there must be a decided broadening of the political base at least in the form of a larger indigenous middle class, which is both politically aware and politically active. Without the appearance of such a middle class, which has played so large a role elsewhere, or the coming to political maturity of wide segments of the populace, it is difficult to see how a democratic system can be expected to stand up against the pressures which are very much in evidence.”

The efforts of Southeast Asian leaders to promote economic growth are also likely to have an important effect upon the course of political development in their countries. “A highly plausible case can be made for the contention that the most direct road to economic development for underdeveloped areas leads by way of an authoritarian rather than a democratic system . . . the more insistent the demands for economic advance, the greater may be the willingness to yield to authoritarianism’s claim to produce speedy results.” It can be argued that Western efforts to increase the economic and social well-being of Southeast Asian countries may keep them from drifting into the orbits of Moscow or Peking, but there is no assurance that such support will appreciably influence whether or not they will be attracted to democratic forms of government.

While thus analyzing these and other salient conditions for and limitations on the growth of representative government in Southeast Asia, Professor Emerson does not, explicitly at least, try to predict the course which their political development will take. Rather, he makes a number of suggestions as to the kinds of studies political scientists should make before they can begin to approach such questions with any degree of self-confidence. It is possible to infer from his analyses the expectation that these Southeast Asian countries will develop governmental systems suited to their own particular conditions which will lie somewhere in the realm between the West’s definition of what is democratic and what is autocratic. But one must also observe the emphasis which he gives to his conviction that in view of the tremendous impediments they have confronted several of them have progressed a rather substantial distance towards their democratic goals.

Professor Schiller's The Formation of Federal Indonesia, 1945-1949 is a book written for the specialist and will be far beyond those who do not already possess some knowledge of postwar Indonesia or at least a basic understanding of federalism. For those who do have such foundations this is a valuable book. It is based upon solid and painstaking research that explores with great thoroughness what has heretofore been a major void in the history of postwar Indonesia. Though Professor Schiller spent considerable time in Dutch-controlled Indonesia in 1949 making on-the-spot observations, his book represents primarily the results of a careful analysis of a great body of documentary materials. These documents were produced in very limited quantity and without his efforts would by now undoubtedly have largely disappeared.

At the outset Professor Schiller frankly disclaims concern with any political design that may have underlain the creation of the federal order which he describes or with the motivations which activated its architects. Since the architects were numerous and their motivations diverse, and since this part of the story is in general immeasurably complicated and abstruse, this may well have been a wise choice.

This book, then, is an account of the formation of a federal state in Indonesia from 1945 through 1949, placed in the context of the most relevant antecedent and subsequent developments. Thus, in his first two chapters Professor Schiller discusses the prewar evolution of ideas concerning Indonesian federalism among officials of the Dutch East Indies government, ideas which were never put into practice, as well as the organization of the government before and after the war. The heart of his study is contained in two long chapters: "Local Government" (Ch. 3) and "The Distribution of Powers of Government" (Ch. 4). The fifth chapter deals with the administration of justice, an emphasis which he selected primarily because he believed it afforded "a typical example of the scope and tempo of alteration in administration in the new state." In the Epilogue there is a brief account of the dissolution of the short-lived federal structure, a dissolution which began almost immediately after its establishment under the name of the United States of Indonesia on December 27, 1949 and which had already run its course by August, 1950, when this federal order gave place to the present unitary Republic.

Professor Schiller observes that at the time of his study in the spring of 1949, "the new structure was still in the planning stage. A host of enactments were being promulgated, but for the most part they were not immediately being put into effect." His study, he states, is frankly one of the federal structure "as it appeared in the books." Thus, as he observes in his introduction, his emphasis is on the promulgated rules, his study being basically "a description of the organization and structure of the various units of government" and "a consideration of the distribution of the powers and tasks of government among political entities that were to make up the federal state."

However, the full significance of this book is not merely that of a description and analysis of an interesting, though transitory, experiment in federalism and of an important, though brief, period in Indonesian history. For the general problem of political decentralization remains in Indonesia today as one of the most pressing and challenging problems confronting its government. True, Indonesian leaders, convinced as they are that the Dutch effort to create a federal order was merely a refined and skillful effort at divide and rule, are unlikely to espouse a truly federal solution, or at least to call it that. They are, however, acutely mindful of the necessity of fashioning a political system wherein realistic account is taken of the substantial existing regional cultural variations and of distances as great as from New York to Seattle. Thus both the general problem discussed by Professor Schiller and his analysis of the various aspects of the pattern of federalism constructed by the Dutch are of relevance today. As he correctly notes, there is evidence that at the present time "many of the values of the federal form are being introduced into the existing unitary state." And even though the fact is not widely advertised, it is, as he suggests, true that in parts of Indonesia (notably in the eastern islands) the Jakarta government continues to maintain some of the substructure of the federal system established by the Dutch. It is logical to expect that, as the Indonesian government proceeds further in the direction of political decentralization, it will explore more thoroughly these residual parts of the Dutch-created federal structure from whose recent history it may derive guidance in constructing a more effectively decentralized unitary state. Those undertaking such an exploration will find Professor Schiller's scholarly book the fullest and soundest existing description and analysis of the only federal order that Indonesia has known, and from it they should be able to derive helpful insights.

GEORGE MCT. KAHIN.

Cornell University.

The Fifteen Weeks (February 21-June 5, 1947). BY JOSEPH M. JONES. (New York: The Viking Press. 1955. Pp. viii, 296. $3.75.)

The Marshall Plan and Its Meaning. BY HARRY BAYARD PRICE, JR. PUBLISHED UNDER THE AUSPICES OF THE GOVERNMENTAL AFFAIRS INSTITUTE, WASHINGTON, D.C. (Ithaca, N. Y.: Cornell University Press. 1955. Pp. xvi, 424. $5.00.)

On February 9, 1946 Stalin made a major speech to the voters of the Stalin Electoral District in Moscow. His purpose, as no doubt even his immediate audience realized, was not to sway Muscovite fence-sitters. Rather, it was to clarify the nature of Soviet relations with the capitalist world in the postwar period and to define the major internal tasks of the Soviet Union. The return to normalcy, he made clear, would be a return to what we have come to call the cold war. The prospects for peace were not bright; the Second World War had been not a "casual occurrence," but the inevitable result of the clashing forces generated by modern monopoly capitalism; in the future, as in the past, general crises and armed conflicts would be inescapable. It followed, therefore, that the Soviet Union must resume the policies of collectivization and industrialization which had made possible victory in the war and which alone could guarantee it "against all possible accidents" in the years ahead.

Against the background of events, the speech had an ominous ring, and as Soviet pressures mounted in the succeeding months, it became increasingly clear that Stalin would do what he safely could to nudge history along its "inevitable" course. By the winter of 1946-47 the outlook, world-wide, was very dark. In the Department of State the atmosphere was thick with foreboding: dispatches from Europe spoke of Communist advances in France and Italy and of widespread economic distress; from the Near East, of growing Communist pressures on Greece and Turkey; from the Far East, of the deterioration of the Kuomintang's position; from Moscow itself, of Soviet expansionist designs. Everywhere so much needed to be done and so little seemed possible!

No one then foresaw the radical transformation of American policy which was to occur within six months, and now, nine years later, the pace and scope of the change still seem breath-taking. The change was not the result of quiet deliberation and careful calculation. It just happened in response to crises which seemed to leave no alternative and which aroused in the country and its leaders a mood mixed of courage, anger, disappointment, determination, and generous impulses. By mid-1947 the United States had grown into a mature acceptance of its responsibilities. The Fifteen Weeks (February 21-June 5, 1947) by Joseph M. Jones is a lively account of how our voice in world affairs suddenly changed.

Mr. Jones set himself a limited but difficult task and he should now be enjoying a sense of accomplishment. He wished to recapture the events and especially "the atmosphere and drama" of this exceptional period and to communicate something of the excitement he felt at "the spectacle of the government of the United States operating at its very finest, efficiently and effectively, and of the American people responding to leadership in a measure equally splendid." The book is, if the phrase will not be misunderstood, an artistic success. He has succeeded in evoking the electric quality of these weeks and his story is, as he wished it to be, fresh, invigorating, and inspiring. It is also accurate. Very little escaped his eye and his report is full and well-balanced.

Although this reviewer is inclined to think that speech-writers (Mr. Jones was a speech-writer and a very good one) usually overemphasize words as compared with deeds, he does not find the present emphasis on speeches misleading. President Truman's Special Message to the Congress on March 12, stating the Truman Doctrine, and Secretary Marshall's Harvard address on June 5, inviting Europe to take the initiative in drafting a recovery program, were key events, signalling the transformation of American policy and leading to far-reaching actions. On these occasions, as too rarely in more recent years, words conformed to decisions and were an effective form of action. Mr. Acheson's initiative with respect to European recovery is properly recognized, although in this case, perhaps, the speech (to the Delta Council on May 8) was less important than the governmental wheels Mr. Acheson had previously set in motion. Mr. Jones does not attempt to describe the execution of the new policies and does not evaluate their adequacy. He is concerned with the basic decisions and throws a warm, friendly, and intimate light on the process by which they were reached and announced. The book will be valuable as supplementary reading in courses on American foreign policy and will not greatly burden the student, for it can be read as quickly and easily as an adventure story, which, in a way, it is.

A little less than eighteen months after Stalin's declaration of cold war, the two halves of the American response had been defined. Shortly, as a result of Mr. Kennan's famous "X" articles in Foreign Affairs, the whole was to be dubbed the "containment policy." The first half was to resist, by force, if necessary, Soviet expansion. The second half was to assist friendly countries in recovering their health and strength. The Marshall Plan and Its Meaning, by Harry Bayard Price, Jr., deals with the carrying out of the European recovery program (ERP) and related assistance programs by the Economic Cooperation Administration (ECA) and its successor, the Mutual Security Agency. The book was written under the auspices of the Governmental Affairs Institute, which was invited by ECA to "prepare an independent, objective history and evaluation of the ECA and the Marshall Plan." The Institute persuaded Mr. Price to take the assignment, and submits the result as "representing the best judgment of this organization, as well as of its author." Although there is, of course, no way of judging, some of the weaknesses of the book may have their origin in this multiple interest and responsibility. The Institute might consider whether in the future full responsibility might better be left to the author.

The basic fault with the argument is that the ERP is not consistently seen as a part of the unified policy of containment. There is a recurrent note of complaint that, as the emphasis shifted from economic recovery to the development of military strength, ECA was distracted from its true purpose, that "economic objectives" were "obscured" and were not regarded as "coordinate" with "political objectives": that, in short, ECA was being misused. (In this the book probably reflects a point of view held by some within the agency, but lends the view support rather than criticizing it and possibly finding in this separatist tendency a weakness of the separate agency as an instrument of foreign policy.) A case could be made, perhaps, that we over-reacted to the shock of Korea, and that by trying to push the military build-up we actually slowed it down as compared with what might have been accomplished with a different balance between economic and military programs. The case is here only asserted, not really demonstrated. In any event, it is a mistake into which the book sometimes but not always slips to regard recovery as an end in itself; ERP, like the military assistance program, should be conceived as means to ends which were always political.

The focus of the book is also somewhat surprising and disappointing, especially in light of its title. ERP and ECA were not, of course, the same thing. The book concentrates on ECA and an evaluation of its operations rather than on the Marshall Plan and its meaning. The focus is significant. Frequently one feels that recovery is being examined for the light it throws on ECA. In discussing the European Payments Union, for example, the role of ECA is stressed, not the role of OEEC. Such Europeans as M. Ansiaux of Belgium, Mr. Figgures of the United Kingdom, M. Marjolin, Secretary-General of the OEEC, and others who helped to conceive and create the EPU are not mentioned as important contributors, although space is found to name several Americans whose contributions were probably less important. In general, important developments in Europe in which ECA was not deeply involved receive short shrift. The Schuman Plan receives only a few superficial paragraphs; the German currency reform (1948) and the British devaluation (1949), events of great significance to European recovery, receive only a few sentences. (More space could have been given to these matters by eliminating the substantial sections on Asian assistance programs. Strictly speaking, these were not part of the Marshall Plan although administered by ECA. The decision to cover this ground requires a widening and crowding of an already wide and crowded canvas. Surely the subject is important enough to have justified more spacious treatment in a separate book.)

Although for this and other reasons the picture of the Marshall Plan does not emerge as sharply and clearly as one had hoped, criticism should not be permitted to obscure the value of this first effort to survey the Marshall Plan as a whole, to discern its effects, and to draw lessons for future programs. A great deal of material has been collected which might easily have been lost. A great many conclusions have been drawn about the conduct of the program which will stimulate discussion and should be helpful in the continuing task of building the foundations of security and prosperity in the free world. The Marshall Plan and Its Meaning helps to remind us how far we have gone in turning back the Soviet challenge and surely provides abundant evidence that the main lines of American policy have been wisely chosen. Not the least remarkable fact about this book and The Fifteen Weeks is that they were written by men who believe, on the whole, that Americans have reason to be proud of their accomplishments during a dangerous decade in a dangerous world.

ROBERT W. TUFTS.

Oberlin College.

Foreign Policy and Party Politics: Pearl Harbor to Korea. BY H. BRADFORD WESTERFIELD. (New Haven: Yale University Press; London: Oxford University Press. 1955. Pp. x, 448. $6.00.)

This study of the role of the American party system in the making of foreign policy is a work of mature scholarship. It is thoughtful, relevant, and methodologically adequate. It will be of considerable value to students of political parties as well as to students of American foreign policy and international relations. Still another aspect of the study commends it. It is explicitly directed towards the understanding of an important practical problem, and employs statistical, historical, institutional, and analytical methods in a nice combination in an effort to evaluate proposed solutions.

Westerfield sets as his problem an appraisal of the alternatives of "partisanship" and "bipartisanship" as desirable and feasible roles for the American major parties in the making and conduct of foreign policy. By "partisanship" Westerfield means a situation in which each of the major parties would tend toward greater homogeneity in foreign policy attitudes than is now the case, and in which the parties would be divided on the basic issues of foreign policy. The substance of foreign policy would be a central issue in legislative debate and in political campaigns. He rejects this alternative first on the grounds that it is unrealistic, that it overlooks the fact that foreign policy cuts across present party lines, and that the situation would not be likely to be improved by any conceivable reconstitution of the major parties. He also rejects it on the grounds of its consequences for the effectiveness of foreign policy. He argues that there is a far greater need for a broad consensus, predictability, and continuity in foreign policy than in domestic policy, and that these can be achieved only through some measure of party collaboration.

He also rejects the alternative of full bipartisanship as he has defined it. This would imply full participation of the opposition party in the making of foreign policy, and the maintenance of party discipline on foreign policy questions. He argues that such full bipartisanship would come into conflict with the need for speed, secrecy, and professionalism in the making of foreign policy decisions, that it would require a degree of party discipline unattainable in the American system, and that it would dry up constructive and creative debate on foreign policy issues.

Having rejected the two extreme alternatives, Westerfield points out how the present situation, which he calls "extrapartisanship," fulfills more values in the net than would either partisanship or bipartisanship. There is a sufficient agreement between parties to guarantee continuity in the basic goals of foreign policy, and at the same time sufficient tension between the parties on foreign policy issues to maintain an active debate, and to affect electoral campaigns.

Westerfield proceeds to an analysis of the conditions necessary to maintain "extrapartisanship." One of the requirements to which he refers is the existence of a wide popular consensus on foreign policy. Another is the readiness of the executive to make concessions to cooperative members of the opposition. A third is a degree of self-restraint in the conduct of electoral campaigns, a willingness on both sides to avoid excesses in the "awarding of political credit and blame on foreign affairs," when in actuality there has been a substantial measure of collaboration in the making of foreign policy.

The greater part of Westerfield's book is taken up with an analysis of the actual impact of parties in the foreign policy-making process in the period from Pearl Harbor to Korea. This includes a careful statistical analysis of congressional roll calls on foreign affairs issues from 1943-50, a description and appraisal of party organizations in Congress for the control of foreign affairs, and an historical survey of party behavior on the major issues of foreign policy since the outbreak of World War II.

GABRIEL A. ALMOND.

Princeton University.

China and the Cold War: A Study in International Politics. By MICHAEL LINDSAY. (Carlton, Victoria: Melbourne University Press; London and New York: Cambridge University Press. Pp. xv, 283. $3.75.)

With his China and the Cold War, Lord Lindsay changes from an ardent championship of the Chinese Communists to a savage indictment. The author's years of association with the Chinese Communists, his warm humanitarianism, profoundly democratic commitment, and uncompromising scholarship encourage us to accept his assurance that this new and unfavorable assessment reflects a change in the Chinese Communists, not in the author's standards of judgment (p. 1).

Lindsay dedicates his work "To friends in China" as being what he wants to say to help them understand how Peking's policies appear in foreign eyes (p. xiv) and how fantastic are the views which intelligent and educated Chinese entertain today about the outer world (p. 274). Nevertheless, it is not only to the Chinese Communists that this "tract for the times" is addressed. The author has undertaken to show both the Chinese Communists and their non-Communist adversaries abroad how the policies of each appear in the eyes of the other and how misguided are many of the beliefs cherished by each about the other.

As indicated by its subtitle, the volume has yet another dimension. Lindsay does more than seek to clarify issues in the relations of Communist China to the rest of the world; he also engages in the methodological experiment of applying to political inquiry the strictest standards of scientific reasoning. A similar approach is advocated for other problems in international relations. Moreover, in generalizing about the substantive conclusions of his study, Lindsay points the way towards a theory of international relations based upon "the assumption that a considerable proportion of political actions are irrational, though the causes can be understood and explained through rational scientific investigation" (p. 260). He goes on to urge re-examination of the assumptions upon which modern foreign policy is based lest with it man destroy himself in global war.

China and the Cold War begins with an analysis of Communist China's foreign policy in the light of the Peking government's professed objectives of peace and the national welfare. For the benefit of his Chinese audience (non-Communist opinion needs no such demonstration), Lindsay reviews the evidence that Peking is following policies incompatible with a genuine desire for international peace. He discusses Communist China's hate campaign against the United States and its allies, the Chinese Communists' uncritical acclaim of Soviet exploitation of East European peoples, and Communist subversion elsewhere as a movement of "national liberation"; their moral and then armed support of the North Korean aggression; the attempt at a forced repatriation of prisoners of war; and the allegations of bacteriological warfare. Discrepancies between practice and profession, it is submitted, do not fit the hypothesis that the Peking government both wants peace and is acting rationally in ways likely to achieve peace, as the Chinese Communists claim. Nor is the explanation to be found in the hypothesis that the Chinese are acting rationally but are not sincere in their claim to be seeking peace, which most non-Communist opinion holds. The only hypothesis which satisfactorily accounts for the facts is that, though sincere in their professions of peace, the Chinese Communists suffer from an emotional and intellectual confusion which makes them incapable of acting rationally to attain this objective.

For the benefit of both Chinese and Western readers, Lindsay argues a persuasive case. He then advances the proposition that the Chinese Communists' conduct derives from the Communist theory of knowledge, their rejection of empiricism and the standards of normal scientific method in judging the true and the false, their faith in orthodox Marxism-Leninism with its doctrines of democratic dictatorship and centralism and of the infallibility of the party, and the hysterical effects of their continual struggle to reconcile the contradiction between theory and observable fact.

Another section of the work analyzes contemporary international relations and concludes that today "the completely doctrinaire Communist, convinced by his system of faith that he is justified in using any means to extend Communist power, presents the same sort of menace to peace as [did] the Nazi or Japanese militarist" (p. 100). Rejecting both the Marxian theory of war (held by the Chinese Communists) and the power politics theory of war (widely held among non-Communists) as incompatible with modern psychology (p. 133), Lindsay devotes a good deal of attention to an examination of the conditions of permanent peace in Eastern Asia and to outlining a peace program both for the Chinese Communists and for their Western enemies. The prescription includes some pretty bitter medicine. In part, the Communists will have to demonstrate by scientific (and therefore non-Communist) standards their readiness to co-operate for peace with non-Communists abroad, while the non-Communists will have to accept the Chinese Communist regime as a fixture in Asia for "the next decade at least" (p. 277).

Many an original observation lights the argument along the way, e.g., those respecting Korean war crimes trials (p. 36), Chinese McCarthyism (p. 74), British troops under MacArthur's command (p. 175), and retaliation against the McCarran Act (p. 250). But would it not have been fairer to ascribe General Wedemeyer's reconstruction of Chinese history to simple ignorance of the subject rather than to deliberate falsification (p. 94)?

JAMES T. WATKINS IV.

Stanford University.

The Theory of the Mixed Constitution in Antiquity: A Critical Analysis of Polybius' Political Ideas. By KURT VON FRITZ. (New York: Columbia University Press. 1954. Pp. xiv, 490. $7.50.)

The present volume is animated by the conviction that "no part of ancient political theory has had a greater influence on political theory and practice in modern times than the theory of the mixed constitution," and that "it is in the form which it was given by Polybius that it has had its greatest influence on modern political theory and practice." Despite its importance, says the author, "no major attempt seems ever to have been made to show in detail how far Polybius' analysis of the historical phenomena on which his theory, according to his own testimony, is based, is correct or what its deficiencies are, if any" (pp. v, vii). To remedy this defect, the author has made it his central concern to make a full "comparison of Polybius' theory with the actual development and functioning of the Roman constitution" (p. viii). This central theme is supplemented by a most painstaking treatment of a number of preparatory and related topics. There are chapters on Polybius' life and political experience, on the circumstances of the composition of his work, the condition of the manuscripts, his methods of writing history, his political theories in their relation to those of Plato and Aristotle (in particular). Although Polybius remains the central figure of the work, the title as distinct from the subtitle, is entirely justified. It would be difficult to imagine a more comprehensive study, or one more carefully planned and executed. Professor von Fritz is a man of vast learning, and he moves among the intricacies of the Roman (or Spartan, or Cretan) constitution with the authority and analytical skill of Corwin on the American constitution.

Unfortunately, the results of this impressive scholarship are extremely negative. In his Introduction (p. vii), Professor von Fritz notes that "Mommsen in the second volume of his Roman history expressed the opinion that nothing could be more absurd than Polybius' attempt to explain the excellent political order of the Roman Republic as an even mixture of monarchy, oligarchy, and democracy." And in his Conclusions, he admits "that in a way Mommsen's judgment is not too harsh." All that is salvaged from the wreck is the following faint and barren praise: "What Polybius did see is that the greatness and power of Rome was an historical phenomenon of the first magnitude, that the greatness of Rome had something to do with its internal order, and that this internal order in its turn was in some relation to what earlier Greek theorists had had in mind when they spoke of the preferability of a mixed constitution or a mixed political order" (p. 345).

Paradoxically, it is the very thoroughness with which our author demolishes Polybius which leads one to suspect that there may be something more, or at least something different, in Polybius than has met the critical eye. Certainly it would be difficult to account for his influence upon such acute minds, and such astute politicians, as Cicero, Machiavelli, or Montesquieu, had he been carried away so completely "by the apparent intrinsic logic" of a theory that had "little relation to reality" (p. 345). Von Fritz writes in the powerful tradition of Mommsen, and he measures Polybius against the conception of political and historical reality of that school. But Cicero also knew Rome, and his Scipio, in his Republic, calls Polybius, with Panaetius, one of the two most politically knowledgeable Greeks of his time. And Cicero pays Polybius the high compliment of taking over, with minor changes, his theory of the mixed constitution. A key to the solution of this puzzle may be found in a passage in Book VI.5 of the Histories, near the beginning of the principal exposition of his political theory, where Polybius remarks (p. 359) that "Perhaps the theory of the natural transition from one type of constitution to the other is more thoroughly explained in the works of Plato and of some other philosophers." (I quote from von Fritz's extensive translations from Polybius in his appendices.) The theory as set forth by Plato and others, he says, is "very complicated" and "lengthy." "Hence I shall try to expound in a somewhat more summary fashion just so much of it as belongs to pragmatic history and is not beyond the reach of common intelligence." Now the theory of the natural transition of constitutions is the basis of the cycle theory, and the cycle theory is the basis of the idea of the mixed constitution. It would then follow that the whole of Polybius' political theory is a deliberate oversimplification, for the purpose of reaching "the common intelligence." In the section immediately following the passage quoted, for example, Polybius explains the origin of justice and morality and, according to von Fritz, does so "exclusively from enlightened self-interest and the ability to reason by analogy about the future" (p. 54, author's italics). Parents teach their children gratitude so that the children will take care of them in old age, and children take care of their aged parents to set an example for their children. Von Fritz justly comments that "In such a bargain there is hardly more room for a feeling of personal gratitude than in the relation of a man to his life insurance." He is puzzled that Polybius' utilitarian conception of duty should have more in common with Epicureanism than with Stoicism, when Polybius' preference for the active life of the statesman is so completely irreconcilable with Epicureanism. Yet there is a simple explanation at hand: Polybius' account of morality in terms of its utility, as distinct from its nobility, is just what fits the "common intelligence," which, as Aristotle said, has no conception of the noble.

Polybius, I suggest, regarded himself primarily as an historian. As a political theorist he seems deliberately to have borrowed and simplified. To simplify what is in its nature complex means, of course, to distort it. And to distort by simplifying is to understate the truth rather than to overstate it. Understatement is the essence of irony. Since Plato is the one thinker Polybius mentions as the exponent of the full and correct theories he adopts, it seems at least possible that the gross simplicity of Polybius' doctrines is not without kinship to Platonic (or Socratic) irony. It seems to me that an alternative treatment of Polybius might explore the question of how Platonic irony could affect the writing of history, and give us a clue perhaps as to how Cicero, for example, might have read Polybius.

Polybius, says our author, coined the expression "pragmatic history" (p. 40), of which he held himself to be a leading exponent. What he meant by it is suggested, in part, by the following striking passage: "Plato has said that human affairs will be well attended when either kings become philosophers or philosophers become kings, but I would say that everything will be well with history when practical statesmen turn to writing history . . . [or] those who wish to become historians consider a practical political training a prerequisite for their work" (Book XII.28, p. 41). Although Polybius does not endorse the famous Platonic thesis, but rather uses it as an analogue, we cannot help noticing that a conspicuous feature of the education of the philosopher-kings in the Republic is just that combination of theoretical and practical training that Polybius urges for the historian. How then does the pragmatic historian differ from the Platonic philosopher-king? "According to Polybius it is the task of the pragmatic historian to make history predictable and to enlighten future statesmen" (p. 351), says our author. This is certainly correct, and sounds, as well, like the program for modern scientific politics which traces its lineage to Machiavelli. According to von Fritz, this latter worthy did Polybius the honor of transcribing whole pages from the Histories into the Discourses without benefit of an acknowledgment. But whatever the resemblances, there is this difference: for Machiavelli, Fortune was a woman, who could be mastered if assaulted by a sufficiently vigorous male; for Polybius, as for all the ancients, she remained a chaste Artemis, whose power could never be brought under human control. To the ancients history, or political science, can bring within human foresight what is amenable to human intelligence, but beyond that human well-being must consist in such consolation as comes from contemplating even those causes which we realize must destroy us. Machiavelli revolted against Platonic political science, because the goal held out in the Republic depended for its attainment upon Fortune; for Plato, the coincidence of philosophy and political power, upon which man's salvation depends, cannot itself be brought about by human means. But Polybius, I suggest, like Cicero and like Plato himself in the Laws, attempted to find such an approximation to the goals of the Republic as fortune and circumstances permitted. The mixed constitution was only the best of possible approximations, although Cicero, as well as Polybius, took considerable liberties with what we would call facts in order to represent Rome as an example of such an approximation. The specific function of history, it would seem, is to teach what fortune and circumstances will permit, and to present these lessons in terms which will benefit non-philosophers as well as philosophers.

The theory of the mixed constitution in antiquity, which our author correctly traces to Plato's Laws, must, I think, be co-ordinated with the entire Platonic world-view. Machiavelli's rejection of the ancient conception of chance or fortune was tantamount to a rejection of this world-view. Machiavelli himself may or may not have grasped the full theoretical implications of this shift. But modern constitutionalism, certainly in the eighteenth century, accepting Newtonian cosmology and Newtonian mechanics, assumed that man could, through such devices as the separation of powers (which is a radically different conception from that of mixing monarchy, aristocracy, and democracy) construct a political order whose success would not require or depend upon human virtue. In this sense such an order would be independent of Fortune. "The problem of establishing a state," said Kant, expressing what is also the key thought of the Federalist, "is solvable even for a people of devils, if only they have intelligence." We might add that the intelligence they needed was not beyond the reach of anyone with an elementary education, provided the elementary schools used the proper textbooks.

It seems to me that a future study of the theory of the mixed constitution in antiquity might take its bearings by this great gulf, which separates it from its modern counterpart. The present volume, I think, is definitive only in showing the inadequacy of the ancient doctrine by what are, essentially, modern standards.

HARRY V. JAFFA.

The Ohio State University.

Nationalization in France and Italy. BY MARIO EINAUDI, MAURICE BYÉ, AND ERNESTO ROSSI. (Ithaca, N. Y.: Cornell University Press. 1955. Pp. x, 260. $3.50.)

This latest addition to the remarkable studies on French and Italian postwar problems undertaken by Cornell University deals with one of the key problems of public policy in present-day Europe. The country reports on nationalization are provided by highly competent observers who have participated prominently in the debates on nationalization in their countries: Professor Byé of the Paris Law School, active in the liberal wing of the M.R.P., is also a member of the Economic Council who has made frequent and admirable contributions to its reports. Mr. Rossi, after having earlier participated in the work of one of the anti-fascist underground movements, has as a journalist and writer given to his fellow countrymen spirited comments on Italian industrial problems during the last decade.

Professor Einaudi's introductory comparative study on nationalization policies is excellent. With a profound understanding of the inextricable mixture of political, psychological, administrative, and economic motives present in all nationalization measures, he not only compares and contrasts experiences in the two "Latin" countries, but also makes particularly suggestive distinctions between methods of economic control on the Continent and in England and the United States. These are areas in which France and Italy offer striking parallels, which are amply documented throughout the volume. Among them are the overall distribution of ownership between the private and the public sector of the economy, the attitudes towards monopoly, competition, and technological change, the impact of family traditions, and the relationships between management and labor and business and the state. But as striking as these similarities are the contrasts existing among the British pattern of administering the nationalized sector through public corporations, the restless search for a solution in France ever since the revolutionary mysticism of liberation days has worn thin, and the resigned unwillingness to adapt the set-up of fascist nationalizations to a drastically changed situation in post-war Italy.

Professor Byé gives a balanced picture of the transformations in the administration of French public enterprises since the enactment of the nationalization measures of 1945-46. Particularly valuable is the insight he provides into the long-term consequences of the Communist usurpation during the first period:

the original perversion of tripartite management has been superseded by a host of bureaucratic control devices diluting responsibility and harmful to the ideal of businesslike management. In mere economic terms, however, the results of most nationalized enterprises are shown to have steadily improved. (It is true that the author does not discuss the reasons for the persistent deficit of the railroads, constantly put into the foreground by the enemies of nationalization in France.)

What makes Mr. Rossi's study one of the most realistic pictures of contemporary Italian politics so far published in this country is his candid discussion of the relationship between the bureaucracy and business leaders. Their collusion is obviously the most important cause of an immobilism which so far has prevented any thorough reorganization of the economic participation of the state; a parliamentary report on needed reforms has disappeared (as have many others) in the files of the civil service.

It is no accident that the reform proposals with which the French and the Italian writers conclude their exposés have much in common: both recommend a modified version of the public corporation, administrative autonomy, and rejection of all statist solutions. The problem, not sufficiently discussed by either author and which would remain even after the legal enactment of such reforms, is that of finding the "autonomous" administrators. Today the battle against nationalization has abated in both countries because the organized business interests feel that the public sector is run in a way entirely satisfactory to them. They would be the first to resist true autonomy from politics and from bureaucratic control, both favorable to them. And since workers and consumers alike have long lost interest in the issue of nationalization, there is no force whatsoever behind proposals requiring important changes in the political mores and the mental habits of the French and Italian political and productive elites.

Professor Einaudi suggests that the solution might be found in the supra-national agencies that exist or have been planned for Western Europe. But while the powers of the European Coal and Steel Community are on paper undoubtedly as strong as he describes them, the real test of their efficacy has not yet been met. It might be true that national economic policies, including many nationalization policies, have become obsolescent. But at least in France and Italy obsolescent structures and practices have a capacity for stubborn survival.

HENRY W. EHRMANN.

University of Colorado.

Congressional Politics in the Second World War. BY ROLAND YOUNG. (New York: Columbia University Press. 1956. Pp. 281. $4.50.)

This book tells the story of the performance of Congress during the second world war. And it tells it in a very lucid, readable, and objective manner. The author was a member of the staff of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations in the early years of the war, and he was also a member of the APSA Committee on Congress during the war years. He writes, therefore, out of first-hand knowledge and understanding of the legislative process in Congress. This is Roland Young's second book in this field, an admirable earlier work—This Is Congress—having appeared in 1943.

In nine excellent chapters the role of Congress in the making of many important legislative decisions during 1941–45 is examined and described. Separate chapters are devoted to the major areas of wartime policy-making and the functioning of Congress in deciding the important issues in each area is reviewed and appraised. The problem areas covered include conversion and control over manpower, money, and supplies; labor policy, price control, monetary policy, military policy and the conduct of the war, foreign policy and post-war commitments, and reconversion to peace.

Among typical issues discussed are the efforts to achieve "equality of sacrifice," to "take the profits out of war," and to "freeze economic relationships," as well as wartime elections, the New Deal, and bureaucracy.

Generalizations regarding the behavior of Congress in wartime are set forth in an Introduction and a final chapter of Conclusions. The author reports that, far from becoming an anachronism or a mere rubber stamp in providing funds and delegating powers, the role of Congress in wartime increased rather than diminished. He portrays it as an institution which considered simultaneously many facets of the war economy.

In some areas of policy "the President emerged as the over-all planner of political and economic action, and the role of Congress was that of altering, amending, objecting, and substituting. . . . There were other areas of policy where the interests of the President and of Congress were not in harmony and where each attempted to persuade the other to follow its leadership," for example, labor and farm policy.

Professor Young concludes that Congress performed three major functions during the war: it made both broad and specific grants of power to the President; it adjusted conflicts of interest; and it supervised the execution of policy. Many difficult decisions were made by the national legislature on organizing the resources of the nation and allocating men, money, and materials among competing claimants. Alternative choices and different standards of judgment gave rise to political competition both within Congress and between Congress and the President. Partisanship continued throughout the war with recurring elections and debates over such controversial issues as price control, consumer subsidies, war taxes, and reconversion. An ingenious series of charts in the Appendix of the book shows how the party battle ebbed and flowed on the various votes and the extent of party control over voting.

With the expansion of governmental activities, Congress extended the scope of its oversight and control of administration. Various control techniques were employed, including committee hearings and investigations, amendments of the laws, restrictions in supply bills, annual review of appropriations, time limits on legislation, and prior committee clearance of administrative action.

Young reports that Congress conducted more than 100 investigations during the second world war in response both to particular grievances and to partisan motivations, as well as to find facts.

The author evaluates the congressional committee system which continued to be used during the war for developing legislation and supervising the government. He finds that "the committee system as a whole showed considerable strength, demonstrating its greatest usefulness in preparing legislation" as well as a means of consultation with administrative agencies. He adds that the committee system also revealed weaknesses during the war period because of the large number of such groups, jurisdictional conflicts among them, and lack of coordination between them in such fields as fiscal policy.

Finally, the author speculates on the interesting question whether or not the war changed the relationships between Congress and the executive branch. Although no final answer is given, it is recalled that "in due time, Congress repealed the emergency grants of power, abolished the war agencies and administrative courts, disassembled the great military machine, and reestablished a free economy. From the legal point of view, Congress may be said to have 'regained' the delegated powers and reestablished the constitutional position it enjoyed before the war. It is less demonstrable, however, that an equilibrium of power was reestablished. . . ."

And the war left some "unresolved problems" for the future relating to the control of delegated powers, the allocation of resources, the determination of fiscal policy, and the making of foreign and military commitments.

All students of the American legislative process will be grateful to Roland Young for this excellent and valuable contribution to the growing literature on congressional politics.

GEORGE B. GALLOWAY.

Library of Congress.

The Political Ideas of Harold J. Laski. BY HERBERT A. DEANE. (New York: Columbia University Press. 1955. Pp. xii, 358. $5.75.)

There are shrewd and sharp things in this astringent book on Harold Laski, which is an able doctoral dissertation and an earnest of things to come from the author. The essential thesis is that Laski began his career with brilliance as a student of historical church-state relations and a champion of the doctrine of political pluralism, but that he bogged down in Marxian dogmatism, became in the end a rhetorician and pamphleteer, and never fulfilled his promise. Despite its hostility, it is not one of those shallow and biased attacks on Laski which dogged him in his final years and continued even after his death. It is a scrupulously reasoned analysis which, while it leaves very little standing, is obviously the work of a rigorous scholar who makes exacting demands on his subject. Any new evaluation of Laski as a political theorist will have to reckon with Deane's work, retrace his ground, and justify conclusions different from his.

With Deane's book the worst that can be said against Laski in a responsible way has been said: that what might have developed into something valuable and viable in his thinking was never followed up but was left fragmentary; that he never made intellectual ends meet; that he was too busy as a party propagandist and organizer and wrote too profusely and spread himself too thin, so that he never had a chance for the kind of questioning of his own first premises which every great thinker requires; that he never wrestled in agony with his own thought as Jacob wrestled with the angel; that the strain of theory to which he devoted the last quarter-century of his life was rhetorical, repetitive, contradictory, and empty of any real contribution either to the Marxist tradition or to any other phase of political theory.

This is an inclusive indictment. If there is any answer to it, it must come from those who are willing to take as great pains in detail as Deane has done. (The schema of his book, examining each of Laski's periods except the last, under the captions of "The Nature of the State and of Power," "The Problem of Obedience," "Liberty, Equality, and Natural Rights," "Politics and Economics," "Marxism and Leninism," is a clumsy one and constantly halts the flow of the analysis, but it enables the reader to read the book two ways—chronologically and topically.) Laski never fancied himself, at least during the years when I knew him, as an original political theorist. He saw himself as the spokesman for the Socialist Center and Socialist Left in Western Europe during the difficult years between the emergence of the Nazi threat and the beginning of the cold war. He was in the European tradition, where political activists have been academic scholars and scholars have been political men of action. He was largely indifferent to the rough edges and the unresolved contradictions in his work, because he saw the function of the scholar-politician as one of responding to the ceaseless flow of events, always seeking to help shape them by his thinking and writing, always shifting his thinking to the shift in the events themselves. His work as a scholar was for him only instrumental to his larger work as a teacher in the broadest sense. It was to this that he devoted his most generous energies, and it is here that one must seek whatever success and effectiveness his work had. Americans saw him only through his books, and they made the demands on the books that Mr. Deane makes. Englishmen saw him as a total personality, and men like Kingsley Martin and John Strachey have accordingly viewed him from a different perspective from that of Mr. Deane.

The first thing to remember about him, which Mr. Deane misses somewhat, is that he helped break the mold of the British gentleman-scholar. He may or may not have been a great scholar, but he was certainly no "gentleman." British intellectual life in the Victorian period had been a closed corporation, a club in which you didn't talk too loudly and where the bickering was carried on politely. The first breach was made by Sidney Webb, a London cockney who studied Government White Papers and turned them into Fabian blueprints; it was widened by the cockney H. G. Wells and an outrageous Irishman called Bernard Shaw. Laski's place in British intellectual history belongs in that sequence, rather than with Mill or Maine, Maitland, Bagehot, or Barker. He somehow managed to capture the magisterial rhythms and accents of the British intellectual tradition which reflected the habits of mind of a class accustomed to command an empire, but he turned them to the uses of the new class of educated workers and trained civil servants who were seeking to transform the base of British politics.

Thus, while the kind of thing Deane does is an interesting exercise in analysis, and a very useful one, and makes absorbing reading because of his lucidity and his sense of justice, it is really rather far afield from the function that Laski cut out for himself and about which he was so deadly serious. The real question to ask is how Laski performed the job of taking the tradition of English and continental liberalism from Mill and Tocqueville, the tradition of anti-state corporatism from Figgis and Maitland, the tradition of American pragmatic individualism from William James and Justice Holmes, and the tradition of Marxism all the way from the Fabians to Lenin, and of putting this strange mixture together into a recipe which could nourish the hungry energies of the young British Labor intellectuals. I have put it this way as if Laski did it all at once, whereas actually he moved from one phase to another in a fascinating and still puzzling progression. Yet he was a little bit of a Socialist even at the very beginning and he remained a little bit of a pluralist-pragmatist and a good deal of the liberal even at the very end, despite his sometimes ghastly innocence about the Kremlin police-state. Thus his end lay in his beginning, and his beginnings survived in his end, and like all men he must be seen as a whole even while we see him as a mind in schematically periodized progress. And seeing him as a whole, the question is whether anyone performed any better than Laski, during that terrible period of the 1920's and 1930's, the task of guiding the democratic socialist movements of Western Europe through the perilous currents and shallows of history, and especially the task of bringing the British Labor party to a consciousness of its historic role.

Laski's anti-state pluralism gave him greater standing in American intellectual circles than in England, possibly because it found an echo in the American tradition of the weak state. But there remains, for all its brilliance, an air of unreality about his pluralism, as if he were practicing finger exercises. When he shifted his emphasis from a plea for governmental localism and regionalism in a society of groups where the state was only one among equals, to an effort to form a strategy of state power, he came closer to the immediate problems of our age. At first he tried to build a bridge between Mills' liberal-arianism and the social service ("positive") state; then he moved over into Fabianism and then finally into Marxism. Here, I fear, his flare for historical scholarship did him a disservice. What was needed was not a knowledge of the documents in the early history of the Marxist movement, but a capacity to look hard at Marxism as a whole in an unfooled way. Laski never did this. He was too deeply moved by the plight of the underdog, knew too little economic theory and cared too little about economic development, and never really threw himself into the kind of study of social theory which would have shown up the dogmatism of Marx and his followers. He was ready to be convinced, by his own life, by the circumstances of his time, and by the ideal image in which he had cast himself as a working-class leader. The result was heartbreak. Deane is quite right in pointing to one of his late books, The American Democracy, as a melancholy monument of what happens when you try to impose a dogma upon the living and changing material of a civilization in motion. What you get in the book is the frozen architecture of American society as it might have looked in the 1920's, but not as it was 20 years later.

Yet I wish Deane had been more generous in seeing Laski as a whole. He might have seen that half the civil servants of Great Britain today would be different men except for his influence. This applies even more strongly abroad. When I traveled through Asia at the very time when Deane's book appeared, there was scarcely a non-Communist intellectual, from Japan and Indonesia through Burma and India and Pakistan, who had not been touched by the fire of Laski's thought. One may say that they learned much from him that is not so, which is true of every teacher and every student. But the fact is that they got confidence from him, and came to feel eventually that they could think for themselves—which is what will count for the future. Deane is quite right in saying that we have not yet evolved an original political theory for our own era, which is not liberal or Marxist or Catholic. Certainly Laski didn't evolve it. But if the book suggests anything it suggests that Laski himself may have been expendable in a process which may yet produce, among some who responded to the fire of his thought, the kind of mind that is daring, critical, and architectonic at the same time.

MAX LERNER.

Brandeis University.

Security Through Freedom: American Political Thought and Practice. By ALPHEUS THOMAS MASON. (Ithaca: Cornell University Press. 1955. Pp. xi, 232. $2.90.)

This is a very well-written little book—inspired, no doubt, by the obligation to deliver the Messenger lectures at Cornell, but prepared for publication with such praiseworthy care that no flavor of the impromptu survives. Whether it is also a "bold" book, calculated to "anger some and encourage others" (as the jacket summary advises), depends on one's point of view.

The first chapter, entitled "Political versus Judicial Control of Government," contrasts the disparate elements in our traditional heritage with remarkable acumen buttressed by a more judicious selection of materials for brief quotation than this reviewer has yet come across. No matter here that Mason puts Locke more confidently on the majoritarian side than seems consistent with all of Locke. Nor his, perhaps too rigid, juxtaposition of the views of Waite and Bradley on the exposure of property affected by a public interest to unlimited legislative control. On the whole, the treatment is sober and the argument sound: there is, at least, a significant sense in which inspired judicial construction of the due process clause constituted a "retrograde step in the rear of democracy"—to use the phrase borrowed by the author from Chancellor Kent.

In the two chapters which follow, however, the story of freedom becomes a little too frankly partisan to sustain the level of philosophical insight which the first promised. To be sure, the author's subtitle for the book hardly commits him to avoid the clichés of party struggles as data for analysis. Nevertheless, it would be gratifying to hear some one discuss "Freedom and the New Deal" who had not obviously either voted for F.D.R. all four times or not at all! While, therefore, one must welcome the attention Mason gives to some revealing correspondence between the protagonists of the period, as well as to such previously little emphasized political interconnections as the translation of the Association for the Repeal of the 18th Amendment into the American Liberty League, only fellow partisans will be stimulated by the familiar campaign refrain in which Hoover is still the villain of the plot.

The author gets back on more solid ground in Chapter 4. This chapter (and it is very good) depicts "The Supreme Court in Search of a Role." Here the significance of the 1937 judicial retreat is subjected to keen and sympathetic analysis. Mason's admiration for Stone palpably helps him to maintain a judicious balance in his treatment of the "preferred freedoms" issue, and he is at his best in dealing with the Flag Salute cases. In fact, this issue is so fully documented that one hesitates to enter even the smallest criticism. I had been under the impression, for example, that Learned Hand was substantially right in disassociating Stone from the preferred freedoms doctrine as developed by Black, Douglas, and Rutledge. But there is nothing material to the issue which Mason seems to have omitted, and his estimate of the situation is, therefore, as definitive as we are likely to get.

"Welfare Capitalism: Opportunity and Delusion" is the title for the next to last chapter, and it very nearly maintains the high standard of its predecessor. According to Mason, Welfare Capitalism is the Trojan horse designed by the N.A.M. as a substitute for the Welfare State, and one must at least agree that he has documented a persuasive thesis beginning with a highly arresting statistic, namely a public relations budget stepped up from $36,000 in 1934 to $793,000 in 1937! To be sure, the author may be assuming a closer correspondence than actually exists when he links the concept of countervailing powers propounded by Galbraith with the organized campaign for Welfare Capitalism. But, after all, Brandeis' suspicion of Bigness has not been entirely outdated, and political scientists may still hearken to one of his disciples with considerable profit.

The inspiration for the final chapter, "Can Freedom Conquer Fear," is, as might have been expected, the current "security" problem. And (also as might have been expected) the terms of reference already adopted by the author handicap him badly in harmonizing the freedom which needs to be vindicated today with the "freedom" whose praises have been sung throughout the earlier part of the book. Indeed, at no point prior to the last few pages, does "Freedom" figure significantly as other than the faithful concomitant of majority rule—the product of the dynamic intervention of government to secure economic equality. Nor do constitutional limitations figure conspicuously at any previous point in the essay as other than obstacles to freedom, interposed by the economic elite.

This is not to suggest that Mason is ever indifferent to the variety of doctrinal influences going to make up the American tradition. This volume is, in fact, dedicated to the task of disclosing just this variety over the whole of our history, and the job has been executed with great discernment. What troubles the reviewer is the possibility that "politics" may afford too superficial a current for trustworthy analysis of the depths the author means to probe. Being confined to this level, he finds himself bracketing the principal authors of the Federalist papers with the 20th-century captains of industry as exponents of the same "conservatism." And, for want of a suitable nonpolitical category, the "new conservatives" are, in effect, classified as exponents of Welfare Capitalism. Similarly, property and freedom are dichotomized too rigidly for other than a survey of current politics. Is it safe to disregard the kind of property involved—the distinction between the core of property and its laissez faire outwork of contract, for instance—when undertaking a long-range appraisal of our constitutionalism? Property is power, indeed, but not every kind of property constitutes a challenge to free government, and some kinds of property are probably integral to free government.

These observations are not intended to detract in the least from the tribute already paid to Professor Mason's book. They raise questions to which the answers are not easily come by, and this reviewer doesn't pretend to have them. He can, in closing, however, admonish Professor Mason for one proofreading error by virtue of his superior geographical position: the twice-mentioned "Senator Dill from New Jersey" was elected from Washington.

K. C. COLE.

University of Washington.

The Development of Academic Freedom in the United States. BY RICHARD HOFSTADTER AND WALTER P. METZGER. (New York: Columbia University Press. 1955. Pp. xiii, 527. $5.50.)

Academic Freedom in Our Time. BY ROBERT M. MACIVER. (New York: Columbia University Press. 1955. Pp. xiv, 329. $4.00.)

These volumes taken together are the final report of the American Academic Freedom Project sponsored by Columbia University as part of the University's Bicentennial program of 1954, the central theme of which was "Man's Right to Knowledge and the Free Use Thereof." Professor R. M. MacIver served as director of the project under a distinguished Executive Committee of which Professor Lewis Hacker was secretary. Those who participated as members of the Executive Committee, in addition to the authors, included Professors R. F. Butts, Henry Commager, Walter Gellhorn, Arthur Macmahon, I. I. Rabi, and Lawrence Chamberlain of Columbia. To assist the Committee a panel of advisers was recruited including the presidents of Vassar, Hobart, Amherst, Bowdoin, Dartmouth, Yale, Rutgers, and the State University of New York, the Chancellor of the Jewish Theological Seminary of America, the directors of the Institute for Advanced Study, the Detroit Public Library, the New York Public Library, the Pierpont Morgan Library, the ex-presidents of Yale and North Carolina, two trustees of Barnard College, and a dean emeritus of Columbia College. The entire project "is the outcome of the initiative and the generosity of Louis M. Rabinowitz," Council member of the School of General Studies at Columbia, who also served as a member of the Executive Committee.

Never before has there been so searching an inquiry into the history, theory, and practice of academic freedom. "The study," according to Professor MacIver, "was planned to consist of two parts, one a historical survey of the rise, development, and vicissitudes of academic freedom in this country, the other an analysis of the contemporary situation, and a study of the problems it presents, against a background designed to bring out the significance of academic freedom and its relation to the society in which we live." The two volumes under review are thus parts one and two of the study as planned. Taken together they constitute a monumental contribution to our intellectual history as well as to an understanding of the specific problem of academic freedom.

At no point have the authors forgotten that academic freedom is not simply a slogan or verbal gimmick concocted by professors to defend the irresponsibility of their own guild, but one important aspect of the general problem of freedom in society. It is appropriate, therefore, that Professor MacIver should begin his volume with a section on the "Climate of Opinion" and conclude it with a section on "The University and the Social Order." And it is also appropriate that the Hofstadter-Metzger volume should begin with an extended account of the European heritage and include, along with a fascinating history of American colleges, chapters on such topics as "Religion, Reason and Revolution," "Darwinism," "Academic Freedom and Big Business," and "Organization, Loyalty and War."

Both volumes lay particular stress on three basic ideas: (1) the integral relation of academic freedom to the prevailing social, economic, political, and ideological climate of the time; (2) the central importance of academic organization and government to the problem of academic freedom; and (3) the importance of inspired and courageous leadership within the college or university, to resist pressures for conformity not only from outside but also from within the academic community.

It is obvious that the nature and extent of academic freedom at any given time and place will depend in large measure upon the spirit and structure of the society of which the university is a part. "In the social structure of the Middle Ages," for example, "the universities were centers of power and prestige, protected and courted, even deferred to, by emperors and popes. . . . Such a theological center as the University of Paris stood at the heart of the spiritual life of the age. . . . If the universities were spiritual centers, they were scarcely less important as agencies of practical life. . . . They provided vocational training for the clerical functionaries of church and state, for notaries, secretaries, legates and lawyers." As both cause and effect of their impor-

7 tance to medieval society, "in internal matters the universities had the prerogative of self-government."

It would be false, however, to assume that power and prestige, together with the right of self-government, are in themselves guarantees of academic freedom. Indeed, the very importance which society attaches to the university may induce a solicitude for what is taught, for the manners and morals of faculty and students, that can stifle rather than sustain academic freedom. This was as true of the medieval universities as it was of colleges in colonial America. These early colleges no less than the medieval universities were important as training centers for both lay and clerical leadership. But "American collegiate education, like that of Europe, was the ward of religion," and sectarian religion at that—a sponsorship not noted for tolerance or respect for deviants and dissenters. Paradoxically, strict sectarian control with its overtones of censorship and enforced conformity was ultimately displaced, not by the decline of sectarian religion, but by the multiplication of rival sects. As James Madison later observed, "in a free government the security for civil rights must be the same as that for religious rights. It consists in one case in the multiplicity of interests, and in the other in the multiplicity of sects."

As the religious domination of extramural society declined, so did the religious control of higher education. An equally important transformation, although one that came later and has still to come in many places, was the shift in emphasis from indoctrination and the simple transmission of existing knowledge to the independent search for new knowledge. Academic freedom acquires an entirely new dimension when colleges and universities cease to be merely custodians of what is known or revealed and become centers for searching out new truths. During the period of this transition academic life is bound to be characterized by tension and conflict, and by elaborate rationalizations to reconcile the new with the old. Hofstadter and Metzger deal extensively and in detail with this process of rationalization and reconciliation from medieval to contemporary times. St. Thomas' ingenious effort to Christianize Aristotle, the more or less systematic campaign to reconcile Darwin with Genesis, and contemporary attempts to rationalize the welfare state with laissez-faire economic "laws" are but a few illustrations that come to mind.

Both of these volumes give extensive attention to the relation of academic government to academic freedom. The American pattern of college government which places final authority in a body of laymen rather than in the academic community itself has been a major source of difficulty. According to Hofstadter and Metzger, this plan of government "has hampered the development of organization, initiative and self-confidence among American college professors and it has contributed along with many other forces in American life to lowering their status in the community."

In spite of this sweeping indictment, academic government by laymen has not been and is not today an unmixed evil. The victory of a mixed board of laymen over the typical ecclesiastical body of the medieval university and the early American college was undoubtedly a step forward. 'Paradoxical as it may seem,' writes Professor Hofstadter, "... the growing religious and intellectual liberalism of 18th century America was identified in the colleges not with corporate autonomy but with lay government. Not until the 19th century, when lay government had been long established, was this situation reversed." And, in my judgment, the case for lay control even today is a strong one. Notwithstanding Professor MacIver's staunch faith in faculty government as the surest guarantee of academic freedom, I harbor some slight skepticism. Professor Hofstadter cites many cases both in European and American colleges and universities where the pressure for conformity came from the academic community itself rather than from the outside. In any case, the emerging pattern of academic government in the United States looks toward a community in which power and responsibility are shared by students, faculty, administrative officers, alumni, and governing board. With some fairly clear recognition of differential functions and jurisdictional limits among the various groups, this pattern of "countervailing forces" in academic government promises as good a guarantee for academic freedom as any other.

Both these volumes have much to say about the composition of academic governing boards. No uniform pattern appears, although businessmen (including bankers), lawyers, and industrialists clearly predominate. This has been due in part to the unceasing dependence of higher education upon private philanthropy and public funds, and in part to the predominance of these groups in our business civilization. Big business, says Professor Metzger, "did not enter academe as intruders, they were welcomed into the realm and escorted to its high places by its very grateful inhabitants." Yet somehow the notion grew that the business patron was anti-intellectual and an enemy of academic freedom. There is, of course, a good deal in the record to support this notion and both of these volumes contain the usual catalogue of horrors. But Professor Metzger particularly does a service in correcting the caricature of the big businessman as the big bad wolf of academe. "The contrary notion notwithstanding, the large contributors to the universities were usually not of that philistine crowd that undervalued the wisdom in books. . . . For all their quirks and vulgarities, the tycoons of Fifth Avenue and Newport were closer to the patricians of Beacon Street than to the business gentry of Main Street." As for their devotion to academic freedom, the record is by no means altogether negative. Indeed, the businessman has probably proved to be more intelligent, tolerant, and understanding on this score than his clerical predecessor, and probably more so than his political successor is likely to be. At any rate, I am grateful to Professor Metzger for his description of Benjamin Duke and his business associates standing firm in defense of Professor John Bassett of Trinity College, North Carolina, while so-called "liberal" editors, clergymen, and educators, including Josephus Daniels of the Raleigh News and Observer cried out for his academic scalp. "Five of the seven voting against Bassett were ministers in the Methodist Church, one a United States Senator, and only one was a local businessman. . . . On the Bassett side, four ministers were aligned with twelve bankers and industrialists."

The other side of the coin, however, is presented here in abundance. The celebrated "cases" of Richard Ely of Wisconsin, I. A. Hourwich, and Edward Bemis of Chicago, J. Allen Smith of Marietta, John R. Commons of Indiana, Edward A. Ross of Stanford, and many more are described. Some of these appear in Professor Metzger's study in a new light, and one in which the forces of good and evil are less sharply delineated. Professor Ely, for example, was tried and acquitted by his own board of regents for economic heresy on charges (brought not by a businessman but by a small-town teacher serving as State Superintendent of Education) that he had among other things favored the closed shop, counseled workers to strike, and entertained a walking delegate in his home. Subsequently Professor Ely wrote to say that were these charges true, they would "unquestionably unfit me to occupy a responsible position as an instructor of youth in a great university." What price freedom! And J. Allen Smith, having been fired from Marietta for supporting the monetary theories of William Jennings Bryan, was offered a job by the Populist President of the University of Missouri, who proposed to make room for Smith, the true believer, by firing a professor who believed in the gold standard. Smith, who saw the "moral equivalence between this and Marietta's action," declined. Nor does the record show faculties rising courageously to the defense of their proscribed brethren. Although there are some cases of this, they are exceptional.

Time and again it appears that the first, and often the last, line of defense for academic freedom lies in the office of the college or university president. When this crumbles through timidity, cowardice, or simple submission to "expedience," a major bulwark of free thought goes. And when, as not infrequently occurs, the president himself is the offender, academic freedom is indeed in jeopardy. For the president in the American system of academic government is the link between the faculty and the governing board, and between the corporate body of the college and the larger community of which it is part. If he understands and believes in the high purposes for which American colleges and universities exist, purposes which can only be realized in an atmosphere of freedom, and if he combines with this belief insight, initiative, and courage, he, more than any other individual or group, can be the guardian and champion of academic freedom.

No possible summary of these volumes can do justice to the very great contribution they make toward an understanding and hence to the defense of academic freedom in our society. The historical foundations are brilliantly set forth by Professors Hofstadter and Metzger, and the contemporary scene is described in detail by Professor MacIver. The climate of opinion, the atmosphere of fear and uncertainty, which has made possible repeated attacks on academic freedom, the difficult problem of communism on the campus, are examined by Professor MacIver with his usual forthrightness and wisdom. One can quarrel in detail with much that is proposed, with his staunch faith in faculty government as the best guarantee of freedom, with his new bill of rights for professors which bristles with ambiguities, with his "conspectus" of principles to "guide us in dealing with communism on the campus." But these differences are minor ones in any case and weigh but slightly against the great sense of indebtedness one feels for this impressive and in some ways definitive study of one of the major problems of our time.

PETER H. ODEGARD.

University of California (Berkeley).

Vernunftglaube und Religion in der Modernen Gesellschaft: Liberalismus, Marxismus und Demokratie. BY EDUARD HEIMANN. (Hamburg: J. C. B. Mohr (Paul Siebeck) Tübingen. 1955. Pp. xiii, 315.)

Eduard Heimann, whose teaching and research have impressed the initiated in this country for the last two decades, has found a wider audience and readier recognition in his native land. In fact, the quick succession of his German post-war publications, partly restoring an interrupted distinguished academic and pedagogical career of pre-Hitler days, gives a fuller cohesive picture of his overall endeavors as an inspirational and systematic social thinker. His approach, indeed, may find a more immediate response in Europe's spiritual vacuum of the totalitarian aftermath than in the less disturbed setting of the new world. Yet as the increasing influence of some theologians on our shores indicates (among them Heimann's comrade-in-arms and one-time fellow religious socialist, Paul Tillich), his writings put into an appropriate American mould will have a rising effect and will arouse (though possibly not win over) an alert social science, grappling with fundamentals in the ideological battles of this era of "International Civil War."

The book under discussion must be seen as the last of a trilogy, starting with his earlier studies (previously published in the United States) on Freedom and Order and on Wirtschaftssysteme und Gesellschaftssysteme. His is a "theology of society," in contrast to the presently prevailing interest in a "sociology of religion." In this latest attempt, his original and not altogether unfamiliar themes are reiterated, stressed, and systematized. Stripped of their somewhat complicated connotations, they state simply that the alternatives usually presented to us between freedom and order, person and community, liberalism and Marxism, individualism and communism are not truly consequential choices but interrelated forces, deriving from the same intellectual assumptions, leading to their necessary stalemate, and fundamentally remaining on the same level. The conflict of these two irreconcilable brethren (one fed by the other's "perversion of freedom into privileges") can be solved only by a new solution which, raising the issue to a new level, at the same time brings it back to the forgotten and abandoned base of its origin in Christianity. One quickly recognizes a familiar dialectic in such a construction and may even see—in the turn to religion as the suggested answer—a frequently proposed way out of the contemporary crisis.

What gives the study its special quality is the fact that it presents in the course of an astute analysis one of the most suggestive criticisms of the inner contradictions inherent in “the false circle” of a secularized society. The second part especially, dealing with the dramatic development of original Marxism and its logical self-destruction in the political theocracy of Bolshevism, deserves careful consideration. This story of great expectations and dismal disappointments, told in the main section of the book, reflects at the same time the intellectual biography of a sincere scholar and of his generation, which has lived through the enticements of a seemingly complete rational order and its debacle. That it must be difficult for such a group to find a more generous appraisal of the Enlightenment (as it may, however, shape up in the minds of oncoming scholars) is understandable. Heimann’s reaction may well be the natural response of a deeply disturbed intelligentsia, caught in a spiritual crisis of the first order, searching for a new security, and yet positive enough in reaching out for available constructive forces. It may well be a satisfactory answer only to a specific historic generation.

For this and other reasons, there may be many who will take exception to the unequivocal conclusion that the “rational autonomy” (in both its versions from the brotherly contemporary foes) has proved its inability to master the present-day crisis and that “the never assured chance” for a productive synthesis of personal freedom and social justice can only be fulfilled by the third force of Christianity merged with the institutions of industrial, social democracy. Yet even those critics will be rewarded by the rich presentation of material, the thoughtful conceptual analysis, and the religious earnestness of this most sensitive social scientist.

SIGMUND NEUMANN.

Wesleyan University.

Die Auflösung der Weimarer Republik: Eine Studie zum Problem des Machtverfalls in der Demokratie. BY KARL DIETRICH BRACHER. (Stuttgart and Düsseldorf, Germany: Ring-Verlag. 1955. Pp. xxiii, 754. D-Mark 27.80.)

Why is it that the story of the downfall of the Weimar Republic still holds such fascination? Is it because this was one case where that modern barbarism, totalitarianism, won in long drawn-out, “democratic” competition with the forces of democracy? Or because of the uncanny impression that here, but for the grace of God, go we all?

However this may be, traditional “one-factor” explanations no longer hold. It was not only, or even chiefly, a Germany leaning toward authoritarianism, or the Great Depression, or the impoverishment of the middle classes, or a Nazi-plutocratic, or Nazi-military, conspiracy which caused the event. Never has the intricate mixture of causes—“historic necessities,” seemingly overwhelming trends, historical "accidents," and the "personal equation"—become as apparent as through Bracher's book. One has the impression of overpowering forces driving toward the inevitable, and yet, at certain junctures, the feeling that but for a coincidence, but for a slightly different action by one of the fabulously inept main actors, it "needn't have happened" as it did.

This is an important book. For the first time story and analysis are based on an exhaustive use of all sources now available in Germany. How far the author was handicapped by the fact that possibly relevant documents are still in foreign custody is hard to say. But material available in Germany, foreign and indigenous (including important, hitherto unknown sources, such as the papers of Count Westarp), has been used comprehensively, and one gains the impression that, whatever may still come (e.g., Bruening's memoirs, still denied us by that exceptionally taciturn man), the great outlines of the period have now been established.

The great merit of the work is in tying in the events of 1930-1933 with a searching analysis of German institutions as they existed in the twenties. Bracher's analyses of bureaucracy, the military, interest groups, Buende, and "movements" (each constituting a complete essay by itself) are rewarding for any student of comparative government. There follows the blow-by-blow story of events during the last, fateful years. As does all significant history-writing, this account proceeds from a definite point of view, that of the democratic Left, but since minute care is taken not to disregard any source from whatever quarter this does not prevent the presentation from being as "objective" as any written from any other "viewpoint." To one whose doubtful privilege it was to live through that period in Germany, reliving it here is a shattering experience. To Germans it may prove to be more. In the ten years they have been free to explore their past again, little attention has been given to the Weimar and Nazi eras, and what there is tends, in dangerous fashion, to be apologetic as far as Rightist forces are concerned, and debunking, if not frankly hostile, toward Weimar democracy; finding it not white but gray, they proclaim it black. This goes not only for the flood of postwar memoirs but also for serious historiography (as witness a recent biography of von Hindenburg, not to mention worse publications). But "repression" and delusion cannot go on forever. The appearance of this book may turn out to be the first step in a process of a nation's self-analysis and self-purification and thus a political event of prime import. In any event, it is a work in which German scholarship may take legitimate pride.

JOHN H. HERZ.

The City College.

German Democracy at Work: A Selective Study. BY JAMES K. FOLLOCK, HENRY L. BRETTON, FRANK GRACE, AND DANIEL S. MCHARGUE. (Ann Arbor, Mich.: The University of Michigan Press. 1955. Pp. viii, 208. $4.50.)

Forecasts about the political future of Germany have taxed for generations the prophetic skill of many political scientists. In the Weimar years hopes ran high, only to be followed by attitudes that ranged from a desire to ostracize Germany from the Western community of civilized nations and to reduce her to industrial impotence to the expectations that de-nazification and political re-education would bring the Germans back to the fold where they were once more desperately needed.

In this excellent volume the authors, under the direction of Professor Pollock, who can rightly claim not only a profound understanding of the German political system and ideology, but also some responsibility for our policies in Germany in the post-World War II period, present an optimistic point of view about Germany's future. The volume is devoted to the study of the working of the rediscovered democratic process, with particular emphasis on elections. The reader gets, for the first time, an excellent account of what the Germans thought and how they voted in the elections of 1953—an account generally similar to the ones given in the very competent volumes that appeared in Great Britain for the general elections of 1945, 1950, and 1951. The ideology and platforms of the major political groupings—the “majority party” (the Christian Democratic party) and the “opposition” (the Social Democratic party)—are carefully analyzed, though at times too much emphasis is placed upon the past history of these two parties rather than upon their contemporary ideological orientation and social composition. An excellent chapter is provided by Pollock on the electoral law under which the elections of 1953 were held and McHargue adds an able statement on the actual voting machinery as it was observed at the polls. Two “close-ups” of the electoral process for the months preceding the election and of the actual balloting and the election returns, along with a good interpretive analysis of the voting, are given by Bretton for one electoral district (Hersfeld, in North Hesse) and for another electoral district (corresponding to the Düsseldorf-Mettman Landkreis) which is considered to mirror as accurately as possible the Federal Republic. There is a good concluding chapter on United States policy in which the role played by this country in the election is frankly admitted. The identification of the Christian Democratic party position with United States foreign policy is candidly shown to have favored rather than harmed Chancellor Adenauer.

The reader, as we noted, will find in this volume an optimistic view. The elections were held in the most orderly fashion; extremists were routed and the young Republic, despite some of the policies advocated by the Social Democratic party, seemed to be remarkably close to a general agreement on the fundamental issues facing it. The democratic parties seem to be well in control of the situation today, as they were in the early years of the Weimar Republic. The scrupulous adherence to democratic processes in electoral campaigning and balloting, so well described by the authors, appears to leave little room for concern. The evaluative remarks of the authors, especially Bretton, go one step farther and help the reader reach a point of happy complacency. For instance, “There are no indications,” he writes, “that the new German Army will again become an instrument of aggression,” and “The German commitment to a democratic state appears to be sincere." It follows, of course, that the fears of the French are unfounded, and that many of our difficulties are due to the Soviet foreign policy, which sows "discord among the nations of the West." The solution to "Europeanize" the Saar is applauded, at the time of writing, by the same author as an indication of Germany's commitment to the West.

One cannot read these statements without considerable skepticism. They are, to begin with, premature; secondly, they leave out of consideration some of the basic concerns of the Germans—reunification being the most important today. What form will it take? Is the "neutralist" position plus the reunification advocated by the Social Democratic party worse than advocacy of reunification by force—something that may in the future break the Republic's tender back? If and when this is advocated then perhaps the Social Democratic policy may, retrospectively, appear to have been not really inconsistent with the interests of Germany, of the European community, and of the United States. Thirdly, despite intentions to keep the army under political control, one cannot ignore the historical role it has played nor fail to watch its growth without serious misgivings.

Such skepticism may be unfounded. It is the hope of this reviewer that the authors will produce volumes on many future German elections as competently as they have done for the last one. It is also his hope that the elections will continue to mirror the spirit of Germany's "commitment to democracy." At this stage, however, I cannot share Bretton's optimism. It is, of course, for the reader to decide how much real hope there is for Germany's future, and I can think of no better volume to suggest than the one Professor Pollock and his associates have produced.

ROY C. MACRIDIS.

Northwestern University.

Israel's Emerging Constitution, 1948-51. BY EMANUEL RACKMAN. (New York: Columbia University Press. 1955. Pp. xvi, 183. $3.00.)

Although poor in natural resources and small in population, Israel rightfully boasts of a larger per capita supply of difficult problems than any other country in the world. For the social scientist, this new state of less than two million people is a microcosmic laboratory in which political, economic, and cultural questions of worldwide significance can be studied at close range. Among these are the issues associated with clashing cultural backgrounds, religious differences, the treatment of national minorities, rapid economic development, serious inflationary pressures, the continuous threat of war, the existence of an economic blockade, the role of collective, cooperative, labor-owned, and national enterprises, the dilemmas of a victorious labor party, proportional representation, the operation of coalition government, the development of a new governmental structure, and—as vividly demonstrated in recent months—the great conflict between the free world and the Soviet bloc.

In this modest volume the author singles out for isolated treatment the development of Israel's constitution during the first few years of its existence. He gives special attention to the debate on whether or not a written constitution should be adopted. Although the founders of the state had done considerable work in preparing alternative drafts, the final decision was negative. Lip-service to the idea of a written constitution was provided, however, by a parliamentary resolution favoring a written constitution at some future date (a resolution that has thus far remained a dead letter). Of particular interest are the reasons for the negative decision. The author shows how politically-organized religious groups played a central role by insisting that a written constitution give a central status to the Jewish religion. Although the religious groups were in a minority position, it seems clear that Prime Minister Ben Gurion felt that it would be better to dodge this issue at a time when an effective coalition government depended upon their support.

The author also gives attention to the development of constitutional principles through the enactment of the new state's first laws. With but minor modifications, Israel's parliamentary system was based on the "shadow state" which had been organized by the Jewish community during the days of the British mandate. It consisted of a unicameral legislature composed of members elected through a system of nationwide proportional representation on the basis of national party lists. Proposals for a system of single-member districts were discussed but—because of the natural opposition from the large number of small parties—abandoned. The judicial system existing under the mandate—with its variegated array of Jewish rabbinical courts, Moslem courts, and Christian ecclesiastical courts—was also continued. This has meant some serious limitations in the civil rights of women. (The broader issues of civil rights, including the rights of the various Arab minorities, are not discussed.) The most drastic changes that were made in the earlier years were the merging of previously separate defense forces into one army, the abolition of bigamy and child marriage, and the offer of citizenship to any Jew coming to Israel. The issue of a national school system to replace the separate schools under the wings of political parties and religious groups was postponed. (A unified system was established, however, soon after the end of the period covered in the book.) With government action penetrating into almost every field of human endeavor, a broad consensus developed on the philosophy of the "positive state." The character of this consensus is partially indicated by the continuous demands of the right wing "free enterprise" minority to nationalize the health services and labor exchanges that have developed under the wing of the General Federation of Labor.

From the viewpoint of comparative government, this book is a useful—albeit limited—case study. From the viewpoint of Middle East affairs (which will probably attract more attention now that this area is once again a bitter bone of international contention), it is a valuable contribution, and should be supplemented by similar studies of constitutional developments in neighboring countries, particularly Egypt. In the opinion of this reviewer, however, the most notable contribution it can make is to help open up to broader and more intensive analysis the multi-hued host of twentieth century social and political questions to be found at this scene of ancient glory and tragedy.

BERTRAM M. GROSS.

Jerusalem, Israel.

Foreign Policy and the Democratic Process. BY MAX BELOFF. (Baltimore: The Johns Hopkins Press. 1955. Pp. 134. $3.00.)

With the publication of these four Albert Shaw Lectures on Diplomatic History, delivered in 1954 at the Johns Hopkins University, Max Beloff, already well known to American readers, joins the growing ranks of those examining the compatibility of democratic processes with effective foreign policy.

While his remarks are in part generalized and specific allusions are made to most of the Western democracies, it is the United States that Mr. Beloff has at the center of his attention. Americans inured to the criticisms of Lippmann, Kennan, Morgenthau, et al. may find Beloff's strictures lacking both novelty and bite. In setting forth the "Problem of Democratic Foreign Policy" the author cites the concern in this country over whether the adaptation of technological changes to improvement of international positions entails necessarily the abandonment of social, economic, and political values that lie at the heart of the concept of democracy. But he speaks of "concern," not of conscious or unconscious abandonment of the latter to the exigencies of the former. This same mildness and, one is tempted to say, balance are also evident in Beloff's examination of the "Pre-suppositions of Democratic Foreign Policy." Mention is made of the (erstwhile?) American penchant for public diplomacy, of the historical efforts to subject diplomacy to popular control, and of the greater concern which the State Department manifests over informing the public, as compared with both the Foreign Office and the Quai d'Orsay. The conclusion, once again, is a tempered one: in foreign policy "newly enfranchised democracies would all seem to require at least a period of apprenticeship."

To this reader, at least, it was the third section, "Institutions of Democratic Foreign Policy," which seemed the most effective, because it was the most challenging. This is not to say that he agreed with all of Mr. Beloff's contentions. Despite the sources named, it would appear to be an exaggeration to repeat that "... Congress is a co-ordinate member of a foreign policy team; and this co-ordinate membership extends to the House as well as the Senate." Also the frequently perceived cleavage in the Republican party between "isolationist," Middle Western, congressional leadership and "internationalist," Eastern, executive leadership may well be an over-simplification of a passing phenomenon. (After all, just how "isolationist" or Middle Western is Senate Republican leader Knowland?) One should not cavil too much, however. Americans tending to take executive control for granted, should be recurrently reminded of the enlarging role and responsibility of Congress. As we approach a national election, Democratic divisions over domestic policy should not totally crowd from view intra-Republican struggles over party orientation toward foreign affairs. It is timely to read of American dependence on the "accident of personality," though we do not forget Sir Winston and the present Prime Minister's difficulty in emerging from his long shadow. Mr. Beloff also performs a service in warning his readers of the danger of paying lip service to "civilian control" without any real comprehension of its meaning. In the concluding section the author confronts classical concepts of national sovereignty with the modern requirements of free-world security, but he at the same time follows the official position of the British government in refusing to see supra-national structures as an inevitable or even a necessarily desirable solution. Like Raymond Aron, Beloff can only hope for democratic wisdom in the use of techniques of statecraft forced upon us by the increasing improbability of total war but still so new that their dimensions and consequences have not as yet been ascertained.

Foreign Policy and the Democratic Process is an exceedingly well-written volume, benefiting perhaps from the fact that the material had first been read aloud. Much of its interest is to be found in seeing the United States through the eyes of a thoughtful, informed, articulate, foreign observer. Clearly directed toward the non-academic public, it deserves a wide audience.

EDGAR S. FURNISS, JR.

Princeton University.

Continuity and Change in Russian and Soviet Thought. EDITED WITH AN INTRODUCTION BY ERNEST J. SIMMONS. (Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press. 1955. Pp. xii, 563. $7.50.)

This ponderous symposium is a collective attempt to determine the degree to which the Soviet regime has remade the Russians or has remained Russian. It emerged from a four-day conference which was held at Arden House in March, 1954 under the auspices of the Joint Committee on Slavic Studies of the American Council of Learned Societies and the Social Science Research Council. The participants represent a wide variety of disciplines, institutions, and personal experience.

The problem is approached in terms of six broad categories: economic thought; authoritarianism and democracy; collectivism and individualism; rationality and nonrationality; literature, state and society; and Russian and Soviet messianism and theories of action. No serious attempt can be made to evaluate or even mention each of the 26 individual specialized papers which comprise the bulk of the volume except to say that they are, on the whole, well-documented and that each is capable of standing alone. Some are highly specialized, such as Father Florovsky's paper on "Reason and Faith in the Philosophy of Solov'ëv and Nicholas Riasanovsky's study of "Khomiakov on Sobornost." Others involve a greater sweep. Alexander Gerschenkron's paper, which deals with nineteenth-century Russian economic thought, also broaches the question of economic backwardness in general terms. Three papers on Stalin offer much in the way of enlightenment regarding his methods and the rationale underlying them: they are Alexander Erlich's paper on the late dictator's views concerning economic development, John Bergamini's study on collectivization, and Adam Ulam's "Stalin and the Theory of Totalitarianism." Of these, Ulam obviously had the most difficult task.

The danger of every symposium is that it can easily result in more fission than fusion. The thankless task of attempting to summarize, evaluate, and integrate the specialized papers fell to the veteran Soviet area specialists Alexander Gerschenkron, Merle Fainsod, Michael Karpovich, Geroid Robinson, Ernest Simmons, and Philip E. Mosely. If it were not for the work of these reviewers, the volume would completely fail to live up to its imposing title. Julian Towster, in his very able paper on "Vishinsky's Concept of the Collectivity," is one of the few authors of individual papers who succeeded in placing his topic in a broader perspective in the spirit of the volume's title.

Of course, this is a problem which in its analytical dimensions and complexity is one of tremendous importance and also one which requires methodological caution but also a certain degree of boldness. Merle Fainsod's review in the volume provides some sober and meaty reading in this respect. He complained quite justifiably, in reviewing the papers on authoritarianism and democracy, that the participants "in their collective wisdom . . . have avoided the issues of continuity and change like the plague, and they have left me to rush in where prudent men fear to tread." He also wisely warned that "the march of events plays tricks on the best of us" and that "we are the unavoidable victims of our time span, and it behooves us to be modest in rendering judgments which future events may belie" (p. 172).

The section on authoritarianism and democracy includes, in addition to Ulam's paper, a superbly documented study by Robert F. Byrnes on the arch-reactionary Pobedonostsev, as well as an able paper by Thomas Hammond on Leninist authoritarianism. Michael Karpovich, who himself is representative of the Western-oriented intelligentsia which was all too uncommon in Russia, contrasts the two Constitutional Democratic leaders Basil Maklakov and Paul Miliukov.

The section on literature contains some good papers on tsarist and Soviet literary practices and a thorough survey by Ernest Simmons which points to the dilemma faced by the Soviet regime on the question of publishing the Russian literary classics. Probably one of the best balanced as well as more manageable sections in the volume is that entitled "Russia and the Community of Nations," which includes papers by Isaiah Berlin, Hans Kohn, Kermit McKenzie, and Frederick C. Barghoorn. Hans Kohn has very succinctly contrasted the two great nineteenth-century Russian messianic thinkers, Dostoevsky and Danilevsky. Barghoorn's survey of Russian messianism in postwar Soviet ideology and McKenzie's paper on the Comintern provide a contrast with the earlier mes-sianism and the basis for Philip Mosely's conclusion that the Soviet brand is far more significant, persistent, and effective than that of the nineteenth century.

The section on rationality and nonrationality includes an excellent survey of Soviet biology by Theodosius Dobzhansky, as well as interesting papers by George L. Kline and Herbert Marcuse, but its high point is Geroid Robinson's unusually provocative and able commentary. Robinson boldly and impressively questions the rationality of Russian pre-Soviet and Soviet thought and contends that "pre-revolutionary Russia was intellectually somewhat immature, and that this condition helps to explain both the immaturity of the Bolshevik ideology and its success in winning a certain following in the Soviet Union" (p. 359). He points out that Russian autocracy lacked a systematic political theory, that the Russian Orthodox Church has "placed more emphasis on mysticism, and less on intellectualism," and that its saints have not been scholars as was often the case in the Western Church. Of course, the Orthodox Church can be defended on the ground that the essence of religion is a matter of faith and not of reason, but Robinson strengthens his case by also citing the low level and obscure nature of the writings of the Populists and of the Socialist Revolutionaries who followed them. In this connection, mention should be made of Oliver Radkey's paper on Chernov, the Socialist Revolutionary leader, which goes far toward explaining the miserable performance of that party in 1917 despite its having won the elections to the Constituent Assembly. It is a pity that Robinson's stimulating commentary, which is reported to have created something of a limited uproar at the Conference, is not pursued in any of the other papers.

It is the impression of this reviewer that the Conference would have been more fruitful if greater resources had been devoted to enabling the volume to live up to its title. The individual papers could have been commissioned as well as some others, but a companion volume or, in any case, a more effective evaluation and synthesis would have been desirable. Yet this is a rich collection of papers and comments, whatever its shortcomings, and it will serve in many respects as a basic work on the Soviet Union and as a foundation for much-needed further study of the problem.

JOHN S. RESHETAR, JR.

University of Pennsylvania.

Becoming. BY GORDON W. ALLPORT. (New Haven: Yale University Press. 1955. Pp. 106. $2.75.)

Political scientists who are disturbed by the crescendo of demand to "psychologize" their profession will profit from this lucid book. Delivered in 1954 as the Terry Lectures at Yale, the essay reflects Allport's belief "that modern psychology is in a dilemma. Broadly speaking, it has trimmed down the image of man that gave birth to the democratic dream." If this diminution had some utility, Allport argues that positivistic psychology, with its stress upon man as an "empty organism," fails to supply the needs of democratic theory "that man possess a measure of rationality, a portion of freedom, a generic conscience, propiarte ideals, and unique value" (Pp. 99-101).

The reasoning culminating in these conclusions begins with an examination of the philosophical roots of various psychological schools. Consciously oversimplifying, Allport dilates on two polar conceptions, the "Lockean and Leibnitzian traditions." For Locke, nothing could be in the intellect that was not first in the senses; but Leibnitz added the table-turning qualification: "save only the intellect itself"! Locke's formula underlies the various stimulus-response, behavioristic psychologies which fascinate so many contemporary American social scientists. Leibnitz's conception is more congenial to Gestalt, cognitive, and phenomenological psychologies and (paradoxical as it may seem to political scientists) furnishes better than Locke's the philosophical base for morally responsible adults.

Allport urges the study of man as a unique personality. This approach involves some depreciation of tendencies to isolate common traits, drives, needs, attitudes, dimensions, or behaviors in favor of dealing with the whole man. It implies criticism of superficial inferences from animal psychology. "I venture the opinion that all of the animals in the world are psychologically less distinct from one another than one man is from other man." It requires shifting the focus of study from man's past to his future—hence "Becoming." This refocusing is assisted by Allport's interpretation of infantile experience, which can inflict "an ineradicable scar" on the emergent character, but which also is capable of laying the foundation for a lifetime of "continuous and unimpeded growth."

To fill the "empty organism" of positivistic psychology without invoking a magical "self" to explain all psychic phenomena, Allport advances the "proprium." The proprium contains "all aspects of the personality that make for inward unity," including (among others) self-identity, ego-enhancement, rational agent, and self-image. One aspect, "propariate striving," refers to the propensity of human beings to set goals for themselves—Raold Amundsen is the telling example. Propariate striving radically qualifies the almost sovereign efficacy of "tension reduction" as the explanation for many psychologists of motivation. Here the analysis raises the question of conscience, which may begin with "internalized" Freudian musts and must-nots but which, in normal, rational adults includes much more—"specific habits of obedience give way to generic self-guidance" by means of values.

Enter cultural determinism's claim that values are socially prescribed and that personality is "merely the subjective side of culture." In deflating this claim, Allport arrives at the question of freedom of the will—"no other issue causes such consternation for the scientific psychologist." Allport's defense of a degree of freedom, his stress upon the question of the meaning of man's existence, and his concluding remarks on religion and democracy all help fulfill his intention to prepare the way for a psychology more adequate to human needs. Finally, the author relies throughout on the kind of evidence political scientists traditionally have understood and employed.

CHARLES M. HARDIN.

University of Chicago.

German History: Some New German Views. EDITED BY HANS KOHN. (Boston: The Beacon Press. 1954. Pp. 224. $4.00.)

The ideal of the historian may be to float above the conflicts of his time and to present the past as it really was, but as human being he cannot escape history. Twice in the last half-century, German historians have had to face this problem in a peculiarly acute form; twice their state and their society have suffered the devastating effects of losing a modern war. The book before us deals with this in two parts: an introduction and an essay by the editor in which he sets the problem, and eleven articles in which a group of German historians re-think some of the most important aspects of their history.

All of these essays were written between 1945 and 1952. In age and experience the authors range from Friedrich Meinecke, who was born in 1862, to Walther Hofer, who was born in 1920. Among them are Protestants and Catholics, conservatives and liberals, but all are scholars of recognized ability as historians. The choice of themes reflects the questions discussed by professional historians and by thoughtful laymen: the via dolorosa of the civilian spirit in Germany, militarism in modern history, the Bismarck problem, misfortune and moral decisions in German history. Of especial importance for readers interested in the broader problems of historical revision are Johann Rantzau, "The Glorification of the State in German Historical Writing," and Walther Hofer, "Towards a Revision of the German Concept of History."

The editor's own contribution to the work goes beyond the wise selection of the representative essays. In his introduction and in his paper entitled "Rethinking Modern German History," he has presented and analyzed the recent and contemporary trends in Germany. He points out that "in modern Germany scholars, and above all historians, have played a great role, indicating the changes in national temper and directing public opinion." He recognizes that the future of Germany "is being not only, and even not mainly, influenced by her historians," but also that German intellectuals and scholars have carried a great share of the responsibility for "the anti-democratic and anti-Western attitudes of the German people in the last one hundred and fifty years." The question is therefore pertinent: "Will they now be more helpful in integrating Germany into the democratic community of the West?" A part of the answer is found in the rest of this book.

My own experience during a year in Germany has strengthened my consciousness of the significance of Hans Kohn's question. Most Germans, historians and laymen, need to learn much about what happened in Germany and in the world when censorship and propaganda controlled their supply of information. It was encouraging to see the increase in the courses on recent history, given by young and well-balanced scholars in the normally conservative departments of history. The variety of questions and of answers, illustrated by the essays here published and matched by many that could not be included, have also helped to break the hold of misinformation and misinterpretation on the German mind.

Yet if the desired results are to be attained, we must recognize some problems which Kohn has considered only in passing or not at all. One is the danger that a program of purposeful historical revision will approach the other extreme, that in the sincere desire to accomplish a worthwhile end historians will produce propaganda which will be easily upset by historical fact. A reason for the ineffectiveness of the revisionist movement in Germany after 1918 was that much of this writing was by non-historians or by historians who did not have the respect of their fellows. Other questions are the validity of the contrast stressed by Kohn between "West" and "East," and of the "alienation of Germany from the West." It is true that even Gerhard Ritter in some of his writing accepted the idea that National Socialism was made possible by "the separation of German political thought from Western European thought," but his view that the pernicious trends in modern German history were common to European civilization as a whole has so far been answered only as Kohn answers it, that "isolated trends in Western nations became dominant ideas in Germany." Finally, in considering the possible effects of rethinking German history by German historians, we must not forget that outside of Germany, too, history is being "revised." "Twenty years of treason" and the writings of such men as Charles Tansill and Harry Elmer Barnes are not unknown in Germany. Time and again I had to remind Germans—and Americans in Germany—that it was Hitler not Roosevelt who broke down the barriers between Germany and the Soviet Union and initiated the movement that brought the Russians to Berlin.

Two years after the publication of Some New German Views, it is possible to answer Kohn's initial question by saying that the problems he saw and analyzed were also clearly seen and analyzed by his group of authors, and that German historians have helped to integrate Germany into the democratic community of the West, but that the future of historical interpretation in Germany, like the role of Germany herself, is fluid and uncertain under the impact of events and ideas at home and abroad.

LAWRENCE D. STEEFEL.

University of Minnesota.

Research Frontiers in Politics and Government: Brookings Lectures, 1955. BY STEPHEN K. BAILEY, HERBERT A. SIMON, ROBERT A. LAHL, RICHARD C. SNYDER, ALFRED DE GRAZIA, MALCOLM MOOS, PAUL T. DAVID, AND DAVID B. TRUMAN. (Washington, D. C.: The Brookings Institution. 1955. Pp. vii, 240. $2.75.)

The Reverend Sydney Smith in 1825 said of the function of the book reviewer,

"One great use of a Review, indeed, is to make men wise in ten pages who have no appetite for a hundred pages; to condense nourishment, to work with pulp and essence, and to guard the stomach from idle burden and unmeaning bulk." No such service is required for the Brookings papers on the frontiers of political science research. In fact the materials are so lean and meaty that any subtraction or compression would be a wound in the flesh. There is no dispensable tissue, and nothing to compress. Readers of these words are therefore advised to seek here no condensation of their intellectual nourishment, but to read and re-read in detail the admirably succinct summaries of current research in political science and research yet to be done which a distinguished group of writers has brought together in these lectures.

The range of their interests is broad. Stephen Bailey discusses historical, institutional, behavioral, and philosophical approaches in political science research of interest to "decision-makers"—legislators, politicians, judges, bureaucrats—rejecting at the outset the notion that scholars have nothing to say to the practitioners. Herbert Simon appraises current research in organization theory in the perspective of twenty years of development; and says, among many other things, that we "need to construct not a single theory of organization but two bodies of theory—one of them applicable to programmed decision-making, the other applicable to non-programmed decision-making." The latter is "the principal terra incognita of organization theory today." Robert Dahl contributes a piece on four kinds of decision-making process (hierarchy, democracy, bargaining, and the price system), and identifies such obstacles to theory as the absence of satisfactory criteria for distinguishing different distributions of power, the variations in the level of political activity that each process supposes, problems of personality and predisposition which these processes present, and the problem of the policy-maker. Richard Snyder finds areas of interest common to the game theorist and the political scientist, and suggests some possible "applications and uses of the theory of games for the analysis of political behavior." Alfred de Grazia summarizes six changing techniques of research on voters and elections, and describes six topics being subjected to research by means of those techniques. These are: the relation of politicians to opinion; the identifications of voters with groups, ideas, and people; the voter's perception of the world of politics; his preferences among issues; his persuasability; and the level of political information and activity in America.

Malcolm Moos discusses the elements of a nominating theory which would be applicable to presidential conventions, and suggests that the most serviceable concept of the nominating process is to regard it as an act of leadership succession. Paul David deals with some developments in the study of comparative state politics, and hazards some hypotheses about the realignment of national parties that might be clarified by the use of data from the field of comparative state politics. And David Truman brings the symposium to a conclusion with a lucid account of the development in the behavioral sciences of research technique, which he thinks has progressed farther than the development of validated and expanded theory. He also discusses the impact of these developments on political science, and warns of limitations in their application to political science.

Comprehensive though the view of political science research is in these lectures, a more nearly accurate title for the book would be "Some Research Frontiers," a phrase that is used in the Introduction. Broad though it is, the coverage does not include discussion of recent work in the judicial process; in the field of comparative politics—for example the comparative politics of non-Western systems—apart from the references to comparative state politics; in international relations (except for passing references to the application of game theory to international situations); on the voting behavior of legislators, the legislative process in its many other aspects, or the activities of interest groups; on the convergence of the interests of political scientists and urban sociologists in the study of municipal institutions; to name some. Moreover, in most of these lectures, researchers at the frontier would appear to be at least as much concerned with problems of method as with the establishment of validated theory, if indeed not more so. It almost seems at points as though the frontiersmen were still hammering wheels on Conestoga wagons which they hope will some day drive them or others to fertile prairies of data. In many of the instances reported by the lecturers, the wagons have not yet started, and the frontier is still closer to Pittsburg than to Cheyenne.

The discussions of research bring certain general matters to mind. First, although there is more or less common concern with problems of method, the authors of these excellent lectures do not speak with a single tongue about the subject of the science. Is it decision-making (several papers stress this), institutions, the political process, policy? Or are all of these aspects of the single unifying idea of power, about which, Dahl says, we "do not have any wholly satisfactory criteria for distinguishing different systems of power." Second, if these be important frontiers of research in political science—assumedly the most important—are there many, if any, graduate schools and graduate programs that qualify a student to engage in work in these areas? What department contains even the minimal unity of concept and approach that these essays represent? The inadequacy of the conventional graduate "training" of political scientists is attested by the fact, among others, that imaginative post-doctoral spirits have to re-tread their training in the post-graduate centers of foundation philanthropy. Third, much of the current speculation about political science concerns itself not only with decision-making, which is a scientific category of great interest, but with decision-makers. And this brings to the front, as though we needed to be reminded of it, the refractory nature of the materials of our science. Perhaps it is not frivolous to think of the famous croquet game in Alice, where the materials of the game—the flamingos and the hedgehogs—don't simply lie inert, waiting to be manipulated, but show a depressing inclination towards independent actions of their own. Not only do our political wickets, balls, and mallets bend, run, blink, and sneeze—we hope that they will think well of us. Politics is indeed harder than physics, as Einstein said it was.

But there is no occasion to be discouraged. Perhaps we should, as David Truman suggests in the last lecture, recognize that as a consequence of the institutional focus of political science, the direct relationship between the behavioral sciences and political science is roughly that between "basic" and "applied" research. The political scientist can and should make use of "accepted hypotheses and promising models" developed in the behavioral sciences. But although he should borrow what he can use, neither he nor the behavioral scientist should think that what happens in the nursery among three children, called objectively A, B, and C, is an adequate explanation of what happens among three nations called America, Britain, and China.

If our problem in developing some political "science" seems to us unduly great, we should take comfort from the fact that the resurgence of interest in the field in the last quarter-century has been tremendous, that there is a sense of new and exciting discovery, and that there is undoubted accomplishment. The Brookings lectures make the resurgence, the sense, and the accomplishment abundantly clear.

EARL LATHAM.

Amherst College.

Woodrow Wilson and the Balance of Power. BY EDWARD H. BUEHRIG. (Bloomington, Indiana: Indiana University Press. 1955. Pp. x, 325. $5.00.)

In this perceptive and cogent analysis of the causes of American entry into World War I, Professor Buehrig of Indiana University traces one-by-one each of the main strands of policy from 1914 to 1917, shows their interrelationships, and appraises their relative importance at different stages along our road to war. The main elements examined are neutral rights and submarine warfare, economic involvement with the allies, mediation between the belligerents, the development of the League idea, and the aim to make the world safe for democracy. Wilson's emphasis at first was on a rather legalistic defense of traditional neutral rights against the shattering impact of the new naval technology. But after he had staked America's prestige and honor on this issue by exacting the Sussex Pledge from Germany, the President himself, Buehrig emphasizes, came increasingly to regard neutral rights as insufficient grounds for a major war. Other objectives came to the fore, to be achieved in the context of a compromise peace—only to be transmuted into the Utopian objectives of a victorious war when the German strategists decided to throw down the gauntlet of unrestricted submarine warfare.

Concerning America's true national interest in World War I, Buehrig's own perspective is akin to that of George Kennan; our wisest objective would have been to mediate a compromise peace which would have preserved a balance of power in Europe. But Buehrig gives Wilson and House greater credit than do most of the current "realist" critics for attempting persistently in 1915 and 1916 to achieve essentially that very end, a "peace without victory." The effort failed mainly, he contends, because our military posture and isolationist traditions were such that England and Germany (indeed American leaders themselves) underestimated how much weight we would actually bring to bear against the side which most antagonized us.

Responsibility for the inadequacy of American diplomacy is thus made to rest upon the immaturity of the popular attitude toward world politics. The immaturity is traced mainly to the coddling effects of a century of British naval supremacy—but one wishes that Buehrig had given detailed attention to various currents in American opinion. Although his impressionistic judgments on this problem seem valid, his rather sketchy treatment of it constitutes the one major gap in what is otherwise a lucid and useful study of America's first gropings toward world leadership.

H. BRADFORD WESTERFIELD.

Harvard University.

BOOK NOTES AND BIBLIOGRAPHY

AMERICAN GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS

The Challenge of Law Reform. BY ARTHUR T. VANDERBILT. (Princeton, N. J.: Princeton University Press. 1955. Pp. vi, 194. $3.50.)

In 1954 Chief Justice Vanderbilt of the New Jersey Supreme Court delivered the William H. White Lectures at the University of Virginia Law School. This book is built on those lectures, somewhat revised and expanded.

Long a leading contributor and active participant in American legal reform, this distinguished jurist deftly probes those mechanics of our legal system which he knows from experience can be improved and charts a course which he believes must result in a much-needed refinement of the substance of the law itself.

The more immediate objectives, he contends, are clear and readily obtainable. Either the whole legal profession must accept its leadership responsibility, as in Delaware, or the needed changes will come about through a popular revolt as in England a century before and in New Jersey.

Visualizing simplification and modernization of the substantive law as a fourth sector on the reform battlefield, he sees the other three sectors as ones where victory must first be won. In order of importance these are: better judicial personnel including jurors, simplified judicial structure and procedure, and improved management methods to reduce the law's delays.

Most attention is given to the latter two sectors. The emergence of a simpler court structure, of flexible procedural rules aimed at minimizing technicalities and surprise, and of pretrial conferences and modernized rules of evidence are traced in the English setting and pointed to developments in certain American jurisdictions. Devices for better utilizing judicial personnel, for speeding up cases, and for producing an administrative organization within the judicial framework capable of developing and executing sound administrative policies are examined against a rich background of experience in New Jersey. This is a learned and effective presentation.

The really challenging task in the next half of the twentieth century, Justice Vanderbilt contends, is that of adapting the substantive law to the needs of the times. Voluminous and inaccessible as much of it is, serving as it does the conflicting objectives of different but overlapping eras in an age when economic, social, and political changes are more involved than in any comparable period before, busy as its technicians are—this is a tremendous undertaking. Who is to tackle it?

Judges and lawyers are thought to be too occupied to provide the needed leadership. The idea of a ministry of justice is examined and discarded. Law schools presently oriented to teaching are not the answer. What is needed are law centers—meeting places for legal scholars of all kinds and of informed laymen—whole faculties that can face the problem of law reform.

This little book preserves some able and challenging lectures and projects their challenge to all who will read and reflect.—HOWARD A. CALKINS, University of Texas.

The Forgotten Ninth Amendment: A Call for Legislative and Judicial Recognition of Rights under Social Conditions of Today. BY BENNETT B. PATTERSON. (Indianapolis: The Bobbs-Merrill Company, Inc. 1955. Pp. vii, 217.)

Mr. Patterson's little volume boils down to a plea to the United States Supreme Court to find protection for our unenumerated rights—our "rights of natural endowment"—in the up-to-now unused Ninth Amendment. He prefers such protection to the Court's usual reliance on the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment and to its occasional reliance on the general but extra-constitutional principles of limited government. Mr. Patterson does not charge that those rights have heretofore been poorly protected by the Court or that the Ninth Amendment would offer them better protection. Rather, it is a matter of principle with him. He is concerned that twenty-one words in the Constitution seem to be sterile of meaning and convinced that, properly interpreted, their use would fill the one serious void in our Constitution as read by the Court today, namely, the lack in it anywhere of a succinct statement of the theory of individual, inherent rights. It is his contention and the central message of the book that "The Ninth Amendment to the Constitution is a basic statement of the inherent natural rights of the individual. . . . As such it is a statement of the essence of the aspirations of a democratic form of government. It is the declaration and recognition of individualism, which is the cardinal virtue of democracy . . ." (p. 4). But despite extensive presentation of its legislative history and other arguments supporting his thesis, Mr. Patterson does not satisfactorily demonstrate that the Ninth Amendment is or was intended to be what he declares it to be. He attempts to read into Madison's proposal of the Amendment to the First Congress a great deal more than Madison's few words have generally been construed to convey, and perhaps the Court has uniformly neglected the ratified form of the Amendment—there has never been a direct judicial construction of the Ninth Amendment—precisely because it says nothing not elsewhere said better. For even Mr. Patterson admits that our whole system of government and the Declaration of Independence provide both the guarantees we need for unenumerated rights and a concise statement of the theory behind them. Thus, while the author denies that he is stirring a tempest in a teapot, by and large his entire discussion is academic.

The book is divided into two parts, the central argument, occupying 85 pages, and an appendix, occupying 132 pages and consisting chiefly of excerpts from the Annals of the First Congress giving in detail the arguments concerning the adoption of the first ten Amendments to the Constitution. The whole is preceded by an introduction by Roscoe Pound.

All in all, the book is a peculiar example of special pleading. Perhaps the key to the entire volume is given in the closing paragraph of the seventh chapter, which bears the title, "What are the Unenumerated Rights?" "There must be some unenumerated rights. The amendment must be given some meaning. Its value and meaning should not be lost through disuse. This amendment can only be saved by our courts" (p. 56). If there are reasons for Mr. Patterson's feeling of urgency, they do not, unfortunately, communicate themselves to the reader.—RICHARD H. LEACH, Duke University.

A Passion for Politics: The Autobiography of Louis Brownlow, First Half. BY LOUIS BROWNLOW. (Chicago: The University of Chicago Press. 1955. Pp. xii, 605. $7.50.)

The warm personal story of the life of Louis Brownlow from his birth in the Ozark Mountains in 1879 when "Alf but a minute minority of the citizens saw the federal government, now that the army had been demobilized, only in and through the post office"; through the formative years when he was self-educated by doing, reading, and moving with people, and when he acquired his deep interest in politics; and on through his varied journalistic career—in Tennessee, Kentucky, Washington, and ultimately in the Far East, Latin America, and Europe; and up to the moment of his appointment as a Commissioner for the District of Columbia, when the second half of his life began. It is more however, than a personal story for there is history of the times, comment on life and events abroad, and revelations on politicians and politics. The second volume on "Brownie's" career in administration will be anxiously awaited by friends; students of administration, and many others who know of his notable career and intimate writing.

Nine Men: A Political History of the Supreme Court of the United States from 1790 to 1955. BY FRED RODELL. (New York: Random House. 1955. Pp. xii 338. $5.00.)

A mixture of fact and opinion in which Mr. Rodell favors a libertarian activist Supreme Court as regards civil liberties and an abstemiously passive Court as regards property and other economic rights. The book, therefore, is hardly history or constitutional law; whatever may be its merits as polemics.

The Supreme Court in the American Scheme of Government. BY ROBERT H. JACKSON. (Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press. 1955. Pp. viii, 92. $2.00.)

An account of the Supreme Court as a unit of government, law court, and political institution in which the late Justice Jackson with characteristic candor discusses the work of the Court. There are interesting comments on the conference and the inability of the members of the Court to read all the materials presented in litigation.

The Congressional Anthology: Poems Selected by Senators and Representatives. EDITED BY ERNEST S. GRIFFITH AND KENTON KILMER. (Washington, D. C.: The University Press of Washington, D. C. 1955. Pp. ix, 156. $3.00; Student edition, $2.00.)

The favorite poems of 130 members of Congress, the Vice-President, and the chaplains of the House and Senate. The poems, arranged under the headings "The Man" and "The Statesman" and followed by four written by members of Congress, range from the classics to modern American verse and reveal much about the humanity and aspirations of the members.

Organization and Management: Theory and Practice. BY CATHERYN SECKLER-HUDSON. (Washington, D. C.: The American University Press. 1955. Pp. viii, 324.)

Written for teachers, training officers, supervisors, executives, and students this is a kind of text or manual of study, but it differs substantially from other texts or outlines. It concentrates on principles and processes, contains 20 tables, introduces each chapter with questions for study, builds each chapter by statement of a number of principles or elements in process or questions, and concludes with an extensive annotated bibliography. It deals with administration in large organizations, with particular focus on public management at the national level.

Reapportionment in Alabama. BY JAMES E. LARSON. (University, Alabama: Bureau of Public Administration, University of Alabama. 1955. Pp. viii, 76.)

A careful analysis of inequality of representation on a population basis in a state which has not had a legislative reapportionment since 1901 and of the probable effects of various plans for reapportionment which have been proposed.

The Florida Constitution of 1885: A Critique. (Reprinted from University of Florida Law Review, Vol. VIII, No. 1, Spring 1955.) BY MANNING J. DAUER AND WILLIAM C. HARVARD. (Florida: University of Florida Press. 1955. Pp. 92.)

An incisive analysis of defects in draftsmanship in Florida's Constitution and an evaluation of its substantive parts in the light of the recentness, speed, and character of the state's growth, with suggestions for improvement.

The Minnesota Department of Taxation: An Administrative History. BY LLOYD M. SHORT, CLARA PENNIMAN, AND FLOYD O. FLOM. (Minneapolis, Minn.: The University of Minnesota Press. 1955. Pp. viii, 176. $3.00.)

A group research product of the Public Administration Center of the University of Minnesota detailing the administrative development of the Minnesota Department of Taxation, including both staff functions and operating tax activities.

The Jefferson County Survey of Health, Welfare, and Recreation Needs and Services. PREPARED BY A CITIZENS COMMITTEE OF THE JEFFERSON COUNTY COORDINATING COUNCIL OF SOCIAL FORCES AND DIRECTED BY VALERIE A. EARLE. (University, Ala.: University of Alabama Press. 1955. Pp. xiii, 368.)

An exceedingly comprehensive and detailed account of services rendered by public and social agencies and of the deficiencies in program, with recommendations to both types of agencies for improvement.

The Government of Metropolitan Miami. (Chicago: Public Administration Service. 1954. Pp. xii, 194.)

A survey of the development and current problems of Metropolitan Miami together with a presentation of governmental alternatives and a recommended approach to the problem of government in the area.

American City Government and Administration. BY AUSTIN F. MACDONALD. (New York: Thomas Y. Crowell Co. 6th ed. 1955. Pp. xvi, 656. $6.50.)

A general, and in places extensive, revision of this text within the framework of previous editions.

American State and Local Government. BY CLAUDIUS O. JOHNSON. (New York: Thomas Y. Crowell Co. 2nd ed. 1956. Pp. xi, 305. $2.95.)

A revised text designed, as was the first edition, to be used in relatively short courses on the subject. The same plan of organization is continued and a new chapter—"The States in the American Federal System"—is added to deal with intergovernmental relations. Numerous charts and tables and the "Model State Constitution" are included.

Essentials of Missouri Government. BY ROBERT F. KARSCH. (Columbia, Mo.: Lucas Brothers, Publishers. 4th ed. 1955. Pp. i, 157.)

A revision of a very useful handbook of Missouri government presenting a great deal of information in concise form and with the aid of more than 50 tables, maps, and charts. Contains the Missouri Constitution of 1955 and amendments thereto.

The United States Patent System: Legal and Economic Conflicts in American Patent History. BY FLOYD L. VAUGHAN. (Norman, Okla.: University of Oklahoma Press. 1956. Pp. xvi, 355. $8.50.)

An exhaustive analysis and evaluation by the author of Economics of Our Patent System (1925) of all aspects of the patent system with particular emphasis upon the part played by patents in patent pools, consolidations, cartels, and monopolies. Includes an instructive final chapter on "Remedies."

Experience under Railway Labor Legislation. BY LEONARD A. LECHT. (New York: Columbia University Press. 1955. Pp. viii, 254. $4.25.)

Contains the full story of the backgrounds of legislation and of experience thereunder, revealing the extent of success and failure under the Railway Labor Act in the successive periods during which it has been operative.

Can We Solve the Farm Problem? An Analysis of Federal Aid to Agriculture. BY MURRAY R. BENEDICT WITH THE REPORT AND RECOMMENDATIONS OF THE COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURAL POLICY. (New York: The Twentieth Century Fund. 1955. Pp. xix, 601. $5.00.)

The Twentieth Century Fund presents an exhaustive research report on the several types of government aid to agriculture and the briefer analysis and recommendations of its Committee on Agricultural Policy. There are two lengthy appendices, one giving the history of the concept of parity and a summary of problems involved, the other supplying the Department of Agriculture's 1954 summary of costs of agricultural programs. The volume is to be succeeded by a second one on the various specific commodity programs.

Economic Needs of Older People. BY JOHN J. CORSON AND JOHN W. MCCONNELL WITH POLICY RECOMMENDATIONS OF THE COMMITTEE ON ECONOMIC NEEDS OF OLDER PEOPLE. (New York: The Twentieth Century Fund. 1956. Pp. xvii, 533. $4.50.)

A comprehensive analysis of the economic problem of the aged and of all roads to their security, followed by the Report of the Twentieth Century Fund's Committee. The Report in general accepts present practice though it is recommended that the states assume an increasing share of the financial responsibility for old-age assistance. The Committee was divided on how provision should be made for the disabled.

Policies to Combat Depression: A Conference of the Universities-National Bureau Committee for Economic Research. (Princeton, N. J.: Princeton University Press. 1956. Pp. x, 417. $8.50.)

A symposium—a joint effort of universities and the National Bureau—with lead statements and comments covering a range of policies, including among other things budget flexibility, state and local finance, taxes, money, public works, and social security.

Scientific Management and the Unions, 1900-1938: A Historical Analysis. BY MILTON J. NADWORN. (Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press. 1955. Pp. vii, 187. $3.75.)

A scholarly analysis of the relations between scientific management and unions showing the attitudes of unions toward the movement for scientific management and of leaders in the movement toward labor union practices and objectives.

A Chronicle of Jeopardy, 1945-55. BY REXFORD G. TUGWELL. (Chicago: The University of Chicago Press. 1955. Pp. v, 489. $7.50.)

Tugwell presents his reflections written on each of ten anniversaries of the Hiroshima bombing on the problems presented for man by the A-bomb and H-bomb, along with many other reflections on things domestic and international.

The Economic Thought of Franklin D. Roosevelt and the Origins of the New Deal. BY DANIEL R. FUSFELD. (New York: Columbia University Press. 1956. Pp. 337. $5.00.)

Traces the development of Roosevelt's ideas on political economy from the noblesse oblige ideals of his family, his early economics courses and the Progressive period to the campaign of 1932, with the general thesis, in conflict with opinions of some other authors, that his "views on basic economic matters were well articulated," though his knowledge, like most of those of his day, was weak on depression problems.

The Making of Charles A. Beard. AN INTERPRETATION BY MARY RITTER BEARD. WITH CHAPTERS BY ARTHUR W. MACMAHON AND GEORGE RADIN AND REPORTS FROM JAPANESE CORRESPONDENTS. (New York: Exposition Press, 1955. Pp. 104. $3.00.)

Thirty-six small pages by Mary Beard, addresses and reports related to Beard's service in Japan, a brief report on his mission to Yugoslavia, and a reprint of an article by Arthur W. Macmahon on Beard as a teacher.

Profiles in Courage. BY JOHN F. KENNEDY. (New York: Harper & Brothers, Publishers. 1956. Pp. xix, 266. $3.50.)

A United States Senator gives an account of eight instances of courageous acts by eight Senators: Adams, Webster, Benton, Houston, Ross, Lamar, Norris, Taft—preceded by a chapter on influences affecting a Senator.

What I Think. BY ADLAI E. STEVENSON. (New York: Harper & Brothers. 1956. Pp. xvi, 240. $3.00.)

Selected speeches and writings, or excerpts thereof, since the presidential campaign of 1952.

The Private Diary of a Public Servant. BY MARTIN MERSON. (New York: The Macmillan Company. 1955. Pp. x, 171. $3.00.)

This is an account of Mr. Merson's Washington experiences in 1953 as consultant to the International Information Administration with emphasis on the political difficulties encountered in effectively countering charges made by Senator McCarthy and others, especially those directed at I.I.A.'s overseas library program.

THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY'S APPROACH TO ITS CONVENTION RULES

The Call to the 1956 Democratic National Convention, issued by Chairman Paul M. Butler on December 21, 1955, provides:

Notice is hereby given that the following resolutions have been approved by the Democratic National Committee for adoption as rules applicable to the 1956 Democratic National Convention:

RESOLVED, That it is the understanding that a State Democratic Party, in selecting and certifying delegates to the Democratic National Convention, thereby undertakes to assure that voters in the State will have the opportunity to cast their election ballots for the Presidential and Vice-Presidential nominees selected by said Convention, and for electors pledged formally or in good conscience to the election of these Presidential and Vice-Presidential nominees, under the Democratic Party label and designation.

RESOLVED, That it is understood that the Delegates to the Democratic National Convention, when certified by the State Democratic Party, are bona fide Democrats who have the interests, welfare and success of the Democratic Party at heart, and will participate in the Convention in good faith, and therefore no additional assurances shall be required of Delegates to the Democratic National Convention in the absence of credentials contest or challenge.

RESOLVED, That it is the duty of every Member of the Democratic National Committee to declare affirmatively for the nominees of the Convention, and that his or her failure to do so shall be cause for the Democratic National Committee or its duly authorized subcommittee to declare his or her seat vacant after notice and opportunity for hearing.

These paragraphs are a marked departure from the familiar form of call, which is customarily confined to the bare essentials of time, place, and number of delegates from each state.

Proposed Solution to Loyalty Oath Problem. These rules are the solution offered by the Democratic party to the so-called loyalty oath problem which erupted on the floor of the 1952 Convention. They must be approved by the Convention, since each Convention prescribes its own rules.

The proposed rules deal with a problem that was the subject of confusion and rancor at the 1952 Convention. That Convention adopted as part of its temporary rules a resolution (Moody resolution) that no delegate shall be seated unless he shall give assurance that he will exert every honorable means available to him in any official capacity he may have to provide that the Convention's nominees appear on the ballot under the Democratic party designation.

Delegates from Southern states speaking in opposition contended: (1) The resolution did not in fact accomplish more than was required by state law in their states, yet their delegations were bound by party resolutions not to make commitments. (2) The resolution advanced a condition of eligibility of delegates not previously announced or included in the Call. The debate was pervaded by a theme of opposition to this resolution as a "loyalty pledge."

Thereafter, on a motion sponsored by the Credentials Committee, the Moody resolution was amended to provide that for this (the 1952) Convention only, such assurance shall not be in contravention of existing state law nor of the previous instructions of the state Democratic governing bodies.

The delegations of Louisiana, South Carolina, and Virginia advised that they could not give the assurances demanded by the Moody resolution. Governor Battle of Virginia explained that no one in Virginia would have any idea of keeping the Convention's nominee off the ballot, and that the Virginia statutes expressly provided for the Convention's nominees to be on the ballot, but that the delegation objected to the sense of the resolution as involving a commitment to support any future action whatever of the Convention. A motion was made to seat the Virginia delegation on the ground that Governor Battle's statement was in substantial compliance with the spirit of the rule. In due course the Virginia, and then the South Carolina and Louisiana, delegations were seated by the Convention.

The foregoing capsule account is in one sense misleading. It omits the oratory, the questioning as to the precise position of the Southern states, the voting reversals, in sum the drama of the occasion. The confusion and wrangling were the instigating cause of an Advisory Committee to survey the question in advance of the 1956 Convention.

The Special Advisory Committee. The proposed rules contained in the Call to the 1956 Convention were approved at a meeting of the Democratic National Committee in Chicago, November 18, 1955. They were recommended to the Democratic National Committee in a report filed in June, 1955 by its Special Advisory Committee on Rules and Procedures for the 1956 Democratic National Convention.

The Advisory Committee was established pursuant to a resolution of the Democratic National Committee at Chicago on September 15, 1953, providing:

That the Chairman of the Democratic National Committee be authorized to appoint an advisory committee to study, review, and make appropriate recommendations concerning all rules governing the Democratic National Convention, including specifically, but not exclusively, the subject of the so-called or mis-called Loyalty Pledge Resolution adopted at the 1952 Convention and rules for the more expeditious handling of convention business, it being understood that the advisory committee's functions and authority are limited to the making of advisory recommendations for submission by the National Committee to the 1956 convention, and that the advisory committee will have widespread geographical representation and will be chosen from among members and non-members of the Democratic National Committee.

Formation of an advisory committee was opposed by some who believed that the matter was ticklish and best left to the deliberations of the 1956 Convention. Mr. Stephen A. Mitchell, then Chairman of the Democratic National Committee, strongly supported the formation of an advisory committee, being of the view that although there were risks and difficulties, these could be minimized and avoided by a program calling first for research and careful study of the problems, and second for consideration by men and women of good will in a composed atmosphere not easily found in Convention week.

By September of 1954, a Committee of 82 individuals from 45 states, the District of Columbia, and Puerto Rico, had accepted appointment to the Advisory Committee. The membership consists of individuals who had served upon the Credentials and Rules Committees of the 1952 Democratic National Convention, or had otherwise taken part in the controversy concerning the so-called "loyalty oath," and other individuals of special competence and experience in the conduct of political conventions, who were regarded as representative of membership of the Democratic party in various parts of the nation.

At an organization meeting in Indianapolis on September 18, 1954, Mr. Mitchell was elected Chairman of the Advisory Committee. At his suggestion, the Honorable John S. Battle, former Governor of Virginia, and Senator Hubert H. Humphrey, of Minnesota, were named Vice-Chairmen. The representative span symbolized by these Vice-Chairmen was an eloquent indication of the broad approach of the Advisory Committee. Whatever differences Governor Battle and Senator Humphrey may or may not have on specific issues of platform or policy, their respect for each other and their belief in the importance of the work of the Advisory Committee were of greatest benefit to the Committee.

Mr. Mitchell brought to the work of the Advisory Committee the qualities of drive and constructive planning that distinguished his tenure as Chairman of the Democratic National Committee.

A number of advisers, including officers and staff of the Democratic National Committee, assisted the Advisory Committee in its work.

The Advisory Committee was an active one. Its meetings were held at the same time as regional meetings of the Democratic National Committee, occasions attracting interest and good attendance. At a spirited meeting in New Orleans on December 3, 1954, when over fifty members were present, agreement in principle was reached on a number of points, and the officers and staff were requested to undertake certain further research and drafting. At a meeting in Washington on April 16, 1955, also well attended, the draft rules were discussed, revised, and approved.

The undersigned, as General Counsel of the Democratic National Committee, and as Counsel of the Advisory Committee, was charged with responsibilities of draftsmanship, and with preparation of certain memoranda for the Committee. In a political science journal it is certainly appropriate to note the debt owed by the Advisory Committee to Dr. Abraham Holtzman, who was in charge of research.

The Advisory Committee considered not only questions of "loyalty" but also questions of Convention and pre-Convention procedure, which are not presented here.

The deliberations and report of the Advisory Committee confirm once again that the practical art of politics can make good use of the techniques and skills of political science.—HAROLD LEVENTHAL.

Editor's Note: The following three memoranda submitted to the Advisory Committee were transmitted to the Democratic National Committee and circulated among officials of the Democratic party. They are out of print and not easily obtainable. It is believed that they will be of interest to the readers of the REVIEW and they are accordingly reprinted here.

(Appendix A, a proposed Call, is substantially the Call adopted by the Democratic National Committee and is not reprinted here.)

March 7, 1955

I. MEMORANDUM

To: Members of Special Advisory Committee on Rules of the 1956 Democratic National Convention.

From: Stephen A. Mitchell, Chairman; John S. Battle and Hubert H. Humphrey, Vice Chairmen.

Subject: Proposed Resolutions Clarifying Responsibilities of State Party and National Committeemen in Regard to Convention Nominees, and Disclaiming Special Oaths for Convention Delegates in Absences of Credentials Test.

1. Following the New Orleans meeting, and pursuant to suggestion at that meeting, we transmit this memorandum and the enclosures as specific proposal for consideration by the Special Advisory Committee at its next meeting.

2. We recommend that this Special Advisory Committee, in its report to the Democratic National Committee, recommend that the National Committee's Call to the next convention follow the form of the Call in Appendix A, and that the National Committee propose the resolutions set forth in Appendix A for passage at the 1956 Convention.

3. The Democratic National Committee has the authority to give notice in the Call it issues for the Convention of a proposal to be submitted to the Convention for a change in the Convention's rules. (This "notice" could also be in an Annex to the Call, or in a separate communication issued at the same time.) In this connection we may note the procedure followed in 1936 when the two-thirds rule was abolished. Mr. Bennett Champ Clark, as chairman of the Committee on Rules and Order of Business, in his report recommending the change, stated that the matter was referred to in the Call of the National Committee for the holding of the Convention (1936 Proceedings, p. 189).

4. The principal elements of the proposal in Appendix A are:

(a) There is made explicit the good faith assumption underlying a state party's sending delegates to the Democratic National Convention, that it undertakes to assure that the nominees of the Convention will appear on the ballot as the nominees of the Democratic Party.

This undertaking does not constitute a warranty or commitment by any one as to his personal action or support. His conscience may require him to decide to support the opposition candidates; there is no attempt to consider here what would be the consequences of such activity. However, good faith requires that voters be able, if they choose, to vote for the nominees of the Democratic National Convention.

(b) No written or special oaths shall be demanded of Convention delegates in the absence of credentials contests.

In the case of challenge or contest, such oaths or commitments may be appropriate. As a general requirement such "test oaths" are not necessary, and they are repugnant and offensive to many sincere Democrats who have long given to the Democratic Party their support, their energies, their loyalty, and indeed their love.

(c) The National Committeeman has an affirmative duty to support the nominees of the Convention. If he fails to discharge that duty, his seat may be declared vacant.

The National Committeeman is not only a member of the state party. He is also a member of a national organization, the Democratic National Committee. As such it is part of his duties to support affirmatively the national ticket. In case of "misfeasance," by his support of the opposition ticket, there would be cause for expulsion. In case of "nonfeasance," failure to declare for and support the Democratic national ticket, his seat may be declared vacant. That course has been adopted by the Democratic Party in the past and is the current rule of the Republican Party.

5. There are also attached hereto two detailed staff memoranda:

Appendix B:—Vacating Seat of National Committeeman Who Does Not Support the National Ticket.

Appendix C:—Background Material Relating to Responsibility of State Party Participating in National Convention; Eligibility and Responsibility of Delegates to National Convention and of Presidential Electors.

These memoranda are transmitted in deference to the wishes of many members of the Special Advisory Committee who expressed a desire for a more comprehensive background of salient elements of the problems discussed.

6. Appendix B provides background for the recommendation proposed herein regarding the responsibilities of National Committeemen, and reviews the applicable precedents and analysis.

7. Appendix C provides material on the various state provisions regarding party loyalty and responsibility. Without reviewing that memorandum in detail, it seems to us to supply these significant facts for our consideration:

(a) The state party has in general a basic authority to regulate its affairs and membership to further its political objectives, and to prevent interference by members of the opposition party. (The complications of "open primaries," however, should be noted.)

(b) In all states there is an assumption that the state party will handle various matters relating to selection of its delegates to the Democratic National Convention, and to selection of candidates for Presidential electors who will, if elected, vote in the Electoral College for the nominees of that Convention.

(c) There is wide diversity among the states in pertinent matters. Different mechanics are provided: The selection may be by convention, state committee, primaries, etc. The methods may or may not be the same for Convention delegates and Presidential electors. The extent of legislative control over the operations of political parties varies from state to state. But in every state there is considerable residual authority in the state party, and to a substantial degree in the state executive committee, at least in customary operations.

8. The Democratic Party has federal attributes. It is a confederation of state parties. The basic requirement of assuring a place on the ballot for the national ticket selected by the Democratic National Convention is properly the function of the state party which participated in that convention. Explicit recognition of that responsibility—in good faith—is appropriate at this time.

9. We have not recommended any enactment of state legislation. Such a course would raise technical complications, due to the wide diversity of practice and procedure. And it would be unnecessary. Political parties must rest in great part upon assumption of good faith cooperation.

10. Where there are contests over delegates to the National Convention, the question arises, which group truly represents the Democratic Party of and in the state. Determination of these contests is a major responsibility of the Convention. A separate memorandum recommends a procedural innovation for advance consideration of pertinent issues prior to the Convention. But in determining these contests the Credentials Committee and the Convention may properly examine and require assurances of the conflicting delegations.

We recommend for your favorable consideration the proposals set forth in Appendix A. Respectfully submitted,

STEPHEN A. MITCHELL, Chairman

JOHN S. BATTLE AND

HUBERT H. HUMPHREY, Vice Chairmen

* * * *

March 2, 1955

APPENDIX B

MEMORANDUM

To: Stephen A. Mitchell, Chairman, Advisory Committee on 1956 Democratic National Convention Rules and Procedures.

From: Harold Leventhal, Counsel.

Subject: Vacating Seat of National Committeeman Who Does Not Support the National Ticket.

This is a memorandum to set forth some background information concerning the problem of the National Committeeman who fails to support the National ticket during the campaign.

A. General Precedents of Expulsion or Exclusion of National Committeeman

The Democratic Manual for the Democratic National Convention, prepared by Congressman Cannon in 1952, contains the following, among the duties and powers of the Democratic National Committee: "11. The National Committee is empowered to expel members for cause and has exercised this prerogative, as in 1896 when it expunged from its rolls the names of members actively opposing the election of the presidential nominee. (In 1896 the Committee struck from its rolls the name of a Pennsylvania committeeman who aggressively supported John N. Palmer, the 'gold-Democrat' candidate for President.)"

The records of the Democratic National Committee also reveal that on August 24, 1949, the Committee adopted the report of its Credentials Committee of August 23rd, that the names of certain members of the Committee from Alabama, Louisiana, Mississippi and South Carolina, be "expunged from the rolls" and vacancies declared under the above quoted Rule 11. The members involved were those who had supported Strom Thurmond rather than Harry Truman as candidate for President in 1948.

In each case there was some discussion as to the extent of the authority of the Democratic National Committee in the matter. Normally every body has the right to determine its membership. A problem arises in the case of the Democratic National Committee only because the members are confirmed as members of the Committee by the Democratic National Convention, which is a superior body. But the conclusion has been maintained that the Democratic National Committee is necessarily the agency to exercise the power which would have been exercised by the Convention if in session. Therefore, it possesses the final ability to expel a member for cause.

A historian, reviewing the action of the National Committee following the 1896 campaign, commented:<sup>1</sup> "(The) National Committee must have the power to protect the party from enemies within its councils, otherwise local conditions might cause men to be seated in the executive councils who were traitors to the platforms and candidates approved by the party." Another political science text expressed approval of the action then taken: "There is another question affecting the membership of the Committee that might assume importance in a time of bitter factional conflict within the Party. A defeated faction might refuse to support the Presidential candidate and the platform, and the members of the National Committee belonging to that faction might give aid and comfort to the enemy. In such a case, with or without specific authority, the Committee would be justified in taking drastic action: self-preservation is a fundamental right."<sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup> See James Albert Woodburn, Political Parties and Party Problems in the United States (1944), p. 300. Mr. Woodburn states that the places of both Mr. Cochrane (Massachusetts) and Mr. Harrity (Pennsylvania), who were out of sympathy with the purpose of the party in the 1896 campaign, were declared vacant by the National Committee. Apparently only Mr. Harrity contested the seat of his successor, Mr. J. M. Guffey, who was designated by a state convention.

Some discussion of the Committee's expulsion power appeared in the National Committee meeting of January 8, 1912, found in transcript of 1912 Proceedings at page 435 and following. Mr. Thomas N. Browne of Vermont stated: "If the authority given by the Democratic National Convention is improperly used, and the individual elected, after he becomes a member of this body, proves that he is not a Democrat, or brings social obloquy or infamy upon the Party, then some representative of the Democratic Party ought to have power to protect it, and that representative would be this body; but it would be after that gentleman had had an opportunity before the Committee to show that he ought not to be expelled from a body to which he had been legally elected. If after becoming a member of this Committee, his acts are so flagrant as to be a disgrace to this Committee, that [sic] the Committee has the right to protect itself."

Curiously enough, Mr. Browne used the power of the Committee to expel members as a reason for holding that the Committee did not have the power to exclude members, i.e., members selected by a state committee to fill a vacancy and hence that the action of the State Committee is conclusive.

Mr. William Jennings Bryan cogently defended the right of Democratic National Committee to review the fitness of proposed National Committeemen, even if armed with proper credentials from the State Committee, in terms of the authority of the National Committee, in an exceptional case, like the power of the Convention itself, to reject the credentials of someone who should not properly be allowed to sit as National Committeeman. Mr. Bryan stated (transcript of National Committee meeting of January 8, 1912, pages 442-443): "They are discussing in the Senate at this time the right of a Senator to his seat. Does everybody question that he comes as the representative of the State with regular credentials? Not at all. Yet the Senate is discussing his right to be a member of the Senate. The Senate will decide, without any member contesting his place, whether he has a right to a seat there. Everybody had a right to decide these questions. The people of Alabama, to illustrate, might have sent to this Committee a man whom it would be improper for the Committee to allow to sit here; something might have occurred after the man was appointed which would make it improper for us to receive him. I insist that this Committee is not compelled to accept the man without the right to consider."

The practice of the National Committee over the past forty years—perhaps longer—has been in accordance with the principles stated by Mr. Bryan (although he was overruled on his point of order at the 1912 meeting). The Democratic National Committee refers all new proposed members to its Credentials Committee, and the designations of the State Committees (to fill vacancies) do not become effective until the person is confirmed by the Democratic National Committee as a member of that Committee.

Procedure. In 1898 when Mr. Harrity was expelled, the vote was taken by the Chairman upon a mail poll of the members. (New York Times, June 7, 1898.) Mr. Harrity, in a letter of March 28, 1898, to Chairman (Senator) James K. Jones, wrote:<sup>3</sup> "I have always believed that the question could have been more intelligently considered at a meeting of the Committee. I have, however, not hesitated to acquiesce in your plan of submitting the question and taking a vote by mail, of the members of the Committee."

In 1949, the committeemen involved were given an opportunity to appear personally and defend themselves.

B. Recognition of Problem of Failure of National Committeeman to Support National Ticket

Apparently the only circumstances which have resulted in formal action by the Committee to date have been the cases of National Committeemen who were actively engaged in supporting the opposing candidate.

<sup>2</sup> Howard N. Penniman, Salt's American Parties and Elections, p. 317.

<sup>3</sup> See "Pennsylvania Member of National Democratic Committee—Answer of Harrity," Library of Congress, Catalogue No. JK 2317, 1898A.

The clearest ground for expulsion comes in the case of a committeeman who actively declares for the opposition candidate.

What about a committeeman who does not actively declare for the opposition candidate, but also does not definitely state his support of the National ticket selected by the Convention?

There are precedents in both the Democratic Party and the Republican Party that such failure to support the national candidates is ground for declaring a vacancy to exist.

This reflects an awareness of the fact that the National Committeeman may stop short of active opposition to the Democratic candidate and still do harm to the ticket by virtue of his antipathy reflected in a refusal to endorse the candidate.

Moreover, non-support means a failure of the Committeeman to undertake and discharge his responsibilities. The Democratic Party may be jeopardized by sins of omission as well as commission.

Duties of National Committeeman. The Democratic Manual of 1952 prepared by Congressman Cannon sets forth the duties and powers of the Committee as follows: "The duties and powers of the National Committee are derived from the Convention creating it and while subject to variation as the Convention may provide, ordinarily include: 1. Control and direction of the national campaign. 2. Creation of committees deemed necessary to the proper prosecution of its work (1940-247). 3. Election or appointment of additional officers or committees (1932-363; 1948-423), who may or may not be members of the National Committee. (Conversely, the Committee would have power to remove at will any officer appointed under authority granted by the Convention.) 4. Adjudication of contests for membership on the National Committee (1932-371, 612; 1944-382, 395). 5. Maintenance of national headquarters at Washington and in the Convention city during the sessions of the Convention, supplying information, enlisting Party cooperation, carrying out Party mandates and contributing to fulfillment of Party pledges. 6. Maintenance of press, radio and television service, speakers' bureaus, club and organization supervision, supplying literature, speakers, organizers, and Party representatives. 7. Financing of Convention and campaign expenses and supervision of related expenditures (1944-325, 362). 8. Provision for the National Convention. . . . (f) Designation of temporary officers, subject to the approval of the Convention, including the Temporary Chairman, who sounds the keynote of the campaign (1944-15). 9. Filling of vacancies on the national ticket occurring by reason of death, declination, or resignation of any nominee of the Convention (1936-302; 1940-196; 1948-225). (Benjamin Fitzpatrick, of Alabama, nominated for Vice President in 1860, declined the nomination and the place on the ticket was filled by the National Committee.) 10. (Refers to Committee function of making recommendations to the Convention.) 11. (Quoted in foregoing part of this Memorandum.)

The functions of the members of the Democratic National Committee include the furtherance of the campaign of the National ticket, and the responsibility for helping to assure election of the Presidential and Vice Presidential nominees, including the choice of a substitute when necessary.

Democratic National Committee Rule of 1896. The issue whether a National Committeeman could be removed for failure to support the National ticket was to some extent involved in the case of Mr. Harry and the 1896 campaign. Harry stated in his own defense that he believed in the gold standard principles of Palmer but did not actively support Palmer for President. However, Mr. Harry did not contend that he had supported Mr. Bryan and the Committee had knowledge of an incident in Philadelphia where Harry refused to sit on the platform at a meeting where William Jennings Bryan spoke, and indeed even refused to attend the meeting. This incident is referred to in a letter from Mr. W. H. Thompson, National Committeeman from Nebraska, to Senator Jones, Chairman of the Democratic National Committee. That letter is not in the files of the Committee, but a copy of it was sent to William Jennings Bryan, and appears in the Bryan papers in the Library of Congress.

Thompson's letter refers to a "resolution passed by the Democratic National Committee at its meeting in New York, wherein the following resolution was passed . . . that on the failure on the part of any member of this Committee to support the candidates of the Party for President and Vice President, it should be the duty of the Campaign Committee to declare a vacancy."

After alluding to the Philadelphia incident, Mr. Thompson continued: "Now, these facts may be known to the Campaign Committee, together with numerous other facts, in reference to what Mr. Harry did or refused to do during the Campaign and since. And I understand the resolution above quoted to be a continuing resolution and the Committee so created was created for the express purpose of deciding such questions as this . . . and I would suggest that this whole controversy be submitted to this Committee with the power to act under that resolution."

There were apparently no formal findings as to the facts and grounds on which the Democratic National Committee expelled Mr. Harry, although the case is often referred to as that of a National Committeeman who actively supported the opposition candidate.<sup>4</sup>

But the interesting point is that 60 years ago, the Democratic National Committee did pass a formal resolution that in case of failure of any member of the National Committee to support the candidates, it should be the duty of the Campaign Committee to declare a vacancy. It is also noteworthy that this duty was assigned to the Campaign Committee—possibly because of the anticipated necessity of prompt action during a campaign which could not await calling the entire committee.

Republican National Committee Rule. In 1912, the Republican Party at its national convention adopted the rule, which has been maintained at subsequent conventions, providing for declaring a vacancy in the seat of a National Committeeman who fails to support the national ticket.

The rule involved is Rule 31 of the Rules of the Republican National Committee:

"The National Committee shall, however, have power to declare vacant the seat of any member who refuses to support the nominees of the Convention which elected such National Committeeman and to fill such vacancy."

Duty of National Committeeman to Open Campaign Office. You have considered, for example, the desirability that each National Committeeman should be required to announce the fact that he has opened an office to assist in the conduct of the National Campaign.

There is no such requirement now applicable to a National Committeeman. It would be entirely proper for the National Committee, and certainly for the Convention, to specify that the functions of the National Committeeman included such a specific responsibility.

<sup>4</sup> The case is so recorded in Cannon's Manual, and in Penniman, cited above. . . . Expulsion suggests an element of "misfeasance," whereas declaration of a vacancy would have a connotation of "nonfeasance."

If such an obligation were placed upon the National Committeeman, then it would be appropriate to provide that upon failure to carry out such obligation, a vacancy could be declared in the Committeeman's position. There is precedent for the Committee itself determining upon the ground of such declaration of vacancy, although this might well be determined by the Convention (as is the case in Republican Party) as part of any proposal dealing with party responsibility.

It would be entirely appropriate for the National Committee to delegate to the Chairman (or perhaps to the Executive Committee) the responsibility of deciding whether such an office has been opened. The Chairman could then be empowered to declare the seat vacant upon a finding that such office has not been opened, and was not opened within a specified period (say 3 weeks after close of the Convention; or 3 days after notification by the Chairman). The Chairman could also be authorized to appoint a temporary Committeeman to hold office as such during the campaign, but this would require Convention authorization.

On the other hand, even without Convention authorization, the Chairman could specify a person in the state to act as the Committee's representative or liaison, in regard to the campaign.

C. National Committeeman's Membership in State Party

The foregoing discussion has not failed to give consideration to the fact the National Committeeman is basically a member of the State Democratic Party. The Democratic Manual indicates that the National Committeeman is selected, subject to confirmation by the Convention, either (a) by State Primary, (b) by delegates to National Convention, (c) by State Convention, (d) by the action of the State Committee. (He is a representative of that Party on the National Committee, and is therefore a member of a national organization and subject to control as such by that national organization.)

The situation is fully comparable to that of the United States Senate which, for example, under the Constitution is the judge of the qualifications of its members, although the members are selected by the electorate of a State.

Administrative Desirability of Organizing for Establishment of Office. The Committeeman's duty to organize an office would not be merely a means of indicating that he supported the national ticket. It would be useful as indicating more clearly the role of the National Committeeman.

At the Indianapolis meeting on September 18, 1954, there was distributed to the Members of the Special Advisory Committee a list of topics for study. The emphasis for that meeting was on procedural improvement, rather than on the so-called loyalty oath question. One of the subjects for discussion was as follows: Item VII, paragraph 1: "Should duty of National Committeeman to set up campaign office in his state be established?" We received some favorable comment that such an office was a desirable, tangible expression of the function of the National Committee as set forth in the first paragraph of the 1952 Manual, as including "control and direction of the National Campaign."

The nature of the office established by the National Committeeman would, of course, be dependent upon local conditions. His office might be combined with that of the State Committee. It might be in the personal business or law office, or even residence, of the National Committeeman or National Committeewoman involved. But the office would be a tangible indication of the status and function of the National Committeeman.

This memorandum is based primarily on research done in 1953 prior to the meeting in Chicago of the Democratic National Committee. Particular mention should be made of the care and energy with which Richard Haas, Esq., unearthed fugitive and stray materials, particularly 40, 50 and 60 years old.

Respectfully submitted,

HAROLD LEVENTHAL, Counsel

March 3, 1955

APPENDIX C

MEMORANDUM

To: Stephen A. Mitchell, Chairman; Senator Hubert H. Humphrey and Honorable John S. Battle, Vice Chairmen, Advisory Committee on 1956 Democratic National Convention Rules and Procedures.

From: Harold Leventhal, Counsel.

Subject: Background Material Relating to Responsibility of State Party Participating in National Convention; Eligibility and Responsibility of Delegates to National Convention and of Presidential Electors.

A. Introduction

This is a memorandum to set forth certain background concerning state laws and state party regulations and practices which may be useful to the Committee in consideration of the subject of the so-called and mis-called "loyalty oath" which arose during the 1952 Democratic National Convention.

This memorandum is prepared for purposes of transmittal to the members of the Advisory Committee and it therefore does not set forth the details of our researches.

In general we have tried to focus our attention on three principal subjects:

(a) In general, who are the members of the Democratic Party in the state who are entitled to participate in the decisions of the state party?

(b) What special problems or features are involved in the selection of the men and women to the party office of delegates to the National Convention?

(c) What special problems or features are involved in the selection and functions of the party's candidates for the position of Presidential elector?

We have had reference to various materials. First, there are formal materials, such as state laws. Second, are materials and memoranda previously prepared on certain phases of these subjects by the Secretary of the Senate, the Library of Congress and the American Political Science Association.

Special mention should be made of the materials in letters addressed to you by State Attorney Generals, and other informed persons in each state. For convenience, there is set forth in the Appendix a copy of your letter of inquiry to these persons. We have had responses from a substantial majority of the states. (Certain Republican Attorney Generals did indicate that they could not provide the information requested; yet even among the Republican officials, more cooperated than not.) In general an earnest effort was made to supply us the material.

The writer desires at this juncture to express his appreciation to the members of the staff who assisted in the appraisal of this material, Dr. Abraham Holtzman, Gillis Long, Associate Counsel, and Robert Bock.

There may be errors or alleged errors in the material—due to mistakes, or possibly due to differences of interpretation or to changes, this subject being in a state of flux. For such errors we beg the indulgence of members from the states involved. We have confidence, however, that the general picture is portrayed with general accuracy.

B. Membership in the Party

The first line of inquiry is who is a member of a party, specifically the Democratic Party? Who is entitled to participate in its affairs?

Some general preliminary observations may be helpful. A political party is in its essence based upon the constitutional rights of citizens embraced in the freedoms of assembly, freedom of speech and press. Citizens are accordingly free to organize themselves, and to engage in political discussion of men and measures, so as to impress their views upon the electorate. See Bowe v. Secretary of Commonwealth, 320 Mass. 230, 251-3, 69 N.E. 2d 115, 130-1 (1946).

The members of a party have a corresponding right to determine and to control its membership, if for no other reason than to protect the party against "raiding," against the conduct of those who spuriously profess to be members of the party and intervene in its affairs solely to embarrass or destroy the party.

The foundation and justification for statutes and regulations prescribing tests of party membership is clear. To quote from one writer in the field: " * * the general right to prescribe tests that will presumably protect the party against those who have no genuine interest in its welfare has been thoroughly recognized in numerous judicial decisions, the underlying basis of which was well stated in this striking sentence: 'A man has a constitutional right not to be a partisan, but he has no constitutional right as a non-partisan to participate in partisan proceedings.'"<sup>8</sup>

These general observations are not lessened in validity in any way by the fact that certain parties have been held subject to Constitutional limitations and prohibitions in regard to efforts to limit membership to white persons. Smith v. Allwright, 321 U.S. 649 (1944) (Convention Resolution of Democratic Party of Texas); Terry v. Adams, 345 U.S. 461 (1953) (Jaybird Democratic Association); Baskin v. Brown, 174 F. 2d 391 (C.A. 4th Cir.) (Democratic Clubs of South Carolina).

Those courts rejected the contention that the state parties were purely voluntary organizations, like golf clubs, of persons entitled under the Constitution to determine in their absolute discretion their own membership and state their political beliefs. The courts in effect held that where a state party has such broad authority—including virtually the determination of the nominees appearing on the general ballot—it partakes of the character of an agency of the state government where violation of Constitutional rights is involved.

However, there is obviously no constitutional problem in excluding a person from party membership on the ground that his political actions in the past, opinions in the present, or proposals for the future, are contrary to the views held by others in the party. That is a familiar and sound limitation on a man's freedom of political association.

The concrete significance of party membership depends upon the state involved. Party membership may be a requirement to participation in caucuses, election of political committees, signing nominating petitions, voting in primaries, eligibility as party's nominee for office, etc.

Open Primaries. Before discussing the party membership, it should be recognized at the outset that in the few states where the "open primary" system prevails such tests are non-existent in determining eligibility for the important task of selecting the party nominees for office.

Thus Mr. Don Eastvold, Attorney General (Republican) of Washington writes us: "We have what is known as the blanket primary, and it, frankly, has deteriorated party responsibility substantially."

The blanket ballot carries the "secret ballot" attributes of an open primary to its logical extreme. Instead of receiving a sheaf of primary ballots, and marking one of them, all voters receive the same blanket ballot, with the names of all proposed nominees of both parties.

It should be noted that Washington has a blanket primary, but it is a state convention which chooses delegates to the National Convention. The State of Wisconsin chooses delegates to the National Convention in a preferential Presidential primary which is conducted as an open primary.

Range of Party Tests. Where there are party "tests," they may consist solely of a simple declaration of party affiliation ("present affiliation"), or may include more elaborate oaths or declarations of past votes or actions ("past allegiance" tests), or intentions as to voting in the future ("future intention" tests). Or there may be combinations of two or more tests.

<sup>8</sup> Berdahl, "Party Membership in the United States," 36 Am. Pol. Sci. Rev. (Feb.-April 1942).

The state statutes may provide simply for presenting objections at the primary election to a person's avowed status. Many states have party registration or enrollment, and this provides a means for testing party regularity and guarding against raiding.

Present Affiliation and Party Enrollment.

A large group of states have, in effect, a party test of present declaration or oath of party affiliation—either at the primary election polls, or at an advance registration or enrollment. In some states both methods are used—advance registration in large communities (in Nebraska, cities of over 7,000), and simple declaration at the primary in the smaller communities.

In some states, indeed, the declaration is apparently implied from the person's action in asking for the ballot of a particular party, e.g., North Dakota, Vermont. The response from a political leader in Vermont states the opinion that this procedure is virtually an open primary since no record is kept of the ballot demanded. It is reported,<sup>6</sup> however, that in 1952 many Minnesota voters were outraged to learn that the new Presidential primary, unlike the regular primary, was not an open primary and they were required to specify the ballot desired; particularly in smaller communities many voters declined to vote in the primary.

A more commonplace situation is the declaration of party enrollment which is permissible, but not compulsory, in conjunction with registration. Examples at random are Louisiana, Maryland, Wyoming, etc. (We may for present purposes omit non-party registration, as e.g., in Rhode Island, where the Permanent Registration Act does not make provision for registration of party preference.)

Party enrollment does amount to more than a mere declaration of present status. First, the requirement of advance registration automatically ensures at least a short period of party identification in advance of the primary. Second, the formal party registration is considered, and by some writers even objected to, as constituting for most voters a "much more solemn and binding method than that of mere verbal declaration at the polls."<sup>7</sup>

<sup>6</sup> See "Minnesota" chapter, Presidential Nominating Politics in 1952, prepared by David, Moos, & Goldman (prepared under the auspices of The American Political Science Association, with the cooperation of the Brookings Institution).

<sup>7</sup> Berdahl, cited above.

Thus certain states which have no time period, or only a short one, as a prerequisite for participation in a primary for persons registering originally, prescribe a six-month waiting period for any one changing his party affiliation.

This is provided, e.g., in Louisiana, Maine, and Maryland (general provisions for counties other than three specified, populous counties).

In contrast, under Texas law which establishes a "present affiliation" test without party registration, the statute expressly provides that a person may not be a participating member of more than one party on the same day.

Party enrollment under declaration of present affiliation may be used as a general test, but subject to requirement of more specific oath upon challenge (as in Florida and Maine, discussed below).

But in other states, such as California and Maryland, the enrollment of party affiliations is the only test provided by law. In California, indeed, a court opinion declares that registration is the "best and only test of party affiliation." Heney v. Jordan, 179 Cal. 24, 175 Pac. 402.

Tests of Past Allegiance and/or Future Intention—State Statutes. As already indicated there is a variety of tests of "past allegiance," "future intention," and combinations thereof, including combinations together with declarations of present affiliation.

First we refer to the tests specified in state legislation. The following is a sample of the statutes:

(a) Pledge on Primary Ballot. Various state statutes contain a pledge at the bottom of the primary election ballot, whereby the voter will, in the words of the Alabama law, "pledge myself to abide by the results of the primary election and to aid and support all the nominees thereof in the ensuing general election." Similar pledges are contained in the statutes of, e.g., Louisiana, Texas ("Pledge myself to support the nominees of this primary").

The same pledges, when required of candidates for nomination, amount of course to an agreement to abide by the primary.

(b) Declaration Upon Party Enrollment. In New York, the person enrolls with a party, at the time of registration or upon application to the Board of Election. In cities requiring annual personal registration, the voter must enroll anew each time he registers. The enrollment blank contains the declaration that "I am in general sympathy with the principle of the party . . . and that it is my intention to support generally at the next election, state or national, the nominees of such Party for state, or national offices."

(c) Oaths Required in Event of Challenge. In various states the statute specifies oaths, or declarations, which must be taken or made in the event of challenge of the right to participate in the primary.

In some states the party enrollment by declaration at time of registration is sufficient for eligibility to vote in the primary unless the vote is challenged, in which event he must take the statutory oath (e.g., Florida, Maine).

The oaths, affirmations and declarations required by state law of voters who are challenged at the primary election include the following:

FLORIDA—Oath that at the last preceding general election, if he voted, he voted for a majority of the nominees of the party.

KENTUCKY—Voter swears to support the principles of the party and vote for its nominees at coming regular election, that he was affiliated with such party, and that he supported its nominees at last regular election.

MAINE—Oath that he intends to vote for the candidates of the party at the next election and that he has not taken part in the caucus of any other political party within the past six months.

MISSOURI—Voter must either be known to affiliate with the political party or must "obligate himself to support the nominees of said party at the following election."

MONTANA—Oath that he has been and is identified with the party and it is his intention to act with the party, and identify self with party at ensuing election.

OHIO—Voter claims membership and affiliation with party and if challenged swears that he voted for a majority of the candidates of the party at the next preceding regular state election at which he voted, or that he has not voted at a previous regular state election.

OKLAHOMA—Statute provides that a voter challenged at a primary election must swear "that he is a member of, and does affiliate with the political party" involved. A 1922 opinion of the Attorney General rules that an elector may be required to take oath that he does "now in good faith intend to support the principles of that party and the candidate nominated by it at the primaries now being held." (Apparently, however, the challenge goes to basic good faith, as when the voter is notoriously a member of another party. Other opinions of the Attorney General rule that an elector registered as a Democrat is not disqualified from voting in the Democratic primary although he intends to vote for a Republican in general election, or intends to vote for non-partisan candidate in general city election.)

VIRGINIA—Upon challenge, voter in primary must declare that he supported the nominees of the party in the last general election in which he participated. If he never voted before, that he will support such nominees in the next ensuing election. (NOTE: Brookings Institution study, Presidential Nominating Politics in 1952, reveals that Attorney General of Virginia has repeatedly held that presidential electors are not considered nominees, for purposes of related party regulation.)

Tests of Past Allegiance and/or Future Intention—State Party Regulations. In addition to the tests provided by state laws, there are tests provided by state party regulations or resolutions. The following are illustrative:

ALABAMA—In addition to the pledge required by state law, set forth above, the state committee included in 1952 an additional pledge in the spring primary "to aid and support the nominee of the National Convention of the Democratic Party for President and Vice President of the United States." A similar pledge was required of all candidates and was upheld by the Supreme Court, as to candidates for Presidential elector, in Ray v. Blair, 72 Sup. Ct. 654 (1952).

ARKANSAS—Party regulations deny right to vote in Democratic primary election to any one who (a) has not openly declared his allegiance to the principle of the Democratic Party, etc., (b) has at the last preceding general election voted against any Democratic nominee, or voted for or espoused the cause of any candidate for office who was not a Democratic nominee, (c) will not pledge himself to vote for and support at the ensuing general election the candidate of the Democratic Party for all offices nominated in the Democratic primary election in which he is voting.

GEORGIA—To vote in Democratic primary, voter must pledge to support in general election all candidates nominated by Democratic Party of Georgia in primary or in any run-off.

C. Delegates to National Convention

Mode of Selection. The Democratic Manual for the 1952 Democratic National Convention prepared by Clarence Cannon notes (p. 17) that delegates to the National Convention are selected, pursuant to statute or custom: (a)

By primary—in 14 states and the District of Columbia; (b) By State Convention—in 34 states and territories; (c) By State Committee—in 5 states.

Eligibility and Requirements. In general, the state statutes and party regulations do not prescribe any tests or requirements for delegates to the National Convention other than those applicable to persons voting in the primary, already discussed above.

In addition, of course, men and women are not likely to emerge as convention delegates by action of the Committee or convention unless they are proven, loyal party workers, and not passive voters.

In states using the primary system, there may be an additional candidate's pledge to vote for the nominees of the Party, a pledge which generally specifies the obligation to abide by the results of the primary.

There are some special requirements for Convention delegates. In Florida (a primary state) delegates to the Convention must not only declare that they voted for a majority of the nominees of the party in the last general election (as all members of the Party must be prepared to swear), but in addition they must, like all candidates for nomination to office, pledge themselves to vote for a majority of the nominees of the party at the next general election.

In South Dakota (a primary state) the declaration of candidate which would govern the Convention delegate is a declaration that the candidate "intends to vote the ticket of that party at the primary election * * * and at the general election in November, and agree to abide by the results of the primary election in regard to any candidacy."

There are a few states where the delegates to the Convention are expressly pledged to support the nominees of the National Convention:

ALABAMA—Pledge required by Democratic State Committee of all candidates for office, including Convention delegates. (Discussed above.)

MINNESOTA AND WISCONSIN—By statute, every candidate for delegate to National Convention must file affidavit that he is affiliated with the political party whose nomination he seeks, and that he intends to vote at the ensuing election for the nominee for president of that political party.

Good Faith Participation in Convention. There is a basic understanding of good faith regarding the participation by a delegate in the affairs of a convention. The most noted ruling on this point appears in Cannon's Democratic Manual, 1952, p. 33, as follows:

"A delegate announcing he would not abide by the decision of the Convention was held not entitled to participate in its deliberations (1864-33)."

In the 1864 Convention, a Maryland delegate protested against the candidacy of General McClellan if the latter was chosen the nominee for the Presidency by the Democratic National Committee. An objection was raised that if a delegate publicly declared he would not vote for the convention's nominee, he was not fit to be a member of the Convention.

The Chairman ruled: "... those who will not submit to the decision of the convention have no right to take part in its proceedings."

This memorandum does not consider any part of the question as to the extent to which delegates are bound at the National Convention, by previous pledges, preferences and commitments, to support particular nominees. There are different degrees to which a delegate may feel bound to support the winner of a Presidential primary, etc. But such "commitment" of course does not survive the life of the Convention.

D. Presidential Electors

Mode of Selection. In the majority of states, candidates for Presidential electors are selected at state conventions. For the most part these are conventions held prior to the National Convention, and indeed may select both delegates to the National Convention and the names of the Presidential electors at the same time. In some states, however, these state conventions are held after the national convention (e.g., Nebraska, New Hampshire, Ohio, Vermont). And in some states procedures have been established to permit modifying action by the state convention upon the completion of the national convention (e.g., Virginia, Texas).

The primary method and selections by state committees are the method used in most of the other states for designation of candidates for Presidential electors.

* At the meeting of the Credentials Committee of the Democratic National Convention on July 22, 1952, Mr. Pyle of Mississippi referred to the following precedent as adopted in 1848. (Tr. p. 22): "The Credentials Committee adopted a resolution that it would not proceed to the investigation of the claims of the contesting delegations from the State of New York to a seat in the convention until the respective claimants would agree that they would abide by the decisions of the convention and support its nominees; whether the decision of the convention be in favor or against the claims of such claimants. And the Utica and Herkimer delegates, as they are called, having refused to enter into such agreement, the Committee agrees that the other delegates are entitled to seats in the convention."

In Pennsylvania the law provides that the presidential nominee of each party shall nominate the candidates for Presidential elector.

In Virginia by 1948 statute if the state convention instructs the candidates to vote in the Electoral College for someone other than the nominees of the national convention, a national representative of the party may certify the electors of that party. However, it is not entirely clear how the Virginia statute could or would operate. First there is the problem as to who is duly authorized to act as a National representative of the party.<sup>9</sup> Moreover the certification of alternate candidates must be made 60 days before the national election. But suppose the state convention rejects the nominee of the national convention only 60 days before the national election? Or even 65 days—taking into account the practical time problems in finding candidates with necessary technical qualifications.

Responsibility of State Party in Choice of Electors. The basic framework concerning the selection of electors is a good faith assumption that a state party affiliated with a national party will choose electors who will vote for the nominees of the national convention. Apart from the few statutes which purport to assure expressly that the electors will vote for the nominees of the national convention, the assurance in fact is obtained by the workings of the state party.

Where electors are selected by Convention or Committee, trustworthy men are presumably chosen. The position is often a prerequisite of mark of honor. And even in the handful of states when electors are selected in primaries, the responses to our inquiries reveal that it is generally the state committee which determines by its influence what names will be placed on the ballot.

Moral Commitment of Electors. As a matter of theory electors have discretion to vote for the person of their choice. This legal power would probably remain in effect regardless of any pledges given by the elector involved. But under the party system it would be a gross breach of political morality for electors to vote for any candidate other than the candidate obviously intended by the voting public. The party system remains a matter of practice and good faith.

The extent to which party practice is in fact the governing determination today is indicated by the fact that in half the states the electors are not even on the ballot, and the ballot contains only presidential and vice presidential nominees. In most of the remaining states, the ballot contains the names of both the nominees and the electors. Only in a few states does the ballot contain merely the names of the electors.

Statutory Declaration or Commitment. We have found only a handful of states which have any special requirement or commitment demanded of candidates for presidential elector. It appears that pledges, statutory declarations are used to reenforce the moral ties which bind the elector to vote for the party nominees, in Alabama, California, Florida, Mississippi, Oregon, Virginia and South Dakota.

There is a recognition of the elector's moral obligation in the laws of Massachusetts, New Jersey and New York, although no specific pledges are provided.

Validity of Pledge Required of Electors. There has been a Supreme Court adjudication concerning the resolution adopted by the State Democratic Executive Committee of Alabama, on January 26, 1952, requiring candidates in its primary to sign a pledge, printed on the primary ballot, reading as follows: "By casting this ballot I do pledge myself to abide by the result of this Primary Election and to aid and support all the nominees thereof in the ensuing General Elections. I do further pledge myself to aid and support the nominees of the National Convention of the Democratic Party for President and Vice President of the United States."

In Ray v. Blair, 343, U.S. 214, 72 Sup. Ct. 654 (1952), reversing the Supreme Court of Alabama's decision reported in 57 So. (2d) 826, the Supreme Court, in an opinion by Mr. Justice Reed, held: (a) It was proper for the state party to attempt to determine in advance that its electors would vote for the nominees of the national party convention to which the state party sent delegates. (b) A state political party, "affiliated with a national party through acceptance of the national call to send state delegates to the national convention, (may decline) to accept persons as candidates who refuse to agree to abide by the party's requirement." (72 Sup. Ct. at 659.) (c) The commitment demanded of the electors in no way violated the spirit of the Twelfth <sup>9</sup> Obviously the Chairman of the National Committee should have that position, but his office is not expressly stated, and if the state officials should demand proof of express authority from the National Committee—or worse, from the Convention—the statute could be made inoperative in fact.

Amendment to the Constitution, which provides the electoral system.

Substitutions by State Committee. Suppose one or more electoral candidates chosen at the state convention announced that he would not vote for nominees of the Democratic National Convention. It has been suggested that his name could be removed, for cause, and replaced by a substitute selected by a state executive committee which has the power of the convention during the interim between conventions. There is a possible analogy in Browne v. Martin, 19 So. 2d 421 (upholding action of Louisiana Committee in rescinding persons named by committee as delegates to the National Convention of 1944 when they refused to take the pledge, required by the committee, to support President Roosevelt). But when the candidate's announcement comes too late to permit of a substitution within the statutory period, there is probably no recourse except upon the basis of honor, to request that the individual resign and permit the operation of replacement methods provided by statute.

E. Role of State Party Organization

The great diversity of state statutes, rules, and practices make[s] it difficult to establish a clear chain of links between the delegate to the national convention and the candidate for presidential elector. They are often chosen in different ways.

The most valid generalization and observation is a quite simple one: It is the State Party which (a) chooses delegates to the national convention, (b) selects candidates for the position of elector, and (c) takes responsibility for the victory of these electoral candidates.

Generally speaking, the State Convention is considered to be the highest voice of a State political party. See Nixon v. Condon, 206 U.S. 73, 84 (1932).

But the matter is one of state law. The term "State Party" may refer to a convention, a committee, or a primary system, or some combination of these.

Some state statutes define a state party in terms of the assemblage of voters which cast a minimum percentage of votes at the last election.

The role of the state party is particularly significant in regard to matters of procedure. In one state after another, matters of party procedure are left by the legislatures for handling by the state party. In turn these are largely resolved in terms of "custom," although specific rules are also developed. Even where state enactments are relatively detailed, the area committed to the state party is substantial.

The discretion of the state party, and typically of the state committee, embraces at a minimum such matters as the time and place of state conventions, which seem like details but may be crucial. In some states the statutes permit the state committee to determine whether the delegates to the National Convention shall be chosen by state convention or by primary.

A number of statutes expressly set forth the broad discretion conferred upon the parties in the management of their affairs. In other states the discretion is implied from the original breadth of discretion and the fact that state legislation does not cover the entire field of political problems. In any event a broad expanse of the matters is left to the state parties.

The state committee is an administrative entity for the state party. Between conventions it is the state committee which acts as the voice and in effect the legal representative of the state party. Certainly, the state committee is a channel of communication to the state party; i.e., notice can be sent to a state party through its state committee even as to a matter to be acted upon in a state convention. And frequently the state committee is not merely an administrative mechanism, holding operation, or channel of communication, but is also an institution of influence even where actions are taken in the primaries or by conventions.

The state statutes generally provide detailed instructions for the selection of state central or executive committees. They may be selected by the convention. Or they may be chosen in direct primary election, with say two members chosen from each state senatorial district. Or they may be the apex of a pyramid whose base is the ward or precinct committee elected in public meeting. These committees elect the next higher layer, until the state committee level is reached.

In any event the state committee serves as a channel of communications in carrying out the responsibilities of the state party in regard to those matters where the state party is not acting by and for itself, but as a part of a national party.

F. Participation by State Party in National Convention

The Federal system assigns a place to the State Governments in their own sovereignty except as to "national" affairs where the sovereignty of the states yields to the sovereignty of the national government.

Political parties are also marked by a Federal system. In many respects the state party is sovereign and independent. But particularly in regard to national conventions and Presidential candidates, it is clear that the state party is not acting by and for itself, but as a part of a national party and, linked with all other state parties, in a national effort.

As the Supreme Court said, in Ray v. Blair, 72 Sup. Ct. 654, 659: "a state political party (is) affiliated with a national party through acceptance of the national call to send state delegates to the national convention. . . ."

The Court cited with approval an excerpt from Ray v. Garner, 57 So. 2d 824, 826: "Primarily, the pledge must be germane to party membership and party elections and, while the last clause of the pledge pertains to the national party, the party in Alabama will be a part of it by sending delegates to participate in the national convention, the Executive Committee having ordered their election and the party thereby having signified its intention to become a member of the national party. Therefore, it was within the competency of the Committee to adopt the resolution so binding the voters in the primary." 57 So. 2d 826. (Emphasis added.)

The Supreme Court noted that such a holding integrates the state and national party. The Court also noted with approval Cannon's Democratic Manual, including passages stating that the National Committee is the permanent agency authorized to act for the party between conventions as a creature of the National Convention and subordinate to its control and direction, that it has the duty and power to provide for the National Convention, involving: Authorization of call and determination within authority granted by the last National Convention of representation from States, Territories and Districts.

Reference may also be made to the following language from the Opinion of the Justices: "No one elected at the General Election as an elector could function unless he belonged to some political party which had held a National Convention and had a nominee for that office." 34 So. 2d 598.

G. National Committeeman

The subject of "loyalty" raises the question of the National Committeeman who advocates the election of the opposition candidate, or for that matter fails to support the nominees of the Convention. It is clear that the national committeeman, although in one sense a representative of the party in his state, is at the same time a member of a national organization just as is a member of the United States Senate. The national committeeman is accordingly subject to removal for such actions. For convenience, this question has been made the subject of a separate memorandum.

Respectfully submitted,
HAROLD LEVENTHAL, Counsel

APPENDIX

Copy of the Inquiry made by Stephen A. Mitchell, Chairman of the Advisory Committee, of Advisory Committee members, of State Attorney Generals, and other informed persons.

Dear _____

It would be very much appreciated if you could inform us, at your earliest convenience, as to the legal requirements in your State applicable to the following:

(1) What the qualifications are for: (a) membership in the Democratic and Republican Parties; (b) for delegates to the Democratic and Republican National Conventions; (c) for candidates for the positions of Presidential electors.

(2) How Party delegates to the National Conventions and nominees for the positions of Presidential electors are or may be selected—by primary; convention; designation by State Committee; petition, etc.

(3) What certifications or legal requirements are involved in securing a designation on the ballot that the nominees for elector would, if elected, be the electors for the Presidential nominees for the respective Democratic or Republican National Conventions?

Is there provision that this be shown on the ballot by (a) listing the names of the Convention's nominees; (b) using the words "Democratic Party" or "Republican Party"; (c) using the emblem of the Democratic Party or Republican Party?

If the State law requires any pledge or commitment of these nominees, please advise us accordingly.

We should very much appreciate your reference to the statutory provision and court decisions in your State which concern this matter.

With many thanks for your kind cooperation.

Yours sincerely,
STEPHEN A. MITCHELL

SELECTED ARTICLES AND DOCUMENTS ON AMERICAN GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS

FRANKLIN L. BURDETTE

University of Maryland

ARTICLES AND BOOKLETS

National Government

Bronz, George. Conversion of Foreign Currency in Customs Administration. Texas Law Review. November, 1955.

Controversy Over U. S. Immigration Policy—Should Basic Changes Be Made? [Symposium.] Congressional Digest. January, 1956.

Galloway, George B. Congressional Reorganization Revisited. Bureau of Governmental Research, University of Maryland. 1956.

Gilliam, Armistead W., and Jonathan W. Sloat. Presidential Inability: The Problem and a Recommendation. George Washington Law Review. March, 1956.

Lee, John Franklin. Statutory Provision for Admission of Mexican Agricultural Workers—An Exception to the Immigration and Nationality Act of 1952. George Washington Law Review. March, 1956.

Riddick, Floyd M. The Eighty-Fourth Congress: First Session. Western Political Quarterly. December, 1955.

Stiefel, Maurice B. Piracy in High Places—Government Publications and Copyright Law. George Washington Law Review. March, 1956.

State Government

Ecker-Rácz, L. László. State Tax Activities, 1955. National Tax Journal. December, 1955.

Heady, Ferrel, and Robert H. Pealy. The Michigan Department of Administration. Institute of Public Administration, University of Michigan. 1956.

Naftalin, Arthur. An Experiment in "Do-It-Yourself" [Management Survey]. State Government. January, 1956.

Neuberger, Richard L. Aids for the Legislator. National Municipal Review. March, 1956.

Rolph, Earl R. Interregional Trade and State Excise Taxes. National Tax Journal. December, 1955.

State Government: The Record and the Opportunity. State Government. January, 1956.

Stout, Randall S., and Eugene A. Myers. Financing Pennsylvania State Government by Means of Emergency Taxes. National Tax Journal. December, 1955.

Suggested State Legislation. Council of State Governments. 1955.

Turano, Peter J. Michigan State and Local Government and Politics: A Bibliography. Institute of Public Administration, University of Michigan. 1955.

Turner, Henry A. Woodrow Wilson and the New Jersey Legislature. Proceedings of the New Jersey Historical Society. January, 1956.

Local Government

Bailey, Stephen K. Leadership in Local Government. Institute of Local Government, University of Pittsburgh. 1955.

Bain, Chester W. Terms and Conditions of Annexation [in Virginia] under the 1952 Statute. Virginia Law Review. December, 1955.

Bloom, Murray Teigh. One Way to Stop Slums. National Municipal Review. February, 1956.

The City's Role in Industrial Development. [Symposium.] Public Management. February, 1956.

Colberg, Marshall R. Utility Profits: A Substitute for Property Taxes. National Tax Journal. December, 1955.

Crawford, Fred G. Organizational and Administrative Development of the Government of the City of Los Angeles. School of Public Administration, University of Southern California. 1955.

Fiske, Robert B., Jr. The Effect of Zoning Ordinances on the Law of Nuisance. Michigan Law Review. December, 1955.

Havard, William C. Metropolis in Miniature. National Municipal Review. January, 1956.

Hobbs, Edward H., and Alton W. Sims. A Manual of Mississippi Municipal Government. Bureau of Public Administration, University of Mississippi. 1955.

Howard, Charles B. Current Municipal Bond Procedures in Minnesota. Minnesota Law Review. January, 1956.

Reed, Thomas H. Trends in City Management. Public Management. December, 1955.

Relations with Employee Organizations. [Symposium.] Public Management. January, 1956.

Royal, P. N. Planning for the 'Fringe.' National Municipal Review. January, 1956.

Sause, George C., Jr. Municipal Poll Taxes in Pennsylvania. National Tax Journal. December, 1955.

Snider, Clyde F. The Fading Almshouse. National Municipal Review. February, 1956.

Walker, Harvey. Toward a New Theory of Municipal Home Rule. Northwestern University Law Review. November-December, 1955.

Westmeyer, Troy R. A Massachusetts Myth [Home Rule]. National Municipal Review. March, 1956.

Intergovernmental Relations

Morgan, Robert J. The States and Watershed Development. State Government. January, 1956.

Constitutional Law and Civil Liberties

Bartholomew, Paul C. The Supreme Court of the United States, 1954-1955. Social Science. January, 1956.

Boudin, Leonard B. The Constitutional Right to Travel. Columbia Law Review. January, 1956.

Brown, Stuart Gerry. Politics and Mr. Crosskey's Constitution, II. Syracuse Law Review. Fall, 1955.

Burton, Harold H. The Legal Tender Cases: A Celebrated Supreme Court Reversal. American Bar Association Journal. March, 1956.

Carrington, Paul D. Political Questions: The Judicial Check on the Executive. Virginia Law Review. February, 1956.

Chief Justice John Marshall: A Symposium. University of Pennsylvania Law Review. October, 1955.

Congressional Pre-emption by Silence of the Commerce Power. Virginia Law Review. January, 1956.

Dean, Howard E. Democracy, Loyalty, Disobedience: A Query. Western Political Quarterly. December, 1955.

Denial of Federally Aided Housing to Members of Organizations on the Attorney General's List. Harvard Law Review. January, 1956.

Frankfurter, Felix. John Marshall and the Judicial Function. Harvard Law Review. December, 1955.

Garrison, Lloyd K. Some Observations on the Loyalty-Security Program. University of Chicago Law Review. Autumn, 1955.

Hofstadter, Samuel H. The Fifth Amendment and the Immunity Act of 1954. Fund for the Republic, New York.

———. Mr. Justice Holmes: Exponent of Juridical Relativity. American Bar Association Journal. January, 1956.

Reid, Ira De A., ed. Racial Desegregation and Integration. [Symposium.] The Annals. March, 1956.

The Scope of Review, Due Process, and the Conscientious Objector—Some Unresolved Problems. Northwestern University Law Review. November-December, 1955.

Smith, James Morton. President John Adams, Thomas Cooper, and Sedition: A Case Study in Suppression. Mississippi Valley Historical Review. December, 1955.

Statutory Implementation of Double Jeopardy Clauses: New Life for a Moribund Constitutional Guarantee. Yale Law Journal. January, 1956.

Judicial Administration and Law Enforcement

Arens, Richard, and Arnold Meadow. Psycholinguistics and the Confession Dilemma. Columbia Law Review. January, 1956.

Becker, Ralph E., and Leo Albert Huard. Tort Liability and the Atomic Energy Industry. Georgetown Law Journal. November, 1955.

Braun, Berton G. The Milwaukee Police Department: A Case Study in Police Organization. Institute of Public Administration, University of Michigan, 1955.

Custom and Trade Usage: Its Application to Commercial Dealings and the Common Law. Columbia Law Review. December, 1955.

Dimock, Edward J. The Public Defender: A Step towards a Police State? American Bar Association Journal. March, 1956.

Disposition of Moot Cases by the United States Supreme Court. University of Chicago Law Review. Autumn, 1955.

Ehrenzweig, Albert A. The Transient Rule of Personal Jurisdiction: The "Power" Myth and Forum Conveniens. Yale Law Journal. January, 1956.

Elliott, Shelden D. "Our Faith in Justice": Puerto Rico Shows the Way to Better Courts. American Bar Association Journal. January, 1956.

Ellison, Newell W. The United States Court of Claims: Keeper of the Nation's Conscience for One Hundred Years. George Washington Law Review. January, 1956.

Ferguson, Glenn W. Legal Research on Trial [in Recording Jury Deliberations]. Journal of the American Judicature Society. October-December, 1955.

Hogan, John C. Blackstone and Joseph

Story—Their Influence on the Development of Criminal Law in America. Minnesota Law Review. January, 1956.

Hynning, Clifford J. Treaty Law for the Private Practitioner. University of Chicago Law Review. Autumn, 1955.

Immunity from Self-incrimination under the Federal Compulsory Testimony Act. Journal of Criminal Law, Criminology and Police Science. January–February, 1956.

Immunity from Statutes of Limitations and Other Doctrines Favoring the United States as Plaintiff. Columbia Law Review. December, 1955.

Intoxication as a Criminal Defense. Columbia Law Review. December, 1955.

Iverson, Evan A., and Lyman B. Powell. Law Enforcement in Utah. Local Government Survey Commission. 1956.

Jeffery, Clarence R. The Structure of American Criminological Thinking. Journal of Criminal Law, Criminology and Police Science. January–February, 1956.

Kaufman, Irving R. Further Observations on Transfers under Section 1404(a). Columbia Law Review. January, 1956.

Kuh, Richard H. The Grand Jury "Presentment": Foul Blow or Fair Play? Columbia Law Review. December, 1955.

The Lawyer as a Member of a Learned Profession. [Symposium.] Southern California Law Review. December, 1955.

Miller, Arthur S. Statutory Language and the Purposive Use of Ambiguity. Virginia Law Review. January, 1956.

Page, Barbara. Statutes in Derogation of Common Law: The Canon as an Analytical Tool. Wisconsin Law Review. January, 1956.

Silving, Helen. Testing of the Unconscious in Criminal Cases. Harvard Law Review. February, 1956.

Stack, Daniel. The Liability of the United States for Breach of Contract. Georgetown Law Journal. November, 1955.

Supreme Court Per Curiam Practice: A Critique. Harvard Law Review. February, 1956.

Vanderbilt, Arthur T. Judges and Jurors: Their Functions, Qualifications and Selection. Boston University Law Review. Winter, 1956.

Waite, John Barker. Judges and the Crime Burden. Michigan Law Review. December, 1955.

Winters, Glenn R. Integration of the Bar—You Can't Lose. Journal of the American Judicature Society. February, 1956.

———. The Photographer's Day in Court.

Journal of the American Judicature Society. October–December, 1955.

Younger, Evelle J. Capital Punishment: A Sharp Medicine Reconsidered. American Bar Association Journal. February, 1956.

Public Administration and Administrative Law

Arpaia, Anthony F. The Independent Agency—A Necessary Instrument of Democratic Government. Harvard Law Review. January, 1956.

Bamberg, John. Improving the Federal Classification and Pay Program: Some Suggestions. Public Personnel Review. January, 1956.

Brown, Harvey Dean. Personnel Legislation in the 84th Congress. Public Personnel Review. January, 1956.

Clark, Reuben, Jr. Accountants in Treasury Practice: The Department Regulations Should Adopt the Bercu Rule. George Washington Law Review. March, 1956.

Convisser, Israel. Primary Jurisdiction: The Rule and Its Rationalizations. Yale Law Journal. January, 1956.

Davis, Clarence A. Government Legal Services, Procedures, and Representation: A Discussion of the Hoover Report and the Administration of the Department of the Interior. Northwestern University Law Review. January–February, 1956.

Davis, Kenneth Culp. Government Officers as Defendants: Two Troublesome Problems. University of Pennsylvania Law Review. October, 1955.

Fuchs, Ralph F. The Hoover Commission and Task Force Reports on Legal Services and Procedure. Indiana Law Journal. Fall, 1955.

Jaffe, Louis L. Judicial Review: Question of Law. Harvard Law Review. December, 1955.

Janowitz, Morris, and Deil Wright. The Prestige of Public Employment: 1929 and 1954. Public Administration Review. Winter, 1956.

McKenna, Frank J. A Delegation of Federal Disbursing Functions. Public Administration Review. Winter, 1956.

Millett, John D. The Values of Public Service. Public Personnel Review. January, 1956.

Odom, Thetus C. Management Development at Kelley Air Force Base. Public Administration Review. Winter, 1956.

Reining, Henry, Jr. The FSEE: The University Point of View. Public Administration Review. Winter, 1956.

Richardson, Ivor L. M. Problems in the Removal of Federal Civil Servants. Michigan Law Review. December, 1955.

Ricketts, Edmond F. The Anatomy of Pay Plans. Public Personnel Review. January, 1956.

Schubert, Glendon A., Jr., Helenan Sonnenburg, and George Kantrowitz. The Michigan Athletics Award Rule. Inter-University Case Program. 1955.

Sharp, Theodore L., and Larry C. White. An Approach to Employee Evaluation: The Field Review. Public Personnel Review. January, 1956.

Sherman, J. Walter. A Formal Management Development Program That Works. Public Personnel Review. January, 1956.

Stockard, James G. The FSEE and the Staffing of Federal Agencies. Public Administration Review. Winter, 1956.

Williams, J. D. The Impounding of Funds by the Bureau of the Budget. Inter-University Case Program. 1955.

Young, Philip. The Federal Service Entrance Examination. Public Administration Review. Winter, 1956.

Political Parties, Elections, and Public Opinion

Blumenson, S. L. From the American Scene: The Politicians. Commentary. March, 1956.

Bricker, Seymour M. Renewal and Extension of Copyright. Southern California Law Review. December, 1955.

A County Political Convention in 1872. Iowa Journal of History. January, 1956.

Exhaustion of Remedies in Private, Voluntary Associations. Yale Law Journal. January, 1956.

Fishel, Leslie H. The Negro in Northern Politics, 1870-1900. Mississippi Valley Historical Review. December, 1955.

Frank, Forest. Cincinnati Recount Triumph for P. R. National Municipal Review. February, 1956.

Gallup, George. The Absorption Rate of Ideas. Public Opinion Quarterly. Fall, 1955.

Gerwig, Robert. The Elective Franchise for Residents of Federal Areas. George Washington Law Review. March, 1956.

Goldman, Ralph M. Move—Lose Your Vote. National Municipal Review. January, 1956.

Harsch, Joseph C. The Role of Political Parties U.S.A. Carrie Chapman Catt Memorial Fund. 1955.

Kaplan, Benjamin. Performer's Right and Copyright: The Capitol Records Case. Harvard Law Review. January, 1956.

Lowe, Francis E., and Thomas C. McCormick. Some Survey Sampling Biases. Public Opinion Quarterly. Fall, 1955.

Lubell, Samuel. The Return of Two-Party Politics. Commentary. March, 1956.

Minnesota Corrupt Practices Act: A Critique of the Fixed Campaign Expenditure Limitations. Minnesota Law Review. January, 1956.

Nimmer, Melville B. Copyright Publication. Columbia Law Review. February, 1956.

———. Copyright 1955. California Law Review. December, 1955.

Pollard, James E. Eisenhower and the Press: The Partial News Vacuum. Journalism Quarterly. Winter, 1956.

Shepard, David W. Henry J. Taylor's Radio Talks: A Content Analysis. Journalism Quarterly. Winter, 1956.

Sherman, Paul J. The Universal Copyright Convention: Its Effect on United States Law. Columbia Law Review. December, 1955.

Sparks, David S. The Birth of the Republican Party in Iowa, 1854-1856. Iowa Journal of History. January, 1956.

Stevenson, Adlai E. Party of the Second Part: Criticism in Politics. Harper's Magazine. February, 1956.

Tannenbaum, Percy H. The Indexing Process in Communication. Public Opinion Quarterly. Fall, 1955.

Television Defamation—Libel or Slander? Virginia Law Review. January, 1956.

Weeks, O. Douglas. Republicanism and Conservatism in the South. Southwestern Social Science Quarterly. December, 1955.

Economic and Social Functions

National Economy

Atomic Power Development. [Symposium.] Law and Contemporary Problems. Winter, 1956.

Davis, Clarence A. What Does the Report on Water Resources Policy Mean? Public Utilities Fortnightly. March 15, 1956.

Holtzinger, John E., and Arvin M. Kramish. Multiple Mineral Development of Public Lands. George Washington Law Review. January, 1956.

Mayer, Harold M. The St. Lawrence Seaway and Problems of the Great Lakes States. State Government. February, 1956.

Meyer, Theodore R. The Reed-Dirksen Amendment: A Re-Examination of Our Income Tax Theory. American Bar Association Journal. January, 1956.

Modernizing the Nation's Highways. Committee for Economic Development. 1956.

Neuberger, Richard L. Our Natural Resources—And Their Conservation. Public Affairs Pamphlet No. 230. 1956.

Plowman, E. G. A Shipper Looks at National Transportation Policy. Harvard Business Review. March–April, 1956.

Smith, W. B. Statutory Treatment of Industrial Stream Pollution. George Washington Law Review. January, 1956.

Stone, Albert W. The Hoover Reports on Water Resources and Power—A Commentary. California Law Review. December, 1955.

Water Use and Control. [Symposium.] Iowa Law Review. Winter, 1956.

Business and Labor

Aranow, Edward Ross, and Herbert A. Einhorn. State Court Review of Corporate Elections. Columbia Law Review. February, 1956.

Armstrong, Jack G. "Hot Cargo" Clause as a Defense to Secondary Boycott. Michigan Law Review. December, 1955.

Battle Over "Right-to-Work" Laws. [Symposium.] Congressional Digest. February, 1956.

Benewitz, Maurice C. The Right-to-Work Law Case. Labor Law Journal. January, 1956.

Carlston, Kenneth S. Foreign Economic Policy and the Antitrust Laws. Minnesota Law Review. January, 1956.

Carson, Ralph M. Some Abuses of Antitrust Prosecution: The Investment Bankers Case. Michigan Law Review. January, 1956.

Cochran, Thomas C. Business and the American Tradition. Harvard Business Review. March–April, 1956.

Cohen, Samuel Harris. The Strike Ballot and Other Compulsory Union Balloting. Labor Law Journal. March, 1956.

Cox, Archibald. Rights under a Labor Agreement. Harvard Law Review. February, 1956.

—. Some Lawyers' Problems in Grievance Arbitration. Minnesota Law Review. December, 1955.

Gamser, Howard G. After Merger—AFL-CIO's Program and Problems. Labor Law Journal. February, 1956.

James, Fleming, Jr. Products Liability. Texas Law Review. November, 1955.

Jeffers, Leroy. The Vintage Doctrine—New Test of Wage and Hour Law Coverage. Labor Law Journal. February, 1956.

Kammholz, Theophil C. NLRB Regional Offices and the Employer. Labor Law Journal. March, 1956.

Krislov, Joseph. Representation Disputes in the Railroad and Airline Industries. Labor Law Journal. February, 1956.

Look, Clarence W., Donovan J. Rau, and Howard D. Hamilton. The Michigan Value-Added Tax. National Tax Journal. December, 1955.

Mills, Lewis R. Government Fiscal Aid to Private Enterprise in Wisconsin: A Quantitative Approach. Wisconsin Law Review. January, 1956.

Morris, James R. Repeal of the Railway Right-to-Work Law—An Appraisal. Labor Law Journal. February, 1956.

The Operation of Fair-Trade Programs. Harvard Law Review. December, 1955.

Oppenheim, S. Chesterfield. Patents and Antitrust: Peaceful Coexistence? Michigan Law Review. December, 1955.

Ratner, Mozart G. Policy-Making by the New "Quasi-Judicial" NLRB. University of Chicago Law Review. Autumn, 1955.

Report of the Attorney General's Committee on Antitrust Law—A Symposium. University of Pennsylvania Law Review. November, 1955.

Rose, George. The Railway Labor Act: The Union Shop and Impartial Tribunals. American Bar Association Journal. January, 1956.

Smith, Lincoln. The Repeal of Maine's Power Embargo. Public Utilities Fortnightly. February 2, 1956.

Stocking, George W. The Attorney General's Committee Report: The Businessman's Guide through Antitrust. Georgetown Law Journal. November, 1955.

Tinsley, James A. Texas Progressives and Insurance Regulation. Southwestern Social Science Quarterly. December, 1955.

Turnbull, John. Federal-State Jurisdictional Problems [in Regulation of Labor Relations]. Labor Law Journal. January, 1956.

Unions and the Antitrust Laws. [Symposium.] Labor Law Journal. March, 1956.

Wilson, Richard G. Products Liability. Part II: The Protection of the Producing Enterprise. California Law Review. December, 1955.

Agriculture

Black, John D. Agriculture in the Nation's Economy. American Economic Review. March, 1956.

Economic Policy for American Agriculture. Committee for Economic Development. 1956.

Farm Aid Proposals. [Symposium.] Congressional Digest. March, 1956.

Health, Education, and Welfare

Brown, J. Douglas. The American Philosophy of Social Insurance. Social Service Review. March, 1956.

Daland, Robert T. Government and Health: The Alabama Experience. Bureau of Public Administration, University of Alabama. 1955.

Eberhardt, John L. Kansas State Department of Public Instruction. Governmental Research Center, University of Kansas. 1955.

Greenfield, Margaret. Self-Support in Aid to Dependent Children. Bureau of Public Administration, University of California, Berkeley. 1956.

Hunt, Robert C. Pooling Resources for Mental Hygiene. State Government. January, 1956.

Mandelker, Daniel R. Exclusion and Removal Legislation. Wisconsin Law Review. January, 1956.

———. Spare the Punishment and Save the Individual: A New Approach to Client Fraud in General Assistance. Northwestern University Law Review. January-February, 1956.

Unemployment Compensation. Research Council for Economic Security, Chicago. 1955.

Military Affairs and National Security

Anderson, Dillon. The President and National Security. Atlantic Monthly. January, 1956.

Elliott, Sheldon D. Statute Construction and the Court of Military Appeals. Tulane Law Review. December, 1955.

Everett, Robinson O. Criminal Investigation under Military Law. Journal of Criminal Law, Criminology and Police Science. January-February, 1956.

Security Inventions: Compensation under Patent and Atomic Energy Acts. Indiana Law Journal. Fall, 1956.

Government Documents

Congress

House. Committee on Agriculture. Family-Size Farms. Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 1st Sess. 1956.

———. Futures Trading. Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 1st Sess. 1956.

———. Investigation of Dairying. 1955. Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 1st Sess. 1956.

———. Committee on Banking and Currency. Disaster Insurance. Hearings. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Regulation of Exports. Hearings. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Committee on Education and Labor. Distinguished Civilian Awards and Cultural Interchange and Development. Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong. 1956.

———. Committee on Government Operations. Administration of Overseas Personnel. Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 1st Sess. 1956.

———. Commission on Organization of the Executive Branch of the Government (Food and Clothing Report). Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 1st Sess. 1956.

———. Congressional Control over the Budget of the United States. Hearing before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 1st Sess. 1956.

———. Foreign Service Promotions under the Wriston Program. House Report No. 1663. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Navy Jet Aircraft Procurement Program. Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 1st Sess. 1956.

———. Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs. Hells Canyon Dam. Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 1st Sess. 1956.

———. Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. Extension of Poliomyelitis Vaccination Assistance Act. Hearing before Subcommittee. Also House Report No. 1697. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Committee on the Judiciary. Japanese-American Evacuation Claims. Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 1st Sess. 1956.

———. Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries. Operation and Administration of the Cargo Preference Act. Hearings. Also House Report No. 1818. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Committee on Post Office and Civil Service. Leave Administration in the Departments and Agencies. House Report No. 1744. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Manpower Utilization in the Federal Government. Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 1st Sess. Also House Report No. 1740. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Personnel Programs and Policies of the Federal Government. Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 1st Sess. 1956.

———. Committee on Un-American Activities. Investigation of Communist Infiltration of Government. Hearings. 84th Cong., 1st Sess. 1956.

———. Committee on Veterans' Affairs. 1956 Legislative Programs of the American Legion, the Disabled American Veterans, American Veterans of World War II, Veterans of Foreign Wars, and Veterans of World War I. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. The Provision of Federal Benefits for Veterans: An Historical Analysis of Major Veterans' Legislation, 1862-1954. House Committee Print No. 171. 84th Cong., 1st Sess. 1955.

———. Select Committee on Small Business. Aluminum Industry. Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 1st Sess. 1956.

House and Senate. Joint Committee on the Economic Report. Foreign Economic Policy. Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 1st Sess. 1955.

———. Low-Income Families. Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 1st Sess. 1955. Also Senate Report No. 1311. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

Senate. Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. Agricultural Act of 1956. Senate Report No. 1484. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Price-Support Program. Hearings. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Committee on Appropriations. Inventory Report on Federal Real Property in the United States as of June 30, 1955. Senate Document No. 100. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Committee on Banking and Currency. Control of Bank Holding Companies. Hearings. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Federal Disaster Insurance. Hearings. 84th Cong., 1st Sess. Also Staff Study, Senate Report No. 1313. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Committee on Finance. Social Security Amendments of 1955. Hearings. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Sugar Act Extension. Hearings. Also Senate Report No. 1461. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Committee on Foreign Relations. Control and Reduction of Armaments. Hearing before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Committee on Government Operations. Administrative Vice President. Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Commission on Government Security. Hearings before Subcommittee.

84th Cong., 1st Sess. 1955.

———. Fees for Government Services. Senate Report No. 1467. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Hugh W. Cross—Chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission. Hearing before Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Payments of Taxes, or in Lieu of Taxes, to State or Local Taxing Units. Hearing. 84th Cong., 1st Sess. 1956.

———. Reorganization of the Passport Office. Senate Report No. 1604. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Review of Audit Reports of the Comptroller General. Senate Report No. 1572. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. Merchant Marine Training and Education. Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 1st Sess. Also Senate Report No. 1465. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Pacific Coast and Alaska Fisheries. Hearings. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Committee on the Judiciary. American Patent System. Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 1st Sess. Also Senate Report No. 1464. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. The Communist Party of the United States of America: What It Is, How It Works. Committee Print. 84th Cong., 1st Sess. 1955.

———. Power Policy: Dixon-Yates Contract. Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 1st Sess. 1956.

———. Recording of Jury Deliberations. Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 1st Sess. 1955.

———. Scope of Soviet Activity in the United States. Hearing before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Security and Constitutional Rights. Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Committee on Post Office and Civil Service. Administration of the Federal Employees' Security Program. Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 1st Sess. 1956.

———. Committee on Public Works. Mississippi River-Gulf Outlet. Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Committee on Rules and Administration. Joint Committee on Central Intelligence Agency. Senate Report No. 1570. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Select Committee on Small Business. ICC Administration of the Motor Carrier Act. Hearings. 84th Cong., 1st Sess. 1956.

———. Military Procurement—1956. Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

FOREIGN AND COMPARATIVE GOVERNMENT

The Origins of the British Labour Party. BY J. H. STEWART REID. (Minneapolis, Minn.: University of Minnesota Press. 1955. Pp. 258. $4.50.)

The rise of the Labor party is one of the most fascinating chapters of English political history. Within barely a quarter of a century the new party replaced the Liberals as one of the two major parties. Two more decades and the original home of political and economic liberalism became the classical example of the welfare state, now in its major premises accepted by the majority of the nation.

Professor Reid gives the account of the formative period of the party between 1900 and 1918. Though the story has often been told in greater detail, two things come out especially well in Reid's book: the essentially moderate and constructive policy of the parliamentary group between 1906 and 1914, and the seeds of the discords which were to split Labor in the twenties and thirties. From its beginning the Labor party contained people for whom laborism was but a "left" extension of liberalism, and the more dogmatic socialists searching for a new social organization. The book documents once again the heightened interest in political and social radicalism which gripped English society as Great Britain's economic dynamism began to slow down in the 1880's. Some form of powerful social reform movement was clearly in the offing; it was a matter of fortuitous circumstances, of the destruction of the premises of European liberalism in World War I, that its main representative was to become the socialism of labor rather than a reformed and semi-socialist Liberal party.

But the rise of a party is only a fragment of the larger problem of the tremendous transformation of English politics and society during the past 50 years. Why was doctrinal Marxism of such little attraction to the British Labor movement whose "moderation" has often been overstressed? Why did Liberalism before World War I fail to identify itself more closely with the aspirations and postulates of the working classes? And finally, how has Conservatism, still stamped with the aristocratic principle and permeated by big business, managed to preserve its preeminent position in the country which has the highest proportion of industrial workers among its population? To answer such questions was not within the purport of Mr. Reid's book; that he hints at the answers enhances the value of his contribution.

What the reviewer misses is a more penetrating analysis of the various ideological components which entered into the Labor movement at its inception. The history of the movement cannot be simply resolved into the dichotomy of "moderation" and "extremism," or reforming pragmatism versus doctrinairism. In English socialism are found the echoes of the anti-industrialism of some of the Chartists, alongside of what is practically a socialist version of Utilitarianism in the early Fabians. What is most amazing, and to a social scientist most instructive, is how a wide variety of very often discordant ideologies and political impulses have coalesced into a single and effective political party. It is in the character and interaction of the various ideological ingredients of English socialism, rather than in a temporary though often symptomatic disagreement over a personality or a policy, that lies the main key to the future of Labor.—ADAM B. ULAM, Harvard University.

The Philippine Answer to Communism. BY ALVIN H. SCAFF. (Stanford, Cal.: Stanford University Press. 1955. Pp. ix, 165. $4.00.)

In this book Professor Scaff presents a clear and readable explanation of the origin, development, and magnitude of the Hukbalahap revolution in the Philippines. He also gives a vivid description of an important part of the program which has been evolved by the Philippine Government to cope with the situation.

In tracing the development of the Huk movement, Professor Scaff provides information which makes possible a better understanding of occurrences and attitudes. He shows, with concrete evidence, that the Huks are not merely harmless agrarian reformers, or not even just the dislocated and disappointed remnants of guerrilla fighting forces which fought the Japanese. It is pointed out, for instance, that during World War II, while the Huks as a guerrilla fighting force killed some 5,000 Japanese, they also liquidated some 25,000 Filipinos who were considered obstructionists to the Communist-inspired and Communist-led Huk movement. The report on the Huk leaders and on their ideas is also revealing.

The book contains a first-hand and well-documented description of that part of President Ramon Magsaysay's program which is designed to cope with the immediate problem of the Huk revolution. Involved in this part of the program is a recognition of the demand of the Huks for "Land for the landless," and the resettlement on public lands of former Huks who were willing to stop fighting. Those Huks who have continued to resist are relentlessly pursued by the army; the resettlement program is carried out in part by the army's Economic Development Corps.

While Professor Scaff has made a real contribution in portraying so well what has probably been the most successful specific approach to the problem of a Communist revolution, it is somewhat disappointing that he did not take a broader view of the whole situation and indicate how the various parts of a much larger program than the one which he described are interrelated. Such an approach would view at least the postwar Huk movement as one of the results of an underdeveloped economy, a semi-feudal economic system, and underdeveloped government services. Relatively little reference is made to these basic problems, and even less to the overall economic development program which is being fostered by the Magsaysay administration. Likewise, little attention has been given to the tremendous impact of the United States Government's foreign assistance program on the economic, social, and political developments which are now in progress in the Philippines. Significant developments are now taking place in specific fields such as agriculture, education, public health and sanitation, public administration, and industry.

Even though the resettlement program of the army's Economic Development Corps, the program the author singles out as the Philippine answer to communism, is the program that is concerned most directly with a large share of the Huk problem, it could nevertheless be pointed out that the success of this program has been dependent to a considerable extent on various parts of the larger program. For example, the Public Administration Division (and contractors in this field) of International Cooperation Administration has provided technical assistance to the Philippine Bureau of Lands on organizational and procedural problems to the extent that the latter agency has been able to increase very materially the number of land patents issued each month. The enlarged activity on the part of the Bureau of Lands was necessary for the success of the resettlement program. Reference could be made to numerous other parts of a large program which is designed to destroy the conditions under which communism grows and to develop the conditions which are conducive to higher standards of living, stable economies, and to democratic and efficient governments. It is recognized, however, that the author was concerned with a particular aspect of the total problem, and we are all indebted to him for a highly informative contribution.—LEO C. RIETHMAYER, University of Colorado.

Dos Estudios sobre la Usucapión en Derecho Administrativo. By EDUARDO GARCÍA DE ENTERRÍA. (Madrid: Instituto de Estudios Políticos. 1955. Pp. 203.)

In these two essays, the author uses an historical approach in explaining the meaning and significance of contemporary doctrines of administrative law in Spain. His particular interest is the question of alienation of the public domain, and he analyzes in detail the origins of the practice of limiting concessions to private citizens for a period not to exceed 99 years. Such a time limit, he shows, is necessary to protect the state against the claim of "immemorial possession," according to which possession for more than 100 years is presumed to be based on legitimate title, even without documentary proof. One of the most interesting points made by the author is that the subjects of the Spanish monarch did not want the latter to sign away income producing parts of his personal realm, since this made necessary levying taxes on their properties. However, the author, active in the affairs of the present-day Spanish Council of State, rejects the pretension of some of the absolute inalienability of the public domain, arguing that such a doctrine is not necessary since by definitive practice the public lands and possessions are not accessible to private parties.—FELIX NIGRO, Central America Public Administration School (San José).

World Commerce and Governments: Trends and Outlook. By W. S. WORTINSKY AND E. S.

WOYTINSKY. (New York: The Twentieth Century Fund. 1955. Pp. lii, 907, $10.00.)

This vast compendium of information is a companion to World Population and Resources, by the same authors. Together they complete a major project "jointly financed by the Rockefeller Foundation, through a grant administered by the Johns Hopkins University, and the [Twentieth Century] Fund." This volume is in three parts, "Trade," "Transportation," and "Governments." The part on governments (pp. 561-861, 879-88) contains much statistical and descriptive material, compactly presented, in six divisions: Nations and Governments (number, size, age of states, types of governments, etc.), Elections and Parliaments, Colonial Empires, Government Expenditures and Revenues, Public Debts, and International Cooperation (international organizations, U. S. foreign aid, European integration).

Bibliographie, livres, brochures, articles de revues concernant la nationalisation, catalogués à la Bibliothèque Centrale du Ministère des Affaires Économiques (Fonds Quetelet) à la date du 1er août 1955. 2e éd. (Bruxelles: 1955. Pp. 56.)

The bibliography of nationalization is arranged alphabetically by countries, includes mainly material since the Second World War in English, French, German, and Dutch, and is apparently based on the very useful monthly list of accessions of that library.—J.B.C.

Commentary on the Constitution of India. BY DURGA DAS BASU. (Calcutta: S. C. Sarkar and Sons, Ltd. 3rd ed. 2 vols. 1955. Pp. lvi, 875. Rs. 15.)

India's lengthy and complex Constitution, already several times amended, insures the frequent appearance of—and need for—volumes of this kind. Here is commentary on every article of the Indian Constitution, frequent comparison with similar articles in other constitutions, reference to Indian legal actions arising under almost every article, reference to comparable legal actions in other countries, and extensive discussion of the first four Constitution Amendment Acts.

Land Tenure Legislation in Uttar Pradesh. BY FRANK J. MOORE AND CONSTANCE A. FREYDIG. (Berkeley, Cal.: University of California. 1955. Pp. iii, 124. $1.00.)

Technical, brief, and very useful monograph by an economist and a political scientist about the policies and problems affecting land reform in one of the major provinces of India.

Unity and Variety in Muslim Civilization. EDITED BY GUSTAVE E. VON GRUNEBaum. (Chicago: The University of Chicago Press. 1955. Pp. xii, 385, $6.00.)

A collection of 16 papers presented at the International Conference of Islamists at Spa, Belgium, in 1953, surveying and evaluating the important relations between the universal Muslim culture pattern and the diverse local traditions of Islamic countries.

The Republic of Indonesia. BY DOROTHY WOODMAN. (New York: Philosophical Library. 1955. Pp. ix, 444. $6.00.)

A general description of the islands, their people and culture; a discussion of the struggle for independence; and a fairly detailed look at the policies and the problems of the Republic since 1950.

The Impact of the West on Government in Thailand. BY WALTER F. VELLA. (Berkeley, Cal.: University of California Press. 1955. Pp. i-vi, 317-410. $1.50.)

A short study of the government of Thailand through 1952, with emphasis on the developments of the last century as a result of Western advisers, Western education, and Western pressures.

Comparative Platforms of Japan's Major Parties. TRANSLATED AND ARRANGED BY CECIL H. UYEHARA, MICHIO AND SHIMAKO ROYAMA, AND SHIJURO OGATA. (Medford, Mass.: The Fletcher School of Law and Diplomacy, Tufts University. 1955. Pp. v, 65.)

By excerpting from recent platforms and official statements the authors present a handy comparison of the positions of the two major Japanese parties (Social Democratic and Liberal Democratic) on a variety of issues, ranging from foreign affairs through domestic problems to intra-party organization and discipline.

Australia: A Social and Political History. EDITED BY GORDON GREENWOOD. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger. 1955. Pp. xii, 445. $7.50.)

Originally projected for the 1951 Jubilee Celebrations, this social and political history by six Australian historians traces the development of that nation from 1788 to 1950.

A useful synthesis, but without striking interpretation.

University Representation in England, 1604-1690. BY MILLICENT BARTON REX. (New York: Barnes and Noble, Inc. 1954. Pp. 408. $7.50.)

The first full-scale effort to deal with this almost unique system of representation, Miss Rex's detailed and scholarly study describes the introduction of the university representatives and follows their history through the 17th century. She treats her subjects as members of Parliament and not merely as representatives of universities and the result is a portrayal of parliamentary life and development under the Stuarts, written from the fresh viewpoint of a special group of MP's. Other volumes are promised to bring the account down to the abandonment of the scheme in 1948.

Questions in the House. The History of a Unique British Institution. BY PATRICK HOWARTH. (London: The Bodley Head. 1956. Pp. 220. 18s.)

Deals with the problem from the first question of which there is record asked in the House of Commons in 1721 to 1881, when questions were regularly made according to prescribed rules and at definite times. The author speaks from the point of view of a number of years spent in the Civil Service.—J.B.C.

The British General Election of 1955. BY D. E. BUTLER. (London: Macmillan and Co. Ltd.; New York: St. Martin's Press. 1955. Pp. 236. $5.00.)

Mr. Butler and his colleagues of Nuffield College, Oxford, have produced a new volume in what has become a regular series on the general elections. This comprehensive and objective study is quite up to the standard set by its predecessors and should be similarly welcomed. The author examines in detail the candidates and their addresses, the national party campaigns, and the role of press and radio in the election. Of special interest are the summaries of the struggle in three selected constituencies, one in London, one in the Lancashire cotton district, and one in the rural south. Finally, there is a comprehensive analysis of the election results which employs the methods worked out in Mr. Butler's earlier study of the electoral system.

Britain and the British People. BY SIR ERNEST BARKER. (London, New York, and Toronto:

Oxford University Press. 1955. Pp. xii, 186. $2.00.)

An enlarged and up-to-date revision of a small volume first issued in 1942. The author describes in brief compass certain important elements of the British social scene: chapters are included on law, government, church, education, social welfare, etc., each delightfully interpreted by England's leading political scientist.

Rural Roads and Local Government. BY THE ROYAL COMMISSION ON AGRICULTURE AND RURAL LIFE. (Regina, Saskatchewan: Queen's Printer. 1955. Pp. xix, 320. $1.00.)

The fourth of a series of reports submitted by the royal commission established in 1952 by the government of Saskatchewan.

The Liberian Year Book, 1956. COMPILED AND EDITED BY HENRY B. COLE. (London: Diplomatic Press and Publishing Co. 1956. Pp. 312.)

For the first time there is readily available in one place rather detailed information about the government of Liberia, with a directory of Liberian diplomatic and consular representation abroad and of foreign diplomatic and consular representation in Liberia. A table of the 1955 election returns is included. There is a section on the presidents of Liberia and the principal events under each. A biographical section of about 100 sketches includes members of Congress and principal officials.—J.B.C.

Sammlung von Gesetzen für den Staats- und Gemeindedienst. 2. erweiterte Auflage. BY THE MINISTERIUM DES INNEREN DER SAAR. (Saarbrücken: Saarländische Verlagsanstalt und Druckerei G.m.b.H. [1955]. Pp. 176.)

The compilation includes the official German text of the Constitution of the Saar, the general law on the administration of the state, the laws governing the organization of the Gemeinde and Kreise, their fiscal relationships to the state, and the operations of business activities.—J.B.C.

Führer durch das Saarländische Recht, 1945-1955, nach dem Stande vom 30.6.1955, mit Gesetzesregister. BY ALEXANDER BENDER. (Saarbrücken: Gesellschaft für berufsbildendes Schrifttum m.b.H. 1 vol., loose-leaf. [1955].)

In a jurisdiction such as the Saar, it is often extremely difficult to know what laws, decrees, and regulations are in force. This work, prepared by a librarian at the Landgericht, Saarbrücken, attempts to remedy this deficiency by indexing the provisions as printed in the Amtsblatt des Saarlandes and in the loose-leaf form, keeping it up to date by quarterly supplements. The position of the Saar in Europe makes it rather important that this information be readily available.—J.B.C.

Nationalratswahlen. Élections au Conseil National 1951. (Bern: Eidgenössisches Statistisches Amt. Beiträge zur schweizerischen Statistik, Heft 28. 1954. Pp. 170.)

This work continues the reports on the results of the proportional elections that have been published in Switzerland since 1919. The text is given in both German and French.—J.B.C.

La Procédure Parlementaire en Europe: Étude Comparée. BY LORD CAMPION AND D. W. S. LIDDERDALE. (Paris: Librairie Armand Colin. 1955. Pp. xix, 247.)

A translation of a useful volume, first published in English in 1953.

African Crossroads. BY SIR CHARLES DUNDAS. (London: Macmillan & Co., Ltd.; New York: St. Martin's Press. 1955. Pp. x, 243. $4.00.)

The memoirs of a successful career officer of the British Colonial Service, comprising the record of 40 years' experience in the Service, largely in East Africa.

Korea Tomorrow: Land of the Morning Calm. BY KYUNG CHO CHUNG. (New York:

The Macmillan Co. 1956. Pp. xxv, 384. $5.95.)

This is also Korea yesterday and today; a solid and comprehensive volume summarizing the nation's history, touching geographical and cultural factors, analyzing the economy, and reviewing the political evolution of the 20th century. The author is a young Korean, educated in Japan and the United States, and now teaching at the Army Language School.

History and Theories of Working-Class Movements: A Select Bibliography. COMPILED BY CHARLES A. GULICK, ROY A. OCKERT, AND RAYMOND J. WALLACE. (Berkeley, California: University of California. 1955. Pp. xix, 364. $4.50.)

All select bibliographies are open to criticism on grounds of restriction of coverage. The compilers of this bibliography explicitly limit their work to periodical material in the English language. A further restriction not specified is use of only major publications, material which is most likely to be found in other guides and bibliographies. No annotations are given, though articles of major importance are marked with a star. A suggestion of subject matter is found in the divisions of material under ten geographical areas and "International." Articles under Great Britain, France, Germany, and Russia are subdivided by subject matter as are those under "International." Of the total, 143 pages are devoted to the United Kingdom.

SELECTED ARTICLES AND DOCUMENTS ON FOREIGN AND COMPARATIVE GOVERNMENT

WILLIAM H. ROBERTS
Catholic University of America

General

Cohen, W. J. Social Security Programs Throughout the World, January 1955. Bulletin of the International Social Security Association. September-October, 1955.

Les Élections dans le Monde. Symposium. Revue Française de Science Politique. October-December, 1955.

Geiger, K. Changing Political Attitudes in Totalitarian Society. World Politics. January, 1956.

Hamson, C. J. The Law: its Study and Comparison. Cambridge, University Press, 1955.

———. The Istanbul Conference of 1955. International and Comparative Law Quarterly. January, 1956.

Horvath, B. Rights of Man—Due Process of Law and Exercès de Pouvoir. American Journal of Comparative Law. Autumn, 1955.

The International Institute of Administrative Sciences Round Table at Oxford. Public Administration. Winter, 1955.

Jiménez de Parga, M. La Teoría y la Realidad Constitucional Contemporáneas. Revista de Estudios Políticos. September-October, 1955.

Die Kleinbauernfrage in Europa. Agrar- politische Rundschau. September–October, 1955.

Lambert, J. L'Histoire Constitutionnelle des États-Unis et le Droit Comparé. Revue Internationale d'Histoire Politique et Constitutionnelle. January–March, 1955.

Mackenzie, W. J. M. Pressure Groups: The "Conceptual Framework." Political Studies. October, 1955.

Mallart, J. La Organización Científica de la Administración Pública. Revista de Estudios Políticos. September–October, 1955.

Merle, M. Le Troisième Congrès de l'Association Internationale de Science Politique. Revue du Droit Public et de la Science Politique. October–December, 1955.

Merikovsky, V. Some Tendencies in the Development of Legal Control in the Administrative Field. Revue Internationale des Sciences Administratives. No. 2, 1955.

Moulin, L. The Organisation of Local and Provincial Government in the Jesuit Constitutions. Revue Internationale des Sciences Administratives. No. 3, 1955.

Ries, J. Dissolution—Sanction et Mort du Parlement. Revue Socialiste. May–June, 1955.

Specific Areas

United Kingdom

Bailey, S. A. Training the Technician in Administrative Practices. Public Administration. Winter, 1955.

Bergmann, G. Die Zahlungsbilanz Grossbritanniens und des Sterlingblocks als Problem der Britischen Wirtschaftsentwicklung. Europa Archiv. December 20, 1955.

Birch, A. H. Partis Politiques et Classes Sociales en Angleterre. Revue Française de Science Politique. October–December, 1955.

Catlan, G. Considerations of the British Constitution. Political Science Quarterly. December, 1955.

Chester, D. N. The Development of the Cabinet. Parliamentary Affairs. Winter, 1955–56.

Conservatism and the Future. Round Table. December, 1955.

de Smith, S. A. Statutory Restriction of Judicial Review. Modern Law Review. November, 1955.

Education in 1954. London, H.M.S.O., 1955 (Cmd. 9521).

Eveshead, Lord. Government under Law in Post-war England. Law Quarterly Review. January, 1956.

Gerald, J. E. The British Press under

Government Economic Controls. Journalism Quarterly. Fall, 1955.

Great Britain. British Information Services. Reference Division. The British Parliament. London, 1955.

Harrison, W. The British Constitution in 1954. Parliamentary Affairs. Summer, 1955.

Holtsoff, A. A Visit to the London Courts: the Administration of Justice in England. American Bar Association Journal. January, 1956.

Humphreys-Davies, B. Internal Administrative Services in the Air Ministry. Public Administration. Winter, 1955.

Jackson, R. M. Judicial Review of Legislative Policy. Modern Law Review. November, 1955.

Jenkins, R. Party Discipline in the House of Commons. Listener. January 26, 1956.

Johnson, A. Some Guides to Understanding the British Social Services. Social Service Review. December, 1955.

Kent, H. R. United Kingdom Income Tax and Social Security Laws. Taxes. February, 1956.

McFaydean, A. The Economic Situation and Prospects. Contemporary Review, February, 1956.

Mitrany, D. Parliamentary Democracy and Poll Democracy. Parliamentary Affairs. Winter, 1955–56.

Plowman, D. E. G. Allegiance to Political Parties. Political Studies. October, 1955.

Robinson, K. Selection and the Social Background of the Administrative Class. Public Administration. Winter, 1955.

Schwartz, B. Forms of Review Action in English Administrative Law. Columbia Law Review. February, 1956.

Strong, C. F. Teaching about Parliamentary Democracy in English Schools. Parliamentary Affairs. Winter, 1955–56.

Trade Union Problems. Symposium. Political Quarterly. January–March, 1956.

Trade Unionism Today. Round Table. December, 1955.

Wade, H. W. R. Are Public Enquiries a Farce? Public Administration. Winter, 1955.

Webbe, H. The General Election and After. Quarterly Review. January, 1956.

Colonial Areas

African Independence and After. Round Table. December, 1955.

Allen, F. G. Procedure in Colonial Legislative Councils. Parliamentary Affairs. Summer, 1955.

Birmingham, W. B. A Pre-election Survey in a Semi-literate Society. Public Opinion Quarterly. Summer, 1955.

British Caribbean. New Commonwealth. November 14, 1955.

Butterworth, E. G. Economic Self-rule in the Gold Coast. New Commonwealth. January 9, 1956.

The Colonial Territories, 1954-55. London, H.M.S.O., 1955 (Cmd. 9489).

East Africa Royal Commission, 1953-55 Report. London, H.M.S.O., 1955 (Cmd. 9475).

Howes, H. W. Fundamental Literacy and Community Education in the West Indies. Paris, UNESCO, 1955.

Members for Malta. Economist. December 24, 1955.

Mercer, T. M. K. Gold Coast Development Programme. African Affairs. January, 1956.

Mission from Malaya. Economist. January 14, 1956.

Sharda, D. K. Racial Partnership in East Africa. India Quarterly. October-December, 1955.

Waterfield, G. Trouble in the Horn of Africa? The British Somali Case. International Affairs. January, 1956.

Commonwealth of Nations

Arora, S. K. The Reorganization of the Indian States. Far Eastern Survey. February, 1956.

Australia. Atlantic Monthly, December, 1955.

Australia: the Rift in the Labour Party. Round Table. December, 1955.

Braden, G. D. Constitutional Law in India (I). Connecticut Bar Journal. December, 1955.

Brimmer, A. F. The Setting of Entrepreneurship in India. Quarterly Journal of Economics. November, 1955.

Campbell, P. Politicians, Public Servants and the People in New Zealand. Political Studies. October, 1955.

Canada: Federalism and Finance. Round Table, December, 1955.

Ceylon. British Survey. July, 1955.

Choudhury, G. W. Constitution-making Dilemmas in Pakistan. Western Political Quarterly. December, 1955.

Cowen, Z. Diversity Jurisdiction: The Australian Experience. Utah Law Review. Fall, 1955.

Davis, R. The "Federal Principle" Reconsidered (I). Australian Journal of Politics and History. November, 1955.

Douglas, W. O. The Bill of Rights, Due Process, and Federalism in India. Minnesota Law Review. December, 1955.

Graham, W. R. Can the Conservatives Come Back? Queen's Quarterly. Winter, 1956.

Green, L. P. Local Government Reform in South Africa. Public Administration. Winter, 1955.

Hopkins, E. R. The New Reforms in Canadian Parliamentary Practice. Current Affairs. January, 1956.

Mann, N. Atlantic Provinces Economic Council. Dalhousie Review. Winter, 1956.

Mansergh, N. The Commonwealth: Problems of Multi-racial Membership. Political Studies. October, 1955.

Menzies, A. W. Recruiting for Executive Work. New Zealand Journal of Public Administration. September, 1955.

Merrifield, L. S. Wage Determination under Compulsory Arbitration: the Basic Wage in Australia. George Washington Law Review. December, 1955.

Neuner, J. Wo Steht die Kirche in Indien? Stimmen der Zeit. November, 1955.

L'Organisation Économique du Commonwealth Britannique. Bulletin du Conseil National du Patronat Français. June, 1955.

Polaschek, R. J. Administration of the Internal Affairs Department. New Zealand Journal of Public Administration. March, 1955.

Report on India. Symposium. Current History. February, 1956.

Richmond, A. H. The Significance of a Multi-racial Commonwealth. Phylon. Fourth Quarter, 1955.

Roddick, P. M. Canadian Immigration; Policy and Practice. Queen's Quarterly. Winter, 1956.

Ross, L. The Crisis of Australian Labor. Foreign Affairs. January, 1956.

Ryan, B. The Agricultural Systems of Ceylon. Rural Sociology. March, 1955.

Schwartz, M. The Wavering Line of Indian Communism. Political Science Quarterly. December, 1955.

In Search of a Constitution: Intractable Problems in Pakistan. Round Table. December, 1955.

Les Services de l'Emploi et de la Formation Professionnelle dans l'Inde. Revue Internationale du Travail. April, 1955.

Shea, T. J., Jr. Implementing Land Reform in India. Far Eastern Survey. January, 1956.

Skeoch, L. H. The Combines Investigation

Act. Canadian Journal of Economics and Political Science. February, 1956.

Spann, R. N. Political Science in Australia. Australian Journal of Politics and History. November, 1955.

Spano, V. Il Partito Comunista Indiano. Rinascita. May, 1955.

Stevenson, J. A. Canadian Political Situation. Quarterly Review. January, 1956.

Thorner, D. The Pattern of Railway Development in India. Far Eastern Quarterly. February, 1955.

Western Europe

Bachelet, V. The Administrative Organisation of the Holy See and of Vatican City. Revue Internationale des Sciences Administratives. No. 2, 1955.

Bellini, F. The Italian CP. Problems of Communism. January-February, 1956.

Berlia, G. De la Présidence de la République. Revue du Droit Public et de la Science Politique. October-December, 1955.

Campbell, P. The French Civil Service. New Zealand Journal of Public Administration. September, 1955.

Carey, J. P. C. The South of Italy and the Cassa per il Mezzogiorno. Western Political Quarterly. December, 1955.

Charlick, C. Civil Service in Switzerland: Conflict and Adjustment. Public Personnel Review. July, 1955.

Charpentier, J. Un Échec du Capitalisme d'État: la SOFIRAD. Revue du Droit Public et de la Science Politique. October-December, 1955.

Chenot, B. Les Paradoxes de l'Entreprise Publique. Revue Française de Science Politique. October-December, 1955.

Chubb, B. Cabinet Government in Ireland. Political Studies. October, 1955.

The Constitution of Sweden. Stockholm, Royal Ministry for Foreign Affairs, 1955.

"Credito Mobiliare" in Italy. Banco di Roma, Review of the Economic Conditions in Italy. September, 1955.

de la Morandière, L. J. Preliminary Report of the Civil Code Reform Commission of France. Louisiana Law Review. December, 1955.

Dorey, H. La Situation des Fonctionnaires. Le Déclassement de la Fonction Publique et ses Conséquences. Revue Politique des Idées et des Institutions. May, 1955.

Enquête sur le Régime Électoral des Députés. Revue Politique des Idées et des Institutions. June, 1955.

France in the Economic Race. Symposium. Economist. January 14, 1956.

Frei, O. Italy's Democrazia Christiana in Trouble. Swiss Review of World Affairs. February, 1956.

Glynn, R. B. L'Affaire Rosenberg in France. Political Science Quarterly. December, 1955.

Gordon-Ordas, F. Espagne 1955. Revue Socialiste. April, May, June, 1955.

Groshens, J. C. Les Secrétaires d'État de la Quatrième République. Revue du Droit Public et de la Science Politique. April-June, 1955.

Halperin, E. Italy's Christian Democrats and their Land Reform. Swiss Review of World Affairs. June, 1955.

Houin, R. Reform of the French Civil Code and the Code of Commerce. American Journal of Comparative Law, Autumn, 1955.

Ireland: Creeping Paralysis. Round Table. December, 1955.

Jeanneau, B. Les Élections Législatives Partielles sous la Quatrième République. Revue du Droit Public et de la Science Politique. October-December, 1955.

Jordana de Pozas, L. Administrative Science in Spanish- and Portuguese-Speaking Countries in 1954. Revue Internationale des Sciences Administratives. No. 3, 1955.

Lipsedge, M. S. The Poujade Movement. Contemporary Review. February, 1956.

Mathiot, A. L'Instabilité Ministeriale in Francia. Politico. No. 3, 1955.

Mendras, H. Les Organisations Agricoles et la Politique. Revue Française de Science Politique. October-December, 1955.

Middleton, W. I. The French Political Outlook. Contemporary Review. January, 1956.

Myers, A. R. Parliaments in Europe (I). Parliamentary Affairs. Winter, 1955-56.

Nissen, B. A. Les Partis Politiques en Norvège. Synthèses. October-November, 1955.

Phillip, D. Public Administration in Sweden and its Relations with Social Administration. Revue Internationale des Sciences Administratives. No. 2, 1955.

Piscione, P. Verso l'Attuazione del Decentramento Amministrativo. Rivista Trimestrale di Diritto Pubblico. July-September, 1955.

La Recherche Appliquée en France. Notes et Études Documentaires. July 13, 1955.

La Réforme Électorale va Devenir un Problème Essentiel dans la Vie Politique. Bilans Hebdomadaires. July 7, 1955.

Rémond, R. À Propos de la Gauche. Revue Française de Science Politique. October-December, 1955.

Scoppola, P. Le Parti Catholique. Espit. September-October, 1955.

Shoup, C. S. Taxation in France. National Tax Journal. December, 1955.

Smogorzewski, K. M. French Elections Past and Present. Contemporary Review. February, 1956.

Steiner, E. The Acquisition and the Loss of Swiss Nationality. Revue Internationale des Sciences Administratives. No. 2, 1955.

Stoetzel, J. Voting Behavior in France. British Journal of Sociology. June, 1955.

Temmerman, J. Les Questions Parlementaires en Belgique. Annales de Droit et des Sciences Politiques. No. 2, 1955.

Vandenvries, J. On O & M Services in Public Administration Agencies. Revue Internationale des Sciences Administratives. No. 2, 1955.

Van Poelje, S. O. The Concept of Codification of Administrative Law in the Netherlands. Revue Internationale des Sciences Administratives. No. 3, 1955.

Vasseur, M. French Monetary Depreciation and Methods Used to Remedy it. Tulane Law Review. December, 1955.

Winter, H. Die Kartellgesetzgebung der Europäischen Länder. Wirtschaftsdienst. October, 1955.

Central Europe

Almond, G. The Political Attitudes of German Business. World Politics. January, 1956.

Brewer, C. The General Staff of the German Army: a Lesson in Military Organization. United States Naval Institute Proceedings. February, 1956.

Brill, H. L. Rechtsfragen der Wiedervereinigung. Gewerkschaftliche Monatshefte. October, 1955.

Buchheim, H. Die Chiffren des "Dritten Reiches." Wort und Wahrheit. October, 1955.

Dietze, G. Unconstitutional Constitutional Norms? Constitutional Development in Post-war Germany. Virginia Law Review. January, 1956.

Ermacora, F. Über die Schlagkraft des "Naturrechtlichen Gedankengutes" im Bonner Grundgesetz. Österreichische Zeitschrift für Öffentliches Recht. March, 1955.

Fingerle, A. Die Staatsbürgerliche Bildungspflicht. Politische Studien. February, 1956.

Gasteyger, C. Die 25. te Tagung des Zentralkomitees der Sozialistischen Einheitspartei. Europa Archiv. December 5/20, 1955.

Grözinger, W. Politische Führerziehung. Politische Studien. February, 1956.

Krone, H. La Politique de Bonn. Revue Politique. October 31, 1955.

Luchsinger, F. West Germany: the Reunification Controversy. Swiss Review of World Affairs. July, 1955.

Müller, K. Der Loccum Evangelische Kirchenvertrag als Spiegel der Staatskirchenrechtlichen Lage in der Bundesrepublik. Öffentliche Verwaltung. July 20, 1955.

Roth, S. Nouvelle Sociologie Industrielle en Allemagne. Documents, Revue Mensuelle des Questions Allemandes. June-July, 1955.

La Situation Religieuse en Autriche. Informations Catholiques Internationales. June 15, 1955.

Soldat in Demokratischen Staat. Symposium. Politische Studien. December, 1955.

Von Aubel, P. Kommunalpolitik im Heutigen Deutschland. StädteTag. June, 1955.

Von der Heydte, F. La Situation Juridique de la République Fédérale d'Allemagne. Politique Étrangère. August-September, 1955.

Zuckermann, S. B. Education in Germany Today; an American Appraisal. Progressive Education. November, 1955.

Soviet Union and Eastern Europe

A. S. La Nationalité en U.R.S.S. Revue de Droit International (Sotille-Genève). October-December, 1955.

Bergson, A. The Russian Economy since Stalin. Foreign Affairs. January, 1956.

Berman, H. J. The Law of the Soviet State. Soviet Studies. January, 1956.

Biscaretti di Ruffia, P. Recenti Studi sull' Ordinamento Giuridico-Costituzionale Sovietico. (Review Article.) Politico. No. 3, 1955.

Buchholz, A. Atomforschung in der Sowjetunion. Osteuropa. December, 1955.

Caesar, A. A. L. Or the Economic Organization of Eastern Europe. Geographical Journal. December, 1955.

Dziewanowski, M. K. Poland, 1950-1954. Journal of Central European Affairs. January, 1956.

Hudson, G. F. The Zig and the Zag. Twentieth Century. December, 1955.

Lowman, E. S. Soviet Secondary Education Designed to Achieve Future Scientific Supremacy. Higher Education. December, 1955.

Luckenbach, E. F., Jr. The Permanent Crisis of Soviet Communism. United States Naval Institute Proceedings. January, 1956.

Lunin, A. The Lower Echelons of the Soviet Militia. Bulletin of the Institute for the Study of the USSR. November, 1955.

Maurach, R. Sowjetrecht und Klassenbildung. Osteuropa. December, 1955.

Monskhely, M. U.R.S.S. La Notion Soviétique de Constitution. Revue du Droit Public et de la Science Politique. October-December, 1955.

Proshin, K. Inventions in the USSR. Munich, Institute for the Study of the USSR, 1956.

Russia on the Sixth Lap. Economist. January 21, 1956.

Russia since Stalin: Old Trends and New Problems. Annals. January, 1956.

Seton-Watson, H. Soviet Nationality Policy. Russian Review. January, 1956.

Shaffer, H. B. Religion Behind the Iron Curtain. Washington, Editorial Research Reports, 1955.

The Soviet Union since Stalin. Current History. January, 1956.

Stillman, E. O. Bulgaria: a Study in Satellite Non-Conformity. Problems of Communism. November-December, 1955.

Taubinger, L. M. Krisenerscheinungen im Kommunistischen Erziehungssystem. Europäische Osten. September, 1955.

USSR since Stalin. Problems of Communism. January-February, 1956.

Von Laue, T. H. Legal Marxism and the "Fate of Capitalism in Russia." Review of Politics. January, 1956.

Vouras, P. P. The Soviet Iron and Steel Industry. Social Studies. November, 1955.

Widmayer, R. Recent Developments in Soviet Education. School Review. November, 1955.

Wiles, P. The Economic Race with Communism. Economic Digest. December, 1955.

Middle East and Africa

Akzin, B. The Role of Parties in Israeli Democracy. Journal of Politics. November, 1955.

Anderson, J. N. D. Law Reform in the Middle East. International Affairs. January, 1956.

Arab Public Administration Conference—Cairo, 1955. Beirut, Kashaf Press, 1955.

Colombe, M. La Turquie et l'Islam. Revue Française de Science Politique. October-December, 1955.

Eisenstadt, S. N. Israël: État des Travaux. Revue Française de Science Politique. October-December, 1955.

El Sabban, C. The Aswan High Dam. Middle Eastern Affairs. December, 1955.

Franck, P. G. Economic Progress in an Encircled Land. Middle East Journal. Winter, 1956.

Grunwald, K. Le Budget de Développement d'Israël. Revue de Science et de Législation Financières. July-September, 1955.

Hanson, A. H. Democracy Transplanted: Reflections on a Turkish Election. Parliamentary Affairs. Winter, 1955-56.

Harris, C. P. Egyptian Nationalism and the Revolution of 1952. World Affairs Quarterly. January, 1956.

Howe, M. The Birth of the Moroccan Nation. Middle East Journal. Winter, 1956.

Issawi, C. Economic and Social Foundations of Democracy in the Middle East. International Affairs. January, 1956.

Julien, C-A. Morocco: the End of an Era. Foreign Affairs. January, 1956.

Kingdom of Sa'udi Arabia. Al-Ahram. June, 1955.

Les Lignes de Force du Maroc Moderne. Politique Étrangère. August-September, 1955.

Luchaire, F. La Justice en Tunisie. Revue Juridique et Politique de l'Union Française. April-June, 1955.

Mattews, A. T. J. Emergent Turkish Administrators. Ankara, Institute of Administrative Sciences—University of Ankara, 1955.

Mitchell, H. The Development of Nationalism in French Morocco. Phylon. Fourth Quarter, 1955.

Onar, S. S. Important Legislative Movements in the Turkish Republic in 1954. Revue Internationale des Sciences Administratives. No. 2, 1955.

Les Partis en Israël. Articles et Documents. June 16/30, 1955.

Padmore, G. Comparative Patterns of Colonial Development in Africa: the Portuguese System. United Asia. March, 1955.

Philipps, A. Legal Factors in Africa. African Affairs. October, 1955.

Problèmes de Population en Afrique. Études et Conjoncture. August, 1955.

Ravoire, P. L. Analyse et Psychanalyse de l'Administration du Maroc. Vie Intellectuelle. August-September, 1955.

La République de Libéria. Notes et Études Documentaires, July 9, 1955.

Turkey. Atlantic Monthly. February, 1956.

Viau, P. Un Syndicalisme Constructif: la Confédération Générale des Travailleurs d'Israël. Économie et Humanisme: Le Diagnostic. March-April, 1955.

Williams, R. W. Trade Unions in Africa. African Affairs. October, 1955.

Worthington, E. B. East Africa and Her Neighbours. Geographical Journal. December, 1955.

Southeast Asia

B. C. Indo-China: the Unfinished Struggle. World Today. January, 1956.

Budiardjo, M. S. The Provisional Parliament of Indonesia. Far Eastern Survey. February, 1956.

Daya, E. La Liberté d'Association et les Relations Professionnelles dans les Pays d'Asie. Revue Internationale du Travail. April/May, 1955.

Mallory, W. H. Chinese Minorities in Southeast Asia. Foreign Affairs. January, 1956.

The Political Parties of Indonesia. Report on Indonesia. January, 1956.

Schiller, O. Das Agrarproblem Asiens und der Kommunismus. Osteuropa. December, 1955.

Pacific and Far East

Armstrong, H. F. Japan at Cross-purposes. Foreign Affairs. January, 1956.

Bonnichon, A. Law in Communist China. Hague, International Commission of Jurists, 1956.

Chen, T. H. Thought Reform in Communist China. Far Eastern Survey. December, 1955.

Dore, R. P. Left and Right in Japan. International Affairs. January, 1956.

Ito, R. Ten Years of Reconstruction and Development. Contemporary Japan. Nos. 10-12, 1955.

Japan under Stress. Economist. January 14, 1956.

Jones, F. P. The Christian Church in Communist China. Far Eastern Survey. December, 1955.

Lewis, J. P. Reconstruction and Development in South Korea. Washington, National Planning Association, 1955.

Murphy, R. China's Transport Problem and Communist Planning. Economic Geography. January, 1956.

Political Tides. Japan Quarterly. October-December, 1955.

Shabad, T. Communist China's Five Year Plan. Far Eastern Survey. December, 1955.

Sinco, V. G. The Authority of the President over Local Officials. Philippine Law Journal. July, 1955.

Ukai, N. The Protection of the State Against

Subversive Activities. Japan Annual of Law and Politics. No. 3, 1955.

Whiting, A. S. Nationality Reforms in Sinkiang. Far Eastern Survey. January, 1956.

Wu, E. Leaders of Twentieth Century China. Stanford, Stanford University Press, 1956.

Latin America

A. S. La Nationalité au Brésil. Revue de Droit International (Sofie-Genève). October-December, 1955.

Alisky, M. The Mass Media in Central America. Journalism Quarterly. Fall, 1955.

Argentina's New Hope. Banker. December, 1955.

Beltran, P. G. Foreign Loans and Politics in Latin America. Foreign Affairs. January, 1956.

Campos, W. E. Racionalização Administrativa do Brasil. Revista do Serviço Público. June, 1955.

de Viana, A. Organization of Central Offices and Coordinating Procedures Required for the Conduct of Economic Development and Technical Assistance Programs. Rio de Janeiro, International Institute of Administrative Sciences, 1955.

Goodrich, C. The Economic Transformation of Bolivia. Ithaca, N. Y. State School of Industrial and Labor Relations—Cornell University, 1955.

Houtart, F. Révolution en Amérique Latine. Revue Nouvelle. June, 1955.

Irizarry y Puente, J. The Nature and Powers of de facto Government in Latin America. Tulane Law Review. December, 1955.

Liniers, F. La Menace Communiste sur l'Amérique du Sud. Écrits de Paris. January, 1956.

Munoz, H. C. Statement of the Laws of Uruguay in Matters Affecting Business. Washington, Pan American Union, 1955.

Perspective of Brazil. Atlantic Monthly. February, 1956.

Rogge, B. A. The Role of Government in Latin American Economic Development. Inter-American Economic Affairs. Winter, 1955.

Rowland, D. Communism in Latin America. South Atlantic Quarterly. January, 1956.

Santos, E. Latin American Realities. Foreign Affairs. January, 1956.

Sternberg, H. G. Agriculture and Industry in Brazil. Geographical Journal. December, 1955.

INTERNATIONAL LAW AND RELATIONS

Charter Review Conference: Ninth Report and Papers Presented to the Commission. (New York: Commission to Study the Organization of Peace. 1955. Pp. 226.)

This volume contains the recommendations of the Commission with respect to the holding of a review conference under the terms of Article 109 of the Charter of the United Nations, and a number of separate papers on topics which might be considered at such a conference. The publication of the Report in August, 1955 was timely, considering that the General Assembly was required by Article 109 of the Charter to place the question of the holding of a review conference on the agenda of its tenth session. The views expressed in the recommendations of the Commission appear in general to have been those of the great majority of the members of the Assembly judging by the action taken on the question. Of course, it is impossible to say what impact the Commission's conclusions had. Rightly, in this reviewer's opinion, the Commission stressed the dangers of the premature holding of a conference, the limited results it might be expected to achieve, and the pressing present need of developing a wide understanding of what the United Nations is, of its role in international relations, of the process by which the United Nations has in the past adapted itself to new conditions, and of the possibilities of such adaptation in the future.

The papers presented are of unequal value to the serious student of international organization. Some deal with fundamental issues in a scholarly and thought-provoking manner, while others are more superficial in their treatment. For example, Quincy Wright's paper on "Domestic Jurisdiction and the Competence of United Nations Organs" is an excellent discussion of this much-discussed question. Louis Sohn's paper on "The Role of the General Assembly and the Problem of Weighted Voting" is a careful analysis, loaded with statistics, on a rather academic question. Catherine Senf's piece, which follows it, is carefully thought out and ingenious. David Cavers has some interesting suggestions for breaking the disarmament deadlock. James N. Hyde gives a clear and concise analysis of "The Development of Procedures for the Peaceful Adjustment of Disputes."

"The Papers are not intended as a comprehensive review of the Charter" (Introduction.)

It is obvious that the emphasis is on the peace and security function and activities of the United Nations. There are no papers dealing explicitly with Charter provisions and U.N. organizational activities in the fields related to economic and social cooperation and non-self-governing territories.—LELAND M. GOODRICH, Columbia University.

The Calvo Clause: A Problem of Inter-American and International Law and Diplomacy. By DONALD R. SHEA. (Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press. 1955. Pp. xv, 323. $5.50.)

In this timely study, Professor Shea has provided a valuable survey of materials related to the problem of the Calvo Clause. But the book is far more than a survey, and its primary claim to attention lies in the fact that the author has undertaken to relate the Calvo issue to problems of international and particularly inter-American politics, questions of international economic relations, and emergent trends in international legal development, as well as to clarify the legal significance of the Calvo Clause as a barrier to the diplomatic protection of aliens.

The author's major thesis is that, by virtue of the arbitral decision in the North American Dredging Company case (1926) and the following of that decision in subsequent cases, the Calvo Clause has acquired a position of limited validity which disproves the contention of most publicists that the clause is legally ineffective and superfluous. The clause is valid in the sense that the individual may effectively contract away his right to invoke the protection of his government; its validity is limited in that a government cannot lose the right to exercise diplomatic protection by the act of a private citizen, and in that it does not pose a legal bar to diplomatic protection in the event of a denial or undue delay of justice.

In the opinion of this reviewer, the effort to prove this thesis is not wholly successful. Professor Shea is clearly correct in the most literal sense: the Dredging case initiated a series of decisions in which the Calvo Clause has been cited as having determinative effect, and thus the clause has, since 1926, been legally effective. But the commission in that case explicitly asserted that the clause did not deprive the claimant of the right to invoke governmental protection if he had exhausted local remedies and justice had been denied or delayed, and it made much of the fact that this procedure had not been followed. What the commission said in effect was that even without the Calvo Clause, there is no right of diplomatic interposition when local remedies have not been exhausted, and even with the clause, there is such a right if those remedies have been exhausted. Insofar as the tribunal took a position generally applicable to cases involving the clause, it simply restated the familiar view that the rule of local remedies is determinative in respect to the admissibility of international claims, and is not modified by the existence of a Calvo Clause.

The crucial feature of the Dredging case was the fact that the parties had formally agreed to waive the local remedies rule. The commission ruled that the Calvo Clause overrode the waiver—that the claimant had a double obligation, under international law and under his contract, to exhaust local remedies, and that the waiver excused him from the first but not the second obligation. Then it found that he had not pushed the matter to the denial of justice stage, and thus that there was no case for governmental interposition on his behalf. It is noteworthy that all the cases cited as following the Dredging precedent have come under claims conventions in which the waiver of local remedies appears. Thus, it would seem that all that can properly be derived from this body of decisional law is the proposition that the Calvo Clause creates exceptions to general waiver clauses. In these terms, the clause is simply an emphatic reiteration of the normal legal rule pertaining to local remedies; the implication is that whenever the clause may be involved in a case unaffected by a waiver, it must be regarded as legally inconsequential—superfluous, in the sense that it is not needed to prevent interposition if there has not been a denial of justice, and futile, in the sense that it is impotent to prevent interposition if there has been a denial of justice. Thus, it seems to this reviewer that the legal significance of the Calvo Clause is more limited, and the views of the debunkers of the clause are more nearly accurate, than the author suggests.—INIS L. CLAUDE, JR., Harvard University.

Yearbook of the United Nations, 1954. PREPARED BY THE UNITED NATIONS SECRETARIAT (New York: Columbia University Press. 1955. Pp. x, 656. $10.50.)

This volume covers the record of the United Nations and the specialized agencies for the calendar year 1954. It differs in important respects from its immediate predecessors in this valuable series. There are substantially fewer pages and the pages are somewhat smaller. This would appear to be the result not so much of less activity to report as of less money to spend. There are some indications that the organizational and political aspects of the Organization's record have been compressed more rigorously than the economic and social. It contains less detailed information and fewer texts of drafts and resolutions than its predecessors. There are documentary notes at the end of each subject discussed which provide references to documents and give the texts of resolutions adopted. This, no doubt, has certain advantages over the earlier practice of including references and texts in the factual accounts. The Yearbook remains an extremely useful and, in fact, indispensable volume for any serious student of international organization.—L.M.G.

Dynamics of International Relations. By ERNST B. HAAS AND ALLEN S. WHITING. (New York, Toronto, and London: McGraw-Hill Book Co., Inc. 1956. Pp. xx, 557. $6.00.)

A new contribution to the growing shelf of textbooks on international politics. The authors go over a good deal of familiar territory in analyzing the power factors, in arguing that power is a means to an end, and in acknowledging that ideals and moral considerations influence policy decisions, and in considering the role of international law and of international organizations. They suggest a new emphasis, however, on the varying nature of the "elite" groups which affect the international relations of any state; such groups include not only officials but those with "private" international interests. The actions of these groups are conditioned by the nature of the political institutions (the United States, Russia, Egypt, and Nazi Germany are studied as illustrations) within which they must work, but in turn the political institutions are responsive to the needs or values of influential elite groups.

Documents on British Foreign Policy, 1919-1939. Third Series, Volume VIII, 1938-39. EDITED BY E. L. WOODWARD AND ROHAN BUTLER. (London: Her Majesty's Stationery Office. Distributed by British Information Services, New York. 1955. Pp. lxxxiv, 560. $9.20.)

Documents on British Foreign Policy, 1919-1939. Third Series, Volume IX, 1939. EDITED BY E. L. WOODWARD AND ROHAN BUTLER. (London: Her Majesty's Stationery Office. Distributed by British Information Services, New York. 1955. Pp. lxxxiii, 539. $9.29.)

Two new issues in the well-edited official series of documents on British foreign relations. These two volumes constitute a single unit dealing with British relations with the Far East (predominantly Japan and China) from August, 1938 to the outbreak of war with Germany in September, 1939.

American Foreign Relations: A Bibliography of Official Sources. BY ELMER FLISCHKE. (College Park, Md.: University of Maryland, Bureau of Government Research. 1955. Pp. viii, 71.)

A brief and exceedingly useful source list, dealing with general U. S. Government publications, congressional sources, State Department and other department releases.

American Agencies Interested in International Affairs. COMPILED BY RUTH SAVORD AND DONALD WASSON. (New York: Council on Foreign Relations. 1955. Pp. vii, 289. $3.00.)

Listing of over 350 non-official agencies concerned in some way with some aspect of international affairs and providing, where available, information about the agency's officers, finance, purpose, and typical publications.

The United States and Asia. BY LAWRENCE H. BATTISTINI. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, 1955. Pp. xii, 370. $5.00.)

A rather brief review of Far Eastern history since 1895, from the viewpoint of the United States' interest and growing concern and responsibility in that area; a handy introductory volume.

The Indian Year Book of International Affairs, 1954. (Madras: University of Madras. 1954. Pp. ix, 454. Rs. 10.)

A collection of essays on a wide variety of topics, most by Indian scholars, arranged under two general headings: "International and Home Affairs," and "International and Comparative Law."

The Pattern of World Conflict. BY G. L. ARNOLD. (New York: The Dial Press. 1955. Pp. vi, 250. $4.00.)

A rather routine look at the contemporary international scene, and one emphasizing the importance of an "Atlantic" view and community during the periods of cold war and/or co-existence; the author is one of the editors of The Twentieth Century.

Verträge der Bundesrepublik Deutschland. Serie A: Multilaterale Verträge Nr 1-11. Band I. BY THE AUSWÄRTIGES AMT. (Bonn, Köln, Berlin: Carl Heymanns Verlag. 1955. Pp. viii, 495.)

Volume 1 of Series A of the official treaty collection for the German Federal Republic includes the German, English, and French texts of the multilateral pacts which have been concluded and made effective to December 31, 1951. In Series B, bilateral treaties, the intent is to reproduce only the text in German. These are to be continued by annual collections. Another series is to contain the treaties of the Deutsches Reich regarded as valid for the Bundesrepublik. A special supplementary volume in loose leaf form is planned to contain information about the conclusion of treaties, their ratification, putting into effect, adherence of other states, etc. It is well to remember that treaties are published currently in Teil II of the Bundesgesetzblatt.—J.B.C.

Staatsverträge, Konventionen, Abkommen zwischen Frankreich und dem Saarland. (Saarbrücken: Saarländische Verlagsanstalt und Druckerei. 1955. Pp. [725]. Das Recht des Saarlandes. T.02.)

The convenient collection of the treaties, conventions, and agreements between France and the Saar has been assembled from the sections as published from time to time in the current unofficial law collection of the Saar, furnished with a table of contents and an index, and accompanied by explanatory speeches delivered in the Saar Landtag. In view of the current political changes in the Saar, these documents represent conditions that may have to be considered rather seriously.—J.B.C.

Ministerstvo Inostrannykh Del SSSR. Sbornik delstvuyushchikh dogovorov, soglacheniy i kovenitsiy, zaklyuchennykh SSSR s inostrannymi gosudarstvami. Vypusk X. (Moskva: Gosudarstvennoe Izdatel'stvo Politicheskoi Literatury. 1955. Pp. [237]. 1 map. Rubles 4.50.)

The tenth and latest volume of the Soviet Union official treaty collection, edited by the Ministry of Foreign Relations, covers the period January 1, 1937-June 21, 1941, and reproduces the texts only in Russian. Vol. 1-2 (p. 371) containing the treaties to January 1, 1925, was published in 1928. Vol. 9 (p. 507), covering the years 1933-36, appeared in 1938. —J.B.C.

Africa in the Modern World. EDITED BY CALVIN W. STILLMAN. (Chicago: The University of Chicago Press. 1955. Pp. x, 341. $6.00.)

A symposium comprising 16 articles by as many men, some of whom are the world's leading students of modern Africa. Based on the 1953 Harris Foundation lectures at Chicago, the volume deals with selected areas south of the Sahara and considers as well certain problems (economic, social, political) common to the whole area. The coverage is necessarily incomplete and the total effect is uneven, but the volume contains some extremely able and useful contributions.

Britain in Western Europe: WEU and the Atlantic Alliance. A REPORT BY A CHATHAM HOUSE STUDY GROUP. (London and New York: Royal Institute of International Affairs. 1956. Pp. xiii, 121. $1.50.)

A well-written, short guide to the various movements for greater European unity, in which the continuing perplexity is Britain's wish to see a stronger Europe which will neither exclude British influence nor require full British membership.

The Asian-African Conference: Bandung, Indonesia, April 1955. BY GEORGE MCTURNAN KAHN. (Ithaca, N. Y.: Cornell University Press. 1956. Pp. vii, 88. $2.00.)

An excellent short essay on the origins and proceedings of this significant regional gathering; several major speeches and reports are appended. The author was an observer at the conference.

The Middle East, Oil and the Great Powers. BY BENJAMIN SHWADRAN. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger. 1955. Pp. xii, 500. $7.00.)

Certainly the exhaustive, final word to date on the politics of Middle Eastern oil from the first effective concession by Persia to William Knox D'Arcy in 1901 through the 1954 production figures. The area is surveyed country-by-country and, while the emphasis is on oil, a good deal of relevant information about internal and external political matters is included. Thirty-nine pages of bibliography.

How Communists Negotiate. BY ADMIRAL C. TURNER JOY. (New York: The Macmillan Company. 1955. Pp. xii, 178. $3.50.)

The senior United Nations delegate at the Korean armistice conference describes those tortuous negotiations with understandable exasperation and evidence of frustration. The admiral, incidentally, is not opposed to negotiation in principle, but is highly critical of the limitations imposed on the military commanders after the Chinese intervention.

Teaching World Affairs in American Schools: A Case Book. EDITED BY SAMUEL EVERETT AND CHRISTIAN O. ARNDT. (New York: Harper & Brothers. 1956. Pp. xv, 270. $4.00.)

A summary of the more interesting and promising methods used to interest students in the United States in world affairs and to include materials on world affairs in curriculums. The survey ranges from elementary through college level, and also includes adult education and community service programs.

SELECTED ARTICLES AND DOCUMENTS ON INTERNATIONAL LAW AND RELATIONS

WILLIAM H. ROBERTS
Catholic University of America

ARTICLES

International Politics and National Policies General

Brebner, J. B. Tradition and Expedience in International Relations. International Affairs. January, 1956.

Campbell, J. C. Negotiation with the Soviets. Foreign Affairs. January, 1956.

Davies, C. Parliamentary Progress Towards World Unity. Parliamentary Affairs. Winter, 1955-56.

Decker, G. Weltpolitische Umschau. Zeitschrift für Geopolitik. January, 1956.

Franklin, G. S., Jr., Atomwaffen und Aussenpolitik. Europa Archiv. December 5/20, 1955.

Hirshleifer, J. Some Thoughts on the Social Structure after a Bombing Disaster. World Politics. January, 1956.

Initiation à l'Idée du "Supranational." Chronique de Politique Étrangère. September, 1955.

King, G. A New Kind of Diplomacy. Quarterly of Film, Radio and Television. Fall, 1955.

McClosky, H. Concerning Strategies for a Science of International Politics. (Review Article). World Politics. January, 1956.

Mathews, W. R. The Age of Continents. United States Naval Institute Proceedings. January, 1956.

Nitzze, P. H. Atoms, Strategy and Policy. Foreign Affairs. January, 1956.

Parkinson, F. From Berlin to Bangkok. Year Book of World Affairs, 1955.

Rossiter, C. The Old Conservatism and the New Diplomacy. Virginia Quarterly Review. Winter, 1956.

Schätzkel, W. Neutralität. Friedens-Warte. No. 1, 1955.

Van Dyke, V. The Teaching of International Politics. Iowa City, State University, 1955.

Military and Functional Questions

Administration of Bilateral Technical Cooperation. Washington, National Planning Association, 1955.

Andrus, J. R. Technical Assistance through Inter-University Contracts. Higher Education. January, 1956.

Brozen, Y. Technological Change, Ideology and Productivity. Political Science Quarterly. December, 1955.

Buzzard, A. W. Massive Retaliation and Graduated Deterrence. World Politics. January, 1956.

Carney, R. B. Principles of Sea Power. Military Review. January, 1956.

Effects of Atomic Radiation—Unanimity on Establishing Scientific Group. United Nations Review. January, 1956.

Genevy, P. Auf der Suche nach einer Abrüstungspolitik. Europa Archiv. December 5/20, 1955.

Haley, A. G. International Cooperation in Rocketry and Astronautics. Jet Propulsion. November, 1955.

Jaroschek, K. Friedliche Nutzbarmachung der Kernenergie. Frankfurter Hefte. September, 1955.

Moutgomery of Alamein, Viscount. Der Globale Krieg der Zukunft. Aussenpolitik. December, 1955.

Le Problème du Désarmement. Chronique de Politique Étrangère. November, 1955.

Rabinowitch, E. International Cooperation of Atomic Scientists. Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists. February, 1956.

The Race for the ICBM. Air Force. February, 1956.

Robinett, P. M. Peripheral Wars. Military Review. March, 1956.

Saundby, R. Problems of Disarmament. Military Review. March, 1956.

Smith, H. A. Modern Weapons and Modern War. Year Book of World Affairs, 1955.

Strategie im Zeichen der Wasserstoffbombe. Zeitschrift für Geopolitik. January, February, 1956.

Von Senger, F. Eine Neue Form der Kriegskunst. Aussenpolitik. January, 1956.

Wanty, E. The World's Strategic Picture. Military Review. March, 1956.

Wilson, E. C. Evaluating Exchange of Persons Programs. Public Opinion Quarterly. Spring, 1955.

United States

Anderson, D. The President and National Security. Atlantic. January, 1956.

Carlston, K. S. Foreign Economic Policy and the Antitrust Laws. Minnesota Law Review. January, 1956.

Cutler, R. The Development of the National Security Council. Foreign Affairs, April, 1956.

Elder, R. E. A Career Service for USIA? Foreign Service Journal. February, 1956.

Farley, M. S. United States Relations with Southeast Asia. New York, American Institute of Pacific Relations, 1955.

Great Decisions: The U. S. Looks Ahead. New York, Foreign Policy Association, 1956 (Headline Series No. 115).

Hessler, W. H. American Foreign Policy. United States Naval Institute Proceedings. January, 1956.

Jäckh, E. The Significance of the Middle East in American Strategy. Military Review. January, 1956.

Johnson, R. C. Recruitment and Training for the Foreign Service of the United States. India Quarterly. October–December, 1955.

A Joint Statement on United States Government Participation in Cultural Exchange Programs. Washington, National Planning Association, 1956.

Kintner, W. R. American Responsibilities in the Nuclear Age. United States Naval Institute Proceedings. March, 1956.

Lacy, D. The Role of American Books Abroad. Foreign Affairs. April, 1956.

Lans, A. B. Illusions of American Foreign Policy. American Scholar. Autumn, 1955.

Lodge, J. Current Aspects of United States-Spanish Relations. Department of State Bulletin. January 9, 1956.

Plischke, E. American Foreign Relations; a Bibliography of Official Sources. College Park, University of Maryland, Bureau of Governmental Research, 1955.

Rubin, S. J. American Diplomacy: The Case for "Amateurism." Yale Review. Spring, 1956.

U. S. International Cooperation Administration. Background for Mutual Security. Washington, 1955.

United Kingdom

Britain in Western Europe: W.E.U. and the Atlantic Alliance. London, Royal Institute of International Affairs, 1956.

Clifford, M. Gateway to the Antarctic. New Commonwealth. November 14, 1955.

Cooks, T. G. B. Control by the Commons of Overseas Expenditure. Parliamentary Affairs. Winter, 1955-56.

Earle, H. E. Britain and Middle East Defence. Australian Outlook. December, 1955.

Euratom and Our Atom. Economist. February 11, 1956.

Gibbs, N. H. The Origins of Imperial Defence. Oxford, Clarendon Press, 1955.

Gwatkin, A. The Foreign Office between the Wars. Contemporary Review. December, 1955.

Le Bas, M. H. The Royal Air Force. Air University Quarterly Review. Summer, 1955.

Schiller, H. Economic Factors in Anti-Americanism in Great Britain since World War II. Social Science. January, 1956.

Slessor, J. Geneva Disarmament and Security—a British View. International Relations. October, 1955.

Strange, S. British Foreign Policy. Year Book of World Affairs, 1955.

Younger, K. The Dyason Lectures. Australian Outlook. December, 1955.

Western Europe

Bloch, C. De Charybde en Scylla ou du Danger Atomique à la Dissociation de l'Union Française. Forces Aériennes Françaises. January, 1956.

Karlström, B. The Missing Link. Air Force. February, 1956.

Omang, R. La Politique Étrangère de la Norvège. Synthèses. October-November, 1955.

Ording, A. Norway in World Affairs. American Scandinavian Review. Summer, 1955.

Central Europe

Borries, K. Die Grossen Mächte und der Deutsche Osten. Aussenpolitik. January, 1956.

Erler, F. The Struggle for German Reunification. Foreign Affairs. April, 1956.

The Four Powers and Germany. The Reunification Issue. World Today. November, 1955.

Kiesinger, K. G. La Politique Étrangère de la République Fédérale en 1955. Politique Étrangère. July, 1955.

Murillo Rubiera, E. El Tratado de Estado Austriaco. Política Internacional. April-June, 1955.

Southern Europe and Mediterranean

Herrero, R. M. Spain and the West. Studies. Winter, 1955.

Loewy, K. Mittelmeer, Atomzeitalter und Geopolitik. Zeitschrift für Geopolitik. August, 1955.

The Place of Yugoslavia in International Politics. British Survey. November, 1955.

Tsoutsos, A. G. La Question Internationale de Chypre. Revue Générale de Droit International Public. July-September, 1955.

Woodhouse, C. M. Cyprus and the Middle Eastern Crisis. International Journal. Winter, 1955-1956.

Soviet Union and Eastern Europe

Bertin, J. Coup d'Oeil sur l'Aviation Soviétique. Forces Aériennes Françaises. December, 1955.

Blazas, H. A Few Aspects of Soviet Colonialism. International Peasant Union Monthly Bulletin. November, 1955.

Bretschger, W. In the Twilight of Peaceful Coexistence. Swiss Review of World Affairs. December, 1955.

Carr, E. H. The Foundations of Soviet Foreign Policy. International Spectator. January 8, 1956.

Fischer, A. J. Die Sowjetunion und Finnland. Internationales Jahrbuch für Politik. No. 2, 1955.

Flandin, P.-E., La Coexistence Pacifique est-elle Possible? Revue des Deux Mondes. June 1, 1955.

Gascoigne, A. Soviet Foreign Policy. Year Book of World Affairs, 1955.

Holubnychy, V. Soviet Economic Aid to China. Bulletin of the Institute for the Study of the USSR. January, 1956.

Katona, P. Soviet Propaganda to the Colonial World. Year Book of World Affairs, 1955.

Kurata, S. Die Sowjetische Politik Gegenüber Japan, 1945-1954. Osteuropa. October, 1955.

Pfeffer, N. Lenin's Strategie in Asien. Dokumente. February, 1956.

Power, T. S. The Soviet Effort for Technological Supremacy. Vital Speeches. February 15, 1956.

"S." Recent Trends in Soviet Foreign Policy: an Indian View. India Quarterly. October-December, 1955.

Trudeau, A. G. The Economic Threat of Soviet Imperialism. Military Review, March, 1956.

L'U.R.S.S. à l'Heure de la Coexistence. Strasbourg, Collège de l'Europe Libre, 1955.

Middle East and Africa

African Problems and U. S. Policy. Transactions of the Commonwealth Club of California. December 26, 1955.

Dallin, D. J. Soviet Policy in the Middle East. Middle Eastern Affairs. November, 1955.

Giniewski, P. La Paix Israélo-Arabe est-elle Possible? Politique Étrangère. July, 1955.

Herly, B. Panislamisme et Occident. Revue des Deux Mondes. June 15, 1955.

Hirsch, A. M. Utilization of International Rivers in the Middle East. American Journal of International Law. January, 1956.

Kaster, H. L. Russlands Einbruch in den Mittleren Osten. Aussenpolitik. January, 1956.

Moore, A. Russia's Activities in Egypt and Middle East. Contemporary Review. December, 1955.

Pipeline versus Tanker. Economist. December 17, 1955.

Rustow, D. A. Defense of the Near East. Foreign Affairs. January, 1956.

Stevens, G. G. The Jordan River Valley. International Conciliation. January, 1956.

Tütsch, H. E. Report from the Middle East (I). Swiss Review of World Affairs. February, 1956.

South and Southeast Asia

B. C. The Waning Power of France in Vietnam. World Today. February, 1956.

Benda, H. J. Communism in Southeast Asia. Yale Review. Spring, 1956.

Évolution de la Politique Étrangère et Intérieure du Pakistan. Chronique de Politique Étrangère. July, 1955.

Giannini, A. La Questione del Kashmir. Oriente Moderno. May, 1955.

Henderson, W. The Development of Regionalism in Southeast Asia. International Organization. November, 1955.

Lévy, R. Die Entwicklung in Indochina seit den Genfer Abkommen vom Juli 1954. Europa Archiv. February 20, 1956.

Rice and Rouble Diplomacy. Economist. January 7, 1956.

Pandit, V. L. India's Foreign Policy. Foreign Affairs. April, 1956.

Salazar, O. Goa and the Indian Union: the Portuguese View. Foreign Affairs. April, 1956.

Far East and Pacific

Coox, A. D. Japanese Attitudes Toward the Soviet Union. World Affairs Quarterly. January, 1956.

Hardie, I. The Importance of the Chinese Railway System. Military Review. January, 1956.

Jaeger, H. Das Verhältnis Peking-Moskau. Deutsche Rundschau. July, 1955.

Maki, J. M. Japan's Rearmament: Progress and Problems. Western Political Quarterly. December, 1955.

Michael, F. The Fall of China. (Review Article). World Politics. January, 1956.

Pratt, J. The Two Chinas. Contemporary Review. December, 1955.

Stone, J. Problems of Australian Foreign Policy, January-June 1955. Australian Journal of Politics and History. November, 1955.

Tanjuakio, R. D. Comments on the U. S.-P. I. Military Bases Agreement. Philippine Law Journal. September, 1955.

Wood, F. L. W. New Zealand and Southeast Asia. Far Eastern Survey. February, 1956.

International Economic Policy and Relations

American Chamber of Commerce in London. The American Antitrust Laws and American Business Abroad. London, 1955.

Armstrong, W. C. Policies of the Department of State on the Disposal of Surplus Agricultural Commodities. Department of State Bulletin. February 20, 1956.

Asia's March Toward Economic Development. United Nations Review. March, 1956.

Awjerino, Z. Das Recht der Aussenhandelsgeschäfte der Sowjetunion. Recht der Internationalen Wirtschaft. October 15, 1955.

Beltrán, P. G. Foreign Loans and Politics in Latin America. Foreign Affairs. January, 1956.

Black, E. R. Challenge of the Underdeveloped Lands. Virginia Quarterly Review. Winter, 1956.

Blondeel, J. L. The Loans of the European Coal and Steel Community. Luxembourg, Communauté Européenne du Charbon et de L'Acier, 1955.

Britain's Trade Competitors. National and English Review. January, 1956.

Bronz, G. An International Trade Organization: the Second Attempt. Harvard Law Review. January, 1956.

Deyrup, F. J. Backward Economies: the Problem of Partial Development. Social Research. Winter, 1955.

Economic Development Abroad and the Role of American Foreign Investment. Washington, Committee for Economic Development, 1956.

The Economic Situation in Asia. Department of State Bulletin. March 5, 1956.

Gatz, W. Europäische Wirtschaftsintegration und Handelspolitik. Weltwirtschaftliches Archiv. No. 1, 1955.

Haberler, G. Economic Consequences of a Divided World. Review of Politics. January, 1956.

Kalijarvi, T. V. A Review of the World Economic Situation. Department of State Bulletin. December 26, 1955.

Küng, E. Zur Problematik des Schweizerischen Kapitalexportes. Aussenwirtschaft. September, 1955.

Melady, T. P. The Economic Phase of our Latin American Relations. Review of Social Economy. September, 1955.

Miller, E. Monetary Policy in a Changing World. Quarterly Journal of Economics. February, 1956.

Mr. Macmillan and Europe. Economist. February 18, 1956.

Nuclear Energy's Importance for Economic Development. United Nations Review. March, 1956.

Review of Tenth Session of Contracting Parties to GATT. Department of State Bulletin. December 19, 1955.

The Role of the United States in International Economic Affairs. Department of State Bulletin. February 13, 1956.

Sanders, K. Die Dollarlücke als Störungsfaktor im Internationalen Handel. Europa Archiv. January 20, 1956.

Stone, W. T. Economic Cold War. Washington, Editorial Research Reports, 1956.

Vernon, R. Die Vereinigten Staaten und die Organisation auf dem Gebiete des Handels (OTC). Europa Archiv. January 20, 1956.

Werner, G. M. Aussenhandelsprobleme des Ostblocks. Osteuropa. December, 1955.

The World Economy in 1956. Round Table. December, 1955.

International Law

Allen, C. G. Revision of German War-Time Judgements under the Bonn-Paris Agreement. International and Comparative Law Quarterly. January, 1956.

Ambion, B. C. Establishment of the Proposed International Criminal Court. Philippine Law Journal. July, 1955.

Aufricht, H. Das Abkommen des Internationalen Währungsfonds und die Unerzwingbarkeit Bestimmter Verträge. Österreichische Zeitschrift für Öffentliches Recht. Nos. 4/5, 1955.

Danier, L. Les Satellites Artificiels. Revue Générale de L'Air. No. 3, 1955.

Eagleton, C. The Use of Waters of International Rivers. Canadian Bar Review. November, 1955.

Farmanfarma, A. The Oil Agreements between Iran and the International Oil Consortium: the Law Controlling. Texas Law Review. December, 1955.

Fitzmaurice, G. G. The Foundations of the Authority of International Law and the Problem of Enforcement. Modern Law Review. January, 1956.

Hammarhjold, D. International Law and the United Nations. Philippine Law Journal. September, 1955.

Hudson, M. O. The Thirty-Fourth Year of the World Court. American Journal of International Law. January, 1956.

Jenks, C. W. International Law and Activities in Space. International and Comparative Law Quarterly. January, 1956.

Meissner, B. Sowjetunion und Haager Landkriegsordnung. Osteuropa-Recht. No. 2, 1955.

Perrin, G. L'Organisation Européenne pour la Recherche Nucléaire. Revue Générale de Droit International Public. April-June, 1955.

Pfeifer, H. Der Österreichische Staatsvertrag. Archiv des Völkerrechts. December, 1955.

Pineus, K. Sources of Maritime Law: a Swedish Point of View. Tulane Law Review. December, 1955.

Sauvy, A. La Colaboración con el Adversario. Revista de Estudios Políticos. September-October, 1955.

Schneider, P. Die Rechtsstellung des Internationalen Roten Kreuzes. Archiv des Völkerrechts. December, 1955.

Szablowski, G. J. Creation and Implementation of Treaties in Canada. Canadian Bar Review. January, 1956.

Territorial Waters and Related Matters. Action Taken by the Third Meeting of the Inter-American Council of Jurists. Mexico City, January 17–February 4, 1956. Department of State Bulletin. February 20, 1956.

Verdross, A. Die Dauernde Neutralität Österreichs und die Organisation der Vereinten Nationen. Juristische Blätter. July, 1955.

Zemanek, K. Die Völkerrechtliche Stellung Formosas. Archiv des Völkerrechts. December, 1955.

International Organization

United Nations and Specialized Agencies

Assembly Calls for Review of Progress in Dependent Areas. United Nations Review. January, 1956.

Barabas, F. Membership and Representation. Journal of International Affairs. May, 1955.

Brown, B. H. Chinese Representation: a Case Study in United Nations Political Affairs. New York, Woodrow Wilson Foundation, 1955.

A Chart for All the Oceans—International Cooperation. United Nations Review. March, 1956.

Deutsches und Ausländisches Schrifttum über die Organisation der Vereinten Nationen. Frankfurt/Main, Institut für Europäische Politik und Wirtschaft, 1955.

E. B. The Tenth Assembly of the United Nations. World Today. February, 1956.

Efforts of the United Nations to Achieve Disarmament. United Nations Review. January, 1956.

Finkelstein, L. S. Somaliland under Italian Administration: a Case Study in United Nations Trusteeship. New York, Woodrow Wilson Foundation, 1955.

Fischer, G. France and the Proposed Revision of the U. N. Charter. India Quarterly. October–December, 1955.

Gregoire, R. National Administration and International Organisations. Paris, UNESCO, 1955.

Guetskow, H. Multiple Loyalties: Theoretical Approach to a Problem in International Organisation. Princeton, Center for Research on World Political Institutions, 1955.

Haas, E. B. Regionalism, Functionalism, and Universal International Organization. World Politics, January, 1956.

Kellogg, E. H. The Seventh General Assembly "Nationalization" Resolution: A Case Study in United Nations Economic Affairs. New York, Woodrow Wilson Foundation, 1955.

Lashly, J. M. Contrasting Approaches to the Employment Rights of the United Nations Staff Members. American Bar Association, Section of International and Comparative Law. Proceedings, August 23, 1955.

Montague, G. H. Limitations on What UN Can Do Successfully; the Proposed UN Program on Restrictive Business Practices. Antitrust Bulletin. December, 1955.

Neal, M. United States Attitudes towards Charter Review. India Quarterly. October–December, 1955.

Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities. United Nations Review. March, 1956.

Reiff, H. The Quest for International Order and Security. Social Studies. November, 1955.

Sohn, L. B. United Nations Charter Review. American Bar Association, Section of International and Comparative Law. Proceedings, August 23, 1955.

United Nations Charter Revision and the Rule of Law. Northwestern University Law Review. January–February, 1956.

Thompson, K. W. The Charter of the United Nations: Realities and Review. American Bar Association, Section of International and Comparative Law. Proceedings, August 23, 1955.

Timberg, S. Restrictive Business Practices as an Appropriate Subject for United Nations Action. Antitrust Bulletin. December, 1955.

Uden, O. The Philosophy of Collective Security. Acta Scandinavica Juris Gentium. Nos. 1/2, 1955.

Von Goeking, J. United Nations Technical Assistance Board: a Case Study in International Administration. New York, Woodrow Wilson Foundation, 1955.

Regional and Collective Security Organizations

Das Abkommen vom 20. Oktober 1955 über die Gründung der Europäischen Gesellschaft für die Finanzierung von Eisenbahnmateriale (EUROFIRMA). Europa Archiv. December 5/20, 1955.

Bergsträsser, A. Frankreich, Deutschland und Europa. Europa Archiv. January 5, 1956.

Bok, D. C. The First Three Years of the Schuman Plan. Princeton, Studies in International Finance, 1955.

Collins, J. L. NATO: Still Vital for Peace. Foreign Affairs. April, 1956.

Colombo Plan Nations Review Economic Progress. Department of State Bulletin. December 12, 1955.

Council of Europe. Consultative Assembly. Focus on East-West Relations. A Policy for Europe. Strasbourg, 1956.

———. Directorate of Information. Balance Sheet of the Work of the Council of Europe (1949-1954). Strasbourg, 1955.

Craig, G. A. NATO and the New German Army. Princeton, Center of International Studies, 1955.

Eppstein, J. Some Features of the Atlantic Alliance. British Survey. August, 1955.

Erven, L. Problèmes du Conseil de l'Europe. Revue de la Politique Internationale. October 1, 1955.

Europäische Zusammenarbeit im Rechtswesen. Tübingen, J. C. B. Mohr, 1955.

The European Coal and Steel Community. Planning. November 21, 1955.

Fenwick, C. G. The Inter-American Regional System. Fifty Years of Progress. American Journal of International Law. January, 1956.

Gentili, R. Struttura e Funzionamento dell'UEO. Revista di Studi Politici Internazionali. July-September, 1955.

Gianturco, M. Il Consiglio di Europa e i Problemi dei Rifugiati e delle Eccedenze di Popolazione. Revista di Politica Economica. July-August, 1955.

Guerrant, E. O. The Council of the Organization of American States. World Affairs Quarterly. January, 1956.

Gumpert, J. Europäische Integration. Schmoller's Jahrbuch. No. 5, 1955.

Howard, K. G. Peace Through Strength: a Look at the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. Department of State Bulletin. March 5, 1956.

Inkrafttreten der Konventionen und Abkommen des Europarats. Europa Archiv. February 5, 1956.

Ismay, Lord. NATO i Primi Cinque Anni: 1949-1954. Relazioni Internazionali. December 10, 1955.

Kordt, E. Der Europäische Beamte. Berichte über die Auswahl und Ausbildung sowie über die Rechtsstellung von Bediensteten bei Europäischen Organisationen. Munich, C. H. Beck, 1955.

Laverne, B. La Petite Europe Pangermaniste et Cléricale. L'Année Politique et Économique. July-September, 1955.

Lenormand, F. Les Forces Armées du Bloc de Varsovie. Écrits de Paris. June, 1955.

McHenry, D. E. Regionalism in the South Pacific. World Affairs Quarterly. January, 1956.

Magnifico, G. C.E.D. e U.E.O. Rivista di Studi Politici Internazionali. April-June, 1955.

Merigot, J. G. Aspects Fiscaux de la Communauté Européenne du Charbon et de l'Acier. Revue de Science et de Législation Financières. October-December, 1955.

Die Militärische Einbeziehung der DDR in den Warschauer Vertrag. Europa Archiv. February 20, 1956.

Mollet, G. The New Drive for European Union. New York, American Committee on United Europe, 1955.

L'Organisation de l'Europe Occidentale. Institutions et Problèmes. Notes et Études Documentaires. July 18-21, 1955.

Ottmann, K. Supranationale Eisenbahn. Internationales Archiv für Verkehrswesen. No. 20, 1955.

Perrin, G. L'Organisation Européenne pour la Recherche Nucléaire. Revue Générale de Droit International Public. April-June, 1955.

Queenin, H. F. The Military Implications of SEATO. Military Review. January, 1956.

Radovanovitch, L. L'Assemblée Consultative Balkanique. Questions Actuelles du Socialisme. March-April, 1955.

Rivers-Macpherson, E. R. What Canada is doing in N.A.T.O. Forces Magazine. December, 1955.

Die Schaffung eines Gemeinsamen Europäischen Marktes. Außenwirtschaft. December, 1955.

Schopen, E. Rechristianisierung Europas. Außenpolitik. December, 1955.

Shanks, M. The Coal-Steel Experiment. Banker. November, 1955.

Spierenburg, D. P. The European Steel and Coal Community. Luxembourg, European Steel and Coal Community 1955.

University of Maryland Bureau of Business and Economic Research. The European Coal and Steel Community. College Park, 1955.

Vendovato, G. Relaciones Europa-Africa. Revista de Estudios Políticos. September-October, 1955.

Wingenroth, C. G. Erüchiger Balkan-Pakt. Zeitschrift für Geopolitik. February, 1956.

Wolff, S. Towards the Economic Integration of Europe. Swiss Review of World Affairs. January, 1956.

Wyndham, E. H. The Military Situation in Europe. Army Quarterly. January, 1956.

DOCUMENTS

General and Miscellaneous

European Coal and Steel Community. Rapport sur l'Application du Traité Instituant la Communauté Européenne du Charbon et de L'Acier Pendant la Période du Novembre 1954 au Avril 1955. Luxembourg, 1955.

GATT. Review Working Party II on Tariffs, Schedules and Customs Administration. Report to the Contracting Parties. Geneva, 1955. (Doc. L/329).

Great Britain. Documents Relating to the Discussion of Korea and Indo-China at the Geneva Conference April 27-July 21, 1954. London, H.M.S.O., 1955 (Cmd. 9186, 9239).

ILO. Development of the Peaceful Use of Atomic Energy. Geneva, 1955. (Doc. G. B. 130/I.O./D.1/1).

International Bank for Reconstruction and Development. Malaya. Report of a Mission Organized by the . . . at the Request of the Government of Malaya, the Crown Colony of Singapore and the U. K. Baltimore, Johns Hopkins Press, 1955.

International Monetary Fund. Summary Proceedings of the 10th Annual Meeting of the Board of Governors. Washington, 1955.

Western European Union. Charter and Rules of Procedure of the Assembly of Western European Union. Strasbourg, 1955.

———. The Assembly of Western European Union, 1st Session—July, 1955. Strasbourg, 1955.

United Nations

All entries under this heading bear the imprint of the United Nations (New York), 1955, unless a different place or date is shown.

Disarmament Commission. Verbatim Records of . . . February 25–October 7, 1955. (Doc. DC/SC.1/PV.22-PV. 68).

———. Second Report of the Subcommittee of the Disarmament Commission. (Doc. DC/71; October 7, 1955).

ECOSOC. Measures for the Cessation of National, Racial or Religious Hostility. Report by the Secretary General. (Doc. E/Cn. 4/Sub.2/172; November 9, 1955).

———. ECLA. A Study of Inter-Latin American Trade. (Doc. E/Cn.12/369; July 29, 1955).

———. Report of the Sixth Session—October, 1955. (Doc. E/Cn.12/387).

———. Economic Survey of Latin America 1954. (Doc. E/Cn.12/362/Rev. 1).

———. ECAFE. Economic Development and Planning in Asia and the Far East—Problems and Techniques. Bangkok, 1955. (Doc. E/Cn.11/412).

———. TAC. Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance. Programme for 1956. (Doc. E/TAC/L.88; November 16, 1955).

———. Technical Assistance Activities under the Expanded Programme. Status Report as at 30 September 1955. (Doc. E/TAC/REP/56; November 28, 1955).

———. Report of TAC. (Doc. E/2810; December 12, 1955).

———. UNICEF. Report of the Executive Board. (Doc. E/ICEF/306; October 28, 1955).

ICJ. Yearbook 1954–1955. The Hague, 1955. (Sales No. 136).

International Law Commission. Summary Records of the Seventh Session of the . . . June 7 . . . July 8, 1955. (Doc. A/CN.4/SR. 306–SR. 330).

Secretariat. Repertory of Practice of United Nations Organs, Vol. IV. Art. 73–91 of the Charter. October, 1955.

United States

Unless otherwise indicated, all entries under this heading bear the imprint: "Washington: Government Printing Office."

Congress

House. Committee on Foreign Affairs. Report of the Study Mission to Europe of . . . 84th Cong., 2nd sess. H. Rep. 1683.

———. United States Contributions to International Organizations. Letter from the Secretary of State. 84th Cong., 2nd sess. H. Doc. 337.

———. Committee on Government Operations. Administration of Overseas Personnel. Pt. 1. Management Survey of the Department of State; Pt. 2. White House Task Force; Pt. 3. Wriston Committee Program; Pt. 4. Foreign Service Promotions under the Wriston Program. Hearings before Subcommittee. June 6 . . . December 15, 1955. 84th Cong., 1st sess.

———. Foreign Service Promotions under the Wriston Program. 9th Intermediate Report of the . . . 84th Cong., 2nd sess. H. Rep. 1663.

Senate. Committee on Armed Services. Operation of Article VII NATO Status of Forces Treaty. Hearing before Subcommittee. March 12, 1956. 84th Cong., 2nd sess.

———. Committee on Foreign Relations. Relating to the Calling of an Atlantic Exploratory Convention. Hearings. July 25 and 29, 1955. 84th Cong., 1st sess.

———. Situation in the Middle East. Hearing. February 24, 1956. 84th Cong., 2nd sess.

———. Technical Assistance in the Far East, South Asia, and Middle East. Report of Senator Theodore Francis Green on a Study Mission. 84th Cong., 2nd sess.

———. Subcommittee on Disarmament. The Executive Branch and Disarmament Policy. Staff Study No. 1. 84th Cong., 2nd sess.

———. Control and Reduction of Armaments. Hearings. Pt. 1. January 25, 1956. 84th Cong., 2nd sess.

———. Subcommittee on Technical Assistance Programs. Summary of Reports of American Citizens Abroad on Technical Assistance Programs. Staff Study No. 4. 84th Cong., 1st sess.

———. Government Utilization of Private Agencies in Technical Assistance. Staff Study No. 5. 84th Cong., 2nd sess.

———. Subcommittee on the United Nations Charter. The Status and Role of the Secretariat of the United Nations. Staff Study No. 12. 84th Cong., 2nd sess.

———. Review of the United Nations Charter. Compilation of Staff Studies Prepared for the Use of the . . . 83d Cong., 2nd sess. Sen. Doc. 164.

———. Committee on the Judiciary. Debt Claims and World War II Assets. Hearings before Subcommittee. September 29, 1955. 84th Cong., 1st sess.

Joint Committee on the Economic Report. Foreign Economic Policy. Report of . . . to the Congress of the United States. 84th Cong., 2nd sess. Sen. Rep. 1312.

———. Subcommittee on Foreign Economic Policy. Foreign Economic Policy. Hearings November 9 and 17, 1955. 84th Cong., 1st sess.

Executive Departments

Department of State. The Geneva Conference of Foreign Ministers, October 17–November 16, 1955. (International Organization and Conference Series I, 30.)

International Cooperation Administration, Mutual Security Legislation and Related Documents. 1955.

POLITICAL THEORY, RESEARCH, AND METHODOLOGY

Historical Inevitability. By ISAIAH BERLIN. (London, New York, and Toronto: Oxford University Press. 1955. Pp. 79. $2.00.)

This first Auguste Comte Memorial lecture at the London School of Economics is now published in what must be a considerably expanded form, since not even Isaiah Berlin could pour some 40,000 words into a single lecture. There is a certain irony, of which Mr. Berlin seems quite aware, in dedicating this particular piece to the memory of Comte. For the lecture is a lively and thoroughgoing attack on all forms of that "historicism" of which Comte's famous sequence of theological-metaphysical-positive stages is an outstanding example. Comte, however, gets off lightly, and the heavy fire is directed toward Hegelians, Marxists, Spenglerians, Toynbeans, and all who see in the course of history a pattern of inevitability. The essay is written with Mr. Berlin's customary fluency and clarity. With commendable considerateness, he has banished to several long footnotes the more technically philosophical parts of the discussion.

Determinism is indeed Mr. Berlin's main target. But he also attacks historical relativism as another dissolvent of the proper moral energies necessary to our time. Lest the reader, not as aware as Mr. Berlin of the vast spaces philosophical thought provides, might think the lecturer's own position purely negative he gives a neat statement of his position, which he does not label, but which we will risk calling realistic pluralism, duly but not excessively spiced with skepticism: "The same facts can be arranged in many patterns, seen from many perspectives, displayed in many lights, all of them equally valid, although some will be more suggestive or fertile in one field than in another, or unify many fields in some illuminating fashion, or, alternatively, bring out disparities and open chasms; some of these patterns will lie closer than others to the metaphysical or religious outlook of this or that historian or historical thinker. Yet through it all the facts themselves will remain relatively 'hard'." (p. 70)

The whole lecture is a stimulating challenge to debate, as befits the pluralist point of view. Here we can note but one point, which has by no means escaped the reviewers. Mr. Berlin only tangentially deals with what must seem to many historians the obvious fact about deterministic beliefs: those who hold such beliefs most firmly do in life behave as if they were free moral agents, as if every moment were a choice between duty and sin. This is as true of convinced Marxists as of convinced Calvinists. Mr. Berlin knows this, of course, but he does not think it worth stressing. He prefers instead to emphasize the degree to which such deterministic beliefs corrupt normal common sense in the minds of men, which he rather hopefully assumes might otherwise operate rather as his own mind does. This conviction that thoroughly formulated systematic ideas about the behavior and destiny of men in society somehow poisons human behavior leads him at least once to list as bad influences practically everybody from Montesquieu to Sorel who has pronounced on men as political animals. It leads him indeed close to the edge of an anti-social-scientism where he has the usual assortment of very disagreeable associates. Of course the social sciences are immature, imperfect, and sometimes painfully cocksure, but they are surely not basically perverse, wrongheaded, wholly outside the tradition of reason and sense Mr. Berlin himself values so highly?—CRANE BRINTON, Harvard University.

The Psychology of Politics. By H. J. EYSENCK.
(New York: Frederick A. Praeger. 1955.
Pp. xvi, 317. $6.00.)

Here is a work to be handled at arm's length, neither clasped to the bosom, nor rejected out of hand. In three excellent chapters Eysenck summarizes most lucidly the problems of measuring public opinion, political attitudes, and voting decisions. Then with some skill he deals with the way in which political (and other) attitudes may be organized in a person's mind and develops some geometric devices for portraying the interrelationships of attitudes. At this point, what is conceived to be the major substantive contribution of the book comes into view—the concept of a continuum of tough- and tender-mindedness (T-scale) which gives a personality dimension "vertical" to the more usual radical-conservative ideological dimension. Much of the remainder of the book is devoted to elaboration of this view, relating it to other studies which are, so it seems, rather rudely pressed into service to support this tender-mindedness dimension. Finally, a theoretical basis is provided from the fundamental concepts of learning theory.

I am indebted to Richard Christie for the opportunity to examine his reworking of Eysenck's data, testing it for internal consistency and comparing Eysenck's inferences to the evidential support. Briefly, under this scrutiny (and additional scrutiny by Rokeach), the T-scale collapses. Yet the idea that there may be some such dimension (separating fascists and communists, on the one hand, from liberals and conservatives on the other) does not fall to the ground and the suspicion remains that, with other items, such a dimension may yet be measured.

In one or two other aspects, I find the work not quite satisfying. In a chapter entitled "A Theory of Political Action," Eysenck gives a summary of learning theory and its relation to attitude formation which seems curiously foreign to the world of politics, rather a disembodied discourse on an interesting but unrelated (because he does not relate it) problem. There is no harm done, but one could wish, with such a title, some closer guidance for those of us who seek help from the psychologists for our analysis of political processes. Further, perhaps because of the gingerly handling of psychoanalytic theory, the book gives an overpowering array of the interrelationships of belief items, but minimal insight into why these, rather than other, beliefs happen to go together.

But do not be quick to put The Psychology of Politics back upon the shelf. The data, studies, methods, and concepts (T-scale aside) discussed therein give better insights into the nature of ideologies than is available in most of the literature dealing with political ideas. And surely Eysenck has offered a useful beginning for a growing objective and operational (testable) analysis of political beliefs.—ROBERT E. LANE, Yale University.

Jean-Jacques Rousseau: A Critical Study of His Life and Writings. By F. C. GREEN.
(Cambridge, Eng.: Cambridge University Press. 1955. Pp. 376. $5.00.)

In this book Professor Green undertakes to do two things: to give an account of Rousseau's life and character, and to show their influence on his literary and political works. The first task is accomplished in a sympathetic yet objective manner. The second reveals some difficulties that likely are inherent in a biographical approach to the interpretation of political philosophy.

Green's portrait of Rousseau is that of a not entirely unattractive man. No effort is made to minimize his defects of character, and these are perceptively traced to their roots in childhood. The many facets of his complex personality are judiciously described. Due weight is given to Rousseau's chronic illness in the explanation of his behavior. He does not come off second best in the account of his quarrels with Diderot and Hume. The explanation of his transformation on the road to Vincennes is excellent and shows Green to be a subtle psychologist.

The analysis of Rousseau's political writings fails to bring The Social Contract into sharp focus and is less convincing than the biographical parts of the book. Rousseau not only had a childhood but was acquainted with the literature of political theory, and we may assume that the latter also influenced his thinking. It is true that in the Discourse on the Arts and Sciences he "universalized his personal experience" (p. 100). But one is less sure that the "whole doctrine of natural human goodness was the involuntary projection, on a universal scale, of Rousseau's own moral and spiritual dilemma" (p. 122). No doubt he avoided many of his moral obligations, but this is not sufficient reason to interpret both Emile and The Social Contract as efforts to escape duty by equating it with necessity. Green grants neither Rousseau's pupil nor his citizen potentialities for moral growth and action. In consequence he regards the transformation which men undergo in Rousseau's society as caused by a "mysterious power" (p. 280) the nature of which is never explained. And social spirit becomes "the mysterious elan that brought men together originally into the political association" (pp. 292-93). An alternative interpretation is that Rousseau thinks of men as making the social contract from motives of expediency and self-interest. Given the appropriate form of association, they are transformed into moral beings in whom there gradually develops social sentiment as they come to appreciate life in a society guided by their general will.

Despite these shortcomings, which are not evident in the analysis of Rousseau's more literary efforts, Green has made a significant contribution to the re-evaluation of Rousseau's thought. The book is full of insights into the connections between his life and writings. It never fails to be both illuminating and stimulating. All Rousseau scholars, and indeed all students of political theory, are permanently indebted to Green for having done a job that has long needed doing.—JOHN W. CHAPMAN, Smith College.

Symbols and Society: Fourteenth Symposium of the Conference on Science, Philosophy, and Religion. EDITED BY LYMAN BRYSON, LOUIS FINKELSTEIN, HUDSON HOAGLAND, AND R. M. MACIVER (New York: Conference on Science, Philosophy and Religion in Their Relation to the Democratic Way of Life, Inc. 1955. Distributed by Harper & Brothers, New York and London. Pp. xi, 611. $6.00.)

In the many-faceted program of this conference, papers were included on "The Queen as Political Symbol in the British Commonwealth," by Thomas Hichie Adam, and on "Symbols of Political Community," by Karl M. Deutsch. There are several additional papers which contain considerable references to political symbols.

Methods in the Study of Administrative Leadership. BY RALPH M. STODDILL AND CARROLL L. SHARTLE. (Columbus, Ohio: The Ohio State University. 1955. Pp. xv, 77. $2.00.)

Developed from the "Ohio State Leadership Studies," this monograph describes seven methods for study of leadership in organizations. It will be followed by six separate studies on application of the methods, scheduled for release during the first half of 1956.

The Engineering of Consent. EDITED BY EDWARD L. BERNAYE. CONTRIBUTIONS BY HOWARD WALDEN CUTLER, SHERWOOD DODGE, BENJAMIN FINE, DORIS E. FLEISCHMAN, A. ROBERT GINEBURGH, JOHN PRICE JONES, AND NICHOLAS SAMSTAG. (Norman, Okla.: University of Oklahoma Press. 1955. Pp. viii, 246. $3.75.)

This is a book on how "trained practitioners" can "engineer public support." They will use "findings of social scientists" to know how better to make strategic use of symbols, etc. effective. The book should be of interest not only to practitioners but to students of public opinion and of democracy who, like some students of law, are interested in more than the use of art for support of causes.

Democrazia e Cultura. BY HANS KELSEN. (Bologna, Italy: Il Mulino. 1955. Pp. xxviii, 175.)

A translation into Italian of three of Kelsen's publications—two in German: Vom Wesen und Wert der Demokratie and Was ist Gerechtigkeit; one in this REVIEW: "Absolutism and Relativism in Philosophy and Politics"—with an introduction by Nicola Matteucci.

SELECTED ARTICLES AND DOCUMENTS ON POLITICAL THEORY

FRANCIS G. WILSON

University of Illinois

History and Criticism

Abernathy, Elton. Huey Long: Oratorical "Wealth Sharing." Southern Speech Journal. Winter, 1955.

Artigas, José. El Tema de la Educación en Fichte. Revista de Estudios Políticos. July-August, 1955.

Baker, Herschel. Where Liberty Lies: Freedom of Conscience in Milton's Day and in Ours. Southwest Review. Winter, 1956.

Bengston, Hermann. Theodor Mommsen. Die Welt als Geschichte. 15/2. 1955.

Beumann, H. Die Historiographie des Mittelalters als Quelle für die Ideengeschichte des Königtums. Historische Zeitschrift. December, 1955.

Bonjour, E. Johannes Müller als Beschirmer Deutscher Universitäten. Historische Zeitschrift. October, 1955.

Bourdon, Jean. Le Liberalisme Français et le Libéralisme Anglo-Saxon de la Constituante à 1877. Revue Politique et Parlementaire. January, 1956.

Briessmann, Adalbert. Tacitus und das Flavische Geschichtsbild. Hermes. Heft 10, 1955.

Buseh, Francis X. The Haymarket Riot and the Trial of the Anarchists. Journal of the Illinois State Historical Society. Autumn, 1955.

Calogero, Guido. Socrate. Nuova Antologia. November, 1955.

Castele, J. J. Van de. Indices d'une Mentalité Chrétienne dans la Législation Civile de Constantin. Bulletin de l'Association Guillaume Budé. December, 1955.

Chilton, C. W. The Roman Law of Treason under the Early Principate. Journal of Roman Studies. XLV/1-2. 1955.

Christensen, Merton A. Deism in Joel Barlow's Early Work. American Literature. January, 1956.

Cohen, Gustave. Le Caractère Européen de la Civilisation Occidentale au Moyen Age. Les Cahiers de Bruges. October, 1955.

Conkin, Paul. The Church Establishment in North Carolina, 1765-1776. North Carolina Historical Review. January, 1955.

Correia, Alexandre. A Política de José de Maistre. Revista Filosófica. May, 1955.

Crutwell, Patrick. Wordsworth, the Public, and the People. Sewanee Review. January-March, 1956.

Elton, G. R. King or Minister: The Man Behind the Henrician Reformation. History. October, 1954.

Étiemble. New China and Chinese Philosophies. Diogenes. No. 11, 1955.

Fernandez-Carvajal, Rodrigo. La Historiografía Constitucional de Sempere y Guarinos. Revista de Estudios Políticos. July-August, 1955.

Ferrero, Giuseppe Guido. La "Tirannide" di Vittorio Alfieri. Giornale Storico della Letteratura Italiana. Fasc. 399, 1955.

Foerster, Werner. Das Wesen der Gnosis. Die Welt als Geschichte. 15/2. 1955.

Friedman, Bernard. The Nation-State: The Machiavellian Element in Shakespeare's Julius Caesar. Historian. Autumn, 1955.

Gallinger, August. Kants Geschichts- und Staatsphilosophie. Zeitschrift für Philosophische Forschung. IX/2. 1955.

Garaudy, R. Deux Anniversaires: Engels, la Révolution d'Octobre. Cahiers du Communisme. November, 1955.

Ghio, Michelangelo. Condorcet. Filosofia. VI/3. 1955.

Giusso, Lorenzo. Acerca de Campanella. Revista Filosófica. May, 1955.

Glassburner, Bruce. Alfred Marshall on Economic History and Historical Development. Quarterly Journal of Economics. November, 1955.

Gordon, Scott. The London Economist and the High Tide of Laissez Faire. Journal of Political Economy. December, 1955.

Ha Tai Kim. The Logic of the Illogical: Zen and Hegel. Philosophy East and West. April, 1955.

Hinton, R. W. K. Was Charles I a Tyrant? Review of Politics. January, 1956.

Jones, A. H. M. The Elections Under Augustus. Journal of Roman Studies. XLV/1-2. 1955.

Jones, A. H. M. The Social Structure of Athens in the Fourth Century B. C. Economic History Review. December, 1955.

Jones, Stanley L. Agrarian Radicalism in Illinois' Constitutional Convention. Journal of the Illinois State Historical Society. Autumn, 1955.

Joyaux, Georges J. Victor Cousin and American Transcendentalists. French Review. December, 1955.

Kantorowicz, Ernst. Invocatio Nominis Imperatoris. Bollettino (Palermo). III/1955.

Kaplan, Lawrence S. The Philosophes and the American Revolution. Social Science. January, 1956.

Kesser, Armin. Der Geist Kierkegaards. Merkur. November, 1955.

Koenigsberger, H. G. The Organization of Revolutionary Parties in France and the Netherlands, during the Sixteenth Century. Journal of Modern History. December, 1955.

Krook, Dorothy. Thomas Hobbes's Doctrines of Meaning and Truth. Philosophy. January, 1956.

Langrod-Wogan, Michèle. La Philosophie Politique du Roi Stanislas. Revue Internationale d'Histoire Politique et Constitutionnelle. January-March, 1955.

Lauer, Rosemary Z. Bellarmine on Liberum Arbitrium. Modern Schoolman. January, 1956.

Lefebvre, G. À Propos de Tocqueville. Annales Historique de la Révolution Française. October-December, 1955.

Lefevre, Renato. Le Riforme di Pio IXe la Liberta di Stampa. Studi Romani. November-December, 1955.

Levi, Albert W. The Idea of Socrates: The Philosophic Hero in the Nineteenth Century. Journal of the History of Ideas. January, 1956.

Leyden, W. von. John Locke and Natural Law. Philosophy. January, 1956.

Loewenberg, Bert James. John William Burgess, the Scientific Method, and the Hegelian Philosophy of History. Mississippi Valley Historical Review. December, 1955.

Loubère, Leo A. Louis Blanc's Philosophy of History. Journal of the History of Ideas. January, 1956.

McCandless, Perry. The Political Philosophy and Political Personality of Thomas Hart Benton. Missouri Historical Review. January, 1956.

McCloskey, John C. Cooper's Political Views. Modern Philology. November, 1955.

Menzel, P. Schiller und Kant. Kant-Studien. 47/3. 1955/56.

Montesquieu. [Various Articles.] Revue Internationale de Philosophie. Nos. 33-34, 1955.

Morton, Luis M. Eighteenth Century Liberalism and Its Effect on Mexico. Records of the American Catholic Historical Society of Philadelphia. September, 1955.

Neumann, Eduard. Zum "Ritterlichen Tu-gendsystem." Wirkende. Wort. 1 Sonderheft. 1955.

Noble, David W. The Religion of Progress in America, 1890-1914. Social Research. Winter, 1955.

Peckin, Allan. The Origins of Southern Anti-Semitism. Chicago Jewish Forum. Winter, 1955-56.

Pittman, Carter. George Mason: The Architect of American Liberty. Georgia Bar Journal. November, 1955.

Porshnev, B. F. The Legend of the Seventeenth Century in French History. Past and Present. November, 1955.

Rattray, R. F. The Racial Clue in History. Quarterly Review. January, 1956.

Redslob, Robert. Die Staatsgedanken der Aufklärung in der Französischen Revolution. Zeitschrift für Politik. July, 1955.

Religion [Articles on Seventeenth Century in France.] XVII<sup>e</sup> Siècle. October, 1955.

Rodríguez Aranda, L. Platón Como Pensador, Político y Artista. Revista de Estudios Políticos. July-August, 1955.

Rosenberg, Stuart E. Notes on the Political Attitudes of the Jewish Tidings. Jewish Social Studies. October, 1955.

Rowen, Herbert H. A Second Thought on Locke's First Treatise. Journal of the History of Ideas. January, 1956.

Saliba, Djémil. Philosophical Symbolism and the Use of Myth among Arab Philosophers. Diogenes. No. 10, 1955.

Schwabl, Hans. Zur Theogonie des Hesiod. Gymnasium. 62/6. 1955.

Scott, Leland H. Methodist Theology in America in the Nineteenth Century. Religion in Life. Winter, 1955-56.

Sexan, Richard. Bismarck: Fülle und Grenze der Macht. Neues Abendland. December, 1955.

Shottelius, Herbert. Bolívar und San Martín. Die Welt als Geschichte. 15/2. 1955.

Sieburg, Friedrich. Albert. Merkur. January, 1956.

Simon, Walter M. Prince Hardenberg. Review of Politics. January, 1956.

Simonetti, Maria. Possibili Influenze di Hobbes sull' Pensiero Pascaliano. Humanitas. X/4. 1955.

Simpson, Alan. How Democratic was Roger Williams? William and Mary Quarterly. January, 1956.

Singer, Irving. The World of George Santayana. Perspectives. Autumn, 1955.

Smith, David G. Lenin's "Imperialism": A

Study in the Unity of Theory and Practice. Journal of Politics. November, 1955.

Smith, James M. Political Suppression of Seditious Criticism. Historian. Autumn, 1955.

Smith, James M. President John Adams, Thomas Cooper, and Sedition. Mississippi Valley Historical Review. December, 1955.

Soto, Jean de. Édouard de Laboulaye. Revue Internationale d'Histoire Politique et Constitutionnelle. April-June, 1955.

Spain. Representative Institutions, Sixteenth Century. [Various Articles.] Americas. January, 1956.

Stadler, P. Politik und Geschichtsschreibung in der Französischen Revolution, 1814-1830. Historische Zeitschrift. October, 1955.

Stamm, Israel. Sturm und Drang and Conservatism. Germanic Review. December, 1955.

Trevor Roper, Hugh. La Révolution Anglaise de Cromwell. Annales. July-September, 1955.

Tucker, William R. The Legacy of Charles Maurras. Journal of Politics. November, 1955.

Valsecchi, Franco. Il Pensiero Illuministico e la Riforma dello Stato nell'Italia del Settecento. Mitteilungen des Instituts für Österreichische Geschichtsforschung. LXIII/3-4. 1955.

Walsh, P. G. Livy's Preface and the Distortion of History. American Journal of Philology. October, 1955.

Wandruszka, Adam. Grundprobleme der Amerikanischen Geistesgeschichte. Mitteilungen des Instituts für Österreichische Geschichtsforschung. LXIII/3-4. 1955.

Williamson, Chilton. Bentham Looks at America. Political Science Quarterly. December, 1955.

Yanuck, Julius. Thomas Ruffin and North Carolina Slave Law. Journal of Southern History. November, 1955.

Legal Theory and Public Law Issues

Albaladejo García, M. El Hecho Jurídico. Revista de la Facultad de Derecho (Oviedo). June, 1955.

Anderson, J. N. D. Law Reform in the Middle East. International Affairs. January, 1956.

Arens, Richard and Meadow, Arnold. Psycholinguistics and the Confession Dilemma. Columbia Law Review. January, 1956.

Beth, Loren P. Toward a Modern American Theory of Church-State Relationship. Political Science Quarterly. December, 1955.

Bricker, John W. Constitutional Insurance for a Safe Treaty-Making Policy. Dickinson Law Review. January, 1956.

Castberg, Frede. Philosophy of Law in the Scandinavian Countries. American Journal of Comparative Law. Summer, 1955.

Clyde, Lord. The Development of the Law. Scottish Law Review. January, 1956.

Corry, J. A. The Prospects for the Rule of Law. Canadian Journal of Economics and Political Science. November, 1955.

Drago, Roland. L'État d'Urgence et les Libertés Publiques. Revue du Droit Public et de la Science Politique. July-September, 1955.

Franklin, Mitchell. Monadic Legal Theory and the Perspectives for World Law. Philosophy and Phenomenological Research. December, 1955.

Garnett, A. Campbell. Charity and Natural Law. Ethics. January, 1956.

